The last was a reference to a characterization Mr. Rumsfeld made in January 2003 to contrast Germany and France, which objected to the United States plan to invade Iraq, with neighboring supporters, not all of which are NATO members.

Reviewing NATO's success in standing up to the Soviet threat, "it seems clear that totalitarianism was defeated as much by ideas the West championed then and now as by ICBMs, tanks and warships that the West deployed," Mr. Gates said. The alliance's most effective weapon, he said, was a "shared belief in political and economic freedom, religious toleration, human rights, representative government and the rule of law."

"These values kept our side united, and inspired those on the other side," he added.

Shifting to current threats and challenges, he called on NATO members to support a comprehensive strategy to stabilize Afghanistan, "combining a muscular military effort with effective support for governance, economic development and counternarcotics."

He also urged NATO allies to increase their military spending to meet the benchmark of 2 percent of gross domestic product set by the alliance; only 6 of NATO's 26 members fulfill that standard.

Mr. Gates briefly turned to the war in Iraq, to echo President Bush's insistence that the United States and its partners there must prevail. If chaos tears Iraq apart, Mr. Gates warned, "every member of this alliance will feel the consequences" of regional turmoil and terrorism.

He acknowledged the damage done to America's global standing by its conduct in the campaign against terrorism, particularly in holding detainees without due process at the United States naval base in Cuba.

"There is no question in my mind that Guantánamo and some of the abuses that have taken place in Iraq have negatively impacted the reputation of the United States," Mr. Gates said. "It is also true, though, that there are real terrorists at Guantánamo."

Repeating comments from a number of American officials, Mr. Gates said most members of the Bush administration would like to close the detention center, and he pledged that tribunals for detainees would be conducted in a legitimate and transparent manner.

Gates To Putin: 'One Cold War Is Enough' (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor
AP, February 12, 2007

Pentagon chief Robert Gates responded Sunday to Vladimir Putin's assault on U.S. foreign policy by saying "one Cold War is enough" and that he would go to Moscow to try to reduce tensions. Gates also sought more allied help in Afghanistan.

He delivered his first speech as Pentagon chief at a security conference in Germany and then flew to Pakistan to discuss fears of a renewed spring offensive by Taliban fighters in neighboring Afghanistan.

Pakistan, a close U.S. ally in the fight against terrorism, has faced charges that the Taliban militia stage attacks from Pakistan against Afghan government troops and NATO- and U.S.-led coalition troops.

Gates' rebuke of the Russian president relied on humor and some pointed jabs.

"As an old Cold Warrior, one of yesterday's speeches almost filled me with nostalgia for a less complex time. Almost," Gates said. Then, as the audience chuckled, the defense secretary said he has accepted Putin's invitation to visit Russia.

"We all face many common problems and challenges that must be addressed in partnership with other countries, including Russia," said Gates. "One Cold War was quite enough."

In his speech Saturday, Putin blamed U.S. foreign policy for inciting other countries to seek nuclear weapons to defend themselves from an "almost uncontained use of military force."

The Russian leader said "unilateral, illegitimate actions have not solved a single problem, they have become a hotbed of further conflicts" and that "one state, the United States, has overstepped its national borders in every way."

Gates also made an urgent call for NATO allies to live up to their promises to supply military and economic aid for Afghanistan.

"It is vitally important that the success Afghanistan has achieved not be allowed to slip away through neglect or lack of political will or resolve," Gates said. Failure to muster a strong military effort combined with economic development and a counternarcotics plan "would be a mark of shame," he said.

Gates also said that prisoner abuse scandals in Iraq and Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and other mistakes have damaged America's reputation. It will take work, he said, to prove that the U.S. still is a force for good in the world.

While he did not mention the war in Iraq, Gates told officials at the security conference that Washington must do a better job of explaining its policies and actions.

For the past century, he said, most people believed that "while we might from time to time do something stupid, that we were a force for good in the world."

Many continue to believe that, Gates said. But, he added, "I think we also have made some mistakes and have not presented our case as well as we might in many instances. I think we have to work on that."

The bulk of his speech was devoted to the future of the NATO alliance and the need to work together to defend against threats.

Gates also sketched out the challenges ahead, from Iran's nuclear ambitions and the situation in the Middle East to China's recent anti-satellite tests and Russia's arms sales.

Just eight weeks on the job, Gates used the conference and a NATO gathering this past week to debut on the international stage and meet privately with some of his counterparts.

In other comments, he said the Bush administration would like to close the Guantanamo Bay detention facility, but there are some terrorists there who should never be let free. Gates also said detainee trials there will be conducted in the open and with adequate defense for the prisoners.

The first public test of Gates' diplomatic skills came at a venue that at times was dominated by his more bombastic Pentagon predecessor, Donald H. Rumsfeld.

So as Gates neared the end of his remarks, he made a deliberate move to separate himself from Rumsfeld.

In the run-up to the Iraq war, Rumsfeld sharply criticized nations opposed to the conflict — specifically France and Germany — and referred to them as part of "Old Europe."

Without mentioning Rumsfeld's name, Gates said some people have tried to divide the allies along lines such as East and West, North and South.

"I'm even told that some have even spoken in terms of 'old' Europe versus 'new,'" Gates said. "All of these characterizations belong in the past."

In Pakistan, Gates planned talks with the president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf and other top officials on cooperation in counterterrorism and efforts by Pakistan to stop militants from moving across the border with Afghanistan, a senior Pakistani government official said Sunday. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because he did not have the authority to speak formally about Gates' visit.

DOJ_NMG_0130255

Pakistan denies the charges that the Taliban are staging attacks from inside Pakistan and says it has deployed some 80,000 troops along its rugged border with Afghanistan to track down militants.

Pakistan's border regions along Afghanistan long have been suspected to be the hiding places for al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden and his deputy, Ayman al-Zawahri.

American forces in eastern Afghanistan have launched artillery rounds into Pakistan to strike Taliban fighters who attack remote U.S. outposts, the commander of U.S. forces in the region told The Associated Press on Sunday.

Musharraf acknowledged recently that his outgunned Pakistani frontier guards have allowed insurgents to cross the border and said the army soon would fence parts of the border to stem the problem.

The Pentagon has plans to extend its recent buildup of several thousand combat troops in Afghanistan, initially announced as lasting until late spring, well into next year, a senior U.S. military official said last week.

That move would keep U.S. troop levels at between 26,000 and 27,000 until at least the spring of 2008.

Russia Intensifies Efforts To Rebuild Its Military Machine (CSM)

By Fred Weir

The Christian Science Monitor, February 12, 2007

MOSCOW

At a major security conference this past weekend, Russian President Vladimir Putin blasted the US for its militaristic approach to foreign policy, saying its actions were "nourishing an arms race."

But little noticed amid the sharp US and European response to Mr. Putin's comments is Russia's burgeoning military-industrial complex, generally thought to have collapsed with the Soviet Union.

The cold war days when the USSR matched the US missile-for-missile may be gone. But experts say that Russia is increasingly capable of turning out cutting-edge weaponry and selling it to countries that are shunned by Western suppliers.

"The fact that our country is playing a leading role in the world in the sphere of export of military production is a sign that the Russian defense industry has not only survived but has a powerful potential for further development," Sergei Chemezov, the head of the state arms-export monopoly Rosoboronexport, told a political meeting late last year.

Russian defense budgets have been soaring since Putin came to power, buoyed by a rising tide of petroleum income, and are set to jump by 23 percent in 2007 to a post-Soviet high of $32.4 billion. Moscow does arms business with over 70 countries, including China, Iran, and Venezuela, and in 2006 exported $6 billion worth of arms.

"Under Putin there has been a wish and an attempt to go beyond the Soviet inheritance," in developing high-tech military capabilities, says Ivan Saffranchuk, Moscow director of the independent World Security Institute. "Now there's cash, and a good political situation, to intensify that effort."

Missiles for Iran

• Last week Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov unveiled a $189 billion rearmament program that will replace about half of Russia's current military equipment by 2015. Among the armed forces' acquisitions will be a completely revamped early-warning radar network, new intercontinental missiles, a fleet of supersonic Tu-160 strategic bombers, and 31 new warships, including aircraft carriers.

• Last month Mr. Putin offered to partner with India to build a futuristic "fifth generation" fighter plane, which Russian designers is already under development and could be flying as early as 2009. Only the US has so far managed to field one of these new era combat jets – which have breakthrough capabilities of stealthiness, supersonic cruising, ultramaneuverability and over-the-horizon electronic visibility. And at $260 million per model, the new F/A-22 Raptor is by far the world's most expensive warplane.

• Russia is already supplying India with the Sukhoi-30MKI, an advanced "fourth generation" warplane that consistently defeats its Western counterparts, such as the frontline US fighters, the F-15C and F-16. Versions of the Su-30 are also being sold to China, Venezuela, and Malaysia.

• At a recent press conference, Putin said that Russia has nothing to fear from US missile defense systems because the new Topol-M intercontinental ballistic missile has stealth characteristics that enable it to penetrate the American shield. "But this is not all," he added, mentioning a "new generation ... of strategic weapons systems," against which missile defense systems would be "powerless."

• In January, Moscow announced it had completed deliveries of 29 sophisticated Tor-M1 mobile antiaircraft batteries to Iran, and Mr. Ivanov hinted that Russia might also supply S-300 long-range air defense weapons. Experts believe that the Tor-M1, which can track 48 targets simultaneously, could seriously complicate any potential air strike on Iran's nuclear facilities.

DOJ_NMG_0130256

"The Tor, in combination with the S-300, would provide a large envelope of protection to the Iranian nuclear complex," says Ariel Cohen, an analyst with the conservative Heritage Foundation in Washington.

• According to Russian media reports, last year Israel complained to Moscow over Hizbullah's use of Russian-made antitank missiles, which inflicted serious casualties and inhibited Israel's armored mobility, during last summer's war in Lebanon. The Israeli media pointed to the Kornet-E, a new laser-guided rocket that can punch through meter-thick armor at a range of five kilometers, which Russia has officially provided to Syria. Russia denied that the weapons might have been diverted to Hizbullah, however.

Key supplier for 'rogue regimes'

The former USSR maintained a sprawling military-industrial complex that absorbed as much as a third of the country's GDP. With the demise of the Soviet Union, defense budgets imploded, the Russian armed forces virtually halted procurement of new weapons, thousands of factories went bankrupt, and skilled workers migrated en masse to other jobs.

Though capital is now flowing back into the defense sector, experts doubt that the Putin-era increases are enough to restore the vast web of specialized industries that kept the Soviet military machine supplied with everything from bullets to antisatellite missiles.

"There have been dramatic increases in procurement funds, but this is not being used efficiently," says Alexander Golts, a military expert with the online newspaper Yezhednevny Zhurnal. "I am dubious about Russia's ability to produce weapons of a truly new generation."

Most Russian arms exports during the 1990s involved sell-offs of Soviet-era stockpiles, including small arms, armored vehicles, and older aircraft. Those fueled vicious wars in Africa and the former Yugoslavia, but did not worry the West much. But Putin-era sales have shifted increasingly to sophisticated weapons, including warplanes, precision-guided munitions, and advanced air-defense systems.

"The US still has a solid lead in the top end of weaponry," says Mr. Cohen. "But at the next level Russia is advancing fast. Geopolitically, it is cornering the market for rogue regimes, such as Iran and Venezuela, and this is most worrisome."

Overhaul needed

Experts say that about 1,550 Russian firms are now involved in arms production, and they have proven adept at modernizing Soviet designs. For example, the Su-30, which accounted for almost half of all Russia's arms-export earnings in 2005, is a development of the USSR's Su-27 frontline combat jet.

But fresh products, such as Sukhoi's new T-50 "fifth-generation" fighter, could give the industry a needed boost.

"The situation in our military-industrial complex is improving, and this [fifth- generation] project will change our position radically," says Konstantin Makiyenko, deputy director of the independent Center of Analysis of Strategies and Technologies in Moscow. "If India agrees to participate, the [financing] will be better. It could give a big boost to many branches of our military industry."

Still, some experts say that sweeping reforms and more state funding are needed before Russia's arms industry can resupply a flagging military machine with cutting-edge weapons, much less compete globally with Western arms merchants.

"We need a completely new military industry, not just remnants of the old one," says Vitaly Shlykov, a former Soviet war planning official and member of the Russian Defense Ministry's public advisory council. "And these new defense industries will need a lot of attention, and an influx of resources on the level that today is only going into the oil and gas industry."

Putin Seeks Expanded Ties With Saudis On Arab Tour (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates, Feb. 11 — President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia arrived Sunday night in Riyadh, the Saudi capital, for a visit intended to expand trade and military links between the nations, among the world's largest oil producers.

The overnight visit was part of a three-day tour of the Middle East intended to bolster bilateral ties with major Arab countries.

Mr. Putin and King Abdullah, the Saudi leader, were expected to discuss Iran's nuclear program, the war in Iraq and the Arab-Israeli conflict, in addition to the simmering Lebanese political crisis, officials said. In an interview with the Russian news agency ITAR-Tass, King Abdullah emphasized that he also hoped the two nations could expand cooperation on investment, air transportation and customs conventions as well as scientific and educational exchanges.

Mr. Putin was greeted at the airport by King Abdullah; Crown Prince Sultan; Prince Saud al-Faisal, the foreign minister; and other Saudi officials, the official Saudi press agency reported. The Russian president, who was accompanied by a trade delegation and various officials, attended a state dinner later in the evening and was to sign trade agreements with Abdullah and other Saudi officials, ITAR-Tass reported.

DOJ_NMG_0130257

He was expected to meet Monday with Saudi businessmen and to visit the Saudi National Museum in Riyadh before traveling to Qatar and Jordan.

Russia has sought to bolster its military and trade relations with countries in the Middle East and is hoping to win a major order from Saudi Arabia for Russian weapons. Russia and Saudi Arabia had no diplomatic relations for more than 50 years until they were restored after Iraq's invasion of Kuwait in August 1990. In September 2003, Abdullah, then the crown prince, traveled to Moscow, warming relations further between the countries.

In a speech on Saturday at a NATO security conference in Munich, Mr. Putin accused the United States of provoking a new nuclear arms race by developing ballistic missile defenses, undermining international institutions and making the Middle East more unstable through its clumsy handling of the war in Iraq.

Mr. Putin recited a list of complaints about American domination of global affairs, including many of the themes that have strained relations between the Kremlin and the United States during his seven-year administration.

The comments were the sternest yet from Mr. Putin, who has long bristled over criticism from the United States and its European allies as he and other former Soviet intelligence officials have consolidated their hold on Russia's government, energy reserves and arms-manufacturing and trading complexes.

Russian Official Says Insurgency In Chechnya Has Been Tamed (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

MOSCOW, Feb. 11 — Russia's defense minister said Sunday that Russia had succeeded in its latest war in Chechnya, defeating separatists and what he called their "emissaries from 50 states."

"We have scored a success in Chechnya," said the defense minister, Sergei B. Ivanov. "The problem has been solved."

Mr. Ivanov, speaking before an international audience of defense officials and diplomats at the Munich Conference on Security Policy, underscored the Kremlin's confidence that the second war in Chechnya since the dissolution of the Soviet Union had largely ended, and that the separatists' ranks had been shrunk by military operations and offers of amnesty.

The second Chechnya war began late in 1999. There has been a sharp turn in Russia's favor since late 2004, and the insurgents have not conducted a large-scale guerrilla operation since 2005 or a major terrorist attack since the seizure of a public school in the autumn of 2004.

The military situation in Chechnya contrasts sharply with that of the United States in Afghanistan and Iraq, where American forces are struggling against growing insurgencies.

Attacks still occur in and near Chechnya, and an insurgency persists, mixing militant Islam, separatism and local vengeance codes.

But the pace of fighting is much slower than it was two years ago, and many of the insurgency's principal leaders — including Shamil Basayev, the terrorist leader — have been killed since 2005.

The turnaround has defied predictions from many analysts and critics of Russia, who believed that its army was hopelessly bogged down and that its rough and often indiscriminate tactics were creating more insurgents than were killed.

Russia has also found strong indigenous forces to serve as local proxies to do much of the continued fighting. These military allies, criticized by human rights organizations as corrupt and ruthlessly brutal, are now largely in control of the region's government.

Mr. Ivanov drew a distinction between Chechnya and the wars that the United States is fighting. He noted, for example, that Chechnya "is a small territory compared to Afghanistan or Iraq."

Mr. Ivanov is viewed as a possible successor to President Vladimir V. Putin, whose second term ends next year.

Kasparov's Gambit (WP)

By Fred Hiatt

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

If any ordinary person predicted trouble ahead for the cocky and seemingly untouchable KGB-regime of Russian President Vladimir Putin, you might say he ought to have his head examined.

But if the head happened to contain one of the most formidable brains of our era, you might at least listen to the argument. Garry Kasparov, legendary world chess champion and now a leader of Russia's political dissidents, possesses such a brain. And having peered two or three or 10 moves into the future, Kasparov says that Putin's petro-Kremlin autocracy may be more brittle than it seems as it approaches a promised presidential succession next year.

DOJ_NMG_0130258

Putin, who traveled to Munich this weekend to alternately bash and condescend to the West, certainly doesn't seem to worry, and why should he? German prime ministers jump onto his payroll as they leave office. Foreign oil executives thank him obsequiously as he pockets their fields. Political opponents abroad turn up poisoned, neighboring countries are bullied, and Putin pays no price. He sells weapons to Iran, and U.S. officials are grateful that he's not doing worse.

At home, meanwhile, he has systematically neutered anyone and anything that might challenge him: the press, big business, parliament, political parties, governors, mayors, civic organizations. Kasparov, who has helped gather the remnants of opposition from across the ideological spectrum into an umbrella group called Other Russia, admits it's an uneven match.

The regime raided Other Russia's office in December and confiscated all the books and documents it could find. When the group tried to stage a rally, 600 people were detained on their way to Moscow, and the few thousand demonstrators who made it were surrounded by police in far greater numbers. Noting how stolen elections became the focus for popular uprisings in Ukraine and elsewhere, Putin changed election law to make it almost impossible for an opposition candidate to qualify for a spot on the ballot.

"If we have to evaluate our chances today -- slim to none," Kasparov says, noting how the absence of political space constricts any strategizing. "If you're at risk of being mated in one or two, you can't think about pawn structure for the long term."

And yet Kasparov -- fast-talking, exuberant, indignant one moment and laughing sardonically the next -- clearly relishes the fight. He was, after all, the youngest world champion ever, who famously took on the darling of the Soviet chess establishment and prevailed, and then took on the world chess establishment, and then IBM's Deep Blue -- and remained, through ups and downs, the world's No. 1-ranked player for longer than anyone else in history.

"He may not be a politician," says a senior U.S. official who knows him, "but he's proved to be a masterful dissident opposition organizer, and unfortunately that's what Russia needs right now." Kasparov, 43, has "passion, toughness, fearlessness and a good organizational head, both operational and conceptual."

And Kasparov believes that not all the challenges are on the opposition's side. As Putin contemplates retirement, he needs a successor strong enough to preserve the regime but not so strong as to challenge whatever wealth or power Putin intends to take with him, Kasparov says.

Beneath Putin a half-dozen would-be heirs battle each other in a "lawless jungle," and "they know that the winner in the battle will eat the others alive." Many Russians feel left out of the oil boom that has brought skyscrapers and Ferraris to Moscow. And the regime's repression of Other Russia reflects an anxiety unsurprising in rulers who have stifled most channels of free expression and complaint.

"If we succeed in uniting behind a candidate and that candidate is not registered, it could lead people to rally," Kasparov says. "And 50,000 might be enough for the regime to collapse because of its paranoia."

Ultimately the regime's vulnerability lies in its basic nature, Kasparov suggests. In the system Putin has created, Kasparov sees elements of feudalism ("local bosses loyal to the top man in exchange for rights to loot the region"), Mussolini-style corporate fascism and old-style KGB brutality. But in the end, "this is not the geopolitical monster of Soviet times. This is all about money. The government is business. It's about Gazprom, it's about Rosneft."

Coincidentally, when I asked Turkey's visiting foreign minister last week about energy politics and relations with Russia, he said, "Putin himself is an expert in this. He studied very well. He is like the CEO of an energy company."

"Putin leads a ruling elite that has very different dreams than in Soviet times," Kasparov says. "They're all thinking about their great life in the Cote d'Azur."

How they may behave if they see their faction losing out, and their wealth in danger, is not easy to predict. Which is, in the end, as far out on a limb as the chess master will climb: "You can probably count on an interesting year ahead of us," he says. Then he prepares to fly home and make it more so.

fredhiatt@washpost.com

Olmert Withholds Judgment On Pact (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, February 12, 2007

JERUSALEM -- Israel wouldn't automatically reject the Palestinian unity government accord between Hamas and Fatah, even though it doesn't contain recognition of the Jewish state, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said yesterday.

"Israel neither rejects nor accepts the agreements at this stage," Mr. Olmert said at a weekly Cabinet meeting. "Like the international community, we're studying what was achieved and what was said."

DOJ_NMG_0130259

By withholding judgment on the agreement reached last week in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, analysts said, Israel is being careful not to rupture ties with Palestinian moderates such as President Mahmoud Abbas just a week before Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice arrives in the region for a three-way summit with Mr. Olmert and Mr. Abbas.

The Mecca accord has already breached a previously united front among the Quartet of peace-process sponsors -- the United States, United Nations, European Union and Russia -- to boycott a Palestinian government that refuses to recognize Israel, previous peace agreements or renounce violence.

Worried that sponsors of the peace process might follow the lead of Russia and endorse the agreement, Israel also doesn't want to risk staking out a position that will be blatantly at odds with the international community.

"Some of the leaders around the world are saying, 'Hold on, and wait and see what government is formed,' " said Gershon Baskin, the head of the Israel/Palestine Center for Research and Information.

"Secretary of State Rice is very serious about making progress in the trilateral talks, and closing the door on it would look bad," he said.

Although the Palestinians have not said who will fill the top Cabinet posts, there is wide speculation that the new finance minister will be Salam Fayyad and that the deputy prime minister could be Mohammed Dahlan -- two figures with strong ties to the United States and its allies.

Israeli newspapers, meanwhile, have quoted anonymous sources in the Israeli defense establishment suggesting the Mecca accord will boost chances for a prisoner exchange that would free Cpl. Gilad Shalit after more than a half year in captivity in the Gaza Strip.

An agreement that puts to an end the escalating violence in Gaza between the military wings of Hamas and Fatah is in Israel's interest, wrote veteran military commentator Ron Ben Yishai.

"Armed chaos allows Iran, Hezbollah and al Qaeda to penetrate the territories and boost their influence," he wrote on the Ynet Web site.

Also yesterday, Israel's Cabinet gave a green light for renovation work on a bridge leading to the Temple Mount in Jerusalem's Old City. The construction and an archeological dig sparked a week of Palestinian demonstrations that culminated Friday in the worst riots on the Temple Mount -- known to Muslims as the Noble Sanctuary -- in years.

Islamic authorities have claimed that Israeli archeological excavations near the base of the Western Wall threaten the foundations under the Al Aqsa Mosque and have sounded the alarm abroad. Israel's Islamic Movement has appealed to the United Nations to intervene and stop the work.

Defiant at the Cabinet meeting, Mr. Olmert insisted that Israel would not allow the Palestinians to dictate what type of renovation work was permissible in the Old City.

Arabs Try Outreach To Israel, U.S. Jews (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, February 12, 2007

WASHINGTON — Arab states, led by Saudi Arabia, are making some of their most public overtures ever to Israel and American Jews in an effort to undercut Iran's growing influence, contain violence in Iraq and Lebanon and push for a Palestinian solution.

The high-profile gestures coincide with Saudi Arabia's lead role last week in brokering a deal for a coalition Palestinian government.

Last month, Prince Turki al-Faisal, Saudi Arabia's departing ambassador to the United States, attended a Washington reception sponsored by American Jewish organizations. The event honored a State Department diplomat appointed to combat anti-Semitism.

The appearance of a Saudi diplomat is "unprecedented," said William Daroff, Washington office director for the United Jewish Communities, which organized the reception.

Saudi Arabia, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates have stepped up contacts with Israel and pro-Israel Jewish groups in the USA. The outreach has the Bush administration's blessing: Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has said six Gulf states and Egypt, Jordan and Israel are a new alignment of moderates to oppose extremists backed by Iran and Syria. She has said an Israeli-Palestinian peace deal would weaken militants such as Hamas and Hezbollah.

Contacts have intensified as part of a strategy meant to undercut extremists and build momentum for a peace deal between Israelis and Palestinians, said Jamal Kashoggi, an aide to Saudi Prince Turki.

Judith Kipper, a Middle East expert at the Council on Foreign Relations, said, "What really concerns pro-U.S. Arab states is that Iran is setting the political agenda in the region."

DOJ_NMG_0130260

Saudi and Gulf Arab contacts with Israelis and American Jews go back more than a decade but have never been so public. Arab countries have treated Israel as a pariah since it gained independence in 1948. Most Arab countries ban travel to Israel, investment there and other commercial ties with the Jewish state and routinely refer to it as the "Zionist entity."

Only three of 21 Arab nations recognize Israel: Egypt, Jordan and Mauritania. A 2002 peace plan put forward by Saudi Arabia offers diplomatic relations with the other 18 Arab states if Israel withdraws to the borders it had in 1967 — meaning giving up the West Bank and the Golan Heights — and cedes land for a new Palestinian state.

Among the other recent Arab-Jewish contacts:

•Saudi national security adviser Bandar bin Sultan met privately with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert in Jordan in September, said Daniel Ayalon, Israel's former ambassador to Washington. He said it was the highest-level Saudi-Israeli meeting he'd ever heard of.

•The United Arab Emirates has invited a delegation from the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations. The conference, a 51-member umbrella group, is a strong supporter of Israel.

•Israeli Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres met the emir of Qatar in late January after taking part in a debate with Arab students there. It was the highest-level Israeli meeting with the Gulf nation since 1996, when Peres visited as prime minister.

Fallon To Recruit Arab Nations For Help (WT)

By Richard Halloran

The Washington Times, February 12, 2007

HONOLULU -- The new commander of U.S. military forces in the Middle East, Adm. William Fallon, says he will set a high priority on enlisting the help of friendly Arab and Asian nations in the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, and against the al Qaeda terrorist network led by Osama bin Laden.

"There are a lot of people out there just standing around not doing anything to help us," Adm. Fallon said late Saturday in his first newspaper interview since he was named last month to succeed Army Gen. John Abizaid as commander of the world's most sensitive region. "We need to turn that around. The neighboring nations there have to play a role."

The admiral, who will have authority over all U.S. forces in the region, including those led by the new commander of U.S. ground forces in Iraq, Gen. David Petraeus, did not name specific Arab nations to which he would look for support.

But Egypt -- a leader in the Arab world that gets $2.5 billion a year in military assistance from the United States -- and Saudi Arabia, which has long been a target for al Qaeda terrorists, seemed likely candidates.

Adm. Fallon spoke by telephone from his airplane as he returned to his Pacific Command headquarters here from Washington, where he was unanimously confirmed to his new post in a Senate vote on Thursday.

Drawing on his experience over the past two years as head of the Pacific Command, Adm. Fallon said he would also seek support from Indonesia, the world's most populous Muslim nation, and Malaysia, in which Islam is the dominant religion. He visited both countries a year ago to meet their senior political and military leaders.

Adm. Fallon also said he might look for help from India, which has a large Muslim minority. Adm. Fallon noted that the United States had been helped in Iraq and Afghanistan by Japan, Australia, South Korea and New Zealand. "I'm interested in seeing how we can leverage this into more support," he said.

The admiral has spent much of his watch at Pacific Command on political military matters, traveling to about 25 nations to talk with everyone from the heads of government to horse breeders on the Mongolian steppes and sailors in the remote Indonesian port of Manado.

In his new assignment, Adm. Fallon said, "I expect to be doing the same thing and even more because of the urgency of the situation. I expect to be meeting a lot of leaders who could be playing a role in the Middle East."

As Pacific commander, Adm. Fallon nurtured a gradual expansion of military exchanges with China that were intended to assure the Chinese that the United States is not planning to attack them while warning them not to underestimate U.S. military power.

He is the first naval officer to head Central Command, which has its headquarters at MacDill Air Force Base in Tampa, Fla., taking up the post while the command is engaged in major ground combat operations in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Adm. Fallon replaces Gen. Abizaid, who in turn took over from Gen. Tommy Franks in July 2003, both career Army officers. The admiral indicated in the interview that he would leave most of the ground warfare task in Iraq to Gen. Petraeus.

Adm. Fallon said Gen. Petraeus, with whom he has not served before, "has a great reputation as a skilled combat commander."

"I'm going to do whatever I can to support him," Adm. Fallon said. "I'll be working the region where there's plenty of work to do."

DOJ_NMG_0130261

Outside of the ground war, he pointed to similarities in some of the issues facing the Pacific and Central commands. Iran threatens to acquire nuclear weapons much as North Korea has already done. Vital shipping, especially of crude oil, passes through the Straits of Hormuz at the mouth of the Persian Gulf, just as it passes through the Straits of Malacca and the South China Sea in Southeast Asia.

Piracy off the coast of Somalia resembles that near Indonesia, although Indonesian, Singaporean and Malaysian anti-piracy operations have reduced that threat in the South China Sea. Insurgencies in Iraq and Afghanistan have their counterparts in the Philippines and southern Thailand.

Adm. Fallon said some of the lessons learned in the Pacific Command would be pertinent to his duties in the Central Command.

"These nations have a slew of problems," he said. "There are not so many nations as in Pacific Command but they have more problems and problems that are more difficult to deal with."

He pointed to Lebanon, which was in what he called "complete chaos" only a short time ago. He also mentioned massive unrest and death in Sudan, the lack of security in the Horn of Africa, failed or dysfunctional states and unnamed nations "that have lost confidence in us."

To prepare for his new command, Adm. Fallon has been, to use a favorite phase, "sponging up information." He said he was "deep into immersion" with an extensive reading list, mostly historical texts, to acquire a background on the Middle East, where he has limited experience.

The admiral said that in recent weeks he has spoken with everyone from President Bush on down, including current and former leaders of the State Department, the Agency for International Development and the Defense Department. He has met as many ambassadors and military attaches as possible from the embassies of Middle East nations in Washington, plus retired American diplomats who have served in the region.

He has been deluged with briefing papers, scholarly essays and news articles. Adm. Fallon, who has a reputation as a quick study, said, "I have been trying to get as many different opinions as I can so that nothing falls out of sight." He has particularly studied counterinsurgency, which is the main thrust of the new U.S. strategy in Iraq.

"With all these papers flying around," Adm. Fallon said, "it's been like a blizzard driving in from Lake Ontario."

Sunni Arab States Fortify Against Iran (WT)

By Gethin Chamberlain

The Washington Times, February 12, 2007

Leaders of Sunni Arab states are embarking on a military spending spree in an attempt to contain the growing threat from Iran.

Alarmed by the progress of Iran's nuclear program and the prospect of a military clash between its Shi'ite regime and the United States, Persian Gulf leaders intend to use billions of dollars of oil revenue to purchase a huge array of military hardware.

Many of the deals will be finalized at a massive arms fair scheduled to open in the United Arab Emirates on Sunday.

Saudi Arabia alone has a shopping list that runs to nearly $50 billion, including fighter aircraft, cruise missiles, attack helicopters and more than 300 new tanks.

The UAE has earmarked $2 billion for a rapid-reaction brigade -- possibly to take a lead role in a regional protection force. An additional $6 billion will go for missile-defense batteries, airborne early-warning systems and aircraft.

Both countries are members of the Gulf Cooperation Council, established in 1981 to provide security against the threat posed by Iran. Other members, including Kuwait, Bahrain and Qatar, are expected to spend heavily in the coming months.

Gulf leaders have watched with growing alarm as Iran's Shi'ite theocracy has flexed its military muscles -- filling the postwar power vacuum in Iraq, exerting influence in the Palestinian territories and Lebanon, and refusing to back down over its nuclear program.

Many are now convinced that the only way to avoid being sucked into a war between the United States and Iran, or being caught up in the turbulence that would follow, is to beef up their own defenses.

Last week, Iran carried out exercises in the Gulf, including test-firing its new Russian defense-missile system, and warned that any attempts to halt its nuclear program would result in attacks on U.S. interests around the world.

In a speech yesterday marking the 28th anniversary of the country's Islamic revolution, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad again insisted that Iran would not give up its uranium-enrichment program, which is regarded by the U.S. and its allies as the precursor to a nuclear weapon.

U.S. plans for a possible attack on Iran's nuclear sites are reported to be well-advanced, despite public denials, and many in the Gulf states fear that they could be caught in the backlash.

One highly placed Saudi diplomatic source told the Sunday Telegraph that there were concerns about U.S. intentions and doubts about the real threat from Iran.

"There are some people who are wary about Iran, but the Americans are running a very successful public relations campaign against Tehran. A lot of Saudis fear that the U.S. will come and make mischief then go away, but we have to live here afterwards."

Some analysts argue that many Gulf states would prefer to be able to adopt a position of well-armed neutrality.

"They are genuinely concerned about Iran because not only are the Iranians not Arabs, they are Shias. For the Saudis in particular, they are sworn enemies. But they share a common enemy with Iran -- the West and its way of life. They don't really want to depend on the Americans," said military analyst Paul Beaver.

With oil pushing $60 a barrel, the spending power of the Sunni states has been boosted, with the UAE government alone looking at a windfall of more than $100 billion if prices stay at present levels for the next two to three years. Up to 20 percent of that extra revenue may be devoted to defense modernization.

Tim Ripley, the Middle East analyst with Jane's Defense Weekly, said: "The Gulf states have a shopping list of arms worth more than $60 billion if all the deals under discussion eventually go through."

The largest deal is Saudi Arabia's purchase of 72 Eurofighter Typhoon jets from BAE Systems.

After the Gulf War in 1991, Saudi Arabia and a number of other states spent $10 billion. Now countries are again flocking to the arms bazaars and more than 900 exhibitors will be competing for their business at the Idex 2007 exhibition in Abu Dhabi.

Although much of the equipment being purchased is designed to counter an external military threat, many are also spending heavily on homeland security.

"People are concerned that if there is a complete breakdown in Iraq it may wash over to them," said Marc Lee, the organizer of a conference on defense in the region that will be held the day before the arms fair. "They are acutely conscious of the instability threats on the other side of the Gulf and the threat from Iran."

At the last Idex exhibition, in 2005, $2 billion of deals were done in five days, but this year is expected to break all records. Up to 45,000 delegates are expected, and the UAE tourism ministry has hired two cruise liners to cope with demand for accommodations.

Across Arab World, A Widening Rift (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

CAIRO Egypt is the Arab world's largest Sunni Muslim country, but as a writer once quipped, it has a Shiite heart and a Sunni mind. In its eclectic popular culture, Sunnis enjoy a sweet dish with raisins and nuts to mark Ashura, the most sacred Shiite Muslim holiday. Raucous festivals bring Cairenes into the street to celebrate the birthdays of Shiite saints, a practice disparaged by austere Sunnis. The city's Islamic quarter tangles like a vine around a shrine to Imam Hussein, Shiite Islam's most revered figure.

The syncretic blend makes the words of Mahmoud Ahmed, a book vendor sitting on the shrine's marble and granite promenade, even more striking.

"The Shiites are rising," he said, arching his eyebrows in an expression suggesting both revelation and fear.

The growing Sunni-Shiite divide is roiling an Arab world as unsettled as at any time in a generation. Fought in speeches, newspaper columns, rumors swirling through cafes and the Internet, and occasional bursts of strife, the conflict is predominantly shaped by politics: a disintegrating Iraq, an ascendant Iran, a sense of Arab powerlessness and a persistent suspicion of American intentions. But the division has begun to seep into the region's social fabric, too. The sectarian fault line has long existed and sometimes ruptured, but never, perhaps, has it been revealed in such a stark, disruptive fashion.

Newspapers are replete with assertions, some little more than incendiary rumors, of Shiite aggressiveness. The Jordanian newspaper Ad-Dustour, aligned with the government, wrote of a conspiracy last month to spread Shiism from India to Egypt. On the conspirators' agenda, it said: assassinating "prominent Sunni figures." The same day, an Algerian newspaper reported that parents were calling on the government to stop Shiite proselytizing in schools. An Egyptian columnist accused Iran of trying to convert Sunnis to Shiism in an attempt to revive the Persian Safavid dynasty, which came to power in the 16th century.

At Madbuli's, a storied bookstore in downtown Cairo, five new titles lined the display window: "The Shiites," "The Shiites in History," "Twelve Shiites," and so on. A newspaper on sale nearby featured a warning by its editor that the conflict could lead to a "sectarian holocaust."

DOJ_NMG_0130263

"To us Egyptians," said writer and analyst Mohammed al-Sayid Said, the sectarian division is "entirely artificial. It resonates with nothing in our culture, nothing in our daily life. It's not part of our social experience, cultural experience or religious experience." But he added: "I think this can devastate the region."

The violence remains confined to Iraq and, on a far smaller scale, Lebanon, but to some, the four-year-long entropy of Iraq offers a metaphor for the forces emerging across the region: People there watched the rise of sectarian identity, railed against it, blamed the United States and others for inflaming it, then were often helpless to stop the descent into bloodshed.

"This tension is the most dangerous problem now in the region," said Ghassan Charbel, editor of the Arabic-language daily al-Hayat.

The schism between Sunnis and Shiites dates to the 7th century, Islam's earliest days, when a dispute broke out over who would succeed the prophet Muhammad. Shiites believe the descendants of Muhammad's daughter, Fatima, and son-in-law, Ali, were deprived of divinely ordained leadership in a narrative of martyrdom and injustice that still influences devout Shiite readings of the faith.

Over centuries, differences in ritual, jurisprudence and theology evolved, some of them slight. But the Shiite community -- as a majority in Iraq and Bahrain and a sizable minority in Lebanon, Saudi Arabia and Kuwait -- is shaped far more today by the underprivileged status it has often endured in an Arab world that is predominantly Sunni. For decades, the Saudi government banned Shiite rituals; a Sunni minority rules a restive Shiite majority in Bahrain; Lebanese Shiites, long poor and disenfranchised, often faced chauvinism that still lingers.

Episodes of sectarian conflict litter the region's history: Shiites revolted in medieval Baghdad, and rival gangs ransacked one another's tombs and shrines. The conflict between the Sunni Ottoman Empire and the Shiite Safavid Empire in Persia was often cast as a sectarian struggle. The 1979 Islamic revolution in Iran was portrayed in parts of the Arab world as a Shiite resurgence.

But rarely has the region witnessed so many events, in so brief a time, that have been so widely interpreted through a sectarian lens: the empowering of Iraq's Shiite-led government and the bloodletting that has devastated the country; the lack of support by America's Sunni Arab allies -- Egypt, Jordan and Saudi Arabia -- for the Shiite movement Hezbollah in its fight with Israel last summer; and, most decisively, the perception among many Sunni Arabs that Saddam Hussein was lynched by Shiites bent on revenge. In the background is the growing assertiveness of Shiite Iran as the influence of other traditional regional powers such as Egypt and Saudi Arabia diminishes.

In Lebanon, where the Hezbollah-led opposition has mobilized in an effort to force the government's resignation, the sectarian divide colors even a contest over urban space. Some Sunnis are angered most by the fact that the Beirut sit-in -- in their eyes, an occupation -- by Shiites from the hardscrabble southern suburbs is taking place in the sleek downtown rebuilt by a former Sunni prime minister, Rafiq al-Hariri, who was assassinated in 2005.

"Politics is perception," said Jamil Mroue, a Lebanese publisher whose father was Shiite and mother Sunni.

Sentiments today remind him of the tribal-like fanaticism that marked another sectarian conflict, Lebanon's 15-year civil war -- which, among other divisions, loosely pitted Christians against Muslims before it ended in 1990.

"It certainly conjures up the feelings of the civil war, when Lebanon started disintegrating, except on a mega-scale," Mroue said. He called it "very scary, because I know that there is a possibility of being moved by this tide."

"At the end of it," he added, "people are going to look back and say, 'What the hell was this all about?' "

In overwhelmingly Sunni countries such as Egypt, where politics were long defined by Arab nationalism or political Islam, visceral notions of sectarian identity remain somewhat alien. It is not unusual to hear people say they realized only as adults that they were Sunnis. Before that, they identified themselves simply as Muslim. Even in Lebanon, despite its communal divisions, intermarriage is not uncommon, and there is a long tradition of Sunnis becoming Shiites so their daughters can receive a more equitable share of inheritance, as allowed under Shiite law.

Across the region, Hezbollah and its leader, Hasan Nasrallah, in particular, still win accolades for their performance in last summer's war in Lebanon.

"You have to give him credit for fighting the Israelis," Abdel-Hamid Ibrahim said of Nasrallah as he stood at a rickety curbside stand in Cairo, boiling water for tea. Overhead were pictures of two Egyptian icons, the singers Um Kalthoum and Abdel-Halim Hafez. "Closest to my heart," he said. Next to them was a portrait of Nasrallah. "A symbol of resistance, the man who defeated Israel," it read.

"Hasan Nasrallah, he's the man who stood in front of the Israelis himself," said Muhsin Mohammed, a customer.

"Who was standing with him?" Ibrahim asked, nodding his head. He pointed to the sky. "Our Lord."

Both scoffed at the sectarian tensions.

DOJ_NMG_0130264

"There's a proverb that says, 'Divide and conquer,' " Mohammed said. "Sunnis and Shiites -- they're not both Muslims? What divides them? Who wants to divide them? In whose interest is it to divide them?" he asked.

"It's in the West's interest," he answered. "And at the head of it is America and Israel." He paused. "And Britain."

That sense of Western manipulation is often voiced by Shiite clerics and activists, who say the United States incites sectarianism as a way of blunting Iran's influence. In recent years, some of the most provocative comments have come from America's allies in the region: Egypt's president questioned Shiites' loyalty to their countries, Jordan's king warned of a coming Shiite crescent from Iran to Lebanon, and last month King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia denounced what he called Shiite proselytizing.

The charge drew a lengthy retort from Nasrallah. "Frankly speaking, the aim of saying such things is fomenting strife," he said in a speech. He dismissed charges of Iranian proselytizing or the emergence of a Shiite crescent.

"People in the region always complain about a Shiite crescent. You always hear, 'Shiite crescent, Shiite crescent.' That's just a crescent. What about the full Sunni moon?" said Nimr al-Nimr, a Shiite cleric in the eastern Saudi town of Awamiya, who spent five days in police detention for urging that a Shiite curriculum be taught in his predominantly Shiite region.

Shiites make up less than 15 percent of Saudi Arabia's population, many of them in the oil-rich Eastern Province. The austere Sunni religious establishment considers them heretics. One cleric, Abdul Rahman al-Barak, considered close to the royal family, has called Shiites "infidels, apostates and hypocrites."

"There are conflicts in Palestine between Sunni sects -- Hamas and Fatah -- in Somalia, in Darfur. None of that is sectarian," said Hassan al-Saffar, the most prominent Shiite cleric in Saudi Arabia. "There's a campaign against Shiites. Why is all this anti-Shiite sentiment being inflamed at a time the United States is trying to pressure Iran because of its nuclear ambitions?"

In Cairo recently, Hassan Kamel sipped sweet tea in a cafe beside the shrine to Imam Hussein, the prophet's grandson, who was killed in battle in 680 in what is now Iraq. The shrine is believed to hold his severed head. Across the street was al-Azhar, one of the foremost academic institutions of Sunni Islam, founded, ironically, by the Shiite Fatimid dynasty that ruled Egypt for 200 years until 1169. On the shrine's wall was a saying attributed to the prophet and often intoned during Shiite commemorations: "Hussein is from me, and I am from Hussein." Kamel pointed to the doors, topped with a Koranic inscription; Shiites and Sunnis like him worshiped at the shrine together, he said.

As cats scurried across the cafe's grimy floor, he wondered aloud about past conflicts that have splintered the Middle East.

"Egyptians, all their lives, without exception, have endured so many crises, catastrophes and problems," he said. He listed wars in 1948, 1956, 1967, 1973. "But they have a gift. It's a gift from God. They have the ability to forget."

Then he talked about the rest of the region, and whether this bout of strife and tension would pass, too.

"They might forget, they might not," he said. "Right now, no one knows what's coming."

Blowup? America's Hidden War With Iran (NSWK)

By Michael Hirsh And Maziar Bahari

Newsweek, February 12, 2007

Jalal Sharafi was carrying a videogame, a gift for his daughter, when he found himself surrounded. On that chilly Sunday morning, the second secretary at the Iranian Embassy in Baghdad had driven himself to the commercial district of Arasat Hindi to checkout the site for a new Iranian bank. He had ducked into a nearby electronics store with his bodyguards, and as they emerged four armored cars roared up and disgorged at least 20 gunmen wearing bulletproof vests and Iraqi National Guard uniforms. They flashed official IDs, and manhandled Sharafi into one car. Iraqi police gave chase, guns blazing. They shot up one of the other vehicles, capturing four assailants who by late last week had yet to be publicly identified. Sharafi and the others disappeared.

At the embassy, the diplomat's colleagues were furious. "This was a group directly under American supervision," said one distraught Iranian official, who was not authorized to speak on the record. Abdul Karim Inizi, a former Iraqi Security minister close to the Iranians, pointed the finger at an Iraqi black-ops unit based out at the Baghdad airport, who answer to American Special Forces officers. "It's plausible," says a senior Coalition adviser who is also not authorized to speak on the record. The unit does exist—and does specialize in snatch operations.

The Iranians have reason to feel paranoid. In recent weeks senior American officers have condemned Tehran for providing training and deadly explosives to insurgents. In a predawn raid on Dec. 21, U.S. troops barged into the compound of the most powerful political party in the country, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, and grabbed two men they claimed were officers in Iran's Revolutionary Guards. Three weeks later U.S. troops stormed an Iranian diplomatic office in Irbil, arresting five more Iranians. The Americans have hinted that as part of an escalating tit-for-tat, Iranians may have had a hand in a spectacular raid in Karbala on Jan. 20, in which four American soldiers were kidnapped and later found shot, execution style, in the head. U.S. forces promised to defend themselves.

DOJ_NMG_0130265

Some view the spiraling attacks as a strand in a worrisome pattern. At least one former White House official contends that some Bush advisers secretly want an excuse to attack Iran. "They intend to be as provocative as possible and make the Iranians do something [America] would be forced to retaliate for," says Hillary Mann, the administration's former National Security Council director for Iran and Persian Gulf Affairs. U.S. officials insist they have no intention of provoking or otherwise starting a war with Iran, and they were also quick to deny any link to Sharafi's kidnapping. But the fact remains that the longstanding war of words between Washington and Tehran is edging toward something more dangerous. A second Navy carrier group is steaming toward the Persian Gulf, and NEWSWEEK has learned that a third carrier will likely follow. Iran shot off a few missiles in those same tense waters last week, in a highly publicized test. With Americans and Iranians jousting on the chaotic battleground of Iraq, the chances of a small incident's spiraling into a crisis are higher than they've been in years.

Sometimes it seems as if a state of conflict is natural to the U.S.-Iranian relationship—troubled since the CIA-backed coup that restored the shah to power in 1953, tortured since Ayatollah Khomeini's triumph in 1979. With the election of George W. Bush on the one hand, and Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad on the other, the two countries are now led by men who deeply mistrust the intentions and indeed doubt the sanity of the other. Tehran insists that U.S. policy is aimed at toppling the regime and subjugating Iran. The White House charges that Iran is violently sabotaging U.S. efforts to stabilize the Middle East while not so secretly developing nuclear weapons. As the raids and skirmishes in Iraq underscore, a hidden war is already unfolding.

Yet a NEWSWEEK investigation has also found periods of marked cooperation and even tentative steps toward possible reconciliation in recent years—far more than is commonly realized. After September 11 in particular, relations grew warmer than at any time since the fall of the shah. America wanted Iran's help in Afghanistan, and Iran gave it, partly out of fear of an angry superpower and partly in order to be rid of its troublesome Taliban neighbors. In time, hard-liners on both sides were able to undo the efforts of diplomats to build on that foundation. The damage only worsened as those hawks became intoxicated with their own success. The secret history of the Bush administration's dealings with Iran is one of arrogance, mistrust and failure. But it is also a history that offers some hope.

For Iran's reformists, 9/11 was a blessing in disguise. Previous attempts to reach out to America had been stymied by conservative mullahs. But the fear that an enraged superpower would blindly lash out focused minds in Tehran. Mohammad Hossein Adeli was one of only two deputies on duty at the Foreign Ministry when the attacks took place, late on a sweltering summer afternoon. He immediately began contacting top officials, insisting that Iran respond quickly. "We wanted to truly condemn the attacks but we also wished to offer an olive branch to the United States, showing we were interested in peace," says Adeli. To his relief, Iran's top official, Ayatollah Ali Khameini, quickly agreed. "The Supreme Leader was deeply suspicious of the American government," says a Khameini aide whose position does not allow him to be named. "But [he] was repulsed by these terrorist acts and was truly sad about the loss of the civilian lives in America." For two weeks worshipers at Friday prayers even stopped chanting "Death to America."

The fear dissipated after Sept. 20, when the FBI announced that Al Qaeda was behind the attacks. But there was new reason for cooperation: for years Tehran had been backing the Afghan guerrillas fighting the Taliban, Osama bin Laden's hosts. Suddenly, having U.S. troops next door in Afghanistan didn't seem like a bad idea. American and Iranian officials met repeatedly in Geneva in the days before the Oct. 7 U.S. invasion. The Iranians were more than supportive. "In fact, they were impatient," says a U.S. official involved in the talks, who asked not to be named speaking about topics that remain sensitive. "They'd ask, 'When's the military action going to start? Let's get going!' "

Opinions differ wildly over how much help the Iranians actually were on the ground. But what is beyond doubt is how critical they were to stabilizing the country after the fall of Kabul. In late November 2001, the leaders of Afghanistan's triumphant anti-Taliban factions flew to Bonn, Germany, to map out an interim Afghan government with the help of representatives from 18 Coalition countries. It was rainy and unseasonably cold, and the penitential month of Ramadan was in full sway, but a carnival mood prevailed. The setting was a splendid hotel on the Rhine, and after sunset the German hosts laid on generous buffet meals under a big sign promising that everything was pork-free.

The Iranian team's leader, Javad Zarif, was a good-humored University of Denver alumnus with a deep, measured voice, who would later become U.N. ambassador. Jim Dobbins, Bush's first envoy to the Afghans, recalls sharing coffee with Zarif in one of the sitting rooms, poring over a draft of the agreement laying out the new Afghan government. "Zarif asked me, 'Have you looked at it?' I said, 'Yes, I read it over once'," Dobbins recalls. "Then he said, with a certain twinkle in his eye: 'I don't think there's anything in it that mentions democracy. Don't you think there could be some commitment to democratization?' This was before the Bush administration had discovered democracy as a panacea for the Middle East. I said that's a good idea."

DOJ_NMG_0130266

Toward the end of the Bonn talks, Dobbins says, "we reached a pivotal moment." The various parties had decided that the suave, American-backed Hamid Karzai would lead the new Afghan government. But he was a Pashtun tribal leader from the south, and rivals from the north had actually won the capital. In the brutal world of Afghan power politics, that was a recipe for conflict. At 2 a.m. on the night before the deal was meant to be signed, the Northern Alliance delegate Yunus Qanooni was stubbornly demanding 18 out of 24 new ministries. Frantic negotiators gathered in the suite of United Nations envoy Lakhdar Brahimi. A sleepy Zarif translated for Qanooni. Finally, at close to 4 a.m., he leaned over to whisper in the Afghan's ear: " 'This is the best deal you're going to get'." Qanooni said, " 'OK'."

That moment, Dobbins says now, was critical. "The Russians and the Indians had been making similar points," he says. "But it wasn't until Zarif took him aside that it was settled ... We might have had a situation like we had in Iraq, where we were never able to settle on a single leader and government." A month later Tehran backed up the political support with financial muscle: at a donor's conference in Tokyo, Iran pledged $500 million (at the time, more than double the Americans') to help rebuild Afghanistan.

In a pattern that would become familiar, however, a chill quickly followed the warming in relations. Barely a week after the Tokyo meeting, Iran was included with Iraq and North Korea in the "Axis of Evil." Michael Gerson, now a NEWSWEEK contributor, headed the White House speechwriting shop at the time. He says Iran and North Korea were inserted into Bush's controversial State of the Union address in order to avoid focusing solely on Iraq. At the time, Bush was already making plans to topple Saddam Hussein, but he wasn't ready to say so. Gerson says it was Condoleezza Rice, then national-security adviser, who told him which two countries to include along with Iraq. But the phrase also appealed to a president who felt himself thrust into a grand struggle. Senior aides say it reminded him of Ronald Reagan's ringing denunciations of the "evil empire."

Once again, Iran's reformists were knocked back on their heels. "Those who were in favor of a rapprochement with the United States were marginalized," says Adeli. "The speech somehow exonerated those who had always doubted America's intentions." The Khameini aide concurs: "The Axis of Evil speech did not surprise the Supreme Leader. He never trusted the Americans."

It would be another war that nudged the two countries together again. At the beginning of 2003, as the Pentagon readied for battle against Iraq, the Americans wanted Tehran's help in case a flood of refugees headed for the border, or if U.S. pilots were downed inside Iran. After U.S. tanks thundered into Baghdad, those worries eased. "We had the strong hand at that point," recalls Colin Powell, who was secretary of State at the time. If anything, though, America's lightning campaign made the Iranians even more eager to deal. Low-level meetings between the two sides had continued even after the Axis of Evil speech. At one of them that spring, Zarif raised the question of the Mujahedin-e Khalq (MEK), a rabidly anti-Iranian militant group based in Iraq. Iran had detained a number of senior Qaeda operatives after 9/11. Zarif floated the possibility of "reciprocity"—your terrorists for ours.

The idea was brought up at a mid-May meeting between Bush and his chief advisers in the wood-paneled Situation Room in the White House basement. Riding high, Bush seemed to like the idea of a swap, says a participant who asked to remain anonymous because the meeting was classified. Some in the room argued that designating the militants as terrorists had been a mistake, others that they might prove useful against Iran someday. Powell opposed the handover for a different reason: he worried that the captives might be tortured. The vice president, silent through most of the meeting as was his wont, muttered something about "preserving all our options." (Cheney declined to comment.) The MEK's status remains unresolved.

Around this time what struck some in the U.S. government as an even more dramatic offer arrived in Washington—a faxed two-page proposal for comprehensive bilateral talks. To the NSC's Mann, among others, the Iranians seemed willing to discuss, at least, cracking down on Hizbullah and Hamas (or turning them into peaceful political organizations) and "full transparency" on Iran's nuclear program. In return, the Iranian "aims" in the document called for a "halt in U.S. hostile behavior and rectification of the status of Iran in the U.S. and abolishing sanctions," as well as pursuit of the MEK.

An Iranian diplomat admits to NEWSWEEK that he had a hand in preparing the proposal, but denies that he was its original author. Asking not to be named because the topic is politically sensitive, he says he got the rough draft from an intermediary with connections at the White House and the State Department. He suggested some relatively minor revisions in ballpoint pen and dispatched the working draft to Tehran, where it was shown to only the top ranks of the regime. "We didn't want to have an 'Irangate 2'," the diplomat says, referring to the secret negotiations to trade weapons for hostages that ended in scandal during Reagan's administration. After Iran's National Security Council approved the document (under orders from Khameini), a final copy was produced and sent to Washington, according to the diplomat.

The letter received a mixed reception. Powell and his deputy Richard Armitage were suspicious. Armitage says he thinks the letter represented creative diplomacy by the Swiss ambassador, Tim Guldimann, who was serving as a go-between. "We couldn't determine what [in the proposal] was the Iranians' and what was the Swiss ambassador's," he says. He added that his impression at the time was that the Iranians "were trying to put too much on the table." Quizzed about the letter in front of Congress last week, Rice denied ever seeing it. "I don't care if it originally came from Mars," Mann says now. "If the Iranians said it was fully vetted and cleared, then it could have been as important as the two-page document" that Richard Nixon and Henry Kissinger received from Beijing in 1971, indicating Mao Zedong's interest in opening China.

DOJ_NMG_0130267

A few days later bombs tore through three housing complexes in Saudi Arabia and killed 29 people, including seven Americans. Furious administration hard-liners blamed Tehran. Citing telephone intercepts, they claimed the bombings had been ordered by Saif al-Adel, a senior Qaeda leader supposedly imprisoned in Iran. "There's no question but that there have been and are today senior Al Qaeda leaders in Iran, and they are busy," Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld growled. Although there was no evidence the Iranian government knew of Adel's activities, his presence in the country was enough to undermine those who wanted to reach out.

Powell, for one, thinks Bush simply wasn't prepared to deal with a regime he thought should not be in power. As secretary of State he met fierce resistance to any diplomatic overtures to Iran and its ally Syria. "My position in the remaining year and a half was that we ought to find ways to restart talks with Iran," he says of the end of his term. "But there was a reluctance on the part of the president to do that." The former secretary of State angrily rejects the administration's characterization of efforts by him and his top aides to deal with Tehran and Damascus as failures. "I don't like the administration saying, 'Powell went, Armitage went ... and [they] got nothing.' We got plenty," he says. "You can't negotiate when you tell the other side, 'Give us what a negotiation would produce before the negotiations start'."

Terrorism wasn't the only concern when it came to Iran. For decades, Washington's abiding fear has been that Iran might pick up where the shah's nuclear program (initially U.S.-backed) left off, and make the Great Satan the target of its atomic weapons. The Iranians, who were signatories to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, insisted they had nothing to hide. They lied. In August 2002, a group affiliated with the MEK revealed the extent of nuclear activities at a facility in Isfahan, where the Iranians had been converting yellowcake to uranium gas, and in Natanz, where the infrastructure needed to enrich that material to weapons-grade uranium was being built. A year later Pakistani scientist AQ Khan's covert nuclear-technology network unraveled, bringing further embarrassments and investigations.

For months, European negotiators worked to get Tehran to formalize a temporary and tenuous deal to freeze its nuclear fuel-development program. In May 2005, they met with Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, Hassan Rowhani, at the Iranian ambassador's opulent Geneva residence. There was some reason to be optimistic: in Washington, Rice had announced that the United States would not block Iran's bid to join the World Trade Organization. Yet a sense of enormous tension filled the room, according to a diplomat who was there but asked not to be identified revealing official discussions. The Europeans told Rowhani they hadn't nailed down exactly what they could offer in return for a freeze, and the Americans still weren't fully onboard. Iran would have to wait for the details for a few more months. But in the meantime, the program had to remain suspended.

Rowhani, in full clerical robes and turban, obviously was not authorized to make any such deal. "The man was in front of us sweating," says the European diplomat. "He was trapped: he couldn't go further ... I realized very clearly that he couldn't deliver, that he was not allowed to deliver. Psychologically he was broken. Physically he was almost broken."

Part of the problem was that elections in Iran were only a few days away. They brought to power a man who satisfied the darkest stereotypes of Iran's fervid leaders. Mahmoud Ahmadinejad publicly renounced the freeze on Iran's nuclear fuel-development program, broke the seals the International Atomic Energy Agency had placed on Iran's conversion facilities at Isfahan and pushed ahead with work at Natanz. In the span of no more than a month or two, nuclear enrichment had become a symbol of national pride for a much wider spectrum of Iranian society than the voters who elected Ahmadinejad. In a warped parallel to Bush, who found his voice after 9/11 rallying Americans to the struggle against a vast and unforgiving enemy, the Iranian president rose in stature throughout the Middle East as he railed against America. The one problem U.S. negotiators had always had with Iran was determining who in the byzantine regime to talk to, and whether they could deliver anything. Now they faced another: the Iranians had almost no incentive to talk. With the United States bogged down in Iraq, Iran now had the leverage—roles had reversed.

In its second term the Bush administration, despite Powell's sour memories, has supported European efforts to resolve the nuclear impasse diplomatically. Rice has offered to meet her Iranian counterpart "any time, anywhere." "What has blocked such contact is the refusal of Iran to meet the demands of the entire international community," says a White House official, who could not be named discussing Iran. The official expressed deep frustration with critics. He argued they were naive about Tehran's intentions, and "parroting Iranian propaganda."

By last summer Iran seemed ascendant. Hizbullah's performance in the Lebanon war had rallied support for Ahmadinejad, one of the group's loudest proponents, across the Arab world. In a series of meetings in New York in September the Iranian president was defiant, almost giddy. (A senior British official who would only speak anonymously about deliberations with the Americans describes Tehran's mood around this time as "cock-a-hoop.") He would not back down when grilled about his dismissals of the Holocaust, and scoffed at the threat of U.N. sanctions over Iran's nuclear defiance.

DOJ_NMG_0130268

The West's patience was running out. In Baghdad, American troops seemed powerless to stop a wave of gruesome sectarian killings that they claimed were fueled by Iran. In Amman and Riyadh, Arab leaders warned darkly of a rising "Shia crescent." After Bush's defeat in the midterm elections, Israeli officials began wondering aloud if they would have to deal with the Iranian threat on their own. Partly in consultation with the British, U.S. officials began to map out a broader strategy to fight back. "We felt we needed to have a much more knitted-together policy, with a number of different strands working, to hit different parts of the Iranian system," says the senior British official.

Critics have questioned how much of that plan is military—whether the administration is secretly setting a course for war as it did back in 2002. Last week officials were at great pains to deny that scenario. "We are not planning offensive military operations against Iran," said Under Secretary of State Nicholas Burns. The Pentagon does have contingency plans for all-out war with Iran, on which Bush was briefed last summer. The targets would include Iran's air-defense systems, its nuclear- and chemical-weapons facilities, ballistic missile sites, naval and Revolutionary Guard bases in the gulf, and intelligence headquarters. But generals are convinced that no amount of firepower could do more than delay Tehran's nuclear program. U.S. military analysts have concluded that nothing short of regime change would completely eliminate the threat—and America simply doesn't have the troops needed.

Iraq is another story. American military officials and politicians accuse the Iranian government of providing Iraqis with an new arsenal of advanced rocket-propelled-grenade launchers, heavy-duty mortars and the newest armor-piercing technology for roadside bombs—explosively formed projectiles (EFPs), said to have been developed by Hizbullah. Military security experts are especially worried by "passive infrared sensors," readily available devices that are often used for burglar alarms or automatic light switches but increasingly seen as triggers for improvised explosive devices (IEDs). Unlike cell phones, remote-control systems and garage-door openers, the sensors emit no signal, making them that much tougher to spot before they detonate.

What's scant is hard evidence that the weapons are provided by the Iranian government, rather than arms dealers or rogue Revolutionary Guard elements. "Iranian lethal support for select groups of Iraqi Shia militants clearly intensifies the conflict in Iraq," says the latest National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq. But the most that can be said with certainty is that Tehran is failing to stop the traffic. The Iranians themselves admit they're not trying as hard as they could. "I can give you my word that we don't give IEDs to the Mahdi Army," says an Iranian intelligence official who asked not to be named because secrecy is his business. "But if you asked me if we could control our borders better if we wanted to, I would say: 'Yes, if we knew that the Americans would not use Iraq as a base to attack Iran'."

The real thrust of Washington's multipronged attack is political. Banking restrictions levied by the U.S. Treasury have begun to pinch the Iranian economy. Voters angry about rising prices dealt Ahmadinejad an embarrassing blow in municipal elections in December, when his supporters were trounced. That wouldn't much matter if he still retained Khameini's support. But that may no longer be the case. The Khameini aide says the Supreme Leader blames Ahmadinejad's overheated rhetoric about Israel and the Holocaust for the unanimous Security Council resolution that passed in late December, demanding that Tehran suspend its nuclear program.

Every time America or Iran has gained an advantage over the other in the last five years, however, they've overplayed their hand. More pressure on Ahmadinejad could well make him popular again—the chief martyr in a martyr culture. Sunni insurgents in Iraq need only kill some Americans and plant Iranian IDs nearby to start a full-scale war. Like so many times in this complicated relationship, this is a moment of opportunity. And one of equally great danger.

With reporting by Babak Dehghanpisheh in Baghdad and John Barry, Mark Hosenball, Richard Wolffe in Washington, Christopher Dickey in Paris, Stryker McGuire in London, and Christian Caryl, Owen Matthews, Scott Johnson, Kevin Peraino, Ron Moreau and Dan Ephron

Report: Cheney Snubbing Japan Official (AP)

AP, February 12, 2007

Vice President Dick Cheney will not meet with Japan's defense minister during his trip to the country next week, a decision Japanese media characterized as a snub over the official calling the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq a "mistake."

Kyodo news agency said Cheney has asked Japan not to schedule any talks with Defense Minister Jumio Kyuma, who criticized the decision to go to war last month because he said it was based on the erroneous assumption that Saddam Hussein's government had weapons of mass destruction.

Kyuma later backtracked, saying he meant that the decision to attack Iraq should have been thought through more cautiously.

DOJ_NMG_0130269

Foreign Ministry officials were not immediately available to comment on the report.

In Washington, Cheney spokeswoman Lea Anne McBride said the vice president's schedule had been filled before he received an invitation from Kyuma to meet.

"He is looking forward to a full day of meetings in Japan, including meetings with the emperor, the prime minister, the chief Cabinet secretary and the foreign minister," McBride said.

"This schedule was set in advance of receiving a request from the defense minister."

Japan sent ground troops to southern Iraq on a humanitarian mission after the March 2003 invasion, but the contingent was pulled out last year. Japan still operates airlifts in the region in support of the U.S.-led forces, a mission set to end in July.

Nuclear Talks On North Korea Hit Roadblock (NYT)

By Jim Yardley And David E. Sanger

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

BEIJING, Feb. 11 — Negotiations on a step-by-step deal that the Bush administration hopes will lead North Korea to give up its nuclear weapons program appeared near collapse on Sunday over North Korea's demands for huge shipments of fuel oil and electricity before agreeing to a schedule for turning over its nuclear weapons and fuel.

The chief American envoy, Christopher R. Hill, said he and North Korea's envoy, Kim Kye-gwan, held a "lengthy and very frank" meeting on Sunday. But Mr. Hill seemed much less optimistic that a deal could be struck. Negotiators are planning to end the talks on Monday, and other envoys were pessimistic that any breakthrough would emerge on the final day.

Meanwhile, a summary of the proposed agreement being circulated among senior policy makers in Washington makes it clear that even if the North agreed to take the listed first steps — sealing its main nuclear reactor and inviting international inspectors back into the country — it would not be required to turn over any nuclear weapons or weapons fuel that it has produced in recent years for an unspecified period of time, and then only after reaching another agreement.

In essence, the agreement Mr. Hill, an assistant secretary of state, is negotiating could prevent the North from producing more weapons, but defers discussions over the weapons and fuel it has stockpiled. Mr. Hill had earlier suggested that if there was agreement, follow-up talks could be set up in March and April.

The summary calls for all six nations in the talks — the others are South Korea, Japan, China and Russia — to "create working groups for full and rapid implementation" of a September 2005 agreement in which the North agreed in principle to abandon its nuclear weapons. But in the past, the North Korean envoys to similar working groups have proven to have no real negotiating authority. Furthermore, the proposed agreement sets no dates on nuclear action beyond shutting down the nuclear plant at Yongbyon and allowing inspectors in within 60 days; it leaves unresolved what the North would get in return. The summary was given to The New York Times by a source trying to explain the timing and vagueness of the deal's elements.

After months of preparation that created unusual optimism within the Bush administration, failure to reach even a preliminary agreement could cast doubt on the prospects of disarming North Korea in the administration's last two years. Several Asian diplomats said they feared that North Korea had sensed the American distraction in Iraq and could be trying to run out the clock until the election of a new president.

At the same time, the North is under pressure because of the effectiveness of financial sanctions, particularly those aimed at Kim Jong-il and other North Korean leaders, and it may feel this is a good time to extract concessions from the South Korean government, which is clinging to economic ties to the North.

Mr. Hill, a seasoned negotiator who played a critical role in the Dayton accords that ended conflict in the Balkans in 1995, made it clear that the United States would not sign a deal that provided North Korea with energy but failed to ensure that it gave up its nuclear material.

"We're not looking to provide energy assistance so that they could avoid taking the further steps on denuclearization," he said at a news conference late Sunday in Beijing. "We understand that you can't just get there in one jump, you have to take several steps, so we're prepared to take several steps."

He added, "But we're not interested in providing that kind of assistance so that they don't have to take the next step."

In the past, the North has always insisted that it get rewards before giving away the nuclear ability that Mr. Kim regards as his sole international bargaining chip.

Kyodo, the Japanese news agency, has reported that North Korea wants an annual energy package of two million tons of fuel oil and two million kilowatts of electricity for taking the first steps in the agreement. It quoted unidentifed diplomatic sources who said the North also wanted a short-term infusion of hundreds of thousands of tons of fuel oil almost immediately. That presumably would be a reward for shutting down Yongbyon, even though Yongbyon does not provide electric energy to the country.

Any deal would inevitably be compared with the 1994 agreement between the Clinton administration and North Korea. President Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice have criticized that accord because it involved a "freeze" on activity that the North could quickly reverse, and because it left the shipment of weapons and fuel out of the country to the very end. The agreement fell apart in 2002, and the North is believed to have then converted its spent nuclear fuel into weapons.

The North tested its first nuclear device in October, though with only partial success.

Outside experts familiar with the outlines of the proposed deal say that the Bush administration would give up relatively little at the beginning — but it would also receive little.

"Freezing and disabling Yongbyon is an important but modest step," said Michael Green, who negotiated with North Korea as the top Asia expert at the National Security Council until he left a year ago. "It does not yet capture harvested plutonium and the existing weapons."

If a deal holds together, he said, "the key will be retaining leverage" on the North by preventing China, Russia and South Korea from increasing their economic cooperation so much that that their actions negate the United Nations Security Council sanctions on the North.

According to the outline, the proposed agreement would establish "tight timelines for actions that are measured in months, not years," and would include a flurry of activity in the first 60 days. That would include shutting down the Yongbyon facilities.

Inspectors would return to the country for the first time in more than four years, and the North would have to declare "all of its existing nuclear programs." That is a reference to the American accusation that the North has a hidden program to enrich uranium, purchased from the rogue Pakistani scientist Abdul Qadeer Khan. The North once admitted to the existence of the program, American officials say, but has since denied it.

The working groups outlined by the proposed agreement would discuss denuclearization, economic and energy cooperation, normalization of diplomatic relations, and a peace treaty formally ending the Korean War. The North's commitments, the document says, "are to all five other parties, including China," and it says that "conventional energy assistance will be determined by the working group and will be commensurate with the steps" North Korea takes to fulfill its commitments.

The huge annual energy package North Korea is demanding would eclipse the aid provided under the 1994 deal, when the North was promised light-water nuclear reactors with a generating capacity of two million kilowatts of electricity, as well as a temporary fix of 500,000 tons of heavy fuel oil.

The chief Japanese envoy, Kenichiro Sasae, told Kyodo, "The problem is that North Korea has excessive expectations about this, and unless it reconsiders this issue, an agreement will be difficult."

North Korea's insistence on the package deflated the optimism that had infused the early days of this round of talks and spread to senior officials in the White House, who said they expected a deal this weekend. By Sunday afternoon, diplomats had decided that Monday would be the final day of talks, agreement or no. According to [a news agency], South Korea's representative, Chun Yung-woo, blamed the size of the energy package "and the scope, pace and range of the North's actions to denuclearize" for the stalemate.

The Russian envoy, Aleksandr Losyukov, suggested that the best outcome might be a "chairman's statement" by China that summarized the negotiations.

"It seems the chances to reach a joint statement are slim," Mr. Losyukov said, according to Xinhua, China's official news agency.

North Korea Snarls Efforts To End Nuclear Standoff (WSJ)

By Evan Ramstad

The Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

BEIJING -- The latest effort by the U.S., China and three other countries to talk North Korea into giving up its pursuit of nuclear weapons is at risk of failure because of disagreement over one major point: the energy incentives they will provide Pyongyang.

The snag spoiled what was expected to be quick approval of a sweeping deal that was largely arranged by the U.S. in a two-way discussion with North Korea last month. Negotiators last night said they will continue working on the problem for just one more day, then will end the current round of talks with or without an agreement.

"There is a point in which you set a deadline and lay out your position and hope the other side is interested in trying to cut a deal," said Christopher Hill, the U.S. envoy to the talks.

The problem emerged on the first day of the talks on Thursday, as North Korea insisted the energy assistance it is being offered in stages occur all at once, Mr. Hill said, rather than in phases. Delegates from other countries in the talks said over the weekend that North Korea's request was excessive. North Korea envoy Kim Kye Gwan doesn't usually talk to reporters until the end of a round of talks.

DOJ_NMG_0130271

The U.S. and other participants in the talks want to phase in energy assistance, increasing it each time North Korea takes another step toward getting rid of nuclear weapons. "We're not interested in just stopping at initial steps," Mr. Hill said. "We're interested in completing the journey to denuclearization."

The stakes are high for the U.S., which, since the North's test of a nuclear device in October, has stepped up its diplomatic efforts to reverse Pyongyang's desire for such weapons. Success with North Korea might help the U.S. persuade another budding nuclear power, Iran, to give up its work, too.

A failure to reach a deal would again raise questions about North Korea's willingness to compromise, which has appeared low from the first round of talks in August 2003.

The viability of the six-party negotiating process also is in jeopardy. Japan, South Korea and Russia are other members of the six-party talks.

The six countries failed to reach a deal the last time they met, in mid-December. Diplomats entered that round with high hopes also, but North Korea's delegates said they weren't able to negotiate.

Mr. Hill subsequently held three days of meetings with the North's Mr. Kim in Berlin last month, resolved several disputes and formed the framework of a deal.

Under it, North Korea would shut down its sole nuclear plant, which provides spent fuel that can be reprocessed into weapons material, and begin to take other disarmament steps.

It also would take steps toward friendlier relations with the U.S., Japan and South Korea.

In return, the five countries would provide North Korea with economic assistance, chiefly in the form of free fuel oil and electricity. The U.S. would resolve a portion of a banking dispute with North Korea.

The countries planned to set up five working groups to implement the various parts of the deal and schedule regular meetings, as often as every month.

Late last night, Mr. Hill said, "I think we have a real problem if we can't reach an agreement on this."

North Korea Talks Teeter On Brink Of Collapse (FT)

By Anna Fifield

Financial Times, February 12, 2007

Diplomatic efforts to halt North Korea's nuclear weapons programme are teetering on the brink of collapse because of a disagreement over the energy aid Pyongyang should receive in return for its first steps.

Pyongyang was making "excessive" demands for electricity and oil that, unless dropped, would see the talks end in deadlock on Monday, Japan's envoy said.

After two tortuous days discussing a single paragraph in a draft agreement that would pave the way for denuclearisation, diplomats agreed to conclude the latest round of six-party talks on the North Korean nuclear problem on Monday, regardless of whether they strike a deal.

Failure would come as a heavy blow for all parties, which have been meeting in the most optimistic atmosphere in 18 months.

"We have a real problem if we can't reach an agreement," Christopher Hill, the US negotiator, said on Sunday night. "The diplomatic process would certainly be dealt a significant setback but that does not mean that we are going to give up on this issue. We do not have the option of walking away."

The talks opened on Thursday amid hopes a deal could be struck that would pave the way for implementation of the September 2005 agreement under which North Korea pledged to abandon its nuclear weapons programme in return for economic and energy assistance.

Although all parties – China, Japan, Russia, the US and the two Koreas – agreed in principle on the first two days to work towards this goal, the talks came unstuck over the weekend over the rewards North Korea could expect for certain steps.

According to reports coming out from the delegations, North Korea has been insisting the other five countries provide it with 2m kilowatts of electricity, the amount that could have been generated by two light-water reactors that were supposed to be built under the 1994 nuclear agreement with the Clinton administration.

It was also demanding 2m tonnes of heavy fuel oil.

Kenichiro Sasae, the Japanese negotiator, said the "excessive" demands led to an "atmosphere of heightened tension" on Sunday. "This is the problem, and unless they change their thinking, an agreement will be difficult," Mr Sasae said.

DOJ_NMG_0130272

Pyongyang has a record of trying to extract greater concessions by starting from an unrealistic bargaining position, so analysts said a deal was still possible.

Mr Hill said he had had a “very, very frank and honest” discussion with his North Korean counterpart on Sunday. “We were prepared to look at some energy assistance because the DPRK really needs energy assistance. But we are not looking at energy assistance that would somehow allow the DPRK to avoid denuclearisation,” he said, referring to North Korea by its official name.

But a pro-Pyongyang newspaper said the talks had hit a snag because of a US “betrayal”. The Chosun Shinbo said the US last month offered to lift financial sanctions in return for North Korea taking steps towards dismantling its nuclear weapons programme. “The obstacle is ... the US and some other countries never think of their [own] duties.”

North Korean Nuclear Talks Proceed As Outlook Dims (WP)

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

North Korean Nuclear Talks Proceed as Outlook Dims

BEIJING -- Deadlocked on Sunday over energy aid to North Korea, envoys to six-nation talks on the Pyongyang government's nuclear weapons program gave themselves one more day to reach agreement on first steps toward eliminating the program.

The stalemate resulted from North Korea's demand for heavy fuel oil in exchange for closing its main nuclear facility, a reactor at Yongbyon, and readmitting international inspectors in a plan the Bush administration had hoped would lead to denuclearization.

The chief U.S. envoy, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill, suggested that if North Korea obtained such a large amount of fuel upfront, it might no longer feel obligated to continue denuclearization. Some reports quoting diplomats at the talks suggested that the initial commitment demanded by North Korea amounted to 2 million tons.

"We're prepared to help . . . especially on economic and energy issues," Hill said. "But we're not prepared to help them in a way that would allow them to avoid the next steps in denuclearization."

The chief Russian negotiator, Deputy Foreign Minister Alexander Losyukov, predicted that the six envoys -- from North and South Korea, China, Russia, Japan and the United States -- would not be able to reach agreement at this round of talks despite what appeared to be favorable conditions when they began Thursday, according to the official New China News Agency.

-- Edward Cody

EUROPE

Â· LISBON -- Voters failed to overturn Portugal's strict abortion law because of low turnout at the polls, but the prime minister vowed to relax restrictions in the conservative Catholic country through legislation.

Â· PRISTINA, Serbia -- Kosovo Albanian leaders appealed for calm after two people died following clashes between police and ethnic Albanians protesting a U.N. plan they say falls short of full independence from Serbia.

Â· ASHKHABAD, Turkmenistan -- Turkmens voted in their country's first presidential election with more than one candidate.

All the candidates were from the only legal party, and there were no foreign monitors. Officials said turnout was nearly 99 percent.THE MIDDLE EAST

Â· RIYADH, Saudi Arabia -- Russian President Vladimir Putin held talks with Saudi King Abdullah on Iraq and the Palestinian-Israeli conflict in the first visit to the kingdom by a Russian leader.

Â· JERUSALEM -- Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said the emerging Palestinian cabinet must recognize Israel, renounce violence and accept past peace agreements.

Separately, Israel conducted its first nighttime test of its Arrow antimissile system, the country's main's bulwark against a possible attack by Iran's long-range weapons, Defense Minister Amir Peretz said.AFRICA

Â· MOGADISHU, Somalia -- Five mortar bombs exploded Monday in the capital, killing at least three people, witnesses said. A bomb exploded Sunday at a march in Kismaayo that drew thousands in support of peacekeepers. Troops fired into the crowd in response. At least five people were killed.

Let's Try To Make A Deal (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 12, 2007

THE LATEST INTERNATIONAL effort to get North Korea to end its nuclear programs enters its final day today on a discouraging note. After an 18-month stalemate and a North Korean nuclear weapon test, U.S. officials are once again struggling to reach a deal with Pyongyang. Yet even if they did, the erratic regime's history would require that any deal be treated with skepticism. And whatever its details, one thing that a deal most assuredly will not be is a solution.

DOJ_NMG_0130273

That's because any solution to the North Korean nuclear problem must include an agreement by Pyongyang to place its plutonium — whether two or 12 bombs' worth — under international safeguards. Once cameras are focused on the material, and inspectors are checking for hidden stockpiles of plutonium or uranium, real engagement with the North Koreans can begin.

The question, of course and as always, is how to get there from here. For all its bluster, the Bush administration got nowhere with Pyongyang until it froze some accounts in a previously obscure bank in Macao — accounts believed to be North Korean leader Kim Jong Il's private slush fund. It was the financial sleuths at the Treasury Department and in the intelligence community, not the hard-liners at the State Department and the Pentagon, who finally brought Kim back to the table.

Once there, the North Koreans appear to have reverted to their usual preposterous demands. Giving up the plutonium stockpiles they already have, or the enriched uranium program they once acknowledged but now deny, is not now up for negotiation. Instead, in exchange for freezing the Yongbyon nuclear reactor, they reportedly want 2 million tons of heavy fuel oil — four times the amount that the U.S. supplied under a deal during the Clinton administration.

This is an offer the U.S. must refuse — even at the cost of walking away from the talks empty-handed. On the other hand, it would be self-defeating for the U.S. to continue to insist that no concessions whatsoever can be made to Pyongyang until it unilaterally dismantles its nuclear program. Kim has every reason to doubt the Bush administration's declaration that it has "no hostile intent." And it's not just the president. There is bipartisan hostility in Washington to Kim's heinous regime. But it's hard to envision a scenario for overthrowing him that doesn't also involve the incineration of Seoul.

The United States, and the world, have lived with a dangerous North Korea for half a century and a dangerously unstable North Korea for more than a decade. What the world cannot live with is a dangerously unstable nuclear North Korea. So a true disarmament deal must be eventually struck. And if a taste of fuel oil, like a swig of Kim's favorite cognac, can begin the cycle of mutual concessions that will be required, then the wisest course may be to pour just enough — and not a drop more — to keep the North Koreans at the table.

Latin America Wary Of New U.S. Attention (LAT)

By Patrick J. Mcdonnell

The Los Angeles Times, February 12, 2007

BUENOS AIRES — The Bush administration's self-proclaimed "year of engagement" with Latin America kicked off last week with broadsides against Venezuela and Iran, a diplomatic tiff with Argentina and analysts wondering whether it all wasn't a little late in the game.

"A veritable diplomatic offensive by a government that has only concentrated on Iraq," wrote veteran correspondent Gustavo Sierra in the Argentine newspaper Clarin after a visit here by R. Nicholas Burns, U.S. undersecretary of State for political affairs, and Thomas A. Shannon, the administration's top diplomat for Latin America.

The pair also visited Brazil, and U.S. Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales made a separate visit last week to Argentina and Brazil. The White House confirmed that President Bush would venture to Latin America in March, with stops scheduled in Brazil, Uruguay, Colombia, Guatemala and Mexico.

The moves are widely seen in South America as an effort to counter the influence of Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, who has wooed his fellow leaders with oil subsidies, foreign aid and a steady diet of invective targeting "the devil" Bush.

It has become conventional wisdom here, even among U.S. allies, that the Bush administration's fixation on Iraq and the Middle East has left Latin America, once the focus of Cold War conflicts, largely ignored, except for U.S. insistence on aggressive drug-interdiction and free-trade policies.

Chavez has gleefully exploited that void, which many think will widen as a politically debilitated Bush assumes lame-duck status.

The White House effort "is catch up and see what we can salvage," said David Fleischer, a political scientist at the University of Brasilia.

U.S. officials embraced the "year of engagement" theme after recent elections put leftists in charge in much of the region, including pro-Chavez presidents in Ecuador and Bolivia. Conservative and pro-U.S. administrations were elected in key allies Colombia and Mexico.

The Bush administration says it has an ability to work across the ideological spectrum.

"Coming out of 2006, we thought it was very important to start 2007 very quickly with as many trips into the region at as high a level as possible," Burns said in Washington before leaving for South America.

Although U.S. diplomats insisted that the initiative was not intended to counter Chavez's spreading influence, the subject has inevitably flared.

"Frankly, you have to wonder if Chavez's plan is to become president for life," Burns told reporters here.

DOJ_NMG_0130274

Most analysts are skeptical that the anti-Chavez strategy will bear fruit in places such as Brazil and Argentina, where leftist presidents Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva and Nestor Kirchner, respectively, have eschewed Chavez's anti-Washington rhetoric but have welcomed Venezuela into the South American trade bloc known as Mercosur.

Chavez has used the platform to criticize U.S. policies, as he did at a hemispheric trade enclave in Argentina in 2005, when a flustered Bush was unable to craft a new free-trade zone, to Chavez's delight.

"In private, some leaders may express concern about Chavez, but publicly there is a sense of unity among South American countries in defending sovereignty and resisting efforts to divide the hemisphere," said Riordan Roett, director of the Latin American studies program at Johns Hopkins University.

The U.S. diplomats' trip to Argentina also provided an opportunity to lash out at another U.S. antagonist — Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, a Chavez ally whose Latin American tour last month clearly upset the White House. Ahmadinejad was pictured kissing babies while in Nicaragua for the inauguration of President Daniel Ortega, a Cold War adversary of the Reagan administration.

"There is a concern that if Iran, through Chavez, is making a presence in the U.S. backyard, then that needs to be dealt with," said Michael Shifter, an analyst at the Inter-American Dialogue, a Washington study group.

The U.S. diplomats visited the site of a Buenos Aires Jewish cultural center targeted in a 1994 bombing that Argentina and Israel say was linked to Iran. Tehran denies any involvement, but U.S. officials have voiced strong support for Argentina's efforts to extradite former Iranian officials, including ex-President Hashemi Rafsanjani, in connection with the blast, which killed 85 people and wounded 200.

Jewish leaders in Argentina, home to the region's largest Jewish population, applauded the U.S. effort. Luis Grynwald, who heads the rebuilt Jewish center here, called it "a symbol of the action we all have to take against international terrorism."

Critics were quick to assail Washington's human rights record, citing abuses at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq and at the U.S. detention center in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq. All have fanned anti-U.S. sentiment in a region where Washington's previous interventions and alliances with military dictatorships remain fresh in the collective memory.

The left-leaning Argentine newspaper Pagina 12 mocked Burns' assertion that the Bush administration was "a champion of human rights" and that it supported the Argentine government's efforts to try abusers from past military regimes.

"If Burns' lack of memory of the proved responsibility of the United States in the successive military coups that devastated Latin America in the decade of the 1970s was notorious, worse was his omission of the situation in Guantanamo," the newspaper said, referring to the detention of terrorism suspects on the base.

Also marring the diplomats' visits were hard feelings about pressure from the U.S. ambassador on behalf of an investment fund's push for a share of a major power transmission company. Argentina rejected the U.S. firm's bid, and Burns termed the whole issue a misunderstanding.

Kirchner, Argentina's president, posed for photos with the U.S. envoys but generally distanced himself. It was not lost on the political class here that Bush will skip Argentina next month, but visit tiny Uruguay, just across the Rio de la Plata. Kirchner is weighing a reelection bid this year, and analysts say that being seen as too cozy with Washington is not smart politics.

Opportunity For Turks And Kurds? (WP)

By Richard Holbrooke

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

IRBIL, Iraqi Kurdistan -- Whatever happens in Iraq, we must try to limit the terrible fallout from the war. The place to start should be with our indispensable NATO ally Turkey, the front-line state of the post-Cold War era, whose relations with the United States have deteriorated dramatically in the past six years.

The immediate issue is raids by Kurdish terrorists across Turkey's border with Iraq, which divides an area inhabited on both sides by Kurds who have long felt that they deserve their own country. Despite centuries of enmity, rapprochement is in the long-term interests of both Turkey and the Kurds of northern Iraq. But such an effort would be controversial and could be undertaken only with strong American encouragement.

First, some essential background from Irbil, the capital of Iraqi Kurdistan, which I am visiting after talks with Turkish leaders in Ankara. This peaceful city is disorienting: Am I in war-torn Iraq or booming Kurdistan? Will Irbil eventually become the capital (or part) of an independent Kurdistan? Or will this region become a battleground for another war, this one between Kurds and Turks?

You can call this place Kurdistan, as its citizens do, or northern Iraq, as the Turks do. But either way, the overwhelming majority (98 percent in a 2005 referendum) of its 4 million people do not want to remain part of Iraq. Who can blame them? Nothing here feels like the Middle East. The Iraqi national flag is banned; only the Kurdistan flag flies. And although the Kurds are sending some of their famously fierce warriors to Baghdad to support the Americans, they fear that Gen. David Petraeus's plan to turn the tide in Baghdad will not succeed.

DOJ_NMG_0130275

Ever since a nation called Iraq was carved out of the debris of the Ottoman Empire by Winston Churchill and Gertrude Bell at the Cairo Conference of 1921, Turkey and Iran have opposed independence for the Kurds of northern Iraq because both fear that an independent Kurdistan on their borders would encourage existing separatist movements among their large Kurdish populations.

This symmetry of fears has led to semi-secret discussions and even some cooperation between our NATO ally and that charter member of the "axis of evil" on dealing with the PKK, a terrorist group that has conducted raids against both Turkey and Iran from bases just inside northern Iraq for many years. I would not rule out limited Turkish military action against some of those bases -- especially since Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan is under enormous political pressure to show strong nationalist credentials against hawkish rivals in an election year.

After years of mishandling relations with Turkey, last year the administration appointed retired Gen. Joe Ralston, the universally respected former NATO commander, as special envoy for the PKK problem. Ralston's intervention helped avoid a Turkish attack in Iraq last summer, and he is accelerating his efforts to get Irbil to rein in the PKK.

But there is a larger issue: the final status of Kirkuk, the multiethnic city that sits in the middle of a huge oil field and lies just outside the official boundaries of Iraqi Kurdistan. The new Iraqi constitution calls for a referendum this year on whether Kirkuk is to be incorporated into the Kurdistan region. The Turks -- who refer repeatedly to the dangers to the Turkmen, their ethnic cousins who live in Kirkuk -- have said that they will not accept such an event. Avoiding a full-blown crisis will require intense mediation by the United States; unfortunately, Ralston's current mandate does not include Kirkuk.

Despite their history, Turkey and Iraqi Kurdistan need each other. Kurdistan could become a buffer between Turkey and the chaos to the south, while Turkey could become the protector of a Kurdistan that, though still technically part of Iraq, is effectively cut loose from a Baghdad government that may no longer function. In addition, Turkey has a major economic opportunity in northern Iraq; already, more than 300 Turkish companies and substantial investment are a primary engine of Kurdish growth.

Rapprochement would require major undertakings by both sides. The legendary Kurdish leader who is now president of the Kurdish regional government, Massoud Barzani, needs to rein in the PKK and pledge not to interfere in Turkey's internal affairs. A compromise that took into account legitimate Turkish concerns would be necessary on Kirkuk; while this would be difficult, especially for the Turkish military, I believe it needs to be attempted, with strong American encouragement.

History and myth make a Turkish-Kurdish deal extremely difficult. It takes visionary leaders to alter the stream of history. Charles de Gaulle and Konrad Adenauer did it for France and Germany. Nelson Mandela did it in South Africa. But such people are very, very rare. Still, the crisis in Iraq requires Turks and Kurds to think of their common interest. Having just talked to the impressive leaders of both sides, I believe they understand that they face not just a crisis but an opportunity.

G-7 Seeks To Shed Overlapping Regulations (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

ESSEN, Germany -- Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson said he and other finance ministers in the Group of Seven leading industrial nations are exploring ways to reduce "duplicative" financial regulations and standards that burden companies doing business globally.

Mr. Paulson said the aim is to "break down artificial barriers" and harmonize regulations and standards so costs and other constraints on multinational companies are reduced.

"One of the biggest costs to business globally is duplicative regulation," Mr. Paulson said in a briefing with reporters during the G-7 meeting here during the weekend.

Mr. Paulson, the former head of Goldman Sachs Group Inc., said when he ran the investment bank, "I can't tell you how many hundreds of millions of dollars we paid dealing with regulations that were similar but different inside the U.S. and outside the U.S." He said many countries have strong regulatory regimes and it should be possible for nations to recognize one another's rules and standards.

In their official statement, the finance ministers said they "agreed to explore within the G-7 free trade in securities based on mutual recognition of regulatory regimes."

Mr. Paulson noted, though, that it is "something that will take a long time" given that many countries, including the U.S., have multiple regulators and overseers. He has planned a conference next month to discuss that overlap, along with other rules he believes may be handicapping U.S. companies.

DOJ_NMG_0130276

The G-7, in its communiqué, agreed vigilance was needed on the potential risks that hedge funds and credit derivatives pose to financial stability. The group acknowledged hedge funds and derivatives "have contributed significantly to the efficiency of the financial system." The statement added that the growth of hedge funds and the instruments they invest in have made the assessment of risks to financial stability "more complex and challenging."

Mr. Paulson dismissed questions about the weakness of the yen, saying it is "market determined" and not being manipulated. While Germany and other European countries have complained that the yen is being manipulated, the G-7's final communiqué made no reference to the currency.

Mr. Paulson's comments could put him at odds with several top Democrats on Capitol Hill, who wrote Mr. Paulson last week saying they "believe a weak yen is a reflection of Japanese government policy." The Democrats, including Michigan Reps. John Dingell and Sander Levin, said the weak yen is assisting Japanese car imports and hurting U.S. auto makers. Mr. Paulson is scheduled to travel to Japan next month.

While the communiqué didn't single out the yen, it said Japan's recovery is "on track and is expected to continue" and that G-7 members "are confident that the implications of these developments will be recognized by market participants and will be incorporated in their assessment of risks." According to G-7 officials, those statements were intended to draw attention to the possibility the yen and Japanese interest rates will rise as the recovery continues.

Notoriety Of President Morales Roils Area's Bolivian Community (WP)

By Pamela Constable And Karin Brulliard

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

On weekend nights, the dance floor at Cecilia's Club in Arlington County pulsates with strobe lights and salsa dancers. But one recent Saturday afternoon, this social hub of the region's large Bolivian population became a sober forum for debate on the political storm that has convulsed the immigrants' native country and sent shock waves through their quiet, prosperous community.

The storm has a name: Evo Morales. He is the charismatic indigenous leader whose election as Bolivia's president just over a year ago brought new pride to the impoverished South American nation. Now, his radical rhetoric and friendships with foreign leftist leaders such as Venezuela's Hugo Chavez are causing consternation in both Bolivia and the United States.

"People are always asking me about Morales. No one ever asked me about any Bolivian president before," said Miriam Rodriguez of Fairfax, who helped organize the forum. "But now we see him making mistakes, following in the steps of Chavez, being pushed to hate America. We want to make sure he does the right thing, because everyone is watching us now."

Greater Washington is home to the largest population of Bolivian immigrants in the United States, with 37 percent of the total. Census figures show that more than 20,000 Bolivian-born immigrants live in the area, but activists and diplomats say the community is more than three times that size. Although smaller and less visible than the area's Central American populace, Bolivians and Peruvians constitute its largest South American immigrant groups.

Bolivians are also one of the oldest and most successful Hispanic communities in the area. Most came here for economic reasons rather than fleeing conflict, and on average they have higher income and education levels than U.S.-born Americans. Although some Bolivians toil at menial jobs, many are professionals or own small businesses.

Bolivians here have clung tightly to their roots, establishing dozens of folklore groups, three soccer leagues in Northern Virginia and a weekend school in Arlington where children study Bolivian traditions. Many fly to Bolivia often to visit relatives or have invested in binational ventures.

Yet surprisingly, they have never formed an ethnic enclave or become politically active as a group. Although many are eligible to vote, almost none has run for local office, and most have avoided becoming involved in the public debate about immigrant rights.

"Bolivians here have been unperceived for many reasons," said Ruddy Orellana, editor of Los Tiempos, a Bolivian-owned newspaper in Falls Church. "They have been peaceful and their kids have not gotten involved in gangs. They have been ambitious in business but have not reached for political influence. . . . They have been scattered and dispersed."

In the past year, however, Morales's election has plunged this quiet community into a political maelstrom. Morales, 47, rose to prominence as a leader of coca-leaf growers, whose crop produces cocaine but also has traditional uses such as tea. He led peasants in highway blockades and opposed U.S. drug eradication policies, saying they unfairly punished poor farmers.

Most Bolivians here say they initially welcomed Morales's presidency as a change from elitist and military governments, but many say they became indignant and alarmed as he has antagonized domestic opponents and befriended Chavez and Cuba's Fidel Castro.

DOJ_NMG_0130277

"We were all tired of corrupt governments, and we were all excited when Morales won," said Monica Williams, president of the Washington-based Bolivian-American Chamber of Commerce. "But he is making mistakes and putting too much emphasis on native issues. We are beginning to see a clash of races and regions. It is polarizing the country."

In recent months, violent demonstrations have broken out in Bolivia, spurred by Morales's promises of an agrarian revolution, with large landowners pitted against landless peasants. Critics say his government has become increasingly confrontational, and opposition leaders have accused him of seeking to impose a totalitarian regime.

Wherever Bolivians gather here, the mention of Morales provokes animated debate. Last Sunday at the Iglesia Santa Maria in Falls Church, whose Episcopal congregation is 90 percent Bolivian, some worshipers expressed fears that his government would seize their family land. But one man counseled patience, adding, "The important thing is that people are participating."

At an indoor gym nearby, men watched two teams of sweaty indoor soccer players chase a blue soccer ball. Gustavo Chalco, a house painter who lives in Burke, said everyone had hoped Morales was going to change things. "But now we are at the edge of a civil war," he said.

Jose Martinez, a gray-haired construction worker, said he dreams of returning home but is no longer sure what awaits him. "Bad image for my country, Evo. Bad image," he said.

In a glassy, modern office in Rosslyn, Oscar Bazoberry, a high-tech developer and venture capitalist, said he admires Morales's concern for the poor but worries that his administration will alienate rather than attract the foreign investment Bolivia needs to develop. So far, his economic policies have stressed nationalizing resources such as natural gas and mining.

"For the first time, Bolivia has a government that cares about the needs of the indigenous poor, but they have no understanding of capital markets and how to make a real dent in development," Bazoberry said. "Morales has put Bolivia on the map, but now that it is a player, let's play."

Some indigenous Bolivians in the area remain enthusiastic about Morales, who has promoted indigenous activists to senior positions and elevated their status in a society long stratified among white, mixed-race and indigenous inhabitants.

Julia Garcia, 58, principal of Escuela Boliva, the weekend school in Arlington, said she still remembers childhood taunts from classmates back home about her Indian-style braids and Quechuan accent.

"I think the high elites never thought we would educate ourselves . . . and be at a level to speak with them," Garcia said. She acknowledged that Morales had made mistakes but said he should not abandon his agenda. "There is a new dawn" in Bolivia, she said.

But others express conflicted feelings about the man who is championing their cause. Elmer Herrera, a stonemason from Annandale and founder of an indigenous organization called Jach'a Uru, said Morales had proved that a Bolivian without pale skin and a foreign degree could rise to power. Yet Morales's refusal to compromise has led to increasingly sharp divisions, Herrera said.

"Evo is ruining the country," Herrera said. "We would like that in Bolivia, the rich and poor, the indigenous and non-indigenous, would sit at a table together."

Morales's emphasis on indigenous rights has hit a sensitive nerve in the area. Although many Bolivian immigrants speak Quechua and join folkloric groups, they are also anxious to blend into American life and not be singled out as an ethnic or racial minority.

"There is a lot of racism," said Alicia Ruiz, who organizes day laborers in Falls Church. Many Bolivians here don't want to acknowledge that they are part Indian, she said. "They ask how a peasant can govern us."

Immigrant leaders are especially concerned about U.S.-Bolivian relations, which have been tested by Morales's role as a champion of coca growers and by his high-profile friendships with Chavez and Castro. Proud of their pro-American values, some Bolivians fear being tarred with the Morales brush.

The Bolivian Embassy in Washington has done little to win them over. For much of last year there was no ambassador, and the new one arrived just as his government proposed that Bolivian residents in the United States obtain costly visas to travel to their homeland.

"We want to have an open door," Ambassador Gustavo Guzman asserted. "People here want us to maintain very good relations with the USA. They worry how close we are becoming to Cuba and Venezuela. They tell us, 'Please be careful. If relations are hurt, we will be the ones who suffer.' "

Yet even immigrants strongly opposed to Morales's views say they want to avert a political crisis in their homeland, which has a long history of instability and military coups.

DOJ_NMG_0130278

"We are all Bolivians, and none of us wants to see a divided Bolivia," Williams said. "I am not crazy about Morales, but we have to give him the benefit of the doubt. All we ask is that he bring the country together, that he speak for all Bolivians, not just some of us."

French Contender Makes Her Presidential Case (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

PARIS, Feb. 11 — France's Socialist presidential candidate, Ségolène Royal, presented her long-awaited presidential program in a two-hour speech on Sunday, hoping to dispel criticism that she is a pretty face without fundamental policies and to reverse a slide in opinion polls.

Dressed in a bright red blazer and speaking to a hall of 15,000 cheering, flag-waving party loyalists, Ms. Royal promised a new kind of French politics based on closer attention to the will of the people through American-style town hall meetings, Internet-based dialogue and national referendums.

Her program was studded with promises and proposals meant to address desires filtered from the more than 700,000 people who attended what her campaign organization puts at 6,500 public meetings since November, together with tens of thousands of ideas left by visitors to her Web site.

"Today I offer you the presidential pact," Ms. Royal told the rally, held northeast of the capital in the industrial suburb of Villepinte. "One hundred proposals for France to rediscover a shared ambition, pride and fraternity."

It remains to be seen whether the speech will give her the momentum to recover her lead over her center-right opponent, Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy. But it failed to impress her harshest critics.

"In the end, she gave a nice speech for a minister of social affairs," said Alain Duhamel, a leading political analyst and the author of "The 2007 Pretenders," a book published in 2006 about France's presidential candidates whose first edition failed to include Ms. Royal at all because Mr. Duhamel did not take her seriously.

Ms. Royal, 53, the daughter of an Army colonel, graduated from the elite École Nationale d'Administration and was appointed as an adviser to François Mitterrand after working on his successful 1981 presidential campaign. She served as minister of the environment and later as deputy minister of school education and as deputy minister of family and childhood. She has also served in Parliament for the Deux-Sèvres department in western France; she was elected president of its regional council in 2004.

But her most visible position has been as photogenic partner to François Hollande, the head of the Socialist Party, with whom she has four children. She appeared early last year as a potential presidential candidate for the party, which was riven by rivalries among its aging bosses.

By the time she won the nomination last fall, Ms. Royal was polling far ahead of other potential candidates. But a series of blunders, particularly in foreign affairs, have added to criticism that she would be out of her depth as France's senior stateswoman.

During a Middle East trip last year, she met a Lebanese Parliament member from Hezbollah who compared Israel to Nazi Germany and criticized American "insanity." She responded, "I agree with a lot of the things you have said, notably your analysis of the U.S."

During a visit to China, where the time between arrest and execution can be a matter of weeks, she appeared to compliment her hosts in saying, "Sometimes the justice is swifter than in France."

Following a meeting in Paris with André Boisclair, head of Canada's pro-independence Parti Québécois, she spoke to Canadian journalists of "common values, namely the freedom and sovereignty of Quebec," infuriating Canada's prime minister.

She has also run into problems at home. When asked on a radio talk show last month about the hotly debated merger of two French utility giants, Suez and Gaz de France, she turned to an aide and asked, "Where do we stand on that?"

When the interviewer asked her how many nuclear-armed submarines France had, she said one. The interviewer shot back, "No, seven," and Ms. Royal corrected herself, only to be told that it was four.

She has even appeared out of step with her partner, Mr. Hollande, who harbored presidential ambitions himself before she swept him aside. She was reportedly furious after he suggested, without consulting her, that a Socialist government would raise taxes on people earning more than about $5,200 a month. He was forced to retract the statement.

Hounded by bad press, she has slipped by as much as nine percentage points in polls since last month, when the Union for a Popular Movement party endorsed Mr. Sarkozy as its candidate. He has since edged ahead. Sunday's speech was meant to help Ms. Royal regain the field.

DOJ_NMG_0130279

Before she appeared on stage, the lights dimmed and techno music filled the hall, including a rendition of the rap hit "Don't Phunk With My Heart." But what followed was a fairly typical, though very long, Socialist Party stump speech, embellished with Ms. Royal's pet proposals.

The proposals are often seen as innovative (giving people who have rented state-subsidized housing for 15 years or more a chance to buy their apartments), impractical (allowing citizens who collect a million or more signatures to propose legislation) or simplistic (paying retirement pensions monthly instead of quarterly and offering free birth control to women under 25).

As with most politicians making promises on the campaign trail, she did not say how she would finance her plans.

She accused the current government of doing "nearly nothing" to address the problems of disenfranchised second-generation immigrant youth, who were responsible for a wave of urban violence in 2005. She warned that without action, there would be even more "extreme violence" that would not be limited to poor neighborhoods.

She avoided delving too deeply into foreign policy.

Of the United States, with which President Jacques Chirac has been at odds over the Iraq war, she said: "We will live with them, as a solid partner, trustworthy, but without complexes either. Size has nothing to do with principles. An imbalance of power is not a reason to stay silent, and we have seen it, indeed, with Iraq. The voice of France, as it was, unfortunately wasn't heard. But it didn't ring any less true.

"And I would like, in the future, for it to continue to ring true and I would like that, by speaking louder and stronger, our voice will carry further."

France's Royal Introduces Platform Ahead Of Election (WSJ)

By Alessandra Galloni And David Gauthier-villars

The Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

PARIS -- French presidential hopeful Ségolène Royal sought to recover from her recent decline in election polls by unveiling a long-awaited platform focused on social programs, including higher minimum wage, pensions and unemployment payouts.

But a lack of specifics on key economic policies, such as how to finance new social spending and concrete proposals on how to tackle the country's high unemployment rate, are likely to leave France's business community cold.

"She avoided talking in depth about sticky issues," says Marc Touati, chairman of ACDE, an association promoting the study of France's economy. Over the past 18 months, Ms. Royal's simple proposition of listening to the people has transformed her from a minor politician in France's Socialist Party to one of the two front-runners in the race to succeed current President Jacques Chirac. Over the past few weeks, however, her popularity has waned vis-à-vis her main rival, conservative candidate Nicolas Sarkozy, in part because of a series of foreign-policy gaffes, but also because she waited until 10 weeks before the election to unveil her official platform. Mr. Sarkozy unveiled his in mid-January.

Ms. Royal has justified her schedule by saying she needed enough time to gather the ideas of French people around the country by holding 6,100 town-hall meetings and sifting through suggestions of 2.8 million visitors to her Web site.

In her two-hour speech before 20,000 supporters in an auditorium near Paris yesterday, Ms. Royal stuck to her trademark crowd-pleasing tactics, including distancing herself from the official Socialist Party platform and promising to give people a greater role in government. For example, in presenting her 100-point "presidential pact," she stuck to her idea of introducing so-called citizen juries, or ordinary people chosen randomly to oversee elected officials, a proposal that has rankled many in her own party.

"You have suggested many things that are simple and true," she said, referring to the town-hall meetings that she says formed the basis of her platform. During the speech, she pledged that, if elected, workers who lose their jobs would receive 90% of their salaries during their first year without a job and promised to increase pensions by 5%. She also promised to build 120,000 units of state-subsidized housing and offer young people a €10,000 ($13,000) loan to finance business projects and get started in life.

"The speech is likely to stop her decline in the polls and is in line with her approach so far," says Zaki Laïdi, a professor at the Institute d'Études Politiques in Paris. What remains unclear, however, is how she plans to finance the measures. "The most astounding thing is that she didn't say anything about tax policy," adds Mr. Laïdi.

Business leaders have been concerned with Ms. Royal's economic rhetoric so far, including promises to give more power to unions -- a pledge she confirmed yesterday, adding that unions should receive state aid to "promote a mass unionization."

Yesterday, Ms. Royal said she wanted to "reconcile people and their companies," promising to give tax breaks to companies that invest in research and development and raising the overall state budget in research initiatives. But in her speech, she also pledged that, if elected, she would raise the minimum wage to €1,500 per month from €1,254 per month -- something unlikely to please the business community, which was instead hoping to have more details on Ms. Royal's view regarding France's 35-hour workweek and overall job-creation measures.

DOJ_NMG_0130280

Ms. Royal also said she wanted to placate public "wrath" over France's 22% unemployment rate among young people, but she gave few details on how to overhaul the job market to make it easier for employers to hire young people.

Early in the speech, Ms. Royal said she wanted to tackle France's public debt, which has soared to 66% of gross domestic product, compared with about 20% 25 years ago, because of high public spending and a chronic budget deficit.

"It's a good thing that she started her speech with the issue of debt, it shows she's aware of the problem," says Mr. Touati, adding, "But it's a pity she didn't say more."

Falling In Polls, French Socialist Offers Platform (WP)

By Molly Moore

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

PARIS, Feb. 11 -- French Socialist Party candidate SÃ©golÃ¨ne Royal, attempting to rejuvenate a faltering bid to become the country's first female president, announced a 100-point platform Sunday that includes sending juvenile delinquents to military-style boot camps and providing free contraceptives to women younger than 25.

Royal billed the two-hour speech, delivered before an estimated 15,000 party members but aimed at a national television audience, as a response to critics who say she has articulated few substantive proposals and has leaned too heavily on her femininity and personality.

"The time of imagination and daring has arrived," Royal, clad in a red dress suit and frequently flashing her trademark photogenic smile, told a cheering, placard-waving crowd. "I will forget no one, because France, in order to recover, needs every man and woman."

Royal, who was leading opinion polls in the presidential race just a few weeks ago, has slipped eight points behind her main rival, Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy of the ruling Union for a Popular Movement party, or UMP. Her campaign has been plagued by blunders, gaffes and internal party disputes that included a public spat over taxes between Royal and the party's head -- who is also her longtime partner and the father of her four children.

In the past week, French newspapers and magazines have switched from publishing pictures of a smiling Royal to showing a frowning or scowling Royal.

She was criticized by party members and political commentators for waiting until Sunday, just 10 weeks before election day, to announce her party platform. Royal justified the delay by saying she was unwilling to draft the platform until she and the party had conducted hundreds of public meetings and interviews across France and on the Internet to allow the French people to have input in shaping the platform.

Her proposals, many of which reflect mainstays of the Socialist Party, include increases in retirement benefits for the lowest wage earners, raising the minimum wage, a guarantee of affordable and safe housing for life for the country's poorest citizens, and loans of up to $13,000 to every young person to help give them a start in life.

"As a mother, I want all the children who are born and grow up in France to have the same as my own children," said Royal, 53, who sprinkled the speech with references to motherhood.

In a statement, the opposing UMP party said Royal had proposed "large public expenditures, an omnipresent state, but the candidate abstained from details of how to finance her program."

Royal's platform also contains several controversial ideas she floated earlier in the campaign, including the use of military-style training for juvenile delinquents and the creation of "citizen juries" to critique the performance of elected officials.

She suggested reforming the government bureaucracy by eliminating some ministerial posts.

Royal accused the United States of making mistakes in Iraq "because of its power," adding that France should be a solid partner with the United States but should not be intimidated by it.

Low Turnout Undercuts Portugal Vote On Abortion (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

LISBON, Feb. 11 — Portugal voted decisively in a referendum on Sunday to liberalize its restrictive abortion law, but the result was not considered valid because of low voter turnout.

Still, Prime Minister José Sócrates, a Socialist who supported the liberalization, declared victory and said he would ask Parliament, where his party enjoys a comfortable majority, to change the law.

DOJ_NMG_0130281

"The people spoke with a clear voice," Mr. Sócrates said in televised remarks after the polls closed. He added: "The law now will be discussed and approved in Parliament. Our interest is to fight clandestine abortion and we have to produce a law that respects the result of the referendum."

The vote was 59.25 percent in favor and 40.75 percent opposed, with a turnout of slightly less than 44 percent of the 8.8 million eligible voters.

At least 50 percent of eligible voters needed to cast ballots for the results to be legally binding.

In many urban centers, the margin in favor of changing the law was much higher than at the national level. In Lisbon, for example, 71.5 percent voted in favor, 28.5 percent opposed; in Faro, in the Algarve region of southern Portugal, 73.6 percent were in favor, 26.4 percent opposed.

Supporters and opponents of abortion, political commentators and pollsters attributed the lack of voter participation to the episodically rainy weather, voter apathy and even ignorance.

"Referendums, unlike regular elections, often deal with complicated issues, and people who are not politically motivated or informed have a problem making the decision to vote," Pedro Magalhães, a pollster at Catholic University of Lisbon, said on state-run RTP1 television.

Other commentators explained that the political elite misread popular opinion in assuming that a broad range of people would declare their position at the polls.

"There are two Portugals, the Portugal of the elite — politicians, newspapers and television — and the Portugal of the people," said João Marcelino, director of the mass-circulation daily tabloid Correio da Manhã. "The people are more concerned about unemployment, their salaries, the health system. The real country doesn't consider the issue of abortion important."

Despite the low turnout, supporters of abortion rights were jubilant.

"Finally after thirty years of democracy in Portugal we now can pass a law that will not treat women as criminals," said Maria Antónia Santos, a Socialist deputy. "This is the first step toward eliminating the reality of backstreet abortions. Now it's our responsibility to pass a good law."

Opponents of a change in the law said that the referendum's failure to attract at least half the electorate meant that Mr. Sócrates was wrong to call for a change in the law.

"Sócrates will be responsible for this sad chapter in Portugal's history for insisting on a political move that has split Portuguese society," José Ribeiro e Castro, head of the center-right Partido Popular, said in televised remarks. He added that the low voter turnout confirmed that for the Portuguese, abortion "was not a critical issue."

A similar referendum in 1998 took place on a sunny Sunday in June, when many Portuguese were at the beach. Only 32 percent of the electorate turned up at the polls, voting by a razor-thin margin to retain the existing law. That result was declared invalid and the restrictive 1984 law remained unchanged.

In the latest referendum, both supporters and opponents of abortion, including the Catholic Church, had urged voters to cast ballots. The referendum asked voters whether they approved legalizing abortion in the first 10 weeks of pregnancy and would have allowed women to openly seek medical support from the state-run health system.

During the day, clerics used their sermons at Sunday Mass in many parishes throughout this overwhelmingly Catholic country to remind parishioners of their duty to vote — and to vote no.

"Before baptism a life already exists that must be appreciated divinely as a gift from the creator," said Rev. Lourenço Sebastião Dias during his sermon in a Lisbon church that was broadcast on state-run RDP radio.

Mr. Sócrates had campaigned in favor of a change in the law, one of the most restrictive in the 25-nation European Union.

He had said the country's identity was at stake in the referendum. "The choice placed before Portugal is whether it resigns itself to staying in the group of the most conservative countries or if it embraces modernity," he said Thursday.

Portugal is also the only European Union member that has put on trial women who undergo illegal abortions, the health care providers who perform them and even "accomplices" like husbands or family members who might accompany them to backstreet abortionists.

The current law in Portugal allows abortion until the 12th week of pregnancy in case of "mental and physical risk," until 16 weeks in case of rape, until 24 weeks in case of a malformed fetus and at any time if the woman's life is in danger. It imposes prison sentences of up to three years for a woman who undergoes an illegal abortion and up to eight years for the person who illegally performs it.

No More Pneumonia (WP)

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0130282

IN ROME LAST week, a group of leading industrialized nations backed one of those rare ideas that is popular, cost-effective and highly consequential for the world's poor. The United States was not among them -- a mistake we hope U.S. policymakers will correct as the initiative proceeds.

Currently, drug companies do not have a strong incentive to develop new medications or to increase production capacity to serve low-income countries. There's demand in developing nations for everything from better anti-retrovirals to new malaria medication, but the money isn't there, especially given the fickleness of foreign aid. So manufacturers face the unappealing prospect of investing hundreds of millions into drug development and production plants only to see the money available to buy their product disappear.

The solution Italy, Britain, Russia and a few other countries endorsed is in essence a promise to buy medication from any company willing to develop it according to World Health Organization standards and sell it at a certain price. Purchases would continue for at least 10 years, a commitment that would make the market more predictable, and the product would be delivered to poor countries.

Ultimately, donor nations hope to spur development of new drugs against malaria, HIV-AIDS and tuberculosis. But they selected pneumococcus, which causes pneumonia, meningitis and other deadly illnesses, as a test case for the scheme, and committed to buy about $1.5 billion worth of new vaccine for use in poorer countries.

Backers of the plan say that pneumococcus is a natural place to start. It is an unheralded killer, responsible for the deaths of 2 million children a year -- much larger than the annual AIDS toll. Yet the amount of money devoted to developing and producing new drugs to treat pneumococcus infections is tiny compared with that for other high-profile diseases. And, because there are drugs on the market in rich countries that effectively protect humans from the bacterium, the $1.5 billion carrot could have an effect quickly. Drug companies will rapidly decide whether or not to invest in new production capacity.

Notably absent from the agreement so far is America's contribution, even though the plan is a relatively cheap, market-based approach that could eliminate a major killer in the developing world. If the pneumococcus test case produces results, the United States should join similar ventures.

DOJ_NMG_0130283

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: MONDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Coast Guard Should Revisit Military Contract, Report Says (NYT) ... 3
Airspace Limits Sought For Patrol Of Canada Border (WT) ... 3
WHATEVER IT TAKES (NewYorker) ... 4

Homeland Response:

Escaping The Watch List (USNEWS) ... 11
Terror's Next Target? (USNEWS) ... 12

War News:

Iraq War Debate Shifts To The House (LAT) ... 12
Rep. Hoyer: Vote On Iraq Will Be Limited (AP) ... 14
Hoyer Puts Republicans In A Bind Over War (POL) ... 14
House Readies For Iraq Debate (RC) ... 16
GOP Expects Defections As House Debates Iraq Resolution (WP) ... 18
House Democrats To Push Resolution Opposing Increase In Troop Levels (WSJ) ... 19
Iraq Debate Shifts To The House (CSM) ... 20
Why Are The Pacifists So Passive? (NYT) ... 22
Ex-Pentagon Official Defends Iraq Stance (AP) ... 23
Feith Calls Faulty Prewar Claims 'Good Government' (LAT) ... 24
Senator Ahab (WSJ) ... 24
U.S. Says Arms Link Iranians To Iraqi Shiites (NYT) ... 25
Military Ties Iran To Arms In Iraq (WP) ... 27
Military: Iran Ships Weapons To Shiite Extremists (USAT) ... 29
Iran's Leaders Arming Iraqis, U.S. Says (AP) ... 30
Iran Arms Iraqi Insurgents (WT) ... 31
U.S. Officials Offer Evidence Of Iran's Hand In Iraqi Unrest (LAT) ... 33
Dems Skeptical Of Starting Row With Iran (AP) ... 33
No News From Iran's Leader On Nuclear Program (NYT) ... 34
Iranians Voice Support For Tehran's Bid For Nuclear Energy (LAT) ... 35
Iran Softens Tone, Declares Readiness To Resume Talks (WP) 36
Iran Raises Hopes Of Nuclear Settlement (FT) ... 37
Iran Hits Softer Note Over Nukes (CSM) ... 38
Scary Movie 2 (NYT) ... 40
U.S. Troops Enter Eastern Baghdad As New Push Begins (NYT) ... 41
Bombing At Tikrit Police Station Kills 9 (WP) ... 42
Insurgents Stepping Up Efforts To Down U.S. Helicopters In Iraq (NYT) ... 43
What Is Plan C? (USNEWS) ... 44
Target: U.S. Choppers (NSWK) ... 44
The Incredible Shrinking Deficit (USNEWS) ... 45
Wanted: A Few Good Iraqis. Or Jordanians. Or . . . Anybody? (WP) ... 45
Thousands Of Army Humvees Lack Armor Upgrade (WP) ... 46

DOJ:

Politics Shouldn't Matter (TOLB) ... 48

Corporate Scandals:

McAfee Ex-Counsel Likely To Face Options Charges (WSJ) ... 48
Restatements Still Bedevil Firms (WSJ) ... 49
Questions Grow About A Top CNBC Anchor (NYT) ... 50

Criminal Law:

Cheney Testimony In Libby Trial Would Carry High Risk (NYT) . 52
A Historic Moment If Cheney Testifies Live, As Expected (NYT) 53
Cheney Backers Grow Restive (WSJ) ... 54
The Libby Trial: Who Said What To Whom, And Who Remembers? (CSM) ... 55
Libby Lawyers To Call On High-profile Journalists (USAT) ... 56
Media Figures May Be Reluctant Defense Witnesses In Libby Case (WP) ... 57
CHANNEL ISLAND: Russert's Fault? A Lack Of Outrage (LAT) 58
Relying On The Notepad In The Electronic Age (NYT) ... 60
Wilkes Warned By FEC (RC) ... 61
'95 WORDS MAY SAVE 'MOB' FED (NYPOST) ... 62
Promises, Promises (USNEWS) ... 62
The Club Scene (WP) ... 63

Civil Law:

Firm Seeks Settlement Of Medicaid Claims Probe (WT) ... 64

Antitrust:

EMI In Talks To Dump Copy Protection (USAT) ... 65
Hindalco Pact To Buy Novelis Underlines India's Push Overseas (WSJ) ... 65
Nasdaq Concedes On LSE As Offer Lapses (FT) ... 66
Nasdaq Fails In Hostile Takeover Bid For London Stock Exchange (WSJ) ... 67
Failed Bid Is Setback For Growth At Nasdaq (NYT) ... 68

U.K.'s Vodafone Secures A Passage Into India (WSJ) 68

Environment/Indian Affairs:

In Congress, Climate Talks Loom (WSJ)..... 70
Sen. Stevens Pushes For Tougher Fuel-economy Standards (LAT) 70
Congress Tackles Global Warming (WT) 72
Letters (WSJ) 73
Virgin Thinking (WSJ) 75
Producers The New Math Of Alternative Energy (WSJ) 75
Zakaria: Unfortunately, We Can't Stop Global Warming (NSWK)79
U.S. Labor Laws Apply To Tribes, Court Says (SDUT)..... 80

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

ATF Officials Who Challenged Director Moved To Lower Posts (WP)..... 81
Dizzying Rise, Fall Of A Local Drug Lord (PHI) 82
13 Cases Collapse After Disclosure Of Informant Offenses (WP)84
Drug Czar Reports Drop In Drug Use (AP)..... 85
Drug Control Plan Heavy On Prevention (OREG)..... 85
Fugitive Honduran Street Gang Leader May Be In Houston (HC)86
Boldness, Violence Kept Drug Kingpin Atop Mexican Cartel (AP)88
Venezuela A Hot Spot For Drug Trafficking (MH) 89
Giuliani: Gun Control Helped Lower Crime (AP) 91

Immigration:

The Attrition Solution (WT)..... 91

Congress-Administration:

Inspector Waxman's Inquest (USNEWS) 92
White House Sees Strong Productivity (WSJ)..... 93
Bernanke's Congressional Testimony Could Set Tone For Treasurys (WSJ)..... 94
Fed Turnover Presents Challenge For Bernanke (USAT)..... 94
Bank Executive Is Expected To Receive Treasury Post (WSJ) .. 95
A Renewed Call To Televise High Court (WP)..... 95
Bush's Farm Bill Outlines Bold Move (CSM) 96
Senators Enter Spin Cycle (RC) 97
FEDERAL DIARY: Pay Unrelated To Performance, Workers Say (WP)..... 99
Did Help Get Left Behind? (USNEWS)..... 100
A Fair Health Fix (USNEWS)..... 101
Passing The Buck On Health Care (NYT) 102
Appalachia Redux (NYT) 102

Other News:

Time To Face The Music (USNEWS)..... 103
Samuelson: The Stubborn Welfare State (NSWK)..... 103
Saudi Oil Minister Says Market Is Balanced, Requires No Changes (WSJ) 104
A Deadline May Be Extended For Claims In Holocaust Case (NYT) 105
The Right Man (NYM) 106
Obama Blasts War In Iraq In Ames Speech (MCGG)..... 108
Tens Of Thousands Turn Out To See Obama (LAT) 109
Obama Questions Rivals On Iraq (WP)..... 110
Obama Homecoming Turns Into Anti-war Rally (CHIT) 111
Obama Comes Out Swinging In Iowa (USAT) 112
Obama Turns To Lincoln And Heats Up Illinois (FT)..... 113
Australian Leader: Al-Qaida Wants Obama (AP) 114
Obama Plan Has A Critic In Australia (NYT) 114
Obama Stresses Appreciation For Faith (AP) 115
Trying To Manage Obama's Message (USNEWS)..... 116
Until The War Ends ... (NYT) 117
Obama's 'Improbable Quest' (WSJ)..... 118
Voters Seek Clarity On Clinton Iraq Vote (AP) 119
For Clinton And Obama, Different Tests On Iraq (NYT)..... 120
Clinton Addresses 2002 Iraq Vote During N.H. Visit (USAT) 121
Clinton's Search For Common Ground Gets Mixed Reviews In N.H. (WP)..... 122
Clinton On The Trail In N.H. (NSDY) 123
Smart Money Is On Clinton As She Homes In On Primary (FT)123
Clinton Is Pressed By Obama (NYS)..... 124
Not Sold On Clinton (WP) 125
Campaign '08: Who Is The 'Real' John Edwards? (NSWK)..... 126
A 'Straight Shooter' Or A Temperament Problem? (NSWK) 127
Democrats Accelerate Effort To Aid Johnson (RC) 128
For Democrats, Time To Pad Senate Majority And Think 60 Seats (RC) 129
Lawmakers Hold 'Tele-town Hall Meetings' (USAT/AP)..... 130
Taming The Deficit, Together (NYT)..... 131
800,000 Uninsured (WP) 132
Now She Tells Us (WSJ) 133
America's Long Dance With The Mideast (NSWK) 133
Gates Brushes Aside Putin's Anti-US Tirade (FT)..... 135
Gates Counters Putin's Words On U.S. Power (NYT) 135
Gates To Putin: 'One Cold War Is Enough' (AP) 136
Russia Intensifies Efforts To Rebuild Its Military Machine (CSM)138
Putin Seeks Expanded Ties With Saudis On Arab Tour (NYT). 139
Russian Official Says Insurgency In Chechnya Has Been Tamed (NYT) 140
Kasparov's Gambit (WP) 140
Olmert Withholds Judgment On Pact (WT) 141
Arabs Try Outreach To Israel, U.S. Jews (USAT)..... 142
Fallon To Recruit Arab Nations For Help (WT)..... 143
Sunni Arab States Fortify Against Iran (WT)..... 144
Across Arab World, A Widening Rift (WP)..... 145
Blowup? America's Hidden War With Iran (NSWK) 147
Report: Cheney Snubbing Japan Official (AP) 151
Nuclear Talks On North Korea Hit Roadblock (NYT) 151
North Korea Snarls Efforts To End Nuclear Standoff (WSJ)..... 153
North Korea Talks Teeter On Brink Of Collapse (FT)..... 154
North Korean Nuclear Talks Proceed As Outlook Dims (WP)... 154
Let's Try To Make A Deal (LAT) 155
Latin America Wary Of New U.S. Attention (LAT)..... 156
Opportunity For Turks And Kurds? (WP)..... 157
G-7 Seeks To Shed Overlapping Regulations (WSJ)..... 158
Notoriety Of President Morales Roils Area's Bolivian Community (WP)..... 158
French Contender Makes Her Presidential Case (NYT) 160
France's Royal Introduces Platform Ahead Of Election (WSJ) . 161
Falling In Polls, French Socialist Offers Platform (WP) 162

DOJ_NMG_0130285

Low Turnout Undercuts Portugal Vote On Abortion (NYT) 163
No More Pneumonia (WP)..... 164

TERRORISM NEWS:

Coast Guard Should Revisit Military Contract, Report Says (NYT)

By Eric Lipton
The New York Times, February 12, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 11 — The Coast Guard's $24 billion ship- and plane-building deal with two of the nation's biggest military contractors is fundamentally flawed, an independent Department of Defense assessment commissioned by the Coast Guard has concluded.

The report, by the Defense Acquisition University, does not explicitly recommend terminating the five-year-old deal with the contractors, Lockheed Martin and Northrop Grumman. But it says that if the arrangement is extended — negotiations are already under way — it should be redrafted so that it is no longer presumed that Lockheed and Northrop will play dual roles as program manager and primary builder.

The prime contractor "should be directed to consider the products and services of companies other than" those made by Lockheed and Northrop, said the report, a copy of which was given to The New York Times.

The project, known as Deepwater, is running way over budget. At the same time, all four major classes of ships that are planned or are in production have had significant problems, the report notes.

Under the current deal, the Coast Guard buys ships and planes from Lockheed and Northrop from a preset menu, with prices already negotiated. That approach should be discontinued, the report recommends, and instead, the Coast Guard should rely on a "government run, full and open competition" for purchases of at least some ships.

Even with the existing menu, Lockheed and Northrop can request higher prices for the ships, planes or electronics based on price escalation clauses "that are far broader than those allowed in major systems acquisition contracts" in the Defense Department, the report said.

Brendan McPherson, a Coast Guard spokesman, said the agency was still reviewing the report.

"Unfortunately we can't change history," Mr. McPherson said. "But we can look at where we are going with Deepwater, and figure out ways to make it better."

The report will probably only intensify calls from Congress to radically change the terms of the deal.

"We're looking for some real answers from the Coast Guard," said Katharine Lister, a spokeswoman for Senator Maria Cantwell, Democrat of Washington and chairwoman of a Coast Guard oversight panel, which is holding a hearing on the program on Wednesday. "Shuffling management structures alone is not going to cut it."

A spokeswoman for the partnership formed by Lockheed and Northrop did not respond to telephone and e-mail messages left on Sunday.

Airspace Limits Sought For Patrol Of Canada Border (WT)

By Shaun Waterman
The Washington Times, February 12, 2007

Homeland Security Department officials say they will work with the Federal Aviation Administration to impose flight restrictions around the North Dakota air base from which they plan to fly a remotely piloted plane this year to patrol regions of the U.S.-Canada border.

"We are working with the FAA to get restrictions on the airspace [above Grand Forks Air Force Base in North Dakota] during certain time windows when we fly, typically at night," said Gen. Michael Kostelnik, head of air and marine operations for U.S. Customs and Border Protection, the agency inside the Homeland Security Department that flies the pilotless aircraft, known by their military acronym UAV, for unmanned aerial vehicles.

The UAV, a version of the military Predator B equipped with special cameras and other sensors, and with the ability to stay in the air for up to 30 hours, will be able to monitor remote and inaccessible regions of the border, officials say.

The flight restrictions, which will apply to small planes operating below 18,000 feet, are necessary because of the danger of collisions, but they will draw protests from those who own or fly private planes.

DOJ_NMG_0130286

The agency already is flying one Predator B, built by General Atomics Aeronautical Systems, over the U.S.-Mexico border, where it uses the already-restricted airspace around Libby Army Air Field at Fort Huachuca, Ariz.

"But there are no restricted or prohibited areas near Grand Forks," points out Heidi Williams, the head of regulatory affairs for the Aircraft Owners and Pilots Association, and the group "would oppose any new restricted airspace created solely for UAV border patrols."

Gen. Kostelnik last week said that within three years, Grand Forks also would become the home of a National Guard UAV air wing, flying the less-sophisticated Predator A.

"We are working with the FAA to help them understand what the implications are of the growing use of UAVs," he said.

The Homeland Security UAV at Grand Forks also will require special FAA certification to fly above 18,000 feet in "positive control airspace," through which U.S. air traffic controllers guide commercial flights.

Customs and Border Protection will obtain "certificates of authorization to operate [the Predator B] in certain corridors in the national airspace" for the purpose of border patrols, Gen. Kostelnik said.

He added that the Predator B was "one of the most sophisticated aircraft on the face of the planet," and that it would fly "mainly in the evenings and at night" in places with little existing air traffic.

"I'm not interested in flying this thing ... in metropolitan areas," he said.

Customs and Border Protection will have four UAVs by the end of the year, he added. The second will join the one already flying in the Southwest in April, the third will be delivered to Grand Forks by Oct. 1, and the last, delivered by the end of the year, likely will be deployed in a maritime role.

He said a prototype drone with sea-viewing radar would be tested in Florida to assess "its look-down capabilities, [and] its performance against targets we go after down there, and explore interface issues with other [air and marine] assets we have deployed."

WHATEVER IT TAKES (NewYorker)

By Jane Mayer

The New Yorker, February 19, 2007

The politics of the man behind "24."

The office desk of Joel Surnow—the co-creator and executive producer of "24," the popular counterterrorism drama on Fox—faces a wall dominated by an American flag in a glass case. A small label reveals that the flag once flew over Baghdad, after the American invasion of Iraq, in 2003. A few years ago, Surnow received it as a gift from an Army regiment stationed in Iraq; the soldiers had shared a collection of "24" DVDs, he told me, until it was destroyed by an enemy bomb. "The military loves our show," he said recently. Surnow is fifty-two, and has the gangly, coiled energy of an athlete; his hair is close-cropped, and he has a "soul patch"—a smidgen of beard beneath his lower lip. When he was young, he worked as a carpet salesman with his father. The trick to selling anything, he learned, is to carry yourself with confidence and get the customer to like you within the first five minutes. He's got it down. "People in the Administration love the series, too," he said. "It's a patriotic show. They should love it."

Surnow's production company, Real Time Entertainment, is in the San Fernando Valley, and occupies a former pencil factory: a bland, two-story industrial building on an abject strip of parking lots and fast-food restaurants. Surnow, a cigar enthusiast, has converted a room down the hall from his office into a salon with burled-wood humidors and a full bar; his friend Rush Limbaugh, the conservative talk-radio host, sometimes joins him there for a smoke. (Not long ago, Surnow threw Limbaugh a party and presented him with a custom-made "24" smoking jacket.) The ground floor of the factory has a large soundstage on which many of "24" 's interior scenes are shot, including those set at the perpetually tense Los Angeles bureau of the Counter Terrorist Unit, or C.T.U.—a fictional federal agency that pursues America's enemies with steely resourcefulness.

Each season of "24," which has been airing on Fox since 2001, depicts a single, panic-laced day in which Jack Bauer—a heroic C.T.U. agent, played by Kiefer Sutherland—must unravel and undermine a conspiracy that imperils the nation. Terrorists are poised to set off nuclear bombs or bioweapons, or in some other way annihilate entire cities. The twisting story line forces Bauer and his colleagues to make a series of grim choices that pit liberty against security. Frequently, the dilemma is stark: a resistant suspect can either be accorded due process—allowing a terrorist plot to proceed—or be tortured in pursuit of a lead. Bauer invariably chooses coercion. With unnerving efficiency, suspects are beaten, suffocated, electrocuted, drugged, assaulted with knives, or more exotically abused; almost without fail, these suspects divulge critical secrets.

The show's appeal, however, lies less in its violence than in its giddily literal rendering of a classic thriller trope: the "ticking time bomb" plot. Each hour-long episode represents an hour in the life of the characters, and every minute that passes onscreen brings the United States a minute closer to doomsday. (Surnow came up with this concept, which he calls the show's "trick.") As many as half a dozen interlocking stories unfold simultaneously—frequently on a split screen—and a digital clock appears before and after every commercial break, marking each second with an ominous clang. The result is a riveting sensation of narrative velocity.

Bob Cochran, who created the show with Surnow, admitted, "Most terrorism experts will tell you that the 'ticking time bomb' situation never occurs in real life, or very rarely. But on our show it happens every week." According to Darius Rejali, a professor of political science at Reed College and the author of the forthcoming book "Torture and Democracy," the conceit of the ticking time bomb first appeared in Jean Lartéguy's 1960 novel "Les Centurions," written during the brutal French occupation of Algeria. The book's hero, after beating a female Arab dissident into submission, uncovers an imminent plot to explode bombs all over Algeria and must race against the clock to stop it. Rejali, who has examined the available records of the conflict, told me that the story has no basis in fact. In his view, the story line of "Les Centurions" provided French liberals a more palatable rationale for torture than the racist explanations supplied by others (such as the notion that the Algerians, inherently simpleminded, understood only brute force). Lartéguy's scenario exploited an insecurity shared by many liberal societies—that their enlightened legal systems had made them vulnerable to security threats.

"24," which last year won an Emmy Award for Outstanding Drama Series, packs an improbable amount of intrigue into twenty-four hours, and its outlandishness marks it clearly as a fantasy, an heir to the baroque potboilers of Tom Clancy and Vince Flynn. Nevertheless, the show obviously plays off the anxieties that have beset the country since September 11th, and it sends a political message. The series, Surnow told me, is "ripped out of the Zeitgeist of what people's fears are—their paranoia that we're going to be attacked," and it "makes people look at what we're dealing with" in terms of threats to national security. "There are not a lot of measures short of extreme measures that will get it done," he said, adding, "America wants the war on terror fought by Jack Bauer. He's a patriot."

For all its fictional liberties, "24" depicts the fight against Islamist extremism much as the Bush Administration has defined it: as an all-consuming struggle for America's survival that demands the toughest of tactics. Not long after September 11th, Vice-President Dick Cheney alluded vaguely to the fact that America must begin working through the "dark side" in countering terrorism. On "24," the dark side is on full view. Surnow, who has jokingly called himself a "right-wing nut job," shares his show's hard-line perspective. Speaking of torture, he said, "Isn't it obvious that if there was a nuke in New York City that was about to blow—or any other city in this country—that, even if you were going to go to jail, it would be the right thing to do?"

Since September 11th, depictions of torture have become much more common on American television. Before the attacks, fewer than four acts of torture appeared on prime-time television each year, according to Human Rights First, a nonprofit organization. Now there are more than a hundred, and, as David Danzig, a project director at Human Rights First, noted, "the torturers have changed. It used to be almost exclusively the villains who tortured. Today, torture is often perpetrated by the heroes." The Parents' Television Council, a nonpartisan watchdog group, has counted what it says are sixty-seven torture scenes during the first five seasons of "24"—more than one every other show. Melissa Caldwell, the council's senior director of programs, said, " '24' is the worst offender on television: the most frequent, most graphic, and the leader in the trend of showing the protagonists using torture."

The show's villains usually inflict the more gruesome tortures: their victims are hung on hooks, like carcasses in a butcher shop; poked with smoking-hot scalpels; or abraded with sanding machines. In many episodes, however, heroic American officials act as tormentors, even though torture is illegal under U.S. law. (The United Nations Convention Against Torture, which took on the force of federal law when it was ratified by the Senate in 1994, specifies that "no exceptional circumstances, whatsoever, whether a state of war or a threat of war, internal political instability or any other public emergency, may be invoked as a justification of torture.") In one episode, a fictional President commands a member of his Secret Service to torture a suspected traitor: his national-security adviser. The victim is jolted with defibrillator paddles while his feet are submerged in a tub filled with water. As the voltage is turned up, the President, who is depicted as a scrupulous leader, watches the suspect suffer on a video feed. The viewer, who knows that the adviser is guilty and harbors secrets, becomes complicit in hoping that the torture works. A few minutes before the suspect gives in, the President utters the show's credo, "Everyone breaks eventually." (Virtually the sole exception to this rule is Jack Bauer. The current season begins with Bauer being released from a Chinese prison, after two years of ceaseless torture; his back is scarred and his hands are burnt, but a Communist official who transfers Bauer to U.S. custody says that he "never broke his silence.")

C.T.U. agents have used some of the same controversial interrogation methods that the U.S. has employed on some Al Qaeda suspects. In one instance, Bauer denies painkillers to a female terrorist who is suffering from a bullet wound, just as American officials have acknowledged doing in the case of Abu Zubaydah—one of the highest-ranking Al Qaeda operatives in U.S. custody. "I need to use every advantage I've got," Bauer explains to the victim's distressed sister.

The show sometimes toys with the audience's discomfort about abusive interrogations. In Season Two, Bauer threatens to murder a terrorist's wife and children, one by one, before the prisoner's eyes. The suspect watches, on closed-circuit television, what appears to be an execution-style slaying of his son. Threatened with the murder of additional family members, the father gives up vital information—but Bauer appears to have gone too far. It turns out, though, that the killing of the child was staged. Bauer, the show implies, hasn't crossed the line after all. Yet, under U.S. and international law, a mock execution is considered psychological torture, and is illegal.

DOJ_NMG_0130288

On one occasion, Bauer loses his nerve about inflicting torture, but the show implicitly rebukes his qualms. In the episode, Bauer attempts to break a suspected terrorist by plunging a knife in his shoulder; the victim's screams clearly disquiet him. Bauer says to an associate, unconvincingly, that he has looked into the victim's eyes and knows that "he's not going to tell us anything." The other man takes over, fiercely gouging the suspect's knee—at which point the suspect yells out details of a plot to explode a suitcase nuke in Los Angeles.

Throughout the series, secondary characters raise moral objections to abusive interrogation tactics. Yet the show never engages in a serious dialogue on the subject. Nobody argues that torture doesn't work, or that it undermines America's foreign-policy strategy. Instead, the doubters tend to be softhearted dupes. A tremulous liberal, who defends a Middle Eastern neighbor from vigilantism, is killed when the neighbor turns out to be a terrorist. When a civil-liberties-minded lawyer makes a high-toned argument to a Presidential aide against unwarranted detentions—"You continue to arrest innocent people, you're giving the terrorists exactly what they want," she says—the aide sarcastically responds, "Well! You've got the makings of a splendid law-review article here. I'll pass it on to the President."

In another episode, a human-rights lawyer from a fictional organization called Amnesty Global tells Bauer, who wants to rough up an uncharged terror suspect, that he will violate the Constitution. Bauer responds, "I don't wanna bypass the Constitution, but these are extraordinary circumstances." He appeals to the President, arguing that any interrogation permitted by the law won't be sufficiently harsh. "If we want to procure any information from this suspect, we're going to have to do it behind closed doors," he says.

"You're talking about torturing this man?" the President says.

"I'm talking about doing what's necessary to stop this warhead from being used against us," Bauer answers.

When the President wavers, Bauer temporarily quits his job so that he can avoid defying the chain of command, and breaks the suspect's fingers. The suspect still won't talk, so Bauer puts a knife to his throat; this elicits the desired information. He then knocks the suspect out with a punch, telling him, "This will help you with the pain."

Howard Gordon, who is the series' "show runner," or lead writer, told me that he concocts many of the torture scenes himself. "Honest to God, I'd call them improvisations in sadism," he said. Several copies of the C.I.A.'s 1963 KUBARK interrogation manual can be found at the "24" offices, but Gordon said that, "for the most part, our imaginations are the source. Sometimes these ideas are inspired by a scene's location or come from props—what's on the set." He explained that much of the horror is conjured by the viewer. "To see a scalpel and see it move below the frame of the screen is a lot scarier than watching the whole thing. When you get a camera moving fast, and someone screaming, it really works." In recent years, he said, "we've resorted a lot to a pharmacological sort of thing." A character named Burke—a federal employee of the C.T.U. who carries a briefcase filled with elephantine hypodermic needles—has proved indispensable. "He'll inject chemicals that cause horrible pain that can knock down your defenses—a sort of sodium pentothal plus," Gordon said. "When we're stuck, we say, 'Call Burke!' " He added, "The truth is, there's a certain amount of fatigue. It's getting hard not to repeat the same torture techniques over and over."

Gordon, who is a "moderate Democrat," said that it worries him when "critics say that we've enabled and reflected the public's appetite for torture. Nobody wants to be the handmaid to a relaxed policy that accepts torture as a legitimate means of interrogation." He went on, "But the premise of '24' is the ticking time bomb. It takes an unusual situation and turns it into the meat and potatoes of the show." He paused. "I think people can differentiate between a television show and reality."

This past November, U.S. Army Brigadier General Patrick Finnegan, the dean of the United States Military Academy at West Point, flew to Southern California to meet with the creative team behind "24." Finnegan, who was accompanied by three of the most experienced military and F.B.I. interrogators in the country, arrived on the set as the crew was filming. At first, Finnegan—wearing an immaculate Army uniform, his chest covered in ribbons and medals—aroused confusion: he was taken for an actor and was asked by someone what time his "call" was.

In fact, Finnegan and the others had come to voice their concern that the show's central political premise—that the letter of American law must be sacrificed for the country's security—was having a toxic effect. In their view, the show promoted unethical and illegal behavior and had adversely affected the training and performance of real American soldiers. "I'd like them to stop," Finnegan said of the show's producers. "They should do a show where torture backfires."

The meeting, which lasted a couple of hours, had been arranged by David Danzig, the Human Rights First official. Several top producers of "24" were present, but Surnow was conspicuously absent. Surnow explained to me, "I just can't sit in a room that long. I'm too A.D.D.—I can't sit still." He told the group that the meeting conflicted with a planned conference call with Roger Ailes, the chairman of the Fox News Channel. (Another participant in the conference call attended the meeting.) Ailes wanted to discuss a project that Surnow has been planning for months: the début, on February 18th, of "The Half Hour News Hour," a conservative satirical treatment of the week's news; Surnow sees the show as offering a counterpoint to the liberal slant of "The Daily Show with Jon Stewart."

DOJ_NMG_0130289

Before the meeting, Stuart Herrington, one of the three veteran interrogators, had prepared a list of seventeen effective techniques, none of which were abusive. He and the others described various tactics, such as giving suspects a postcard to send home, thereby learning the name and address of their next of kin. After Howard Gordon, the lead writer, listened to some of Herrington's suggestions, he slammed his fist on the table and joked, "You're hired!" He also excitedly asked the West Point delegation if they knew of any effective truth serums.

At other moments, the discussion was more strained. Finnegan told the producers that "24," by suggesting that the U.S. government perpetrates myriad forms of torture, hurts the country's image internationally. Finnegan, who is a lawyer, has for a number of years taught a course on the laws of war to West Point seniors—cadets who would soon be commanders in the battlefields of Iraq and Afghanistan. He always tries, he said, to get his students to sort out not just what is legal but what is right. However, it had become increasingly hard to convince some cadets that America had to respect the rule of law and human rights, even when terrorists did not. One reason for the growing resistance, he suggested, was misperceptions spread by "24," which was exceptionally popular with his students. As he told me, "The kids see it, and say, 'If torture is wrong, what about "24"?' " He continued, "The disturbing thing is that although torture may cause Jack Bauer some angst, it is always the patriotic thing to do."

Gary Solis, a retired law professor who designed and taught the Law of War for Commanders curriculum at West Point, told me that he had similar arguments with his students. He said that, under both U.S. and international law, "Jack Bauer is a criminal. In real life, he would be prosecuted." Yet the motto of many of his students was identical to Jack Bauer's: "Whatever it takes." His students were particularly impressed by a scene in which Bauer barges into a room where a stubborn suspect is being held, shoots him in one leg, and threatens to shoot the other if he doesn't talk. In less than ten seconds, the suspect reveals that his associates plan to assassinate the Secretary of Defense. Solis told me, "I tried to impress on them that this technique would open the wrong doors, but it was like trying to stomp out an anthill."

The "24" producers told the military and law-enforcement experts that they were careful not to glamorize torture; they noted that Bauer never enjoys inflicting pain, and that it had clearly exacted a psychological toll on the character. (As Gordon put it to me, "Jack is basically damned.") Finnegan and the others disagreed, pointing out that Bauer remains coolly rational after committing barbarous acts, including the decapitation of a state's witness with a hacksaw. Joe Navarro, one of the F.B.I.'s top experts in questioning techniques, attended the meeting; he told me, "Only a psychopath can torture and be unaffected. You don't want people like that in your organization. They are untrustworthy, and tend to have grotesque other problems."

Cochran, who has a law degree, listened politely to the delegation's complaints. He told me that he supports the use of torture "in narrow circumstances" and believes that it can be justified under the Constitution. "The Doctrine of Necessity says you can occasionally break the law to prevent greater harm," he said. "I think that could supersede the Convention Against Torture." (Few legal scholars agree with this argument.) At the meeting, Cochran demanded to know what the interrogators would do if they faced the imminent threat of a nuclear blast in New York City, and had custody of a suspect who knew how to stop it. One interrogator said that he would apply physical coercion only if he received a personal directive from the President. But Navarro, who estimates that he has conducted some twelve thousand interrogations, replied that torture was not an effective response. "These are very determined people, and they won't turn just because you pull a fingernail out," he told me. And Finnegan argued that torturing fanatical Islamist terrorists is particularly pointless. "They almost welcome torture," he said. "They expect it. They want to be martyred." A ticking time bomb, he pointed out, would make a suspect only more unwilling to talk. "They know if they can simply hold out several hours, all the more glory—the ticking time bomb will go off!"

The notion that physical coercion in interrogations is unreliable, although widespread among military intelligence officers and F.B.I. agents, has been firmly rejected by the Bush Administration. Last September, President Bush defended the C.I.A.'s use of "an alternative set of procedures." In order to "save innocent lives," he said, the agency needed to be able to use "enhanced" measures to extract "vital information" from "dangerous" detainees who were aware of "terrorist plans we could not get anywhere else."

Although reports of abuses by U.S. troops in Iraq and Afghanistan and at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, have angered much of the world, the response of Americans has been more tepid. Finnegan attributes the fact that "we are generally more comfortable and more accepting of this," in part, to the popularity of "24," which has a weekly audience of fifteen million viewers, and has reached millions more through DVD sales. The third expert at the meeting was Tony Lagouranis, a former Army interrogator in the war in Iraq. He told the show's staff that DVDs of shows such as "24" circulate widely among soldiers stationed in Iraq. Lagouranis said to me, "People watch the shows, and then walk into the interrogation booths and do the same things they've just seen." He recalled that some men he had worked with in Iraq watched a television program in which a suspect was forced to hear tortured screams from a neighboring cell; the men later tried to persuade their Iraqi translator to act the part of a torture "victim," in a similar intimidation ploy. Lagouranis intervened: such scenarios constitute psychological torture.

DOJ_NMG_0130290

"In Iraq, I never saw pain produce intelligence," Lagouranis told me. "I worked with someone who used waterboarding"—an interrogation method involving the repeated near-drowning of a suspect. "I used severe hypothermia, dogs, and sleep deprivation. I saw suspects after soldiers had gone into their homes and broken their bones, or made them sit on a Humvee's hot exhaust pipes until they got third-degree burns. Nothing happened." Some people, he said, "gave confessions. But they just told us what we already knew. It never opened up a stream of new information." If anything, he said, "physical pain can strengthen the resolve to clam up."

Last December, the Intelligence Science Board, an advisory panel to the U.S. intelligence community, released a report declaring that "most observers, even those within professional circles, have unfortunately been influenced by the media's colorful (and artificial) view of interrogation as almost always involving hostility." In a clear reference to "24," the report noted:

Prime-time television increasingly offers up plot lines involving the incineration of metropolitan Los Angeles by an atomic weapon or its depopulation by an aerosol nerve toxin. The characters do not have the time to reflect upon, much less to utilize, what real professionals know to be the "science and art" of "educing information." They want results. Now. The public thinks the same way. They want, and rightly expect, precisely the kind of "protection" that only a skilled intelligence professional can provide. Unfortunately, they have no idea how such a person is supposed to act "in real life."

Lagouranis told the "24" team what the U.S. military and the F.B.I. teach real intelligence professionals: "rapport-building," the slow process of winning over informants, is the method that generally works best. There are also nonviolent ruses, he explained, and ways to take suspects by surprise. The "24" staff seemed interested in the narrative possibilities of such techniques; Lagouranis recalled, "They told us that they'd love to incorporate ruses and rapport-building." At the same time, he said, Cochran and the others from "24" worried that such approaches would "take too much time" on an hour-long television show.

The delegation of interrogators left the meeting with the feeling that the story lines on "24" would be changed little, if at all. "It shows they have a social conscience that they'd even meet with us at all," Navarro said. "They were receptive. But they have a format that works. They have won a lot of awards. Why would they want to play with a No. 1 show?" Lagouranis said of the "24" team, "They were a bit prickly. They have this money-making machine, and we were telling them it's immoral."

Afterward, Danzig and Finnegan had an on-set exchange with Kiefer Sutherland, who is reportedly paid ten million dollars a year to play Jack Bauer. Sutherland, the grandson of Tommy Douglas, a former socialist leader in Canada, has described his own political views as anti-torture, and "leaning toward the left." According to Danzig, Sutherland was "really upset, really intense" and stressed that he tries to tell people that the show "is just entertainment." But Sutherland, who claimed to be bored with playing torture scenes, admitted that he worried about the "unintended consequences of the show." Danzig proposed that Sutherland participate in a panel at West Point or appear in a training film in which he made clear that the show's torture scenes are not to be emulated. (Surnow, when asked whether he would participate in the video, responded, "No way." Gordon, however, agreed to be filmed.) Sutherland declined to answer questions for this article, but, in a recent television interview with Charlie Rose, his ambivalence about his character's methods was palpable. He condemned the abuse of U.S.-held detainees at Abu Ghraib prison, in Iraq, as "absolutely criminal," particularly for a country that tells others that "democracy and freedom" are the "way to go." He also said, "You can torture someone and they'll basically tell you exactly what you want to hear. . . . Torture is not a way of procuring information." But things operate differently, he said, on television: "24," he said, is "a fantastical show. . . . Torture is a dramatic device."

The creators of "24" deny that the show presents only a conservative viewpoint. They mention its many prominent Democratic fans—including Barbra Streisand and Bill Clinton—and the diversity of political views among its writers and producers. Indeed, the story lines sometimes have a liberal tilt. The conspiracy plot of Season Five, for example, turns on oligarchic businessmen who go to despicable lengths to protect their oil interests; the same theme anchors liberal-paranoia thrillers such as "Syriana." This season, a White House directive that flags all federal employees of Middle Eastern descent as potential traitors has been presented as a gross overreaction, and a White House official who favors police-state tactics has come off as scheming and ignoble. Yet David Nevins, the former Fox Television network official who, in 2000, bought the pilot on the spot after hearing a pitch from Surnow and Cochran, and who maintains an executive role in "24," is candid about the show's core message. "There's definitely a political attitude of the show, which is that extreme measures are sometimes necessary for the greater good," he says. "The show doesn't have much patience for the niceties of civil liberties or due process. It's clearly coming from somewhere. Joel's politics suffuse the whole show."

Surnow, for his part, revels in his minority status inside the left-leaning entertainment industry. "Conservatives are the new oppressed class," he joked in his office. "Isn't it bizarre that in Hollywood it's easier to come out as gay than as conservative?" His success with "24," he said, has protected him from the more righteous elements of the Hollywood establishment. "Right now, they have to be nice to me," he said. "But if the show tanks I'm sure they'll kill me." He spoke of his new conservative comedy show as an even bigger risk than "24." "I'll be front and center on the new show," he said, then joked, "I'm ruining my chances of ever working again in Hollywood."

DOJ_NMG_0130291

Although he was raised in Beverly Hills—he graduated in 1972 from Beverly Hills High—Surnow said that he has always felt like an outsider. His classmates were mostly wealthy, but his father was an itinerant carpet salesman who came to California from Detroit. He cold-called potential customers, most of whom lived in Compton and Watts. Surnow was much younger than his two brothers, and he grew up virtually as an only child, living in a one-bedroom apartment in an unfashionable area south of Olympic Boulevard, where he slept on a foldout cot. If his father made a sale, he'd come home and give him the thumbs-up. But Surnow said that nine out of ten nights ended in failure. "If he made three sales a month, we could stay where we lived," he recalled. His mother, who worked as a saleswoman in a clothing store, "fought depression her whole life." Surnow, who describes his parents as "wonderful people," said, "I was a latchkey kid. . . . I raised myself." He played tennis on his high-school team but gave it up after repeatedly losing to players who could afford private lessons.

Roger Director, a television producer and longtime friend, said that he "loves" Surnow. But, he went on, "He feels looked down upon by the world, and that kind of emotional dynamic underpins a lot of things. It's kind of 'Joel against the world.' It's as if he feels, I had to fight and claw for everything I got. It's a tough world, and no one's looking out for you." As a result, Director said, "Joel's not sentimental. He has a hard-hearted thing."

Surnow's parents were F.D.R. Democrats. He recalled, "It was just assumed, especially in the Jewish community"—to which his family belonged. "But when you grow up you start to challenge your parents' assumptions. 'Am I Jewish? Am I a Democrat?' " Many of his peers at the University of California at Berkeley, where he attended college, were liberals or radicals. "They were all socialists and Marxists, but living off their family money," he recalled. "It seemed to me there was some obvious hypocrisy here. It was absurd." Although he wasn't consciously political, he said, "I felt like I wasn't like these people." In 1985, he divorced his wife, a medical student, who was Jewish, and with whom he has two daughters. (His relationships with them are strained.) Four years later, he remarried. His wife, who used to work in film development, is Catholic; they have three daughters, whom they send to Catholic schools. He likes to bring his girls to the set and rushes home for his wife's pork-chop dinners. "I got to know who I was and who I wasn't," he said. "I wasn't the perfect Jewish kid who is married, with a Jewish family." Instead, he said, "I decided I like Catholics. They're so grounded. I sort of reoriented myself."

While studying at Berkeley, Surnow worked as an usher at the Pacific Film Archive, where he saw at least five hundred movies. A fan of crime dramas such as "Mean Streets" and "The Godfather," he discovered foreign films as well. "That was my awakening," he said. In 1975, Surnow enrolled at the U.C.L.A. film school. Soon after graduation, he began writing for film; he then switched to television. He was only modestly successful, and had many "lost years," when he considered giving up and taking over his father's carpet business. His breakthrough came when he began writing for "Miami Vice," in 1984. "It just clicked—I just got it!" he recalled. "It was just like when you don't know how to speak a language and suddenly you do. I knew how to tell a story." By the end of the year, Universal, which owned the show, put Surnow in charge of his own series, "The Equalizer," about a C.I.A. agent turned vigilante. The series was a success, but, Surnow told me, "I was way too arrogant. I sort of pissed off the network." Battles for creative control have followed Surnow to "24," where, Nevins said admiringly, he continues to push for "unconventional and dangerous choices."

Surnow's tough stretches in Hollywood, he said, taught him that there were "two kinds of people" in entertainment: "those who want to be geniuses, and those who want to work." At first, he said, "I wanted to be a genius. But at a certain point I realized I just desperately wanted to work." Brian Grazer, an executive producer of "24," who has primarily produced films, said that "TV guys either get broken by the system, or they get so tough that they have no warmth at all." Surnow, he said, is "a devoted family man" and "a really close friend." But when Grazer first met Surnow, he recalled, "I nearly walked out. He was really glib and insulting. I was shocked. He's a tough guy. He's a meat-eating alpha male. He's a monster!" He observed, "Maybe Jack Bauer has some parts of him."

During three decades as a journeyman screenwriter, Surnow grew increasingly conservative. He "hated welfare," which he saw as government handouts. Liberal courts also angered him. He loved Ronald Reagan's "strength" and disdained Jimmy Carter's "belief that people would be nice to us just because we were humane. That never works." He said of Reagan, "I can hardly think of him without breaking into tears. I just felt Ronald Reagan was the father that this country needed. . . . He made me feel good that I was in his family."

Surnow said that he found the Clinton years obnoxious. "Hollywood under Clinton—it was like he was their guy," he said. "He was the yuppie, baby-boomer narcissist that all of Hollywood related to." During those years, Surnow recalled, he had countless arguments with liberal colleagues, some of whom stopped speaking to him. "My feeling is that the liberals' ideas are wrong," he said. "But they think I'm evil." Last year, he contributed two thousand dollars to the losing campaign of Pennsylvania's hard-line Republican senator Rick Santorum, because he "liked his position on immigration." His favorite bumper sticker, he said, is "Except for Ending Slavery, Fascism, Nazism & Communism, War Has Never Solved Anything."

DOJ_NMG_0130292

Although he is a supporter of President Bush—he told me that "America is in its glory days"—Surnow is critical of the way the war in Iraq has been conducted. An "isolationist" with "no faith in nation-building," he thinks that "we could have been out of this thing three years ago." After deposing Saddam Hussein, he argued, America should have "just handed it to the Baathists and . . . put in some other monster who's going to keep these people in line but who's not going to be aggressive to us." In his view, America "is sort of the parent of the world, so we have to be stern but fair to people who are rebellious to us. We don't spoil them. That's not to say you abuse them, either. But you have to know who the adult in the room is."

Surnow's rightward turn was encouraged by one of his best friends, Cyrus Nowrasteh, a hard-core conservative who, in 2006, wrote and produced "The Path to 9/11," a controversial ABC miniseries that presented President Clinton as having largely ignored the threat posed by Al Qaeda. (The show was denounced as defamatory by Democrats and by members of the 9/11 Commission; their complaints led ABC to call the program a "dramatization," not a "documentary.") Surnow and Nowrasteh met in 1985, when they worked together on "The Equalizer." Nowrasteh, the son of a deposed adviser to the Shah of Iran, grew up in Madison, Wisconsin, where, like Surnow, he was alienated by the radicalism around him. He told me that he and Surnow, in addition to sharing an admiration for Reagan, found "L.A. a stultifying, stifling place because everyone thinks alike." Nowrasteh said that he and Surnow regard "24" as a kind of wish fulfillment for America. "Every American wishes we had someone out there quietly taking care of business," he said. "It's a deep, dark ugly world out there. Maybe this is what Ollie North was trying to do. It would be nice to have a secret government that can get the answers and take care of business—even kill people. Jack Bauer fulfills that fantasy."

In recent years, Surnow and Nowrasteh have participated in the Liberty Film Festival, a group dedicated to promoting conservatism through mass entertainment. Surnow told me that he would like to counter the prevailing image of Senator Joseph McCarthy as a demagogue and a liar. Surnow and his friend Ann Coulter—the conservative pundit, and author of the pro-McCarthy book "Treason"—talked about creating a conservative response to George Clooney's recent film "Good Night, and Good Luck." Surnow said, "I thought it would really provoke people to do a movie that depicted Joe McCarthy as an American hero or, maybe, someone with a good cause who maybe went too far." He likened the Communist sympathizers of the nineteen-fifties to terrorists: "The State Department in the fifties was infiltrated by people who were like Al Qaeda." But, he said, he shelved the project. "The blacklist is Hollywood's orthodoxy," he said. "It's not a movie I could get done now."

A year and a half ago, Surnow and Manny Coto, a "24" writer with similar political views, talked about starting a conservative television network. "There's a gay network, a black network—there should be a conservative network," Surnow told me. But as he and Coto explored the idea they realized that "we weren't distribution guys—we were content guys." Instead, the men developed "The Half Hour News Hour," the conservative satire show. " 'The Daily Show' tips left," Surnow said. "So we thought, Let's do one that tips right." Jon Stewart's program appears on Comedy Central, an entertainment channel. But, after Surnow got Rush Limbaugh to introduce him to Roger Ailes, Fox News agreed to air two episodes. The program, which will follow the fake-news format popularized by "Saturday Night Live," will be written by conservative humorists, including Sandy Frank and Ned Rice. Surnow said of the show, "There are so many targets, from global warming to banning tag on the playground. There's a lot of low-hanging fruit."

Last March, Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas and his wife, Virginia, joined Surnow and Howard Gordon for a private dinner at Rush Limbaugh's Florida home. The gathering inspired Virginia Thomas—who works at the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank—to organize a panel discussion on "24." The symposium, sponsored by the foundation and held in June, was entitled " '24' and America's Image in Fighting Terrorism: Fact, Fiction, or Does It Matter?" Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, who participated in the discussion, praised the show's depiction of the war on terrorism as "trying to make the best choice with a series of bad options." He went on, "Frankly, it reflects real life." Chertoff, who is a devoted viewer of "24," subsequently began an e-mail correspondence with Gordon, and the two have since socialized in Los Angeles. "It's been very heady," Gordon said of Washington's enthusiasm for the show. Roger Director, Surnow's friend, joked that the conservative writers at "24" have become "like a Hollywood television annex to the White House. It's like an auxiliary wing."

The same day as the Heritage Foundation event, a private luncheon was held in the Wardrobe Room of the White House for Surnow and several others from the show. (The event was not publicized.) Among the attendees were Karl Rove, the deputy chief of staff; Tony Snow, the White House spokesman; Mary Cheney, the Vice-President's daughter; and Lynn Cheney, the Vice-President's wife, who, Surnow said, is "an extreme '24' fan." After the meal, Surnow recalled, he and his colleagues spent more than an hour visiting with Rove in his office. "People have this image of him as this snake-oil-dirty, secretive guy, but in his soul he's a history professor," Surnow said. He was less impressed with the Situation Room, which, unlike the sleek high-tech version at C.T.U., "looked like some old tearoom in a Victorian house."

DOJ_NMG_0130293

The Heritage Foundation panel was moderated by Limbaugh. At one point, he praised the show's creators, dropped his voice to a stage whisper, and added, to the audience's applause, "And most of them are conservative." When I spoke with Limbaugh, though, he reinforced the show's public posture of neutrality. "People think that they've got a bunch of right-wing writers and producers at '24,' and they're subtly sending out a message," he said. "I don't think that's happening. They're businessmen, and they don't have an agenda." Asked about the show's treatment of torture, he responded, "Torture? It's just a television show! Get a grip."

In fact, many prominent conservatives speak of "24" as if it were real. John Yoo, the former Justice Department lawyer who helped frame the Bush Administration's "torture memo"—which, in 2002, authorized the abusive treatment of detainees—invokes the show in his book "War by Other Means." He asks, "What if, as the popular Fox television program '24' recently portrayed, a high-level terrorist leader is caught who knows the location of a nuclear weapon?" Laura Ingraham, the talk-radio host, has cited the show's popularity as proof that Americans favor brutality. "They love Jack Bauer," she noted on Fox News. "In my mind, that's as close to a national referendum that it's O.K. to use tough tactics against high-level Al Qaeda operatives as we're going to get." Surnow once appeared as a guest on Ingraham's show; she told him that, while she was undergoing chemotherapy for breast cancer, "it was soothing to see Jack Bauer torture these terrorists, and I felt better." Surnow joked, "We love to torture terrorists—it's good for you!"

As a foe of political correctness, Surnow seems to be unburdened by the controversy his show has stirred. "24," he acknowledged, has been criticized as racially insensitive, because it frequently depicts Arab-Americans as terrorists. He said in response, "Our only politics are that terrorists are bad. In some circles, that's political." As he led me through the Situation Room set on the Real Time soundstage, I asked him if "24" has plans to use the waterboarding interrogation method, which has been defended by Vice-President Cheney but is considered torture by the U.S. military. Surnow laughed and said, "Yes! But only with bottled water—it's Hollywood!"

In a more sober tone, he said, "We've had all of these torture experts come by recently, and they say, 'You don't realize how many people are affected by this. Be careful.' They say torture doesn't work. But I don't believe that. I don't think it's honest to say that if someone you love was being held, and you had five minutes to save them, you wouldn't do it. Tell me, what would you do? If someone had one of my children, or my wife, I would hope I'd do it. There is nothing—nothing—I wouldn't do." He went on, "Young interrogators don't need our show. What the human mind can imagine is so much greater than what we show on TV. No one needs us to tell them what to do. It's not like somebody goes, 'Oh, look what they're doing, I'll do that.' Is it?"

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Escaping The Watch List (USNEWS)

By Angie C. Marek

U.S. News and World Report, February 12, 2007

David Taylor, a 58-year-old grandfather of five from the Boston area, never could have imagined such a nightmare. About three years ago, airport officials told him he appeared to be on a special terrorism watch list used by the Transportation Security Administration to flag some passengers for extra security screening. After that, he began to spend "what felt like a lot of my life" trying to fix the trouble, calling everyone from Ed Markey, his representative; to Washington megacontractors; to the Library of Congress. He even sent the TSA the original version of his birth certificate. For security reasons, TSA doesn't tell people who appeal their case whether their identity is ultimately cleared. "All I know is I haven't had problems for the last year or so," Taylor says now.

Taylor has no idea why-or even if-he was ever on the watch list or whether there's some other David Taylor out there who's a threat. But there may be fewer of those Kafka-esque stories if the Department of Homeland Security has its way. DHS is engaged in an aggressive effort to clean out extraneous names from the watch lists. It's also launching a website to help people appeal identity mix-ups. But Congress has its own ideas about fixing the screening system, and critics say the process has an awfully long way to go.

The problem, of course, is relatively new. Before 9/11, just 16 names were on the no-fly list, meaning people with those names couldn't board U.S. airplanes. Today, the TSA maintains a presumably larger no-fly list, as well as a selectee list, which designates people who get special security screening. The numbers of names on the lists are classified, although CBS News's 60 Minutes found 119,000 names on the two lists last March. But those are just a subset of the master list of potential terrorists that President George W. Bush asked intelligence agencies to cobble together in 2003. That list has been held in National Counterterrorism Center and has been reported to total some 325,000 names. Parts of it are passed along to the FBI's Terrorist Screening Center, which uses some of the names to make up the TSA's lists.

DOJ_NMG_0130294

"Scrub." The TSA lists are supposed to include only people deemed threats to aviation, but problems are legendary. Massachusetts Sen. Edward Kennedy and Catherine Stevens, wife of Alaska Sen. Ted Stevens, are among those who have been snagged. Kip Hawley, the head of the TSA, revealed last month that his agency has been giving its lists "a thorough scrub." About six months ago, his agency for the first time sent full-time TSA investigators to the FBI to check each name. Hawley says when the process is finished in a couple of months, "we'll have cut the [no-fly] list in half."

The redress process has also improved. At one point, people petitioning to get off the list had to submit notarized copies of documents like birth certificates to the TSA; today, a copy of a passport and some forms on a website will do. A once months-long process now takes on average less than 10 days. But more than 20,000 people sent in personal information to try to clear their identities in 2006 alone. People who have proved they have a similar name to someone on the watch list-but are not the actual target-are put on a special "cleared" list that goes to airports.

Terror's Next Target? (USNEWS)

By Stephen Flynn

U.S. News and World Report, February 12, 2007

Retired U.S. Coast Guard officer Stephen Flynn is a prominent homeland-security expert and a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations. He frequently testifies before Congress on port- and border-security issues and authored the bestselling book, America the Vulnerable, in 2004. He also served as an adviser to the U.S. Commission on National Security/21st Century, a task force led by former Sens. Gary Hart and Warren Rudman that issued seminal reports on terrorism, including one just before 9/11. In a new book, The Edge of Disaster: Rebuilding a Resilient Nation, Flynn argues that ailing infrastructure like weakened dams, levees, and power grids-as well as America's underinvestment in homeland security-makes the country susceptible to a catastrophe that could kill thousands.

CONSIDER THIS. It's a warm Friday evening in June, and nearly 40,000 baseball fans are gathered at Philadelphia's Citizens Bank Park to watch the home team play the New York Mets. Most of the stadium's 21,000 parking spaces are filled, and, just a few hundred yards away, Interstate 95 is crowded with travelers heading for Atlantic City and the Jersey Shore. Just 2 miles due west, workers on the night shift are arriving at the 1,000-acre Sunoco oil refinery on the banks of the Schuylkill River. A light breeze is blowing toward the east-ideal conditions for a terrorist operation.

Three young men gather in a vacant lot in Camden, N.J., just across the Delaware River. The leader is a British national who spent much of 2004 in Iraq. Angered by the U.S. invasion, he traveled across Europe to Turkey and slipped into the country to join other insurgents. A second-generation Pakistani with a mechanical engineering degree, he received training in bomb-making from an Iranian tutor in Iraq and participated in two attacks on Iraqi oil refineries.

In the spring of 2005, a few months after returning home, the same man traveled to the United States. Having never run afoul of the law in England, his name was not on any terrorist watch list. Upon arrival, he answered the standard entry questions and was fingerprinted. With a letter of introduction from a radical British sheik, he found his way to a Jersey City mosque, where he met two Americans: an Egyptian college student recruited at a campus speaking event and the student's older cousin.

Working with a local imam, the Americans had hatched a plan to use a commercial tanker truck to target the Sunoco refinery. It's hardly a novel technique: Terrorists used a tanker truck in the bombing of the Khobar Towers in Saudi Arabia on June 25, 1996, which killed 19 servicemen and wounded 372 people. In Iraq, trucks have been used in many suicide attacks, including the 2003 bombing of the United Nations headquarters.

Thousands of tanker trucks operate in the tri-state area of New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut. The older cousin holds a commercial trucker's license and an authorization from the Department of Homeland Security to carry hazardous materials, a certification available to almost anyone with no criminal record or history of being committed to a mental institution. He works as a driver for an independent gasoline distributor. His cousin, the student, is also an apprentice painter with one of the thousand contractors working on the Sunoco facility each day.

WAR NEWS:

Iraq War Debate Shifts To The House (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey And Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, February 12, 2007

WASHINGTON — As the House this week launches its first major debate over the Iraq war since the November elections, Democrats are counting on many Republicans to join them in passing a resolution opposing President Bush's troop buildup.

DOJ_NMG_0130295

Rep. Wayne T. Gilchrest, a Maryland Republican, predicts that 30 to 60 of his colleagues will back the nonbinding resolution, which would be the strongest repudiation of Bush's Iraq policy from Republicans since the war began nearly four years ago.

Opponents of the troop increase include Republicans who, until now, have stood with the president. Amid continuing turmoil in Baghdad and rising casualty figures, anxiety about the White House strategy in Iraq has been building among GOP lawmakers, and many of them blame it for their party's loss of control of Congress.

"Many of us have just watched this thing unfold and see nothing changing," said Gilchrest, whose largely rural district has lost 23 service members in Iraq and Afghanistan. "You face the families and you have to have something to tell them."

The debate, likely to be highly emotional, begins Tuesday and is expected to last three or four days. Each of the House's 435 members will be given five minutes to speak.

The resolution will express support for the U.S. military personnel in harm's way, while opposing adding 21,500 troops to the 135,000-plus already in Iraq. A Senate vote on a similar resolution has been held up in a partisan dispute over debate rules. Eight GOP senators have expressed support for a resolution critical of the White House plan.

The House debate is expected to be followed by more aggressive efforts by Congress' new Democratic majority to challenge the administration, including attempts to restrict funding for the war and set dates for troop withdrawals — though some of these actions may divide the party's rank and file.

"It's time for a new policy," House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) said Sunday on NBC's "Meet the Press." "This is now four years that we've been at this effort, and 3 1/2 years after the president said the mission — whatever the mission was — was accomplished."

In a preview of the debate, Hoyer's GOP counterpart, House Minority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio, appearing on the same program, acknowledged that the resolution would draw some GOP support but challenged Democrats to offer an alternative strategy.

"If you don't like the president's plan, Steny, what is your plan for success?" Boehner asked, predicting dire consequences if the U.S. failed to shore up Iraq. "Who doesn't believe that if we withdraw and leave that chaos in the Middle East, that the terrorists won't follow us here to the United States?"

In an interview, Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.) said, "I call it the status quo resolution. It basically says 'Don't do something' without saying what we should do."

Others say it is an important symbolic vote — one that, if it is backed by a substantial number of the president's usually loyal GOP supporters, would increase pressure on the administration to reconsider its Iraq strategy.

Julian Zelizer, a congressional historian at Boston University, said the vote is "the opening act of a debate that will unfold over the next two years, right into the 2008 election."

Republican leaders want a vote on alternative resolutions that would oppose cutting funds for the war effort and would set up a bipartisan panel to oversee whether Bush's strategy was working and whether Iraqis were moving to assume greater responsibility for security of their country.

But Hoyer said he wanted to avoid the kind of procedural fight that had tied up the Senate. "We want a very straightforward, clear answer to the question: 'Do you support the president's escalation?' " he said.

The resolution will have at least one GOP co-sponsor, North Carolina Rep. Walter B. Jones, a conservative who publicly broke with his party over the war in 2005.

For many other Republicans, deciding how to vote on the resolution will be tough: Do they stick with an unpopular president over a war that is losing public support? Or do they break from their party leaders and risk angering some of their GOP supporters?

Among the Republicans who have come out against the buildup are Reps. James T. Walsh of New York, who narrowly won reelection, and Phil English of Pennsylvania, whose district has been the site of antiwar protests, as well as Roscoe G. Bartlett of Maryland, John J. Duncan Jr. of Tennessee and Steven C. LaTourette of Ohio. It was not known how many of them would vote for the resolution.

English, who won reelection with 53.6% of the vote (his lowest winning percentage since 1996), acknowledged that he had received calls from Republicans in his district angry over his break with the president. But, he said, "if they're looking for someone to be a more predictable supporter of the Republican line, they're probably not looking for someone they can get elected."

A number of House Republicans are pushing for a resolution that would urge the president to more closely follow the recommendations of the bipartisan, independent Iraq Study Group, but one of those recommendations — opening talks with Iran and Syria — has already been rejected by the White House.

DOJ_NMG_0130296

Democrats, meanwhile, appear increasingly unified behind the resolution being prepared by their leaders. Rep. Barbara Lee (D-Oakland), a leader of the strongest antiwar wing of the party, last week urged support for the nonbinding resolution, even though she and others are pushing for more aggressive steps to end the war.

Rep. Hoyer: Vote On Iraq Will Be Limited (AP)

AP, February 12, 2007

A House vote on Iraq this week will be limited to the question of supporting President Bush's troop escalation, House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer said Sunday.

Hoyer's comment drew a vehement objection from House Minority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, who said House Democrats had promised to allow a vote this week on a Republican alternative opposing a cutoff of money for the war.

Hoyer, D-Md., said such a vote would occur later.

"Live up to your word," Boehner told Hoyer. Democrats, Boehner said, "won't even let us have a substitute. ... Give us a vote this week."

The lawmakers appeared on "Meet the Press" on NBC.

Hoyer Puts Republicans In A Bind Over War (POL)

By Patrick O'Connor And Jim VandeHei

The Politico, February 12, 2007

House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer said Sunday the upcoming debate over the Iraq war will be confined to four straight days of arguing over President Bush's escalation of the military campaign.

Hoyer used an appearance on NBC's "Meet the Press" to break a promise he made publicly late last week to allow Republicans a vote of their choice pertaining to the war effort. In doing so, Hoyer dramatically increased tensions in the war over war and thrust Republicans into a defensive crouch heading into this week's showdown over troop levels.

"We believe the American public wants a straightforward answer to the question, 'Do you agree with the president's proposal?'" Hoyer said.

Hoyer, a Democrat from Maryland, said Republicans will be prohibited from forcing a vote on an alternative resolution opposing cutting off funding for U.S. troops in Iraq.

On the same show, House Minority Leader John Boehner, an Ohio Republican, accused Hoyer of stifling dissent and backtracking on the pledge by Democratic leaders to build a more democratic process in the House. "Live up to your word," Boehner said.

But Democrats want to limit a four-day debate, which begins Tuesday, to Bush's plan to send more than 20,000 additional troops to Iraq to quell violence.

Boehner looked irritated for part of the show -- and with good reason. Hoyer's decision, which will be criticized as another example of Democrats breaking their election-year promise to hold open and fair debates in the House, undercuts the GOP strategy.

Last week, Hoyer initially said Republicans would be allowed to offer an alternative measure on the floor before a House vote on the Democrats nonbinding resolution. "The Republicans will be given either a substitute or a motion to recommit so that they can propose whatever substantive alternative that they choose," Hoyer told reporters Thursday. "That will also be debated."

He backtracked later that day in floor statements to Minority Whip Roy Blunt, R-Mo.

"Frankly, because we feel this is such a critically important question and that the clarity of the question and the clarity of the response is so important that we are trying to carefully consider how we can assure that there is no confusion as to the answer that this House gives," Hoyer told Blunt in their weekly colloquy.

Republicans pointed out that inconsistency in a press release last week that was largely unnoticed because Hoyer's exact language was muddled.

Republicans had hoped to make this debate about the troops -- not the surge -- and force Democrats to go on record as refusing to ever cut off funds for soldiers in harm's way. But by shifting strategies, Hoyer has put the GOP in a tough spot.

The debate will be a symbolic one. It will center on a nonbinding resolution, which is essentially a press release with a recorded vote, that will not force the White House or Congress to do anything.

It will, however, shine the congressional spotlight on the Iraq war. Unlike the Senate, which has yet to create even a binding agreement on how to debate a nonbinding resolution, the House is firmly set for what promises to be the most explosive debate over the war since its authorization in 2002.

DOJ_NMG_0130297

What remains unclear is whether this is part of a broader effort by anti-war Democrats to force an end to the military campaign. Many Democrats want to use the upcoming debate over the budget, which actually carries the weight of law, to bring the war to a halt by cutting off funding.

"What we're going to do this week is the first step in your effort to cut off funds for our troops in harm's way," Boehner said.

Either way, it will be a tough week for the White House. Many Republicans are planning speeches that are harshly critical of President Bush's handling of the Iraq war -- but stop short of outright opposition to the escalation. Virtually every Democrat plans to attack Bush, Republicans and the war.

Other Sunday Show News

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., appearing on Fox News Sunday earlier in the day, bristled at the suggestion that Republicans had stalled the debate over Bush's troop surge.

"The portrayal has been totally inaccurate," McConnell said. "The majority was trying to dictate the terms of the debate. We were not trying to obstruct the terms of the debate."

McConnell's No. 2, Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott, R-Miss., agreed with the leader during an interview on CBS's "Face the Nation."

"We want a debate, not a mandate," he said.

On the same show, Sen. Chris Dodd, D-Conn., a presidential hopeful, criticized the Congress as whole for falling back on procedural arguments when confronted with such a major issue.

"Last week we debated about debating," Dodd said. "We in Congress looked like we were wringing our hands on the issue … I thought we made a mistake by not having a real vote with real teeth in it."

Join The Conversation

You need to be a registered user of Politico.com to "join the conversation". If you are not a member yet, what are you waiting for? Register Now!

by kevinizon on 02.11.2007 at 11:51 PM

I was under the impression that we if airdrop thousands of pairs of blue jeans and hostess? twinkies onto the people, everyone would be happy.

I don't know what the debate's going to do in the meantime. But... lets just see...

by Ardie on 02.11.2007 at 10:43 PM

House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer has done the right thing. You don't honor your promises with scoundrels. The Democrats should take some advice from Lady Macbeth:

To beguile the time, look like the time; bear welcome in your eye, your hand, your tongue: look like the innocent flower, but be the serpent under ?t. -- Macbeth?Act I, v, 30-71

Good work Steny! I didn't vote for Democrats so we could all be one happy family. I voted for Democrats so they could crush the Republicans and bring our troops home?and impeach Bush and Cheney.

by Stall Shifter on 02.11.2007 at 10:01 PM

This is going to be an interesting week on the House floor. The arguments will all be very partisan and a non binding resolution will be passed. That's like kissing your sister after coming in coming in second.

The discussion should be formative in that it leads to another course of action such as a surge toward diplomatic efforts with Iran and Syria and/or redeployment and a plan for an orderly withdrawal. (Suggested by the Iraq Study Group) That probably won't happen. It's more likely that Bush will send another Carrier battle group to the Persian Gulf and bomb the hell out of Iran based on incorrect intelligence. It's deja vu all over again. I have seen this movie before, Condi will go the UN and show satellite photos of nuclear sites and a link will be made with Al Qaeda yatta yatta yatta. World War three here we go.

Our mission in Iraq was accomplished long ago, I heard the speech on the carrier deck. Now it's up to the powers in the mid east to assist in stabilization of a new Iraq government.

I think we can do a better job of supporting the troops by getting them the hell out of the middle of a civil war they have zero chance of ever controlling. The Shia and Sunni can battle it out and decide what kind of a government we will be dealing with. When the dust clears we will have a new government too. Hopefully one that has more foresight than the old one. (That is unless Bush declares Martial Law and suspends elections)

by bootaan on 02.11.2007 at 09:03 PM

I think Republicans are scared of that loosing the congress last year, might proceed to a bigger defeat in 2008.

by bleacherdave on 02.11.2007 at 08:39 PM

It is not clear that Congress can legally de-fund only the Iraq war. The budgetary scalpel may not be that sharp.

by Scarlet on 02.11.2007 at 05:11 PM

drbillybob: I understand your position, but think you misunderstand the situation at hand.

It is true, Congress could put an end to the funding of the war, but where does that leave us? Where does it leave our troops? Where does that leave our country? Our future?

To stop funding for the war would be to stop funding for our troops - that is not an option for neither the Republicans nor the Democrats. The democrats admire our troops, respect them, and would never abandon them because of poor and thoughtless decisions that were made by our "President." Unfortunately they have to stand up for their opinions - and America is hoping that the Democrats will be able to stop the horrible decision that Bush has made in it's tracks.

Did you not pay attention to the November '06 election, billybob? America spoke. You must not have been listening.

by drbillybob on 02.11.2007 at 03:59 PM

Scarlet, although I'm sure many sympathize with your sentiments, your logic is lacking. You say that:

<< Sadly, the truth remains that what Bush says goes - he has manipulated and rewritten law to make it so. >>

<< And now if the Dems try to fight it they'll just get the "you don't support our troops!" argument, whilst trying to get America out of this mess. >>

This is nonsense. Congress does have a role here. They are choosing to grandstand rather than act. Bush cannot continue without funding - get it? They are complicit. So don't blame Bush for what your elected representatives now control. and

by Scarlet on 02.11.2007 at 03:41 PM

Yes, unfortunately this is just the beginning; the beginning of a 'great escalation' not only in US troop volume, but in the Iraqi insurgency. Bush even said it himself in his SOTU speech: "So we're deploying reinforcements of more than 20,000 additional soldiers and Marines to Iraq. . . . Tonight I ask the Congress to authorize an increase in the size of our active Army and Marine Corps by 92,000 in the next five years." (Washington Post)

So this? This is just the beginning. And as Americans, what are we stuck with? Should we just suck it up and expect to be at war for at least the next decade? Should we fight and demand our troops be sent home risking the reality that our congress will not listen? Should we trust our ignorant President and allow him to get away with making more horrendous decisions? Sadly, the truth remains that what Bush says goes - he has manipulated and rewritten law to make it so. And now if the Dems try to fight it they'll just get the "you don't support our troops!" argument, whilst trying to get America out of this mess.

The reality is we're stuck on the brink of WWIII and we can't do a God damn thing about it.

by drbillybob on 02.11.2007 at 03:30 PM

If Senators truly believe that the Iraq War is lost or that the costs will be too high, then please vote to cut funding and bring 'em home now! If Senators believe that there is still a chance to salvage a strategic democratic foothold in the heart of the muslim world that could greatly benefit the western world, then support the President with fervor.

Unfortunately, there is no middle ground here. Non-binding resolutions such as this simply encourage our enemy and demoralize our military. And all for a cheap political CYA stunt - disgusting!

Is this the "new leadership" the Democrats promised? No thanks!

by recordguy on 02.11.2007 at 02:34 PM

The issue for the debate is simple; is the President's plan, whether one chooses to call it an escalation, a surge, or the best security solution for Iraq, the best course of action to take in Iraq at this time. The President's proposal is the only one on the table. It's already begun and even if the Congress votes to stop funding there is enough money in the budget to funnel towards this plan, so it's going to happen no matter what. But Congress needs to go on the record as either opposing or defending the plan.

The issue is not whether or not Congress supports the troops. No one in Congress, much less the entire U.S., doesn't want what's best for the troops. But, is using the troops in this plan the best thing for them, or are there alternatives. In my opinion, this plan is at best Vietnam all over again, and at worst, the beginning of a much greater escalation.

The President and his supporters know that to do anything less than continue on in Iraq is an admission of failure. And, unfortunately, his detractors know that to reduce our forces will be seen as acceptance of failure, hence no real attempt to cut war funding will occur for some time; welcome to American politics in the 21st century.

So, the troops will soldier on, useless talk in D.C. and on the airwaves will drone on continuously and it will be business as usual for the rest of us. Hopefully, and I mean hopefully, by primary time, things will either get much better in Iraq or much worse; an extreme one way or the other. It is only then that real action will be allowed to occur.

Personally, I feel Iraq is lost. And, to bleed to death by a million small cuts is no better than to bleed to death by one massive cut. Dead is dead.

Before you start composing please note that you will need to be a registered user of Politico.com to "join the conversation". If you are not a member yet, what are you waiting for? Register Now!

House Readies For Iraq Debate (RC)

By Jennifer Yachnin

Roll Call, February 12, 2007

As House Democratic leaders are slated to unveil today a succinct resolution condemning President Bush's proposed escalation of U.S. troops in Iraq, Republican lawmakers are readying an aggressive response from the chamber's floor throughout the three-day debate over the measure.

Democratic sources said language in what is expected to be an austere resolution — consisting of only two provisions: one expressing general support for the military personnel and a second condemning Bush's proposed increase of 21,500 troops — would be the primary subject of weekend discussions, as lawmakers seek to garner bipartisan support while still clearly reproaching the Bush administration.

"We want to make it as direct and concise as possible," said a Democratic leadership aide, who asked not to be named. Democrats have indicated the measure will not specifically reference "escalation," in an effort to sway GOP lawmakers to support the measure.

"We want to make it a clear vote on the president's plan," the aide added.

Under the Democrats' proposed schedule, each Member will receive five minutes of floor time during the debate, scheduled to begin Tuesday, although aides said a specific lineup for Democratic lawmakers remained largely undecided prior to the weekend.

While the Democratic leadership is expected to spotlight several freshman lawmakers who also are military veterans, other internal factions are seeking blocks of time as well, including the fiscally conservative Blue Dogs and the Progressive Caucus, which has endorsed funding a six-month redeployment plan.

The Democrats' debate time will be jointly controlled by Foreign Affairs Chairman Tom Lantos (D-Calif.) and Armed Services Chairman Ike Skelton (D-Mo.).

The party expected to be largely unified on the resolution, even as portions of the Caucus seek additional measures targeting funding for the Iraq War as well as fiscal accountability, asserting that the measure is the first of several large discussions on the war.

"There's always tomorrow. We don't have to put it all in the first crack we get," said Rep. Dennis Cardoza (D-Calif.).

Although Democratic leaders indicated late last week that the Republican minority would be allowed to offer a substitute measure — the resolution is expected to be a closed rule with no possibility for amendments — no decision had been finalized as of press time Friday.

Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) said Thursday that Democrats had yet to determine whether to allow an alternate proposal, citing the sensitive nature of the resolution.

"We feel this is such a critically important question and that the clarity of the question and the clarity of the response is so important that we are trying to carefully consider how we can assure that there is no confusion as to the answer that this House gives," Hoyer said.

One Democratic aide, speaking on the condition of anonymity, said Democrats were concerned that a Republican substitute, such as legislation sponsored by Rep. Frank Wolf (R-Va.), could shift the focus of the debate away from the increase in troops.

"We want this to be a clean message opposing escalation," the aide said.

A Democratic lawmaker, who asked not to be named, asserted that many rank-and-file Members were lobbying against allowing Republicans to offer a substitute resolution, asserting it could "fracture" the majority.

Republicans, who had yet to determine Friday whether to bring new legislation or an existing bill should a substitute be allowed, sharply criticized the Democrats.

"It looks like Democrats are going for a very carefully choreographed debate with strictly defined parameters for a predetermined outcome. I don't think you can even call that a debate," said Brian Kennedy, a spokesman for Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio).

Nevertheless, House Republicans have prepared a response plan for next week's debate, including plans to blanket television and radio with interviews, as well as rapid-response messaging that will track the floor debate and a "resource center" for Members to provide research and debate material.

In addition, the GOP plan will focus on several themes, including Iraq's context in the larger war on terror and the consequences of losing the Iraq War, with lawmakers expected to assert that withdrawal could destabilize the entire region as well as invite terrorist attacks in the United States.

According to an outline of the plan, Republicans also will focus on arguments that the resolution will weaken troop morale and assert that Democrats have a responsibility to halt funding if they disagree with the president's proposed strategy.

DOJ_NMG_0130300

Boehner will open debate for the Republicans, although the remaining lineup is not yet determined. Ranking GOP lawmakers on the Intelligence, Armed Services, Homeland Security and Foreign Affairs committees will share control of the party's debate time.

GOP Expects Defections As House Debates Iraq Resolution (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

Three days of intense debate over the Iraq war begins in the House today, with Democrats planning to propose a narrowly worded rebuke of President Bush's troop buildup and Republicans girding for broad defections on their side.

Both parties will jockey for prime time before the C-SPAN cameras, with leaders claiming the best time slots and rank-and-file members trying to make the most of the five minutes each will be allotted. If all 435 House members use their five minutes, debate will last 36 hours. It is likely to begin by late morning and run until midnight tomorrow, Wednesday and Thursday. A vote is expected Friday.

After watching their counterparts in the Senate stall and sputter last week, unable to agree on ground rules for a debate on Iraq, House leaders are forging ahead, determined to send a statement to the White House to condemn a troop buildup.

Democrats will file a nonbinding resolution against the Bush plan while Republicans will try to broaden the dispute and seed doubt in the Democratic approach. Although Senate Republicans were able to block debate on a resolution condemning Bush's war policies last week, it will be much easier for Democrats in the House to bring a measure to the floor.

The GOP, whose members have conceded they are likely to lose, is treating the debate like a mini-political campaign, deploying a rapid-response team to counter Democrats' statements, aggressively trying to get its leaders on television and radio, and creating a "resource center" off the House floor where members can fill their arms with maps, research material, videos or other visual aids to use during their floor time.

"We may lose the vote, but we'll win the debate," said Kevin Smith, a spokesman for House Minority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio).

Other Republicans are not so sure they will win even that much. If Democrats stick to their plan of narrowly focusing debate on the president's deployment of 21,500 additional troops to Iraq, the more contentious issues that Republican leaders want to highlight could fail to resonate.

"What we have now is a dispute in tactics," said Rep. Phil English (R-Pa.), who once supported the administration but is opposed to the troop increase. "This is a situation where we've been dealt a bad hand, where we've made a lot of mistakes, where we should have addressed the problems in Baghdad a long time ago, and now a surge on the scale the president has proposed is unlikely to move us forward."

One House Republican close to the GOP leadership spoke on the condition of anonymity in order to be blunt. "This next week is going to be a very tough one for us to get through," he said. "The Democrats know that. We can sit back and hope they overplay their hand, but I don't think they will."

Although the order of speakers has not yet been set, Democrats and Republicans are vying for the most desired slots at a time when attention in Washington will focus on the House. Lawmakers from the West Coast do not want to speak early in the morning, when their constituents are asleep; those from the East do not want to appear at 11:25 p.m. And nearly everyone wants to talk in time to make the evening news and beat the daily newspapers' deadlines.

The last time an Iraq resolution came before the House was in June, when the Republicans controlled Congress. After two days of largely partisan debate, the House easily approved a measure declaring that the United States must complete "the mission to create a sovereign, free, secure and united Iraq," without setting "an arbitrary date for the withdrawal" of troops. Forty-two Democrats bucked their leadership to join a virtually united GOP.

But this debate will be different, lawmakers from both parties agree.

Democrats get to draft the resolution, and the war -- already unpopular in June -- is now clearly opposed by most voters. The party is united, even the left wing, which ultimately wants troop withdrawal from Iraq but is content to see the resolution as a first step.

House Republicans say as few as 20 or as many as 60 Republicans could vote with the Democrats, regardless of the wishes of the Republican leadership and the White House.

"Every time I go to another funeral, every time I go to Walter Reed, people are really gracious, but what do you say? What are we doing over there now?" asked Rep. Wayne T. Gilchrest (R-Md.), whose Eastern Shore district has lost 23 service members in the war.

GOP leaders and conservatives may apply some pressure to stay off the Democratic resolution, but, Gilchrest added: "My internal soul goes a lot beyond my minuscule political career."

DOJ_NMG_0130301

By its nature, the House is quicker to bend to public opinion than the Senate; House members are never more than two years away from an election. Gilchrest voted with the Republican leadership in June, but last month he was one of eight House Republicans who signed a letter stating that the deployment of additional U.S. troops to the sectarian fighting in Iraq would only make matters worse.

A senior Republican aide said the GOP leadership knows that Republicans from districts where the war is unpopular will have to vote with the Democrats to protect themselves. "And that's okay," he said, adding that Republican leaders will not tell their members to stick with the party line.

Gilchrest collected 29 Republican signatures on his own letter pleading with Bush to open diplomatic dialogue with Syria and Iran to find a way out of Iraq, then personally handed the letter to Bush at a bill-signing ceremony in the Oval Office. He is now working with Democratic Reps. Gregory W. Meeks (N.Y.), James P. McGovern (Mass.) and Solomon P. Ortiz (Tex.) to further that diplomatic push.

For some Republicans, the Democratic takeover of Congress has been liberating. A barrage of recent hearings into malfeasance under the U.S. occupation authority in Iraq, the stretched state of the military and the cost of the war have brought to light new information while underscoring congressional acquiescence under GOP control, said Rep. Walter B. Jones (R-N.C.), a longtime war critic.

"My party did not want to do anything to embarrass the administration," he said.

House Democrats To Push Resolution Opposing Increase In Troop Levels (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

WASHINGTON -- House Democrats, taking a lesson from the stalemate in the Senate, are pressing ahead with an Iraq debate this week, narrowly confined to a resolution opposing President Bush's decision to increase troop levels.

As now drafted, the measure expresses support for American forces without delving into the more sensitive issue of whether Congress may restrict war funds in the future. At the same time, hoping to attract Republican votes, the resolution is expected to avoid the use of the word "escalation" to describe the increased U.S. commitment of at least 21,500 troops.

FIGHT FOR IRAQ

1

See continuing coverage2 of developments in Iraq, including an interactive map of day-to-day events3 in Iraq and a tally of military deaths4.

Instead, the draft language speaks simply of rejecting "the decision of President George W. Bush announced on January 10, 2007, to deploy more than 20,000 additional United States combat troops to Iraq."

The final language is expected to be completed Monday in anticipation of floor debate beginning Tuesday and running up to a vote likely on Friday. Democrats said this will give both parties adequate time to express themselves. But Republicans have no assurance yet of having an opportunity to offer an alternative of their own.

"As we discussed this, we saw the problems that the Senate was confronted with," House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D., Md.) said on NBC News "Meet the Press." "We believe the American people want a straightforward answer to the question: Do you agree with the president's proposal? Republican president has made a proposal, we're going to respond to that. We want to respond to it with great clarity."

Senate debate stalled last week when Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R., Ky.) demanded a vote against cutting war funding before permitting action on a bipartisan resolution challenging the increased troop levels. House Republicans would almost certainly offer similar language as their alternative resolution, but the Democratic leadership would prefer to postpone the funding issue until Congress addresses a $93.4 billion emergency spending request for the war next month.

Pressed by Minority Leader John Boehner (R. Ohio) who also appeared on the broadcast, Mr. Hoyer said there would be such an opportunity "within the next 30, 45 days." But he wouldn't commit yet to giving Republicans the right to offer such an alternative this week.

The maneuvering in both houses of Congress underscores the rolling, often incremental nature of the war debate. All of the resolutions now are non-binding policy statements, but the stakes rise when lawmakers turn to the war funding package next month, and then in June to a much larger $623.1 billion request to fund the Pentagon's core budget and overseas military operations for fiscal 2008.

Opponents of the troop increase have essentially won the first round. House Republicans concede that the Democratic resolution will pass this week with possibly 30 Republican votes. While there has been no Senate vote, Republican leaders agree that a majority of senators support a bipartisan resolution -- crafted by former Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner (R., Va.) -- opposing the troop increase.

DOJ_NMG_0130302

It is precisely because of this loss that Republicans and the White House want to skip ahead quickly to the second and higher stake round: the $93.4 billion spending bill. That is why there is so much Republican emphasis on resolutions opposing any reduction in funds, and why Democrats are still struggling to come up with restrictions that are do-able.

The House Appropriations Committee will meet Mar. 7 on the request, and in testimony Friday, Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the departing Army chief of staff, conceded that the Pentagon was struggling to meet the schedule set for the troop increase.

"We're sending in piecemeal troops because…we don't have them," said Rep. John Murtha (D., Pa.), the chairman of the defense subcommittee. "I'm sure you'd like to send 21,000 tomorrow. But wouldn't you agree we can't send 21,000 tomorrow, General?"

"We're doing it on the schedule that was asked for," Gen. Schoomaker said. "It is a challenge to do it. No question about it."

As a result, the full complement of soldiers for the so-called "surge" isn't expected to be in Iraq until May. Moreover, maintaining the higher overall troop levels will likely require that the military extend the tours of some of the brigades in Iraq now.

The Pentagon has begun to concede that instead of 21,500, the more likely number of troops needed -- when support personnel are counted -- will be closer to 25,000. That would bring the total U.S. troop levels in Iraq to about 160,000; if that were maintained just through the end of this calendar year, it could strain even the revised fiscal 2008 budget numbers.

A $3.82 billion request for Iraqi security forces -- in the spring supplemental -- will almost certainly be a target for some cuts or conditions attached by Congress.

Among the other options affecting U.S. troops more directly would be a provision barring the use of new funds to extend the deployment of Army and Marine troops beyond 365 and 210 days, respectively. If that were combined with a second provision that prevented sending troops back to Iraq until they had had promised time at home, it could make it harder to carry out the increase now and over time make it harder for the military to maintain the "post-surge" 160,000 troop level.

Iraq Debate Shifts To The House (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, February 12, 2007

WASHINGTON

The Senate deadlocked just 90 minutes into a debate last week over President Bush's "new way forward" in Iraq. Now the action shifts to the House, where Democrats aim for an up-or-down vote on his policy.

As in the Senate, that resolution would be nonbinding on Mr. Bush, but no one would know it, judging from the intense disputes – within and between political parties – over the terms of disagreement. Democrats say Senate Republicans blocked the vote primarily to protect the president. Republicans say Democrats rigged the rules to suppress minority rights.

At issue is more than a test of wills. It's how to frame the terms of opposition to a war that has lost public support and strained US relations with the rest of the world.

The vote – or nonvote – on the resolution is also politically toxic. Opposition to the war helped sweep Republicans out of control in the House and Senate in 2006. But if the issue is mishandled, it could do the same to Democrats – or topple even more GOP careers – in 2008.

The Senate's version of a resolution against a proposed surge of 21,500 US troops in Iraq evolved into five pages of "whereas" clauses, many added to bring another vote or two on board.

By contrast, House Democrats say they intend to keep it simple. Their resolution, to be announced Monday, is expected to have two parts: One affirms that Congress will continue to support US troops who have been committed to the war in Iraq; the other affirms that members do not agree with the proposed escalation.

"This is an up-or-down vote on the policy enunciated by the president. We owe it to our constituents to have that," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, the Democratic caucus chair, after a caucus meeting on Iraq last week. The House is planning three days of debate, with each member allowed five minutes to speak.

Meanwhile, House GOP leaders call the coming vote "a meaningless political stunt ... that demoralizes US troops." Like Senate Republicans, they are pushing Democrats to allow a separate up-or-down vote on a resolution not to cut off war funding.

"If Democrats are serious about ending the war, they should bring a real resolution to the floor about whether to cut funding," House Republican leader John Boehner said last week.

Senate Republicans also insist that senators have an opportunity to vote on a resolution not to cut off funding to the troops. Democratic majority leader Harry Reid refused to allow that vote. In return, all but two Republicans voted to block the resolution against the troop surge (proposed by Sens. John Warner (R) of Virginia and Carl Levin (D) of Michigan), which Democrats wanted to proceed.

DOJ_NMG_0130303

"Democrats and antiwar Republicans are sending political signals with this vote," says Randall Woods, a historian at the University of Arkansas, who writes on congressional antiwar politics. "They need to show the American people that they are voicing opposition to the war, yet not appear soft on national security," he says. "They're fighting for their [political] lives."

As in previous war votes, the language of the resolutions has been crafted to maximize political peril for the opposition. But for the first time since US forces went into Iraq in 2003, Democrats are setting the timing and terms of war votes, and they are determined to not rush into a vote they are likely to lose.

It's a tactic Republicans have used in the past to embarrass Democrats who oppose Bush's war strategy – and one that some GOP leaders now say they regret.

When Rep. John Murtha (D) of Pennsylvania, a longtime friend of the military, broke with the White House in November 2005 and proposed an immediate, phased withdrawal of US forces from Iraq, House GOP leaders rushed a recorded vote to express the sense of the House that the deployment of US forces in Iraq "be terminated immediately." The language was crafted to embarrass Representative Murtha and to squelch any antiwar momentum from his high-profile reversal on the war. As expected, the vote failed, 3-403.

Some Republican leaders now say that strategy of forced, preemptive votes was a mistake. "It was clearly a ploy. Everybody in American knew it was a ploy, and we paid a price in November," said Rep. Adam Putnam (R) of Florida, the new House Republican conference chairman, last week.

Meanwhile, Murtha, who now chairs the defense subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee, is laying groundwork for a vote on funding as early as mid-March, when the House is expected to take up Bush's $99.6 billion war funding request for fiscal 2007. He says he aims to build a robust case for redirecting spending to adequately equip and train US forces, rather than to fund a troop surge.

"Our concern is the proper supply and backup to the troops already in theater, as we transform this mission to one where we can be successful," says Rep. Marcy Kaptur (D) of Ohio, a member of the defense subcommittee.

Congress wants to vote on the war? It already has.

The US Senate and House of Representatives have voted dozens of times on resolutions, funding measures, and amendments pertaining to the Iraq and Afghanistan conflicts. Below is an abbreviated record of their votes.

107th Congress: Republicans control the House (221-214*); Democrats control the Senate (51-49*)

2002

October: A joint resolution is approved to authorize use of armed forces against Iraq (House 296-133, Senate 77-23).

· House rejects Barbara Lee amendment urging peaceful means to resolve the issue (72-355).

· House rejects amendment to require the president to seek congressional authority before using military force against Iraq without a UN resolution (155-270).

. . .

108th Congress: Republicans control House (229-204*) and Senate (51-48*)

2003

April: Congress approves $78.5 billion in emergency war funding (House by voice vote, Senate by unanimous consent).

· Senate rejects amendment calling on the president to raise revenues to offset Iraq war costs (18-79).

October: Senate rejects amendment to offset Iraqi reconstruction costs by eliminating income-tax cuts enacted in 2001 for top 1 percent of earners (42-57).

· Senate adopts Lindsey Graham amendment to express the sense of Congress that Saddam Hussein's removal has enhanced the security of Israel and other US allies (95-2).

· Senate rejects amendment to release $10.2 billion in reconstruction funding only if the UN authorizes a multinational military force under US leadership in Iraq (42-57).

· Senate agrees to amendment to reimburse service members who paid for meals while hospitalized as a result of injuries or illness while in combat or training since 9/11 (99-0).

· Senate rejects amendment prohibiting use of defense funding for the involuntary deployment to Iraq of members of the National Guard and Reserves who have been involuntarily deployed for six months or more during the past six years (15-82).

October/November: Congress approves $87.5 billion in emergency war funding (House 298-121, Senate by voice vote).

2004

May: House expresses deep appreciation to the members of military who served in Operation Iraqi Freedom (365-50).

June: Senate rejects amendment to suspend a portion of the reduction in the highest income-tax rate for individual taxpayers to pay for Iraq war (44-53).

· House expresses gratitude to US armed forces for valiant service and offers continued support (352-57).

. . .

DOJ_NMG_0130304

109th Congress: Republicans control House (232-202*) and Senate (55-45*)

2005

April: Senate adopts Robert Byrd amendment that war funding be part of the president's annual budget after fiscal year 2006 (61-31).

May: Congress passes $82 billion in emergency war funding (House 368-58, Senate 100-0).

· House rejects Woolsey amendment that the president should submit to Congress a plan for the withdrawal of US military forces from Iraq (128-300).

July: Senate adopts Warner amendment that calendar year 2006 should be a period of "significant transition" to full Iraqi sovereignty, thus creating conditions for phased redeployment of US forces from Iraq (79-19).

· House rejects resolution to terminate immediately deployment of US forces in Iraq (3-403).

December: House expresses commitment to achieving victory in Iraq (279-109).

2006

June: Congress passes $94.5 billion in emergency war funding (House 351-67, Senate 98-1).

· House agrees to resolution declaring that it is not in US national security interests to set arbitrary date for withdrawal or redeployment of US troops in Iraq (256-153).

· Senate rejects Levin amendment to begin phased redeployment of US forces from Iraq in 2006 (39-60).

· Senate rejects amendment to require the redeployment of US armed forces from Iraq by July 1, 2007 (13-86).

. . .

110th Congress: Democrats control House (233-202) and Senate (51*-49)

2007

January: House votes that it shall be US policy to "vigorously support the government of Afghanistan" and to deploy troops there "as long as the Afghan government supports such US involvement" (299-128).

Why Are The Pacifists So Passive? (NYT)

By Lynn Chu And John Yoo

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

BEFORE the November elections, many Democratic candidates and legal academics insisted that the Iraq war was illegal and that only Congress, not the president, had the power to manage it under the Constitution. Interestingly, now that Democrats control Capitol Hill, they are fretting that if Congress tried to cut back on funds or troop levels, it might be, well, unconstitutional. Democrats are suddenly acknowledging that the commander in chief and executive branch may be better off without their micromanagement, after all.

Of course, they haven't been silent about the war: both the House and Senate last week were political circuses, juggling various bills that proposed to "rein in" the president. But behind all the bluster, the one thing all the major Democratic proposals have in common is that they are purely symbolic resolutions, with all the force of a postcard. (Two other Democratic Senate proposals that have actual teeth — one by Russell Feingold to cut off money for the war, another by Barack Obama to mandate troop reductions — were ignored by the leadership.)

The fact is, Congress has every power to end the war — if it really wanted to. It has the power of the purse. Its British forebears in Parliament micromanaged the monarchy quite a bit, for instance by making money (the "sinews of war") contingent on attacking one country and making peace with another. And there is more direct precedent: In 1973, Congress affirmatively acted to cut off funds for Vietnam. It also cut off money for the Nicaraguan contras with the Boland Amendment in 1982.

Not only could Congress cut off money, it could require scheduled troop withdrawals, shrink or eliminate units, or freeze weapons supplies. It could even repeal or amend the authorization to use force it passed in 2002.

A pullout, however, would have no chance of success, because its supporters are likely to lack the two-thirds majority necessary to override a presidential veto. But to stop President Bush's proposed troop surge, Congress doesn't have to do anything. It can just sit back and fail to enact the periodic supplemental spending measures required to keep the war going. Congress has wielded considerable power by just threatening such measures, as with President James K. Polk in the Mexican-American War and President Ronald Reagan in Lebanon after the 1983 barracks bombing.

The Constitution doesn't pick winners. It leaves it to the three branches to use their unique powers to struggle for supremacy. James Madison, the leading intellectual force behind the Constitution, rebutted Patrick Henry's firebrand attack on executive war powers during the Virginia ratifying convention by reminding him that Congress could control any renegade president by stopping the flow of money.

DOJ_NMG_0130305

But with power comes responsibility. The truth is that this Congress is not sure what to do in Iraq. Its hesitation reflects America's uncertainty and divisions. Antiwar bluster is high at the moment, echoing popular frustration and grim news from Baghdad.

Our elected representatives know, however, that policy can't be made by poll. Most also understand that that leaving Iraq to a sectarian power struggle would break our word and lead to slaughter. A failed state in Iraq would breed more terrorism, not less, by becoming a haven for more radical training camps.

Most in Congress, in fact, are not eager to replay Vietnam. The United States has had far fewer casualties in this conflict. Our national security interests here are high. If we falter now, it would be read as a "defeat" and embolden more terrorist attacks on us. Once again the world would begin to doubt American strength. This would undermine our ability to conduct credible diplomacy, while electrifying Islamists to further jihad.

The truth is that the Democrats in Congress would rather sit back and let the president take the heat in war than do anything risky. That way they get to prepare for the next election while pointing fingers of blame and spinning conspiracy theories. It is odd to see the Democratic Party turning toward isolationism, bonding with paleoconservatives, and so bitterly averse to the ideals of democratic nation building.

War is not about instant gratification in a hail of klieg lights, our truncated Gulf war notwithstanding. In an interdependent, globalized world, we can't shrug our shoulders and shirk in the war on terrorism. America made a fundamental change in foreign policy after the 9/11 attacks: to support and spread democracy. The House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, should understand this well. She made her national reputation as a junior representative in the 1980s criticizing the Chinese dictatorship after the Tiananmen Square massacre.

Perhaps it was inevitable that the public would soon tire of war and engage in overheated accusations of bad faith. It is quite right that Congress review, and consider, from its unique perspective, what changes, if any, it now wants to make. If Congress really believes the Bush administration has set us on the wrong course, it can act tomorrow to cut the sinews of war in Iraq. But its failure to do so seems an acknowledgment that the consequences would be far worse than what we face now.

Ex-Pentagon Official Defends Iraq Stance (AP)

By Ben Feller

AP, February 12, 2007

A former Pentagon official on Sunday defended his prewar assessment of a relationship between Iraq and al-Qaida, calling it a much-needed critique of the CIA's intelligence on the subject.

"It's healthy to criticize the CIA's intelligence," said former Pentagon policy chief Douglas Feith. "What the people in the Pentagon were doing was right. It was good government."

Feith was responding to a report by the Defense Department inspector general that Feith's office "did not provide the most accurate analysis of intelligence to senior decision makers."

The IG's report found that there was no support for the Pentagon's claim of a "mature symbiotic relationship" in all areas between Iraq and al-Qaida.

"No one in my office ever claimed there was an operational relationship," Feith said on "Fox News Sunday." "There was a relationship."

The review found that the actions of Feith's office were not illegal or unauthorized — but they were an inappropriate "alternative" analysis that did not reflect the consensus of the intelligence community or include caveats about the information's reliability.

Feith said this amounted to circular logic from the Pentagon's internal watchdog.

"The people in my office were doing a criticism of the intelligence community consensus," Feith said. "By definition, that criticism varied. If it didn't vary, they wouldn't have done the criticism."

The 2004 report from the Sept. 11 commission found no evidence of a collaborative relationship between Saddam and Osama bin Laden's terrorist organization.

When asked if his office ever made the case against going to war with Saddam, Feith said, "The answer is emphatically yes."

Feith left his Pentagon post in August 2005.

Sen. Jack Reed, a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said the Pentagon, through Feith's office, intentionally made the case for war in 2002 based on faulty analysis.

"They did it very deliberately," said Reed, D-R.I. "They used that analysis. It was leaked to the media. It was reported in newspapers. It took on a credibility beyond the facts that the intelligence community had." Reed also appeared on "Fox News Sunday."

DOJ_NMG_0130306

Feith Calls Faulty Prewar Claims 'Good Government' (LAT)

By Josh Meyer

The Los Angeles Times, February 12, 2007

WASHINGTON -- A former top Pentagon official on Sunday defended as "good government" his office's prewar findings of a significant relationship between Iraq and al-Qaida, while a congressional Democrat suggested that his actions were not only inappropriate but possibly illegal.

Douglas J. Feith, the former undersecretary of Defense for policy, appeared on "Fox News Sunday" to explain his actions and that of his Office of Special Plans, following the release Friday of a highly critical report by the Pentagon's inspector general.

The report concluded that Feith, a leading architect of the policies that led to the Iraq war, briefed senior Bush administration officials on the purportedly strong links between al-Qaida and Iraq that did not accurately reflect the views of the CIA and other U.S. intelligence agencies. It also said Feith and his aides sought to discredit and bypass those intelligence officials because they were strongly discounting alleged ties between the terrorist network and Saddam Hussein's regime.

The inspector general's review found that the actions of Feith's office were not illegal or unauthorized, describing them as an inappropriate "alternative" analysis.

Critics have used the inspector general's report to bolster their claims that Feith and other Pentagon aides loyal to then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Vice President Dick Cheney "cherry-picked" intelligence suggesting an al-Qaida/Iraq link as part of a politically motivated effort to sell the Iraq war to the American public, U.S. allies and the United Nations.

Sunday, however, Feith sought to portray his actions and those of his staffers as part of the normal give-and-take of government in the months leading up to the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in March 2003. He indicated that, at the time, he thought the CIA in particular was missing important ties between al-Qaida and Saddam's regime.

"It's healthy to criticize the CIA's intelligence," Feith told "Fox News Sunday." "What the people in the Pentagon were doing was right. It was good government."

The inspector general's report concluded that there was virtually no support for the Pentagon policy office's assessment that "intelligence indicates cooperation in all categories" and a "mature symbiotic relationship" between al-Qaida and Iraq at the time Feith's office was presenting those findings to top White House officials.

Feith's office also claimed that an alleged April 2001 meeting in Prague, Czech Repbublic, between Sept. 11 lead hijacker Mohamed Atta and an Iraqi agent was a known contact; it has since been widely discredited by the 9/11 Commission and the Senate intelligence committee.

"All of that was wrong, wasn't it?" "Fox News Sunday" host Chris Wallace asked Feith, referring to his office's conclusions.

"No, not at all," Feith responded. "There was substantial intelligence.... There was a lot of information out there."

Feith also said that "no one in my office ever claimed there was an operational relationship" between Iraq and al-Qaida. That claim was immediately questioned by some administration critics.

"It's an abject lie, and it completely ignores what is in the documented public record," Larry C. Johnson, a former State Department and CIA counterterrorism official, said in an interview Sunday. "I think the problem is across the board that we have convenient memory loss. No one wants to go back and hold people accountable to what they were doing."

On his blog, noquarter.typepad.com, Johnson wrote Sunday that Feith repeatedly had claimed such a relationship, particularly in a still-classified memo dated Oct. 27, 2003, that was sent to the leadership of the Senate Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence. The 16-page memo was later leaked to a conservative magazine, which reported on it extensively. The resulting article was later cited by Cheney as "the best source of information" on al-Qaida/Iraq ties.

Sen. Ron Wyden, D-Ore., a member of the intelligence panel, told CNN's "Late Edition" that not only were Feith's actions "inappropriate," but that "there are serious questions about whether Mr. Feith broke the 1947 statute that requires that our committee be informed" of his office's activities.

On NBC's "Meet the Press," House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md., said he and other top House Democrats had sent a letter earlier in the day asking Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte for proof that they had taken steps to prevent "a similar occurrence in the future."

Hoyer said Feith's activities were a calculated effort to subvert the intelligence advice given to President Bush before the war, but that he didn't know whether it had led to "miscalculations."

"But the fact of the matter is, what was done was wrong," Hoyer said. "We want to get to the bottom of it."

Feith left the Pentagon in August 2005 and is now a visiting professor of national-security policy at Georgetown University.

Senator Ahab (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0130307

In a reasonable world, Douglas Feith would have received an apology late last week from Senator Carl Levin. But the obsessive Democrat won't let go of his story that the Bush Administration "politicized" pre-war Iraq intelligence no matter how many times the facts disprove it. Senator Ahab is now going even further and suggesting behavior standards that would make the U.S. intelligence bureaucracy less accountable to elected officials; this could get Americans killed.

The familiar accusation against Mr. Feith is that the former Undersecretary of Defense was responsible for all the government's intelligence failures on Iraq because his office had the temerity to review and critique intelligence on the relationship between Iraq and al Qaeda. His alleged pressure to find a strong link is said to have so influenced apparently weak-kneed CIA analysts that they made a false case for war. Senate Intelligence Chairman Jay Rockefeller went so far as to accuse Mr. Feith of "running a private intelligence failure [sic], which is not lawful."

This preposterous narrative has already been debunked many times -- notably in a bipartisan report from the Senate Intelligence Committee itself. That 2004 report found that not only had CIA analysts not been pressured to change their views but that Mr. Feith's review had sometimes "actually improved the Central Intelligence Agency's products." A year later the Robb-Silberman commission also found no evidence that prewar intelligence had been politicized. And last week the Defense Department's Inspector General delivered to Congress a report that likewise exonerates Mr. Feith of doing anything unlawful and acknowledges that his actions were authorized by the Secretary or Deputy Secretary of Defense.

But instead of moving on to more important things, Mr. Levin is still chasing his great white whale. He's grabbed on to an odd bit of editorializing by the Inspector General that Mr. Feith "was inappropriately performing Intelligence Activities . . . that should be performed by the Intelligence Community."

"Inappropriately"? What on Earth does that mean? The charge is so vague that it has the air of a political sop that Acting Inspector General Thomas Gimble tossed to Mr. Levin to avoid being hauled in front of the Senate and accused of a cover-up. The myth persists that Inspectors General are King Solomons who are above politics, but in this case Mr. Gimble split the baby, and in a way that could harm U.S. security.

He and Mr. Levin are essentially saying that officials appointed by an elected President aren't allowed to question the "consensus" of the "intelligence community." Yet the work of Mr. Feith's office on al Qaeda had nothing to do with what everyone now concedes was the main intelligence failure on Iraq, which was the lack of WMD stockpiles. Former CIA Director George Tenet said it was a "slam dunk" that Saddam Hussein had such stockpiles, and it was this intelligence "consensus" that the Bush Administration relied on in making its main case for war. Any links between al Qaeda and Iraq is a separate issue that was barely mentioned in the run-up to war.

Make no mistake, the people "politicizing" intelligence here are Senators Levin and Rockefeller, whose smears against Mr. Feith will have a chilling effect on anyone who wants to question "consensus" judgments in the future. This is dangerous, because if recent experience has taught us anything it is that we need far more such questioning.

It was the intelligence community that underestimated Saddam's nuclear capabilities before the first Gulf War, only to overestimate them later. It was the CIA "consensus" that also vastly overestimated the strength of the Soviet economy even as Moscow was about to sue for peace. Before 9/11 it was also the intelligence consensus -- led by former CIA Near East chief analyst Paul Pillar -- that terrorism was a minor and manageable problem. Too bad Mr. Feith and his team weren't around to scrub those judgments.

We learned much of what we know about intelligence from the late, great Cold War strategists, Albert and Roberta Wohlstetter. And what they taught was that in the intelligence business almost nothing is certain. Albert Wohlstetter especially disliked "national intelligence estimates," which were always the product of lowest-common-denominator judgments -- or group-think. These judgments, in turn, often lead to public pronouncements that claim a degree of certainty that simply doesn't exist -- and then to charges of "politicizing" intelligence when those judgments turn out not to be true.

Messrs. Levin and Rockefeller may enjoy scoring partisan points. But their nasty obsession with Mr. Feith will have the effect of endorsing more group-think as the last, best word in intelligence -- and will lead to more Iraqs and more 9/11s.

U.S. Says Arms Link Iranians To Iraqi Shiites (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 11 — After weeks of internal debate, senior United States military officials on Sunday literally put on the table their first public evidence of the contentious assertion that Iran supplies Shiite extremist groups in Iraq with some of the most lethal weapons in the war. They said those weapons had been used to kill more than 170 Americans in the past three years.

DOJ_NMG_0130308

Never before displayed in public, the weapons included squat canisters designed to explode and spit out molten balls of copper that cut through armor. The canisters, called explosively formed penetrators or E.F.P.s, are perhaps the most feared weapon faced by American and Iraqi troops here.

In a news briefing held under strict security, the officials spread out on two small tables an E.F.P. and an array of mortar shells and rocket-propelled grenades with visible serial numbers that the officials said link the weapons directly to Iranian arms factories. The officials also asserted, without providing direct evidence, that Iranian leaders had authorized smuggling those weapons into Iraq for use against the Americans. The officials said such an assertion was an inference based on general intelligence assessments.

That inference, and the anonymity of the officials who made it, seemed likely to generate skepticism among those suspicious that the Bush administration is trying to find a scapegoat for its problems in Iraq, and perhaps even trying to lay the groundwork for war with Iran.

Officials at the Iranian Embassy in Baghdad said they had no comment on the American accusations, the latest in a back-and-forth between the countries as tension has escalated over Tehran's rising influence in Iraq and elsewhere in the Middle East and suspicions about its nuclear energy program. And while the Americans displayed what they said was the physical evidence of their claims about Iran's role in Iraq, they also left many questions unanswered, including proof that the Iranian government was directing the delivery of weapons.

The officials were repeatedly pressed on why they insisted on anonymity in such an important matter affecting the security of American and Iraqi troops. A senior United States military official gave a partial answer, saying that without anonymity, a senior Defense Department analyst who participated in the briefing could not have contributed.

The officials also were defensive about the timing of disclosing such incriminating evidence, since they had known about it as early as 2004. They said E.F.P. attacks had nearly doubled in 2006 compared with the previous year and a half.

"The reason we're talking about this right now is the vast increase in the number of E.F.P.s being found," one official said. American-led forces in Iraq, the official said, "are not trying to hype this up to be more than it is."

Whatever doubts were created about the timing and circumstances of the weapons disclosures, the direct physical evidence presented on Sunday was extraordinary.

The officials said the E.F.P. weapons arrived in Iraq in the form of what they described as a "kit" containing high-grade metals and highly machined parts — like a shaped, concave lid that folds into a molten ball while hurtling toward its target.

For the first time, American officials provided a specific casualty total from these weapons, saying they had killed more than 170 Americans and wounded 620 since June 2004, when one of the devices first killed a service member.

But then the officials went much further, asserting without specific evidence that the Iranian security apparatus, called the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps - Quds Force controlled delivery of the materials to Iraq. And in a further inference, the officials asserted that the Quds Force, sometimes called the I.R.G.C. - Quds, could be involved only with Iranian government complicity

.

"We have been able to determine that this material, especially on the E.F.P. level, is coming from the I.R.G.C. - Quds Force," said the senior defense analyst. That, the analyst said, meant direction for the operation was "coming from the highest levels of the Iranian government."

At least one shipment of E.F.P.s was captured as it was smuggled from Iran into southern Iraq in 2005, the officials said. Caches and arrays of E.F.P.s, as well as mortars and other weapons traceable to Iran, have been repeatedly found inside Iraq in areas dominated by militias known to have ties to Iran, the officials said. One cache of antitank rocket-propelled grenades and other items was seized as recently as Jan. 23, the officials said.

The precise machining of E.F.P. components, the officials said, also links the weapons to Iran. "We have no evidence that this has ever been done in Iraq," the senior military official said.

The officials also gave fresh details on recent American raids in Baghdad and the northern city of Erbil in which Quds Force members were picked up and accused of working with extremist groups to plan attacks on American and Iraqi forces.

Some of the five Iranians still being detained after they were picked up in Erbil on Jan. 11 had been flushing documents down a toilet when they were found, the defense analyst said, and they had recently been engaged in "changing their appearance" — apparently shaving their heads, though for what reason the analyst did not know.

An earlier raid in Baghdad was carried out, the officials said, after American forces received word that the No. 2 Quds Force official, whom they identified as Mohsin Chizari, was unexpectedly in Iraq. When Mr. Chizari was picked up in a raid in December, he was carrying false identification, the officials said.

He was later released to the Iraqi government with another Iranian official who was picked up at the same time. The Iraqis asked both Iranians to leave the country.

DOJ_NMG_0130309

The senior defense analyst said there was no direct link between the detained Iranians and the physical evidence presented on Sunday. But the analyst said, “the overall tenor” of the evidence was that Mr. Chizari was implicated in bringing E.F.P.s into Iraq.

The briefing also presented new information on what the Americans call the smuggling routes. There are three main routes, officials said: the Mandelli border crossing, east of Baghdad; the Mehran crossing, in the marshes to the south; and in the southern city of Basra.

Paid Iraqis, rather than Iranians themselves, carry the materials across the border, the officials said.

The senior military official blamed recent press reports for, he said, overstating the importance of the weapons presentation, which had been delayed. Part of the delay reflected a view among officials in Washington that the original presentation was insufficiently strong. Officials here did not address that element of the internal debate.

The senior American military official did make it clear that declassifying the material took place only after weeks of analysis on what information could be useful to hostile forces — information that has mostly been kept out of the public eye since the E.F.P.s began turning up in Iraq. “We publicly have not acknowledged E.F.P.s for the past two years,” the senior military official said.

Laid out on the tables themselves were the tailfins of dozens of apparently used mortar shells, as well as intact mortar shells, rocket-propelled grenades, cases for some of the weaponry, the E.F.P., and two identification cards the officials said were taken in the Erbil raid.

The shells had serial numbers in English in order to comply with international standards for arms, the officials said. One grenade, for instance, was marked with the serial number P.G.7-AT-1 followed by LOT:5-31-2006. The officials said that the serial numbers clearly identified the grenade as being of Iranian manufacture and the date showed that it had been made in 2006.

Commanders in Baghdad are acutely aware of the deadly E.F.P.s. Col. Steve Townsend, commander of the Third Stryker Brigade Combat Team in Baghdad, said his unit has encountered about a dozen E.F.P.s in the past two months.

Iran’s role in Iraq has been discussed in recent months in public and private testimony by senior intelligence officials. In testimony last month, Gen. Michael V. Hayden, director of the Central Intelligence Agency, said “there’s a clear line of evidence that points out the Iranians want to punish the United States, hurt the United States in Iraq, tie down the United States in Iraq, so that our other options in the region, against other activities the Iranians might have, would be limited.”

Senator John D. Rockefeller IV, the West Virginia Democrat who chairs the Senate Intelligence Committee, said last month that he believed that Iranian operatives inside Iraq were supporting Shiite militias and working against American troops.

But he also asserted that the White House had a poor understanding of Iranian calculations and added that he was concerned that the Bush administration was building a case for a more confrontational policy toward Tehran.

Military Ties Iran To Arms In Iraq (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 11 -- Senior U.S. military officials in Iraq sought Sunday to link Iran to deadly armor-piercing explosives and other weapons that they said are being used to kill U.S. and Iraqi troops with increasing regularity.

During a long-awaited presentation, held in Baghdad's fortified Green Zone, the officials displayed mortar shells, rocket-propelled grenades and a powerful cylindrical bomb, capable of blasting through an armored Humvee, that they said were manufactured in Iran and supplied to Shiite militias in Iraq for attacks on U.S. and Iraqi troops.

"Iran is a significant contributor to attacks on coalition forces, and also supports violence against the Iraqi security forces and the Iraqi people," said a senior defense official, who was joined by a defense analyst and an explosives expert, both also from the military.

The officials said they would speak only on the condition of anonymity, so the explosives expert and the analyst, who would normally not speak to the news media, could provide information directly. The analyst's exact title and full name were not revealed to reporters. The officials released a PowerPoint presentation including photographs of the weaponry, but did not allow media representatives to record, photograph or videotape the briefing or the materials on display.

An official at the Iranian Embassy in Baghdad called the U.S. accusations "fabricated" and "baseless."

"We deny such charges. We ask those who are claiming such evidence: Show the documents in public," said the official, who also spoke on condition of anonymity. "We cannot compensate for the American failure and fiasco in Iraq. . . . It is not our policy to be involved in any hostile operations against coalition forces here."

DOJ_NMG_0130310

The U.S. officials said weapons were smuggled into the country by the Quds Force, an elite unit of the Iranian Revolutionary Guard that U.S. officials believe is under the control of Iran's supreme religious leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. The officials in Baghdad said that Iranians recently detained in Iraq by U.S. forces belong to the Quds Force.

With so much official U.S. buildup about the purported evidence of Iranian influence in Iraq, the briefing was also notable for what was not said or shown. The officials offered no evidence to substantiate allegations that the "highest levels" of the Iranian government had sanctioned support for attacks against U.S. troops. Also, the military briefers were not joined by U.S. diplomats or representatives of the CIA or the office of the Director of National Intelligence.

Although the administration has made many assertions about Iran's nuclear program, its role in Iraq and its ties to groups on the State Department's terrorism list, the U.S. government has never publicly offered evidence proving the allegations. The briefing was the first time during the Bush administration that officials had sought to make a public intelligence case against Iran.

Iraq's deputy foreign minister, Labeed M. Abbawi, said in an interview Sunday that the Iraqi government remains in the dark about the full U.S. investigation into Iranian activities in Iraq. "It is difficult for us here in the diplomatic circles just to accept whatever the American forces say is evidence," he said.

"If they have anything really conclusive, then they should come out and say it openly, then we will pick it up from there and use diplomatic channels" to discuss it with Iran, he said. "The method or the way it's being done should be changed, to have more cooperation with us."

U.S. military officials in Iraq had previously described the use of "explosively shaped charges" to target vehicles, but Sunday's briefing was the first time they displayed pieces of what they called an "explosively formed penetrator" or EFP.

The one such device shown at the briefing was a cylinder of PVC pipe about eight inches long and about six inches in diameter. The officials said the devices are deadly because the explosion sends a slug of malleable metal, often copper, at velocities high enough to penetrate the armor of tanks and Humvees. Their components require precision machining that Iraq has shown no evidence of being able to perform, the officials said.

The first known attack using such weapons in Iraq occurred in May 2004, and the rate of attacks using them has nearly doubled in 2006, the officials said. They have also been used in southern Lebanon, the explosives expert said. The Lebanese Shiite organization Hezbollah receives military support from Iran.

The defense analyst said Iranians used Iraqi smugglers to bring the weapons into Iraq. "The smoking gun of an Iranian standing over an American with a gun, it's never going to happen," he said.

The officials said the weapons are often supplied to what the officials called "rogue" elements of the Mahdi Army, the powerful Shiite militia led by anti-American cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. One official said there was no "widespread involvement" of the Iraqi government in supplying the weaponry.

A group of Iraqis coming into southern Iraq from Iran were detained by Iraqi border forces in 2005, the defense analyst said, and "they had the materials, EFPs and whatnot, on them."

The officials provided further details on the case of two Iranians captured during a December raid on the compound of a leading Shiite politician, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, and five Iranians seized in the raid of a liaison office in the northern city of Irbil in January.

The raid at Hakim's compound netted Mohsen Chirazi, whom U.S. officials described as a high-ranking Quds Force operations chief, as well as documents with information about sniper rifles and mortars, the officials said. The senior defense official said that when U.S. officials discussed the allegations with Hakim's representatives, their explanation was that "it is normal for different groups to acquire armaments for protection purposes."

Following protests from Iraqi officials, the U.S. released Chirazi and the other Iranian captured with him. Hakim visited President Bush at the White House in December.

In the January raid of the Iranian liaison office, which provides consular services in Irbil, U.S. forces captured five Iranians. U.S. officials said they were Quds Force operatives who carried no passports and had fake identification cards. At the time of the raid they were trying to alter their appearance by shaving their heads -- U.S. forces found a bag of hair -- and they were flushing documents down a toilet, the officials said. Explosive residue was found on the hands of at least one of the Iranians, they said.

The Iraqi government has called for their release as well. Iraq's foreign minister, Hoshyar Zebari, has said that the liaison office was operating under the approval of the Kurdish regional government and that Iraq was in the process of formalizing it as a diplomatic consulate.

The weapons displayed for reporters on two tables on Sunday -- rocket-propelled grenades, football-shaped mortar shells, the shaped explosive charge and about 40 tail fins of exploded mortar shells -- showed specific signs of Iranian manufacture, the officials said. The mortar tail fins, for example, were made from a single fused piece of metal, while other countries make mortar shells that have removable parts, the explosives expert said.

Two rocket-propelled grenades, with the markings "P.G. 7-AT-1," were said to be made exclusively in Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0130311

The process of the briefing, delayed by more than two weeks, was unusual. President Bush's national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, said in a recent meeting with reporters that the original media presentation had overstated the evidence against Iran and needed to be toned down.

At the Green Zone briefing Sunday, the senior defense official said charts and graphs outlining the scope of attacks with shaped charges had been removed from the presentation by the intelligence community. "The reason we're talking about this right now is the vast increase in the number of EFPs being found," he said. The U.S. forces in Iraq "are not trying to hype this up to be more than it is."

Staff writer Dafna Linzer in New York and special correspondent Naseer Mehdawi in Baghdad contributed to this report.

Military: Iran Ships Weapons To Shiite Extremists (USAT)

By Jim Michaels

USA Today, February 12, 2007

BAGHDAD — The U.S. military said Sunday that armor-piercing roadside bombs sent by Iran to Shiite extremists have killed 170 American and coalition troops in Iraq.

U.S. military officials, who declined requests to be identified, said shipments of weapons and ammunition to Iraq's Shiite militias were being directed at the highest levels of the Iranian government.

FROM THE U.S. MILITARY: Pictures, descriptions of Iranian support to insurgents (PDF)

In a briefing, U.S. officials showed reporters part of a device they described as a sophisticated roadside bomb, along with mortar shells and rocket-propelled grenades they said were made in Iran. Later, one of the officials, an intelligence analyst, said it would be impossible to find a "smoking gun" conclusively proving Iranian government involvement.

Sunday's briefing by the three military officials was the most detailed attempt to show that Iran supports militants in Iraq. It followed similar remarks Friday by U.S. Defense Secretary Robert Gates.

Gates said serial numbers and markings found on explosives provide "pretty good" evidence that Iran is supplying either weapons or expertise to extremists in Iraq.

U.S. and coalition forces have not captured any Iranian agents in possession of the armor-piercing roadside bombs. The U.S. officials at the briefing said Iraqis are usually used to transport the explosives from Iran.

The Mahdi Army militia is among the Shiite extremist groups that have obtained the powerful bombs. The Mahdi Army is aligned with anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, whose political organization is part of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government.

Al-Maliki has moved to distance himself from al-Sadr in recent weeks and has said he does not want Iraq to become a proxy battlefield for the United States and Iran.

U.S. commanders have been increasingly vocal about allegations of Iranian support for Shiite militias and extremists in Iraq. Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno, the No. 2 ranking U.S. commander in Iraq, said recently that Iran was providing training, weapons, ammunition and money to militants in Iraq.

The military said sophisticated weapons from Iran give militants an edge in their fight against American and Iraqi forces.

The Iranian Embassy in Baghdad could not be reached for comment, but Tehran has denied the allegations in recent statements.

Sunday's military briefing had been delayed several times, as higher-ups in Washington vetted the evidence, the U.S. officials said. The Bush administration was widely criticized after the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq for flawed intelligence alleging Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction.

The officials said that among several Iranians picked up in recent raids was an operations officer from Iran's al-Quds Brigade, a unit in the Iranian Revolutionary Guards responsible for training insurgents and terrorists. The U.S. military identified him as Mohsin Chizari.

The Revolutionary Guards and al-Quds force report to Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei.

U.S. forces raided a compound in the northern Iraqi city of Irbil last month, detaining five Iranians, all of whom were al-Quds members, the U.S. military said. Those captured tried to flush documents down the toilet and alter their appearance by shaving their heads, the U.S. officials said.

American officers are particularly worried about the armor-piercing bombs that can shoot a large slug of molten metal through the thick armor of a Humvee or Abrams tank.

Unlike many roadside bombs in Iraq that are cobbled together from artillery shells, so-called explosively formed penetrators are machined in factories.

"It is not just technology you can crank off the street," Lt. Col. Steven Miska, deputy commander of a U.S. brigade in Baghdad, said in an interview last week.

DOJ_NMG_0130312

The military officials said the number of explosively formed penetrators, or EFPs, used in Iraq increased dramatically last year after first being detected there in 2004. The number of EFP attacks nearly doubled last year. EFPs also have been used against Israeli forces in Lebanon by Iranian-backed Hezbollah militants, who fought a 34-day war with Israel last summer.

The U.S. military says it has also discovered conventional weapons and ammunition in Iraq tied to Iran. In an interview last week, Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, the top U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, said U.S. forces have discovered mortar rounds that were Iranian-made. They're distinctive because most tail-fins on 81mm mortars screw off, but Iranian-made shells do not, he said.

The U.S. officials said Sunday that much of the Iranian weaponry found in Iraq was manufactured last year, indicating the munitions were recently shipped into Iraq and were not Saddam-era weapons.

Odierno said in a recent interview that the Iraqi government has been confronted with U.S. allegations of Iranian support for militants in Iraq.

Iran's Leaders Arming Iraqis, U.S. Says (AP)

By Steven R. Hurst

AP, February 12, 2007

U.S. military officials on Sunday accused the highest levels of the Iranian leadership of arming Shiite militants in Iraq with sophisticated armor-piercing roadside bombs that have killed more than 170 troops from the American-led coalition.

The military command in Baghdad denied, however, that any newly smuggled Iranian weapons were behind the five U.S. military helicopter crashes since Jan. 20 — four that were shot out of the sky by insurgent gunfire.

A fifth crash has tentatively been blamed on mechanical failure. In the same period, two private security company helicopters also have crashed but the cause was unclear.

The deadly and highly sophisticated weapons the U.S. military said it traced to Iran are known as "explosively formed penetrators," or EFPs.

The presentation was the result of weeks of preparation and revisions as U.S. officials put together a package of material to support the Bush administration's claims of Iranian intercession on behalf of militant Iraqis fighting American forces.

Senior U.S. military officials in Baghdad said the display was prompted by the military's concern for "force protection," which, they said, was guaranteed under the United Nations resolution that authorizes American soldiers to be in Iraq.

Three senior military officials who explained the display said the "machining process" used in the construction of the deadly bombs had been traced to Iran.

The experts, who spoke to a large gathering of reporters on condition that they not be further identified, said the supply trail began with Iran's Revolutionary Guards Quds Force, which also is accused of arming the Hezbollah guerrilla army in Lebanon. The officials said the EFP weapon was first tested there.

The officials said the Revolutionary Guard and its Quds force report directly to Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei.

The briefing on Iran was revised heavily after officials decided it was not ready for release as planned last month.

Senior U.S. officials in Washington — cautious after the drubbing the administration took for the faulty intelligence leading to the 2003 Iraq invasion — had held back because they were unhappy with the original presentation.

The display appeared to be part of the White House drive that has empowered U.S. forces in Iraq to use all means to curb Iranian influence in the country, including killing Iranian agents.

It included a power-point slide program and a handful of mortar shells and rocket-propelled grenades which the military officials said were made in Iran.

The centerpiece of the display, however, was a gray metal pipe about 10 inches long and 6 inches in diameter, the exterior casing of what the military said was an EFP, the roadside bomb that shoots out fist-sized wads of nearly molten copper that can penetrate the armor on an Abrams tank.

"A normal roadside bomb is like a shotgun blast. But these are like a rifle. They're focused and they're aimed. ... It's going to take anything out in its way, go in one side and out the other," said 1st Lt. Zane Galvach, 25, of Dayton, Ohio, a soldier with the Army's 2nd Division, based in Baghdad.

Skeptical congressional Democrats said the Bush administration should move cautiously before accusing Iran of fomenting a campaign of violence against U.S. troops in Iraq.

Senate Intelligence Committee member Ron Wyden, D-Ore., said "the administration is engaged in a drumbeat with Iran that is much like the drumbeat that they did with Iraq. We're going to insist on accountability."

DOJ_NMG_0130313

On the Republican side, Sen. Trent Lott of Mississippi said he did not think the United States was trying to make a case for attacking Iran. Lott said the U.S. should try to stop the flow of munitions through Iran to Iraq but that "you do that by interdiction ... you don't do it by invasion."

The EFPs, as well as Iranian-made mortar shells and rocket-propelled grenades, have been supplied to what the military officials termed "rogue elements" of the Mahdi Army militia of anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. He is a key backer of Shiite Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

The U.S. officials glossed over armaments having reached the other major Shiite militia organization, the Badr Brigade. It is the military wing of Iraq's most powerful Shiite political organization, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, whose leaders also have close ties to the U.S.

Many key government figures and members of the Shiite political establishment have deep ties to Iran, having spent decades there in exile during Saddam Hussein's rule. The Badr Brigade was formed and trained by Iran's Revolutionary Guard.

An intelligence analyst in the group said Iran was working through "multiple surrogates" — mainly in the Mahdi Army — to smuggle the EFPs into Iraq. He said most of the components are entering the country at crossing points near Amarah, the Iranian border city of Meran and the Basra area of southern Iraq.

The analyst said Iraq's Shiite-led government had been briefed on Iran's involvement and Iraqi officials had asked the Iranians to stop. Al-Maliki has said he told both the U.S. and Iran that he does not want his country turned into a proxy battlefield.

"We know more than we can show," said one of the senior officials, when pressed for tangible evidence that the EFPs were made in Iran.

U.S. officials have alleged for years that weapons were entering the country from Iran but had until Sunday stopped short of alleging involvement by top Iranian leaders.

During the briefing, a senior defense official said that one of the six Iranians detained in January in the northern city of Irbil was the operational commander of the Quds Force.

He was identified as Mohsin Chizari, who was apprehended after slipping back into Iraq after a 10-month absence, the officer said.

The Iranians were caught trying to flush documents down the toilet, he said. They had also tried to change their appearance by shaving their heads. Bags of their hair were found during the raid, he said.

The dates of manufacture on weapons found so far indicate they were made after fall of Saddam Hussein — mostly in 2006, the officials said.

In a separate briefing, Maj. Gen. Jim Simmons, deputy commander of Multinational Corps-Iraq, said that since December 2004, U.S. helicopter pilots have been shot at on average about 100 times a month and been hit on an average of 17 times in the same period.

He disclosed for the first time that a Black Hawk helicopter had been hit by small arms fire near the western city of Hit. The craft crash-landed but there were no casualties. Simmons was on board.

The major general said Iraqi militants are known to have SA-7, SA-14 and SA-16 shoulder-fired anti-aircraft missiles but none of the most recent five military crashes were caused by those weapons. He said some previous crashes had been a result of such missiles but would not elaborate.

North of Baghdad, a suicide truck bomber crashed into a police station near Tikrit, killing at least 30 policemen. A total of 76 people were killed or found dead across Iraq. The U.S. Central Command said a soldier was shot and killed Sunday in volatile Diyala province northeast of the capital. A second soldier was reported killed Sunday in western Baghdad.

Iran Arms Iraqi Insurgents (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, February 12, 2007

Iran is supplying deadly shoulder-fired missiles and armor-piercing bombs to Iraqi insurgents, along with TNT, triggering devices, rockets and other weapons that are killing and injuring hundreds of U.S. and allied troops, a U.S. military intelligence report made public yesterday says.

The detailed briefing report, titled "Iranian Support for Lethal Activity in Iraq," stated that Iranian Misagh-1 portable anti-aircraft missiles were found after a failed attempt to shoot down a plane at Baghdad's airport in 2004.

Disclosure of the Iranian provision of anti-aircraft missiles comes as six U.S. helicopters have been shot down by insurgents in the past three weeks. It is not known whether Iranian missiles were used in the attacks.

The armor-piercing bombs have killed at least 170 American and allied troops in Iraq, defense officials told reporters in Baghdad, where the report was released.

DOJ_NMG_0130314

"More than 170 U.S. and coalition troops have been killed by these things, and 620 wounded. There was a significant increase in their use over the past six months," one defense official said.

"The weapons had characteristics unique to being manufactured in Iran. ... Iran is the only country in the region that produces these weapons," said a defense official who briefed reporters in Baghdad, adding that Tehran was using Shi'ite cleric Sheik Muqtada al-Sadr's Mahdi Army as a surrogate in Iraq.

The report stated that the Iranians involved in supporting Iraqi extremists are members of the Qods Force of the Iranian Revolutionary Guards Corps, Tehran's Islamist paramilitary shock troops. The Qods Force is known to back terrorists throughout the Middle East, according to the 16-page report.

A senior defense official said the Iranian terrorist support is "coming from the highest levels of the Iranian government."

Much of the intelligence in the report was obtained in the past several months, including an identity card of a Qods Force member who was captured along with four other Iranian agents in a raid on the group's office in the northern Iraqi city of Irbil last month. The identity card bore the logo of the Qods Force.

"Over the last 60 days, Iranian and Iraqi detainees have told us that the Qods Force provides support to extremist groups in the form of money and weapons," the report said. "Their information included references to Iranian provision of weapons to Iraqi militants engaged in anti-coalition violence, as well as weapons and training to these same militants."

The briefing is the first Bush administration effort to expose details of Iranian support for extremists that has been a growing problem, especially with the introduction in 2004 of what the military is calling "explosively formed penetrators," or EFPs, that were shown in the report to have blown through the armor plating on the side of a U.S. Humvee.

"There is a growing body of evidence pointing to Iranian supply of EFPs to Iraqi extremist groups. Additional evidence suggests that Iran is also providing training and other forms of weaponry to extremist groups," the report said.

But congressional Democrats on yesterday's political talk shows were immediately skeptical on many points.

"Explosives seem to be flowing into Iraq from Iran, but does it stem from a deliberate government policy or rogue elements within the Iranian government?" asked Sen. Jack Reed, Rhode Island Democrat and Armed Services Committee member, on Fox News.

Both Democratic Sens. Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut and Ron Wyden of Oregon said they feared the Bush administration had doctored the intelligence to support a belligerent policy against Iran.

"I'm worried about that. That's how we got into the mess in Iraq," Mr. Dodd said on CBS, with Mr. Wyden telling CNN that "the administration is engaged in a drumbeat with Iran that is much like the drumbeat that they did with Iraq. We're going to insist on accountability."

But Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott, Mississippi Republican, dismissed such suggestions, saying that the United States is using military interdiction to block Iranian interference in Iraq, while continuing diplomatic dialogue with Tehran.

"We are talking to them in a variety of ways. Just because you don't have a grand meeting doesn't mean you're not communicating," Mr. Lott said. "Diplomacy is an arcane world that I guess you have to be in to really understand. But I don't think the American people ought to be concerned that some precipitous action is fixing to occur."

The report contains a map showing the route used by Iranian agents to funnel cash and weapons into Iraq.

"Money and weapons are escorted across the border using different vehicles that only travel at night," the report said, noting the shipments happen "regularly."

"The money is transported through Mehran, Iran," the report said. "Named individuals provided two of the IEDs from Iran that can go through armor."

The shaped charges were described in the report as can-shaped high-explosives that send out a melted-metal projectile that can penetrate armor plating. It is a new type of improvised explosive devices, the deadly roadside bombs that have caused most of the deaths among U.S. and allied forces in Iraq since 2003.

In addition to shaped charges, the report shows that the Iranians have supplied cash and triggering devices for bombs, including a relatively sophisticated "passive infrared trigger" that was recovered by U.S. forces near the southern city of Basra and traced to Iran.

Large amounts of TNT were also recovered and found to have Farsi writing, an indication they were manufactured in Iran. Additionally, 88 mm mortar rounds found in Iraq were traced to Iran by serial numbers and shown to have been manufactured as late as September.

"Comparison of the seized mortar container markings to known Iranian samples indicates they are of Iranian production," the report said.

Iranian armor-piercing rocket-propelled grenades also are being sent to Iraq, according to the report. New PG-7AT-1 grenades were found in Baqouba in November and in Baghdad in January.

DOJ_NMG_0130315

Senior administration officials in the past have complained of the Iranian weapons support, but until now they have been reluctant to make the details public.

The report was held up for more than a week as the result of an internal dispute between intelligence and policy officials. Senior U.S. intelligence officials within the office of the director of national intelligence sought to play down the intelligence of Iranian involvement, fearing the report will be used as a basis to launch an attack on Iran.

Policy and military leaders pressed to have the report made public to expose Iranian duplicity. Tehran officials have said publicly that they want to see a stable Iraq while they are covertly supporting insurgents through the Qods Force activities.

U.S. Officials Offer Evidence Of Iran's Hand In Iraqi Unrest (LAT)

By Tina Susman, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 12, 2007

U.S. defense and intelligence officials today rolled out what they said was solid evidence that Iran was providing bombs to target U.S. and Iraqi troops and accused Iran's supreme leader of orchestrating the smuggling of such devices over the Iran-Iraq bo

Baghdad — U.S. defense and intelligence officials today rolled out what they said was solid evidence that Iran was providing bombs to target U.S. and Iraqi troops and accused Iran's supreme leader of orchestrating the smuggling of such devices over the Iran-Iraq border.

At a briefing held under unusually secretive conditions here, the U.S. officials, who refused to be identified by name and did not allow cameras or recording devices inside a conference room, offered up tables laden with hardware and a slide show of documentation that they said bolstered the U.S. contentions of Iranian involvement in Iraqi unrest.

One of the officials, a military explosives expert, sat cradling the remnants of what he said was an Iranian-made explosively-formed penetrator, or EFP, on the table in front of him. The officer said that the device, which looked like a large coffee can stuffed with a gray, sandy substance, has been responsible for the deaths of at least 170 U.S. and other forces since first surfacing in Iraq in June 2004.

Also on display at the press conference were about three dozen tailfins of 60-milimeter and 81-milimeter mortars; two anti-tank rockets; shipping containers for mortars; a chunk of metal said to have been rocketed out of an Iranian-made explosive; and the identification cards, tucked into clear, plastic baggies, of two men arrested by U.S. agents in the northern Iraqi city of Irbil last month.

The intelligence analyst said the men were Iranian agents who were trying to change their appearance and flush documents down the toilet when U.S. officials burst in on them. The hardware, they said, was identifiable as Iranian because of the method in which it was manufactured, or because of unique markings.

The unveiling came amid discomfort from Iraqi government officials, who have made clear they don't want to be in a diplomatic cross-fire between the United States and Iran, leading supporters of the Iraqi government who are mutual antagonists. Since December, U.S. officials have arrested several Iranian officials in Iraq. Last week, Iran accused the United States of being behind the abduction of an Iranian diplomat on the streets of Baghdad.

The latest U.S. accusations against Iran, targeting Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, was certain to heighten tensions between Washington and Tehran. According to the U.S. official here, agents of Iran's Quds Force, a unit of the Iranian Revolutionary Guards, were involved in the smuggling of explosives into Iraq.

"They report directly to the supreme leader," said the U.S. intelligence official of the Quds agents. Another official said the material provided at the briefing was only a sample of evidence that existed but that because of intelligence concerns, nothing more could be provided.

Violence persisted in the capital and other parts of Iraq today (Sunday). At least 15 people died when a suicide bomber rammed a pickup truck into a police station in Dour, a Sunni town north of Baghdad. Witnesses said the explosives were hidden beneath hay in the truck and that the force of the blast damaged a hospital, post office, two schools and other buildings near the station.

The attack occurred shortly at about 9 a.m., just as Iraqi police were gathering for work, and destroyed the police station, said one witness, adding that the street was littered afterward with shrapnel and body parts.

In other attacks Sunday, gunmen raked a police station in the southern town of Muthena with gunfire, killing one civilian, and a car bomb went off in Baghdad's Mansour neighborhood, killing one person.

The violence came despite U.S. and Iraqi promises of a new security plan to stabilize Iraq, a plan that Nouri said Sunday would escalate this week with sweeps throughout Baghdad.

Dems Skeptical Of Starting Row With Iran (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0130316

AP, February 12, 2007

Skeptical congressional Democrats said Sunday the Bush administration should move cautiously before accusing Iran of fomenting a campaign of violence against U.S. troops in Iraq.

The members of Congress spoke on the morning talk shows as the U.S. military said it believes orders came from the highest levels of the Iranian government to send components for sophisticated roadside bombs in Iraq.

The military told reporters in Baghdad that between June 2004 and last week, more than 170 Americans had been killed by the bombs, which the military calls "explosively formed projectiles." Those weapons are capable of destroying an Abrams tank.

Explosives seem to be flowing into Iraq from Iran, but does it stem from a deliberate government policy or rogue elements within the Iranian government? asked Sen. Jack Reed, D-R.I., who serves on the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., said that ultimately Iran wants a stable Iraq and that the United States needs to engage in diplomacy.

Sen. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., said the administration could be laying the groundwork for an attack on Iran and that "I'm worried about that. That's how we got into the mess in Iraq," by relying on what Dodd called "doctored information."

Senate Intelligence Committee member Ron Wyden, D-Ore., said "the administration is engaged in a drumbeat with Iran that is much like the drumbeat that they did with Iraq. We're going to insist on accountability."

On the Republican side, Sen. Trent Lott of Mississippi said he does not think the United States is trying to make a case for attacking Iran. Lott said the U.S. should try to stop the flow of munitions through Iran to Iraq but that "you do that by interdiction ... you don't do it by invasion."

Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, spoke in more aggressive tones, saying that "we have to do everything within our power to stop" any cross-border flow.

Reed spoke on "Fox News Sunday," Kerry on ABC's "This Week," and Dodd and Lott on CBS's "Face the Nation" and Cornyn and Wyden on CNN's "Late Edition."

No News From Iran's Leader On Nuclear Program (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

TEHRAN, Feb. 11 — President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad vowed in a speech marking the 28th anniversary of the Islamic revolution here on Sunday that Iran would not stop its nuclear program despite a United Nations deadline next week.

But he stopped short of making a promised announcement about "good news" in the country's nuclear progress, raising speculation that domestic political pressure and technological glitches may have put off a milestone in the government's efforts to begin mass enrichment of uranium.

In his speech, to a crowd estimated at more than 100,000 people who had gathered in Azadi Square in Tehran, he fell back on a formula that has become familiar as international sanctions and pressure have increased: vowing that Iran would never give up its right to enrich uranium, but promising that its program was for peaceful purposes only.

"We are ready for talks but will not suspend our program," he said.

In addition, he accused Western governments of making false promises of aid to lure Iran into giving up its program at a moment when it holds great promise.

"There is deception behind their demand for us to suspend our nuclear enrichment program; they want to force us to suspend the program and not let us resume it under an excuse," he said, adding that the last time the country halted its nuclear activities it took more than two years to restart the process.

The looming nuclear issue, and the events of a year in which Iran has worked to assert its importance on the world stage in other areas, added a note of historic importance to an anniversary celebration that in years past had often taken on the air of forced celebration.

This year, demonstrators converged to hear Mr. Ahmadinejad speak. Many held banners proclaiming Iran's nuclear aims, including the slogan: "Suspension, never, not even for one second!"

Mr. Ahmadinejad presented Iran's program as a fait accompli that the West would have to deal with, saying, "Our nuclear program is not a legal or a technical issue anymore, it has become a political one."

But the news of major success that he repeatedly promised last week did not appear in his presentation, nor in a parallel speech given by Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, at an international security conference in Munich. Instead, the president said the news would be announced sometime in the next two months, and he referred to the rally on Sunday as a "great nuclear celebration."

It was unclear whether Mr. Ahmadinejad's conspicuous silence reflected technical problems or political caution or some combination of the two.

DOJ_NMG_0130317

Technically, Iran is on the edge of crossing a nuclear line it has envisioned for decades: moving beyond the experimental phase of its enrichment program, begun in secret in 1985 and continued in fits and starts since then, and progressing to industrial-scale production. It was widely believed that Mr. Ahmadinejad was planning to announce that step, claiming opening success in an effort to install 3,000 enrichment centrifuges in two cavernous halls at its desert nuclear plant near Natanz.

The plant is eventually meant to hold 54,000 centrifuges, allowing the enrichment of uranium by the ton for reactor fuel rods — or, if the Bush administration's fears are true, nuclear weapons.

But one outstanding question is whether the frenetic activity at the desert plant is real, a bluff or a little of both — whether Tehran has really mastered the centrifuge basics or is involved in a political show to strengthen its bargaining position in the global standoff over its nuclear program. The known technical facts suggest that it may be too soon for any immediate leap to an industrial capacity, some international nuclear experts say.

There has also been growing domestic political pressure on Mr. Ahmadinejad to tone down his defiant rhetoric, especially after the recent imposition of sanctions by the United Nations.

Last week, reformist members of Parliament said they were ready to hold talks with their American counterparts in an effort to reduce tensions.

"It is time for the Parliaments of the two countries to use their legal power and authority to help bring understanding and cooperation between the two governments," said Akbar Alami, a reformist member of Parliament, the daily newspaper Aftab-e-Yazd reported Saturday.

Mr. Alami pointed to the rhetoric of Mr. Ahmadinejad and President Bush and said that both had been provoking animosity between the countries.

In between Mr. Ahmadinejad's alternately defiant and jubilant notes on Sunday, he also tried a reassuring one, taking pains to say that Iran would comply with International Atomic Energy Agency regulations and would not leave the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty. "All our activities are watched by I.A.E.A. cameras," he said.

In Munich, Mr. Larijani, Iran's nuclear negotiator, echoed those assurances, telling an audience of military and disarmament experts that "we believe in a solution through negotiations and dialogue" and asserting that Iran was ready to restart talks over its nuclear program.

"If the other side is determined in doing so," he said, "I am sure within a few months all issues will be finalized and the way will be paved for long-term cooperation both in regional aspects and in energy."

But Iran still faces a Security Council deadline that looms much sooner than a few months down the road. The Council has set Feb. 24 as the deadline for the government to suspend its uranium enrichment program or face tougher sanctions.

In his speech, Mr. Larijani said sanctions were counterproductive.

Afterward, he met for more than an hour with Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief, who had been involved in the negotiations with Iran. Mr. Larijani later met with Frank-Walter Steinmeier, the German foreign minister.

Iranians Voice Support For Tehran's Bid For Nuclear Energy (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, February 12, 2007

Tens of thousands of flag-waving Iranians converged on Azadi Square on Sunday to voice support for Iran's bid for nuclear energy, as President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad vowed to press forward with the nation's uranium enrichment program.

"When we suspend our activities, they will never let us resume them," the president told a crowd of cheering, chanting supporters who alternately sang patriotic anthems and burned Uncle Sam-hatted effigies of President Bush.

In his hourlong speech on the 28th anniversary of the Islamic Revolution, when crowds each year assemble to commemorate the overthrow of Shah Mohammed Reza Pahlavi, it was expected that Ahmadinejad would announce progress on Iran's uranium enrichment program.

Iran is said to be in the beginning stages of installing industrial-scale uranium enrichment centrifuges at an underground site at Natanz, but Ahmadinejad disclosed no advancements Sunday. Western nonproliferation specialists say the start-up has been hindered by technical problems, including difficulties operating the above-ground test centrifuges.

Iran has also hinted that it may try to set up P-2 centrifuges, which are more advanced than those being installed at Natanz, but there was no announcement of that, either. Ahmadinejad hinted that reports of new technological gains of an unspecified nature would be forthcoming between now and April 9.

Iranian officials have asserted a right to develop a civilian nuclear power program, but the U.S. and other leading Western nations believe that Iran is aiming to construct a nuclear weapon.

DOJ_NMG_0130318

For all the flag-waving, fist-clenching and chants of "Death to America," the crowd seemed somewhat subdued, as did the president. Hundreds wandered off in the middle of Ahmadinejad's speech, and the subtext to the president's address was that Iran intended to cooperate and was prepared for talks if the U.S. did not unilaterally set the terms.

"Why are your nuclear sites operating 24 hours a day, and we have to stop ours? We are ready to negotiate, but in a fair atmosphere," the president said. "Why do we have to suspend [enrichment] before negotiations?"

He said Iran was committed to continuing full cooperation with the International Atomic Energy Agency, including access by IAEA inspectors to Iran's nuclear sites.

In Germany, meanwhile, chief Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani struck a similarly conciliatory tone, asserting that Iran was prepared to settle all outstanding issues with the IAEA over the next three weeks.

"Today we announce to you that the political will of Iran is aimed at the negotiated settlement of the case, and we don't want to aggravate the situation in our region," Larijani told a gathering of the world's top security officials in Munich.

He added that Iran was seeking harmonious relations with its neighbors in the Middle East.

"That Iran is willing to threaten Israel is wrong," Larijani said. "We pose no threat and if we are conducting nuclear research and development we are no threat to Israel. We have no intention of aggression against any country."

Ahmadinejad's speech was the highlight of a day here that also included schoolchildren singing patriotic songs (including a recently penned anthem, "Nuclear power for peaceful goal, today it's the song of Iranians," and "The threat of the United States is not useful anymore.")

One woman waved a caricature of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice with huge lips pursed into an angry snarl. Bush was depicted with big ears and a cowboy hat stamped with the Star of David.

Streets on several sides of Azadi Square throughout Sunday morning were turned into rivers of people making their way toward the anniversary rally, most of them bused in by the government from government offices, factories and schools. But some came on their own, a few stopping to buy Spiderman and Barbie balloons along the way.

"Please tell Mr. Bush, stay in your place, because you cannot do anything against this nation. If he tries to harm us, he will regret it," said Fatimeh Youssefi, who came with her granddaughter, both clutching chadors tightly around their chins. "We will defend our country to the day we are dead as martyrs."

"It's our duty to come here for our country and our revolution, and to say that nuclear energy is our right," said Mehdi Besharati, a 49-year-old government employee. "Why is it that the other countries can have nuclear energy, but we can't?"

Ahmadinejad also used the occasion to warn the U.S. about its continued presence in Iraq, although he did not address U.S. claims that Shiite-run Iran is aiding Shiite militias in the neighboring state.

"There's no more dictator, so why are you staying there? Iraq has a national parliament now. Why are you staying? Why are you making a new war between Sunni and Shia?" he said.

"The Iranian nation is brothers of the Iraqi nation. Millions of Iranians each year travel to Iraq. The security of Iraq is our security. If there is no safety in Iraq, it means there is no safety in the entire neighborhood," he said.

"You tried to ask us to make a solution in Iraq. We accepted, but you didn't accept our suggestions, and now you've made more and more problems."

Iran Softens Tone, Declares Readiness To Resume Talks (WP)

By Craig Whitlock And Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

MUNICH, Feb. 11 -- Facing the prospect of broader international sanctions, Iran's president and national security chief on Sunday offered to resume negotiations over their country's nuclear program and eased up on some of the contentious rhetoric of the past, including threats to destroy Israel.

In Munich, Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear negotiator, briefly met with European diplomats for the first time since talks collapsed in September and said Iran was willing to return to formal discussions.

He also said his country had "no intention of aggression against any country," adding that Iran "posed no threat to Israel" in particular, despite past vows from Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to wipe Israel "off the map."

Meanwhile in Tehran, Ahmadinejad also said that Iran was willing to resume negotiations, although both he and Larijani rejected a condition for talks set by the U.N. Security Council that Iran first freeze its uranium enrichment program. "We are prepared for dialogue but won't suspend our activities," Ahmadinejad said.

In an address commemorating the 28th anniversary of the Islamic revolution that overthrew the shah of Iran, Ahmadinejad said his government had made recent progress in its nuclear development but did not give specifics. Some diplomats and analysts had expected him to announce that Iran had made a breakthrough in its efforts to enrich uranium.

DOJ_NMG_0130319

U.S. and European officials expressed doubt about the sincerity of Iran's stated willingness to talk. "Offering to negotiate but saying suspension's off the table raises a real question about the sincerity of what he said," U.S. Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert M. Kimmitt told reporters in Germany after Larijani's appearance at the Munich Conference on Security Policy, an annual gathering of top defense officials and diplomats from around the world.

In Paris, French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy said it would be "unacceptable" to hold negotiations unless Iran first agrees to freeze its nuclear activities. "We have to be exceedingly clear and very rigorous on this proposition," he said.

Larijani met briefly in Munich with German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier and Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief. Although no breakthroughs were reported, it was the first time the two sides had met since talks between Iran and European diplomats broke off last fall over Iran's refusal to end its uranium enrichment program.

Iran insists its nuclear program is for peaceful energy purposes, but U.S. and European officials say Tehran is pushing to develop atomic weapons in violation of international treaties.

On Friday, the International Atomic Energy Agency suspended some technical aid to Iran, which is under a Feb. 21 deadline from the Security Council to stop enriching uranium or face more international sanctions.

With the deadline looming, Iranian officials have sounded less strident of late. Although Ahmadinejad has garnered worldwide headlines for threatening to destroy Israel and for calling the Holocaust a "myth," diplomats and analysts said he has lost domestic political support in recent months and is under pressure to moderate his tone and positions.

In Munich, where Hitler and the Nazis first tasted power, Larijani tried to sidestep questions about his government's views on the Holocaust, during which the Third Reich orchestrated the killing of an estimated 6 million Jews and about 5 million other Europeans. It is a crime in Germany to deny that the Holocaust happened.

"There is an overreaction to the matter of the Holocaust," Larijani said. "It's a historical matter. I can't see why such sensitivities are being given to such a simple case."

Larijani also said Iran was a force for regional stability in the Middle East and had no designs on any of its neighbors, including Iraq and Israel. "We pose no threat, and if we are conducting nuclear research and development, we are no threat to Israel," he said.

Instead, Larijani blamed the United States for bringing chaos to the Middle East and South Asia, noting that it had invaded two of Iran's neighbors, Iraq and Afghanistan. He echoed some of the criticism leveled a day earlier in Munich by Russian President Vladimir Putin, who harshly accused the United States of making the world more dangerous than at any point during the Cold War.

In his own speech at the Munich conference Sunday, U.S. Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates used both humor and pointed remarks to parry Putin's speech. "One Cold War was quite enough," Gates told the audience of about 200 defense and foreign ministers and other officials from about two dozen countries.

Alluding to the fact that both he and Putin are former intelligence officials, Gates said, "I guess old spies have a habit of blunt speaking."

But he added, "I've been to reeducation camp" -- a reference to the four years he spent as president of Texas A&M University before becoming the Pentagon chief.

Gates, who has been defense secretary for just two months, noted that he has accepted an invitation from Putin to visit Russia.

Gates devoted most of his speech to urging NATO members to contribute to the force fighting Taliban insurgents in Afghanistan.

"It is vitally important that the success Afghanistan has achieved not be allowed to slip away through neglect or lack of political will or resolve," Gates said.

Iran Raises Hopes Of Nuclear Settlement (FT)

By Gareth Smyth, Stephen Fidler And Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, February 12, 2007

Iran's top security official on Sunday held out hope for a "negotiated settlement" on Tehran's nuclear programme and said the programme would pose no threat to Israel or any other country.

Ali Larijani, Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, also told an international security conference in Munich that his government was willing to discuss technical limitations on uranium enrichment, to ensure it could not make the highly enriched uranium needed for a nuclear weapon.

In remarks that deviated from a prepared text, he also said Iran was open to talks on a multinational arrangement for uranium enrichment. But he suggested Tehran still considered it had the right to conduct its own uranium enrichment.

DOJ_NMG_0130320

Despite international fears that Iranian rhetoric would be ratcheted up Sunday as hundreds of thousands rallied in Tehran to mark the 28th anniversary of the Islamic Revolution, the country's leaders said they were open to compromise over the programme although they would not abandon it.

After discussions with Javier Solana, the European Union foreign policy supremo, Mr Larijani struck an optimistic note. "An important point is that I felt that Europe has the necessary will for a settlement of this case and there is the political will on our side to have a negotiated settlement." Earlier, he told the conference: "There are solutions to address your concern: we don't want you to be concerned."

European officials said the meeting was too brief to ascertain whether Mr Larijani's comments represented a potential breakthrough.

Meanwhile, on Sunday a US defence official in Baghdad said 170 coalition troops had been killed by Iranian-made roadside bombs, as US anger rises at Tehran's alleged involvement in the war. The official said there was "a growing body" of evidence of Iranian weapons being smuggled into Iraq and used to kill their soldiers.

Last week in Seville, Robert Gates, US defence secretary, said Washington had "pretty good" evidence that Iran was providing militias in Iraq with sophisticated explosive devices called " explosively formed projectiles". He said the evidence included serial numbers and markings on fragments of exploded devices. Tehran denies the charge and blames US soldiers for the violence and for inflaming tensions between Shia and once-dominant Sunni.

But Mr Gates dismissed suggestions that the recent increase in anti-Iranian rhetoric from US officials was a prelude to war. After the Iranian supreme leader threatened on Thursday to respond to any US attack on Iran, Mr Gates that day responded that it was "just another day in the Persian Gulf".

Asked later whether his response was aimed at ratcheting down the American rhetoric, he replied: "In the last few weeks there's been an effort in Washington actually to tone down everybody else. I don't know how many times the president, [Secretary of State Condoleezza] Rice and I have had to repeat that we have no intention of attacking Iran, that the second carrier group [recently dispatched to the Gulf] is there to reassure our allies, as well as to send a signal that we've been in the Persian Gulf for decades and we intend to stay there. And I think these are fairly modest statements, frankly."

At a rally in Tehran, President Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad also adopted a less combative tone, saying Iran was ready for "dialogue" and would remain within the nuclear non-proliferation treaty, which prohibits the development of atomic weapons. But he also stressed that Iran "would never accept . . . humiliation" by suspending nuclear activities, which the UN Security Council has demanded by this month. "A huge power like Iran cannot be threatened with sanctions," he told cheering crowds.

Iran's reformists and pragmatic conservatives have in recent weeks been trying to pressurise Ayatollah Khamenei to make Mr Ahmadi-Nejad adopt a more measured approach.

But one analyst told the FT he detected in Sunday's speech little evidence of a significant shift in Mr Ahmadi-Nejad's views. "He was as tough as ever," said Nasser Hadian, professor of politics at Tehran University.

Mr Ahmadi-Nejad said Iran had already achieved "its inalienable right", an apparent reference to proficiency in fuel-cycle technology, and promised further news of "great" progress.

The president did not, as had been expected by some western diplomats, announce an expansion of the number of centrifuges – the device used to enrich uranium – at its Natanz plant. Neither did he announce that gas had been introduced to the centrifuges, as some had predicted.

A report from Mohammad ElBaradei, director-general of the International Atomic Energy Agency, is due to be presented to the UN watchdog's board on February 21. Mr ElBaradei has tried to get negotiations under way by calling for a "time out", in which Iran would suspend enrichment simultaneously with the start of talks.

Iran Hits Softer Note Over Nukes (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, February 12, 2007

ISTANBUL, TURKEY

Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad marked the 28th anniversary of the Islamic revolution in Tehran Sunday by telling a mass rally that anyone who gave up "one iota" of the controversial nuclear program would be the "most hated man in Iran."

But a far more conciliatory – and unexpected – message was offered to Western security chiefs meeting in Munich by Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear negotiator, who said that Iran is ready to resolve within three weeks all issues with the UN nuclear watchdog agency. "The political will of Iran is aimed at the negotiated settlement of the case and we don't want to aggravate the situation in our region," Mr. Larijani said.

Iran's nuclear messages come just days before a Feb. 21 deadline set by the UN Security Council for Iran to stop uranium enrichment or face broader sanctions than the limited restrictions imposed by a resolution in late December.

DOJ_NMG_0130321

Larijani's words indicate that despite Mr. Ahmadinejad's tough rhetoric – or perhaps because of it – Tehran has grasped how sensitive Iran's position has become, analysts say. But diplomats reacted with skepticism, even as they tried to find a compromise on the issue of enrichment.

Larijani's offer came as senior US officials in Baghdad presented what they called a "growing body" of evidence of high-level Iranian interference in Iraq, with lethal weapons and agents. Showing bomb fragments and mortar fins to journalists, the intelligence analysts charged that sophisticated roadside bombs known as "explosively formed penetrators" (EFPs) had been made in Iran and smuggled into Iraq, where they have killed 170 coalition troops since 2004.

The US analysts further charged that special units of Iran's Revolutionary Guard, known as the Al Qods forces, had been actively plying Shiite militias in Iraq with training, cash, and high-tech explosives to use against US forces. Of five Iranian "diplomats" detained by US forces last month in Arbil, the officials allege, one is head of Al Qods operations in Iraq.

In Germany, Mr. Larijani said the nuclear issue could be solved with "constructive dialogue," adding that Iran's program – which Tehran claims is limited to creating nuclear power, not weapons – is "no threat to Israel. We have no intention of aggression against any country."

The Iranian nuclear messages come just days before a Feb. 21 deadline set by the UN Security Council for Iran to stop uranium enrichment, or face broader sanctions than the limited restriction imposed by a unanimous resolution in late December. Ahmadinejad has in the past rejected the sanctions resolution as a "torn paper," and Sunday ruled out any suspension. Rallygoers echoed the president, chanting that nuclear power is Iran's "right."

Iran has vowed to complete building a cascade of 3,000 centrifuges by the end of this year, and to begin "industrial scale" enrichment of uranium to fuel power plants, which could also – at least in theory – produce enough material for a one weapon within a year.

But problems have beset the work of two 164-centrifuge pilot cascades already operating; 50 centrifuges "blew up" last spring, Iranian officials say. Rumors circulated this week in Tehran that the president would announce that Iran was installing the first 1,000 centrifuges at the underground site of Natanz, to defy UN demands.

"Image is outpacing reality when it comes to [Iranian] technology. The schedule is politically driven," says Michael Levi, a nuclear physicist and nonproliferation expert at the Council on Foreign Relations in New York.

"If Iran's near-term goal is to establish political facts on the ground, then the success of the technology is only of marginal importance," says Mr. Levi, who visited Iran last spring, a week after Ahmadinejad declared Iran a member of the nuclear club, after it produced a few grams of low-enriched uranium.

"People are too quick to infer that, because Iran is scaling up [enrichment] operations, that it has mastered lower-level operations," says Levi. "If this were a science fair project, that might make sense. But this is, number one, about shaping the international political environment."

Defiant tone, compliant actions

Senior Iranian officials had said to expect a major announcement of progress Sunday. But while Ahmadinejad made typically defiant tones, he also made it clear that Iran intended to follow safeguard rules as a signatory of the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

Inspectors of the UN International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) in the past week set up monitoring cameras in the Natanz enrichment facility, and canceled 18 cooperation programs with Iran on Friday that could have had dual civilian- military use, in accordance with the Security Council resolution.

"The problems [Iranians] are having don't seem to be showstoppers. Their centrifuges crash more than they did when the Dutch built similar machines ... [but] they are further along," says David Albright, a physicist and former IAEA inspector in Iraq, who has long followed the Iran case as president of the Institute for Science and International Security.

"Our 'worst case' assessment that they could have a bomb in 2009 hasn't changed," says Mr. Albright, noting that Iran would first have to make a definitive decision to go for a weapon – a step that Albright and other analysts believe that Iran has not yet made – and that "things would have to go well for them," which so far they have not.

"At some point, Iran has got to play its hand on how much it knows, if it is going to install these 3,000 machines this year," says Albright. "It's got to start hooking them together in cascades, and then turn them on and see if they work. I think we are going to learn a lot more in the next month or two about their capabilities."

When Iran first announced last spring that it had enriched uranium to 4.8 percent – high enough for nuclear fuel, but far short of the more than 80 or 90 percent necessary to make weapons-grade material – it declared plans to build its 3,000-centrifuge cascade by the end of 2006.

But technical difficulties and a fluid political dynamic inside Iran that has been partly influenced by surprise at the unanimous Security Council resolution against the Islamic Republic, are affecting Iran's nuclear timeline.

DOJ_NMG_0130322

"The biggest impact on [Iran] is fear of what could happen in the future, and more pressure on countries not to invest in Iran. It's embarrassing; they are a very proud nation, and don't like being called a pariah by the Security Council," says Albright. "But is that going to slow down their nuclear program? I don't think so."

Rising tension with the West has been defined by Ahmadinejad's uncompromising language on the nuclear issue, and by denying the Holocaust and calling for the destruction of Israel.

The White House has also ratcheted up its rhetoric in recent weeks, accusing Iran of supplying anti-US militias and insurgents in Iraq with weapons. It has also taken concrete military steps – such as sending a second aircraft carrier battle group to the Persian Gulf, mine sweepers to key oil export routes, and Patriot anti-missile batteries to regional allies.

US officials are preparing a new Security Council resolution that would broaden economic sanctions if Iran fails to meet the Feb. 21 deadline. One addition could be holding Iran in violation of prohibitions of harboring terrorists, The Washington Post reports, because of several key Al Qaeda members officially held under "house arrest" in Iran since late 2001.

But there are growing signals in Iran, too, that pragmatic conservatives – and even Iran's supreme religious leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, who refused a meeting requested by Ahmadinejad two weeks ago – have been trying to rein in the president on foreign policy issues.

Ahmedinejad may be more isolated

Ahmadinejad has been further weakened by the failure of his allies in December municipal and Experts Assembly elections. Conservative newspapers have criticized him for bringing Iran closer to war, and more than 100 parliament deputies last week took him to task for foreign policy adventures.

"A lot of [Iranians] think the new sanctions on Iran and the new rising tension between Iran and the US is mainly because of Mr. Ahmadinejad's statements about the Holocaust and so on," says Saeed Laylaz, a political analyst in Tehran. "Everyone thinks the situation is more sensitive than before, and that they should be careful about their statements.... You can see that [Ahmadinejad] these days is more silent."

But a modest muting of such rhetoric does not mean that Iran's nuclear program has lost its popularity, or its utility to Iran's theocratic regime. A placard bearing Ayatollah Khamenei's image at the rally Sunday read: "Achieving indigenous nuclear science is an epochmaking and civilization-building move."

"If the US does not want to give the [Islamic] system security guarantees [that it won't attack Iran], they have no other choice in Tehran but to be as strong as possible," says Mr. Laylaz. "They are going to protect themselves by providing this [nuclear] shield."

Scary Movie 2 (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

Attacking Iran would be a catastrophic mistake, even if all the allegations now being made about Iranian actions in Iraq are true.

But it wouldn't be the first catastrophic mistake this administration has made, and there are indications that, at the very least, a powerful faction in the administration is spoiling for a fight.

Before we get to the apparent war-mongering, let's talk about the basics. Are there people in Iran providing aid to factions in Iraq, factions that sometimes kill Americans as well as other Iraqis? Yes, probably. But you can say the same about Saudi Arabia, which is believed to be a major source of financial support for Sunni insurgents — and Sunnis, not Iranian-backed Shiites, are still responsible for most American combat deaths.

The Bush administration, however, with its close personal and financial ties to the Saudis, has always downplayed Saudi connections to America's enemies. Iran, on the other hand, which had no connection to 9/11, and was actually quite helpful to the United States in the months after the terrorist attack, somehow found itself linked with its bitter enemy Saddam Hussein as part of the "axis of evil."

So the administration has always had it in for the Iranian regime. Now, let's do an O. J. Simpson: if you were determined to start a war with Iran, how would you do it?

First, you'd set up a special intelligence unit to cook up rationales for war. A good model would be the Pentagon's now-infamous Office of Special Plans, led by Abram Shulsky, that helped sell the Iraq war with false claims about links to Al Qaeda.

Sure enough, last year Donald Rumsfeld set up a new "Iranian directorate" inside the Pentagon's policy shop. And last September Warren Strobel and John Walcott of McClatchy Newspapers — who were among the few journalists to warn that the administration was hyping evidence on Iraqi W.M.D. — reported that "current and former officials said the Pentagon's Iranian directorate has been headed by Abram Shulsky."

DOJ_NMG_0130323

Next, you'd go for a repeat of the highly successful strategy by which scare stories about the Iraqi threat were disseminated to the public.

This time, however, the assertions wouldn't be about W.M.D.; they'd be that Iranian actions are endangering U.S. forces in Iraq. Why? Because there's no way Congress will approve another war resolution. But if you can claim that Iran is doing evil in Iraq, you can assert that you don't need authorization to attack — that Congress has already empowered the administration to do whatever is necessary to stabilize Iraq. And by the time the lawyers are finished arguing — well, the war would be in full swing.

Finally, you'd build up forces in the area, both to prepare for the strike and, if necessary, to provoke a casus belli. There's precedent for the idea of provocation: in a January 2003 meeting with Prime Minster Tony Blair, The New York Times reported last year, President Bush "talked about several ways to provoke a confrontation, including a proposal to paint a United States surveillance plane in the colors of the United Nations in hopes of drawing fire."

In the end, Mr. Bush decided that he didn't need a confrontation to start that particular war. But war with Iran is a harder sell, so sending several aircraft carrier groups into the narrow waters of the Persian Gulf, where a Gulf of Tonkin-type incident could all too easily happen, might be just the thing.

O.K., I hope I'm worrying too much. Those carrier groups could be going to the Persian Gulf just as a warning.

But you have to wonder about the other stuff. Why would the Pentagon put someone who got everything wrong on Iraq in charge of intelligence on Iran? Why wasn't any official willing to take personal responsibility for the reliability of alleged evidence of Iranian mischief, as opposed to being an anonymous source? If the evidence is solid enough to bear close scrutiny, why were all cameras and recording devices, including cellphones, banned from yesterday's Baghdad briefing?

It's still hard to believe that they're really planning to attack Iran, when it's so obvious that another war would be a recipe for even bigger disaster. But remember who's calling the shots: Dick Cheney thinks we've had "enormous successes" in Iraq.

U.S. Troops Enter Eastern Baghdad As New Push Begins (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr. And Damien Cave

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 11 — American troops locked down a large industrial area of eastern Baghdad on Sunday while Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, without indicating how he would do it, vowed to speed the deployment of Iraqi forces throughout the war-ravaged capital.

American commanders described the operation in the area, the Rusafa district, as an early taste of the large-scale sweeps expected in eastern Baghdad to take back some measure of control from militias. Soldiers from the Third Stryker Brigade Combat Team, from Ft. Lewis, Wash., were fired on by insurgents with automatic rifles. The soldiers detained 10 Iraqis while searching for a car-bomb manufacturing site in the area, a violent sectarian fault line between a Shiite enclave and the insurgent-ridden Sunni neighborhood of Fadhil.

The operations in eastern Baghdad are to be a centerpiece of the so-called surge of 21,000 troops that many here view as a last-ditch effort to save the country from all-out civil war. Eastern Baghdad "is a focal point for us right now," said Brig. Gen. John Campbell, deputy commander of coalition troops in Baghdad. American-led forces say they have conducted 3,400 patrols and detained 140 suspects in the past week.

Mr. Maliki, who is under immense pressure from his Shiite backers who say their neighborhoods are becoming increasingly vulnerable to attacks by Sunni insurgents, said Sunday that he had ordered an accelerated deployment of Iraqi soldiers and policemen to areas considered sanctuaries for insurgents and militias. "It will not start in just one area, but in all areas at the same time," he said.

But it remains unclear just how fast that deployment will take place, because only a portion of the Iraqi forces called for under the new Baghdad security plan are in position. And if the Iraqis who accompanied American soldiers during the 14-hour mission on Sunday were an accurate barometer, most are skeptical that the latest plan will make much difference. Similar operations in the past have largely failed.

"With all these security plans before this one, nothing has happened," said an Iraqi lawyer who spoke to a few soldiers near the Bab al-Sheik police station after he finished dealing with one of his cases.

The American brigade commander, Col. Steve Townsend, whose unit is part of the Second Infantry Division, said later that he believed most Iraqis would welcome more American troops. "I don't think the security plan is a hard sell," he said. "I just think that at this point they are a bit jaded."

After his soldiers stopped in a Shiite neighborhood close to Fadhil, one middle-aged Iraqi man told them, "The government is tired, and we are tired too." He explained that people were reluctant to identify insurgents because "then they go and kill them after that."

DOJ_NMG_0130324

As he spoke, the crackle of automatic gunfire erupted to the southwest, and Americans and nearby Iraqis dove behind vehicles. Taking cover behind his 19-ton Stryker armored vehicle, Colonel Townsend looked through the sight of his rifle and drew a bead on several suspicious men.

"See the radio antenna?" he asked one of his soldiers, as they both looked through sights. "Two fingers from that. A cluster of heads." But they did not return fire, because it was not clear who fired the shots.

Nearby, the Iraqis seemed unruffled. "They always fire from over there," one of the onlookers said. "Over there" was in the direction of Fadhil. Residents in the largely Shiite districts around Fadhil described that densely packed Sunni neighborhood as a place most would never go to.

"They drive their cars out from there, kidnap their victims, and return back to Fadhil," said Brig. Gen. Latif Muhammed, a police commander who oversees areas near Fadhil.

Residents in and around Fadhil said they hoped the presence of American soldiers would quiet the fighting that has trapped some in their homes for weeks. They said their streets and alleys have become a frontline battleground for Shiite fighters from neighborhoods to the northeast, near Sadr City, and Sunni gunmen who have sought to protect their turf from the Mahdi Army, the militia based in Sadr city that is loyal to Moktada al-Sadr.

Shiites in Sadriya, one neighborhood bordering Fadhil, have said Sunnis from Fadhil have been after Shiites for months — as shown, they said, by the truck bomb that killed at least 135 people last week.

In Fadhil, however, three Sunni residents said the fighting started about five months ago, when the Sadr organization sought to open a mosque and office in the area and local leaders refused. "It's like we have marks on our foreheads," said a widow in her 40s who would only give her name as Um Haider. "They know we're from Fadhil and they shoot at us."

She also said Shiite officials had refused to let her collect her husband's pension, and that the man who once provided food ration cards had been killed. Residents, she said, shoot at the Iraqi Army and the police because they believe they are allies of the Mahdi Army. "If the Americans are here, the Mahdi Army will be afraid to attack," she said.

But Uday Ahmed, 31, a Sunni whose family lost three restaurants in the bombing at the Sadriya marketplace, was less sanguine. "This is maybe the 10th time that the Americans have raided in Fadhil and nothing has changed," he said. "I don't think that it will work this time either."

Violence continued elsewhere on Sunday. In Adwar, southeast of Tikrit, a suicide truck bomber slammed into a police station in the morning, killing at least nine policemen and prisoners, and wounding at least 10 others.

The United States military also announced the deaths of two soldiers. One died after being shot Saturday during combat operations in Diyala Province; another was killed in an attack on Sunday when he was on patrol in western Baghdad.

In Ramadi, a fuel tanker exploded at a police checkpoint, killing at least three people and wounding at least eight. Minutes later a suicide bomber tried to enter the area but was stopped by the police. He detonated the bomb and killed himself and one policeman.

Baghdad was relatively quiet on Sunday. A car bomb in Mansour killed one person and wounded three, an Interior Ministry official said. The authorities also found 27 bodies throughout the city, many showing signs of torture.

Bombing At Tikrit Police Station Kills 9 (WP)

By Ernesto Londoã±o And Saad Al-izzi

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 11 -- Nine police officers were killed Sunday near Tikrit when a suicide bomber drove up to a police station and detonated explosives hidden under hay on the bed of a truck, the U.S. military and Iraqi officials said.

The blast, which took place at 9:15 a.m. in front of the Dawr police station, wounded several children at a school across the street and damaged several houses, Iraqi officials said.

"I was inside the police station and . . . there was a loud explosion that I could not describe, for I have not heard anything like that before in my life," said an officer, Ahmed Subhi, 23. "I was holding a tray with teacups, and the last thing I remember was that I was being pushed along with the tray toward one of the walls in the room and parts of the ceiling falling on me."

Dawr, in a heavily Sunni Muslim area in north-central Iraq, is near the site where U.S. officials found deposed Iraqi president Saddam Hussein hiding in December 2003.

Meanwhile, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said Sunday that the Baghdad security plan, which officials have described as a gradual, concentrated effort to step up patrols in the capital, will speed up this week.

"It will not start in one area in particular but in all areas at the same time, and those who will participate in conducting it are from all the spectrums of Iraq, from which the police and army troops are made up," he said.

The country's police and army are predominantly Shiite.

DOJ_NMG_0130325

Maliki said troops will simultaneously seal off 10 areas of the capital to crack down on insurgent and militia groups and protect homes abandoned by Iraqis who have fled the violence.

Also Sunday, the U.S. military announced that a Multi-National Division soldier was killed Sunday in western Baghdad. The soldier was shot when his unit was "conducting a cordon and search operation," the military said in a statement. A second soldier was wounded by small-arms fire.

Maj. Gen. James E. Simmons, deputy U.S. commander in Iraq, told reporters in Baghdad that U.S. helicopters in Iraq have come under attack 100 times per month on average since 2004.

Simmons said helicopter travel in Iraq has increased considerably in recent years as roads have become more dangerous. He said U.S. Army helicopters were expected to log 400,000 hours of flight time this year; in 2005 they logged 240,000 hours.

Simmons said that most U.S. helicopters shot down recently in Iraq crashed in predominantly Sunni areas but that there was no evidence insurgents were using sophisticated weapons to bring them down.

"There is no indication that we have seen that the enemy is employing any form of advanced ground-to-air missile," he said.

A U.S. military spokesman said Sunday night that a report from Iraqi police in Tikrit indicating that an AH-64 Apache helicopter had been shot down earlier in the day was unfounded.

Insurgents Stepping Up Efforts To Down U.S. Helicopters In Iraq (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 11 — A deputy commanding general in Iraq whose duties include aviation said Sunday that insurgents had adopted new tactics and stepped up their efforts to shoot down American helicopters, and he acknowledged that the rash of recent incidents included a previously unreported downing of a Black Hawk late last month.

The unreported incident took place on Jan. 25 near the Euphrates River town of Hit when a Black Hawk was struck by automatic weapons fire from the ground, said Maj. Gen. Jim Simmons, a deputy commanding general for the American-led Multi-National Force in Iraq. All aboard were evacuated and there were no casualties, General Simmons said.

Depending on the outcome of an investigation into the crash last Wednesday of a Marine CH-46 Sea Knight helicopter, the latest report brings the number of American military and civilian helicopters shot down in Iraq in the past 21 days to either six or seven. General Simmons said preliminary findings suggested that the Sea Knight went down because of mechanical problems, but some witness reports indicated that the helicopter was shot down. All seven people aboard died.

“I will tell you that someone who is involved in a fight, who is adaptive and thinking, will develop the tactics to be able to engage people,” General Simmons said, speaking of the insurgents. “I believe that is what we have seen here.”

General Simmons said he also believed that the insurgents might be especially motivated to shoot down helicopters as a way of discrediting the new American and Iraqi security plan.

The United States military effort in Iraq depends heavily on moving cargo, weaponry and troops by helicopter, and any disruption of the flights would undoubtedly have a major impact.

The general acknowledged for the first time that the American military had altered its flight patterns and schedules as a result of the downings, but he added: “We have not canceled one mission, and there has been absolutely no reduction in rotary wing aircraft flight. Nor will there be.”

He said that helicopter transport had become ever more critical over the past few years as ground convoys have become increasingly dangerous. In 2005, Army helicopters logged 240,000 hours, and in 2006 the figure was 334,000 hours, General Simmons said. The projected number in 2007 is 400,000 hours, he said.

“In many cases it’s more efficient, it’s more effective to move people and supplies by air than it is by ground,” the general said. He added that it had also generally been safer.

Battles between insurgents on the ground and American helicopters in the air have by no means been rare at any time during the conflict. General Simmons said that since December 2004 the helicopters have been engaged by hostile forces about 100 times a month, mostly by small arms and automatic weapons, but occasionally by shoulder-fired missiles. On average, 17 helicopters have been hit each month.

As a result of those engagements, 29 Army helicopters have been shot down in the entire conflict, he said. He did not immediately have the total including Marine and other helicopters, but an unofficial tally by the Brookings Institution indicates that since the beginning of the conflict, 57 American military helicopters have either crashed or been shot down.

Among the most troublesome recent tactics by insurgents is firing on helicopters with heavy machine guns from more than one direction at once, General Simmons said. He said that had been the case in the Jan. 20 downing of a Black Hawk in which 12 service members died.

DOJ_NMG_0130326

The general, an Army aviator who has been commander of an Apache attack helicopter brigade, used nicknames to refer to many of the military aircraft that had been shot down. Beginning with the Black Hawk shot down on Jan. 20, they were EZ 40, Tarantula 26, Big Gun 72 and Crazy Horse 08. He did not use a nickname for the Marine helicopter that went down last week.

What Is Plan C? (USNEWS)

By Kevin Whitelaw And Anna Mulrine

U.S. News and World Report, February 12, 2007

Amid the congressional grandstanding last week over U.S. policy in Iraq, House Minority Leader John Boehner tried to channel President Bush and cast the choice as a simple one. "If you're not for victory in Iraq," the Ohio Republican said, "you're for failure."

If only it were that simple.

What kind of "victory," realistically, is achievable at this point? Certainly not a model democracy. Probably not even a particularly stable government, but perhaps one that would present some semblance of central authority and deny al Qaeda a new home for its training camps. What would failure be? These days, most Americans would probably settle for anything less than an all-out civil or regional war-as long as it brings the troops home. More voices are arguing that maybe the goal should simply be getting U.S. troops out of Iraq, whatever the consequences.

For now, Democrats and Republicans in Congress are tying themselves in knots trying to respond to the new strategy President Bush laid out last month for Iraq-his Plan B. The president's critics have focused on his call for a so-called surge of 21,500 U.S. troops, but Plan B is a broader shift that makes American soldiers responsible (for the first time) for keeping the Iraqi people safe. The new security plan is still taking shape, with additional U.S. troops moving into Baghdad. But the past two weeks have been demoralizing, with a handful of U.S. helicopters shot down and Baghdad convulsed by its own surge of suicide bombings and sectarian killings.

Even U.S. officials admit privately that Plan B is a long shot, alarmingly dependent on the performance of an Iraqi government that has yet to demonstrate much by way of resolve. Anthony Cordesman, a military expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, puts the odds of success at "probably less than 1 in 4." U.S. intelligence agencies are downright skeptical. The newly issued National Intelligence Estimate says that both Iraqi leaders and security forces will be "hard pressed" to move forward in the next 18 months.

Defense Secretary Robert Gates told a Senate panel last week that he is "planning for success" but conceded that he has ordered Pentagon officials to look at fallbacks. "I would be irresponsible," he said, "if I weren't thinking about what the alternatives might be." In public, U.S. officials are loath to discuss a possible "Plan C," but any significant shift would require months of preparation.

Unfortunately, the options for Plan C range from ugly to abhorrent-underscoring exactly how much is riding on Bush's Plan B. A look at five of the most-discussed options for Plan C, and their shortcomings:

1. WITHDRAWAL

Announce a date for the withdrawal of U.S. troops; accelerate training of Iraqi security forces; intensify diplomatic efforts to keep Iraq's neighbors from intervening

With violence spiraling and the Iraqi government so far unable to reverse the trend, a new report by the Council on Foreign Relations suggests that the situation may simply be irretrievable and U.S. forces will have to pull out from an unstable Iraq sooner or later. "It is now just a matter of time," the report concludes. "Better to withdraw as a coherent ... act than withdraw later in a hectic response to public opposition ... or a series of unexpectedly sharp reverses on the ground in Iraq."

Target: U.S. Choppers (NSWK)

By Mark Hosenball And Dan Ephron

Newsweek, February 12, 2007

Six U.S. choppers (including two belonging to a private security company) have crashed in Iraq since Jan. 20, killing a total of 27. Investigators have concluded four were shot down and are still sifting through the debris of the fifth crash site. (The sixth crash had no fatalities.) The Pentagon says publicly it's too early to determine whether the surge points to new tactics by insurgents. But a U.S. counterterrorism official said it looks as if some Iraqi fighters have been getting special training lately on how to down helicopters. The official, who asked for anonymity because of the sensitive subject matter, indicated that intel analysts were divided over the question of Iranian involvement in the training and that evidence so far was not conclusive. He said low-flying helicopters are being brought down by what amounts to small-arms fire—insurgents aiming machine guns or even rifles at the chopper's vulnerable spots. Some intel analysts believe insurgents have acquired armor-piercing ammunition that can be especially effective against helicopters, according to the official.

Part of the problem is that helicopters are vulnerable at almost any altitude. "Any time you're low, you are exposing yourself to some small arms. Any time you're high, you are exposing yourself to the SAMs [surface-to-air missiles]," said Col. Robert Quackenbush, a veteran Army officer who has flown both Apaches and Black Hawks. Quackenbush said pilots chart different flight patterns every day depending upon intel about insurgents on the ground. He said U.S. investigators in Iraq were sending back debris from the crash sites to U.S. labs, where it will be analyzed to determine what weapons were used and where they originated.

Army aviation official Lee Tutin said the Pentagon is developing lightweight armor panels that would protect a helicopter's exterior from machine-gun fire. But, he said, the extra weight would mean choppers could carry fewer passengers or less ammunition. The fear of crashes aside, many soldiers still prefer flying to travel by roads, where IEDs (improvised explosive devices) account for nearly 40 percent of American fatalities. Cutting back on chopper use would be a serious blow to U.S. mobility in Iraq. But if insurgents continue to improve their aim, the counterterrorism official said, the military would need to find safer ways to move soldiers.

The Incredible Shrinking Deficit (USNEWS)

By James Pethokoukis

U.S. News and World Report, February 12, 2007

It might be a bit cynical, not to mention premature, to call President Bush's new $2.9 trillion budget "dead on arrival." But the myriad proposals on everything from the Pentagon to the National Park Service are certainly going to be massaged a bit-mutilated in some cases, probably-by the new Democratic-controlled Congress. One thing you can bank on, though, is that when all is said and done, nixed and negotiated, Uncle Sam will still be in the red.

As the White House figures it, the federal government will be spending $244 billion more than it collects in 2007 (or about 1.8 percent of gross domestic product) and $239 billion in 2008 (or 1.6 percent of GDP). Still, those are hardly scary numbers for a $13.5 trillion economy. "The magnitude of the current deficit is nothing to be concerned about," says Jared Bernstein, an economist at the liberal Economic Policy Institute.

What would the numbers be if the country were not fighting wars in both Afghanistan and Iraq? Bush's budget includes a request for $93 billion in supplemental war funding for 2007 as well as a $142 billion request for 2008, the first time the White House has explicitly budgeted for the two wars. And what's the running tally on America's 21st-century military expeditions? So far $427 billion has been appropriated for "operations in the Global War on Terror." Tack on the funds requested in the new budget, and the total is $662 billion. War doves and budget hawks will recall that when former White House economic adviser Lawrence Lindsey estimated the cost of the war in Iraq to be between $100 billion and $200 billion, then Deputy Secretary of Defense Paul Wolfowitz scoffed, "We are dealing with a country that can really finance its own reconstruction, and relatively soon."

Doubters. Like many forecasts coming out of Washington, that one didn't pan out. And many budget experts doubt the White House's new economic forecast will either. Speaking at chipmaker Micron Technology's Manassas, Va., manufacturing plant last week, Bush said he appreciated "very much the fact that companies like Micron actually have a budget. It's a concept that the government needs to get used to, too. ...I submitted a budget yesterday that says we can balance the budget by 2012 without raising your taxes."

Indeed, the Bush budget does promise such things. According to the proposal, the U.S. government would run a $61 billion surplus in 2012, though the projected deficits in 2010 ($94.4 billion) and 2011 ($53.8 billion) would be so small relative to the size of a projected $18 trillion economy-0.6 percent and 0.3 percent of gross domestic product-as to be financially insignificant. (And yes, bean counters of America, these numbers do assume that Social Security surpluses are commingled with the rest of tax revenues.)

The nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office also shows the budget moving into balance by 2012, but there is a key difference from the Bush budget: The CBO assumes the 2001 and 2003 Bush tax cuts will expire, thereby bringing in a load of new tax revenue. Bush assumes the tax cuts stay in place.

Wanted: A Few Good Iraqis. Or Jordanians. Or . . . Anybody? (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

The Pentagon and the State Department have been squabbling quite publicly over State's request to have the already-stretched military fill about 40 percent of the 300 new State jobs in Iraq created by the administration's latest rebuilding plan.

DOJ_NMG_0130328

Seems the military isn't the only one balking at working there. The U.S. Embassy in Baghdad is finding it increasingly difficult to get local Iraqis to work there because of what one senior official at the embassy called the "precarious security situation" in the country.

Last year, 35 local employees resigned, "nearly all due to security issues," the official said. The State Department is authorized to hire 136 local people for jobs in the embassy, but right now only 47 are filled by Iraqis. Thirteen more are filled by Jordanians brought over in a program specifically set up to fill the chronic gap.

Even with the Jordanians, the "ever-growing" shortage of local Iraqis "seriously impacts on our ability to carry out the normal, day-to-day operations of the embassy," the official said. They can't find Iraqis to fill the solid-paying jobs even in a country where the unemployment rate is estimated to be 25 to 40 percent.

Two years ago, the department sent out pleas for volunteers to go to Iraq, but the responses were mostly from folks who could fill only low-level jobs. There are now a number of important mid-level jobs the embassy needs to fill with people from the region.

So the plan now is to provide additional benefits -- housing and meals, more vacation, more health benefits and other inducements -- to entice local people hired at embassies in the region and even elsewhere in the world who might be willing to work in Iraq on six-month rotations. There is talk of figuring out ways to hire retired embassy employees from the region to come back in and work in Baghdad as contractors.

The long-term hope is to hire Iraqis for these jobs, but given the chaos and insecurity in Baghdad these days, nobody's counting on that option.Love in the Time of Bioterrorism

All set to mail that beautiful Valentine's Day bouquet to your favorite lawmakers to thank them for favoring your clients? Sending truffles to your main squeeze on the Hill?

You've waited too long! Even if you run out right now to mail your gifts, even if you overnight them, Senate and House officials warn, your little something sweet is not likely to get there by Wednesday.

That's because the security screening process adds two, maybe even three, days to the usual delivery times. "In anticipation of Valentine's Day," House Chief Administrative Officer Jay Eagen and Sergeant at Arms Wilson Livingood caution in a Feb. 1 letter to members and staff, "be advised that overnight deliveries via a nationwide system (FedEx, UPS, DHL, etc.) will be processed by the off-site Postal Operations screening facility."

And that adds a good extra couple of days, they say, because packages "must be held in quarantine until the test results deem the packages safe." That means your flowers, candy and such -- as well as cards and other gifts -- will sit around, wilting and melting, at the postal facility -- though the "staff will make every attempt to secure the perishable items" in refrigerated quarantine, the letter says.

Senate Sergeant at Arms Terrance W. Gainer suggests that staff "advise family and friends to refrain from directing" flowers and gifts to the Hill, warning of a 72-hour wait.

Both the Senate and the House bar couriers and vendors from making deliveries directly to the Capitol or its office buildings. If a flower-delivery person calls, "please instruct the delivery person to meet you in an outside public area," the House advisory says. "You must meet the delivery person, inspect the flowers and bring the flowers" into the buildings yourself. (Don't forget to give a nice tip.) "Only cut flowers set in water or arranged in an unsealed box or carton may be brought" in, we're advised, and only by staff members "bearing valid identification badges."

So does this mean you might end up forced to dine alone on Wednesday?

Well, you can always try this excuse for the post-anthrax age: "Forget? Moi? No way. Those danged safety screening devices nuked the two dozen long-stemmed." Of course, they better show up on Thursday.Clinton's Defender to Serve Bush

Williams & Connolly partner Emmet T. Flood, last seen in the news pages helping fellow partner David Kendall help President Bill Clinton fend off impeachment, is said to be moving over to the newly expanding White House counsel's office as senior counsel to President Bush.

Despite that minor Democratic lapse back in 1998, Flood, who has a doctorate in philosophy, boasts stellar conservative legal credentials. He clerked for the legendary federal appeals judge Ralph K. Winter and then for Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia.

Thousands Of Army Humvees Lack Armor Upgrade (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

The Army is working to fill a shortfall in Iraq of thousands of advanced Humvee armor kits designed to reduce U.S. troop deaths from roadside bombs -- including a rising threat from particularly lethal weapons linked to Iran and known as "explosively formed penetrators" (EFP) -- that are now inflicting 70 percent of the American casualties in the country, according to U.S. military and civilian officials.

DOJ_NMG_0130329

The additional protection is needed for thousands of U.S. reinforcement troops flowing into Baghdad, where these devastating weapons -- used primarily by Shiite fighters -- are particularly prevalent, the officials said.

U.S. Army units in Iraq and Afghanistan lack more than 4,000 of the latest Humvee armor kit, known as FRAG Kit 5, according to U.S. officials. The Army has ramped up production of the armor, giving priority to troops in Baghdad, but the upgrade is not scheduled to be completed until this summer, Army officials said. That is well into the timeline for major operations launched last week to quell violence by Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias, which the U.S. military now views as the top security threat in Iraq.

"Those who need FRAG Kit 5 are receiving FRAG Kit 5 based upon theater requirements and priorities," said Army Brig. Gen. Charles Anderson, director of force development for the Army deputy chief of staff. The Army is supplying the life-saving kits "as quickly as we can," he said in an interview and in written responses. "Kits are being flown to theater."

The Army declined to disclose details on the number of kits installed and where the shortages exist.

The Army began the Iraq war with an estimated $56 billion equipment shortage and has struggled to keep up with demands for new armor to protect against increasingly deadly bombs. In the case of FRAG Kit 5, the Army quickly produced a bolt-on version in limited quantities, while the permanent version has taken longer than expected to develop, test, produce and install. Meanwhile, the unexpected deployment of five additional Army brigades into Baghdad has created an urgent need for 2,000 Humvees with the new armor.

Shiite forces in recent months have stepped up their targeting of U.S. soldiers in Baghdad with sophisticated EFPs, described by one official as like "a spear that rips right through the vehicle."

The penetrator, a heavy, metal projectile, is propelled by an explosive and strikes with enough speed and power to shatter the relatively brittle, "high hard" steel of up-armored Humvees, creating what experts call "behind armor debris (BAD)" -- essentially, turning pieces of the vehicle into shrapnel. The new armor kit is designed with more flexible materials that slow down the projectile and contain the debris, limiting the damage to that caused directly by the EFP.

However, there is no guarantee that even the latest armor -- which reinforces the doors -- can prevent deaths from EFPs, defense officials have emphasized, and U.S. troops in Humvees outfitted with the new kit have been killed by EFPs.

The Pentagon does not release overall data on EFP strikes or their effectiveness, to prevent such information from being exploited by attackers. But reports from the military and family members on specific attacks indicate that since November, at least 11 U.S. soldiers and an interpreter have died in EFP strikes, all but one of them in Baghdad.

"In November, there was all of a sudden a ridiculous surge in EFP activity. People were getting killed left and right," said one military officer who served recently in Iraq. While other roadside bombs often cause no casualties, EFPs "make everyone nervous," he said. "It's a catastrophic weapon."

Senior U.S military officials in Baghdad held a briefing yesterday in which they presented evidence of apparent Iranian involvement in supplying EFP technology and components to fighters in Iraq.

The total number of roadside bombs laid in Iraq doubled in the past year, Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, testified before Congress last week.

"You add that, then, to the new explosively formed projectiles, which are a much more deadly form that are coming into Iraq from Iran, and the combination has maintained the level of casualties," Pace said, despite advances in U.S. protective gear, tactics and targeting of bomb networks. Pace recently said two Iranians had been detained in raids on the networks.

EFP attacks are a small percentage of the roughly 1,200 attacks against U.S. forces each month involving roadside bombs, according to the Pentagon's Joint IED Defeat Organization. About half the roadside bombs in Iraq are found and disabled, and only 20 percent cause U.S. casualties. But EFPs "are far more lethal," Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said recently, adding, "They can take out an Abrams tank."

U.S. commanders have voiced frustration recently at the ability of enemy fighters in Iraq to change tactics to defeat U.S. protective gear. "Equipment that was, we thought, pretty effective in protecting our troops just a matter of months ago is now being in fact challenged by some of the techniques and devices over there," Adm. William J. Fallon, the new U.S. commander for the Middle East, said last month.

Fewer than half the Army's roughly 14,500 up-armored Humvees in Iraq and Afghanistan have been outfitted with the bolt-on version of FRAG Kit 5. Thousands of the permanent kits have been flown to Iraq and are being installed at 11 locations around the country, officials said. Over the next six months, the Army plans to produce 5,000 more Humvees with the permanent kits already installed, Anderson said.

DOJ_NMG_0130330

Overall, Army equipment backlogs had grown so severe, Anderson said, such a troop increase would not have been possible last year. He said the Army is in a far better position now, thanks to an infusion of $17 billion last year to replace and repair equipment.

Still, Pace said last week that U.S. troops will face a gap of up-armored Humvees and other armored vehicles that will not be closed until July, and according to the Pentagon, commanders will be required to share 500 up-armored vehicles. But the Army said it is not short of up-armored Humvees in Iraq.

DOJ:

Politics Shouldn't Matter (TOLB)

Toledo Blade (OH), February 12, 2007

BY MOST accounts, the Bush Administration has gone further in infusing the federal government with partisanship than any administration in modern history. That is why Congress should enact legislation to ensure that the White House doesn't undertake unnecessary political mischief in the appointment of federal prosecutors.

Assistant U.S. attorneys, the 5,200 men and women who prosecute federal crimes, traditionally have been commissioned by the president and confirmed by the Senate. Typically, a new president replaces the entire crew with supporters.

But last year, Sen. Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, quietly inserted into reauthorization of the Patriot Act a provision to allow appointment of such prosecutors on an interim but indefinite basis - without Senate consent.

The action came to light at Christmas time as seven assistant U.S. attorneys were summarily fired by the Justice Department. One, who had been in the post in Little Rock, Ark., for five years, was replaced by a former aide to Karl Rove, President Bush's political hatchet man.

Any government maneuver involving Mr. Rove is immediately suspect, to be sure, and the episode raised suspicions that skulduggery was afoot. Favoritism and political influence are this administration's basic tools. Remember "Brownie" at FEMA?

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, empowered to make the interim appointments, is vague about the need for the new law. He told the Washington Post that political appointees are subject to removal for any - or no - cause, and he added obliquely that the administration might be inclined to replace personnel to get "better results."

Maybe so, but more likely the new law is a thin disguise for some sort of shenanigan. According to the Post, the prosecutor sacked in Little Rock was told his removal was no reflection on his work, that officials in Washington just wanted to give his job to the other guy.

Indeed, it's been suggested that one of the attorneys let go, Carol S. Lam, of San Diego, was removed because she did too good a job with the bribery investigation of U.S. Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, a California Republican who was forced from office and is now in prison.

The injection of partisanship in public employment is never healthy, but the job of an assistant U.S. attorney should be, at least nominally, above politics. Subjecting criminal prosecutors to claims of outside or undue influence only weakens trust in the criminal justice system, and shifting personnel could cause harmful and unnecessary delays in cases.

In that vein, we hate to think what might have become of the Coingate case if the Republican federal prosecutor involved, Greg White, of Cleveland, had been sidetracked by politics two years ago. Instead, Mr. White ably prosecuted GOP insider Tom Noe for making illegal campaign contributions to President Bush, and his office aided in the successful state theft case that sent Noe to prison.

Who is prosecuted and for what crimes should not be a matter of partisan whim, or even appear to be. Congress should act now to take back its oversight role on assistant U.S. attorneys from a power-hungry president.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

McAfee Ex-Counsel Likely To Face Options Charges (WSJ)

By James Bandler And Mark Maremont

The Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

Federal prosecutors are readying criminal charges related to alleged backdating of stock options against a former general counsel of McAfee Inc., Kent Roberts, according to people familiar with the matter.

The charges are likely to be filed in the next few days, a person familiar with the situation said, but the person added that the actions could be delayed for at least a week. If charged, Mr. Roberts would become the sixth person charged with criminal offenses in the widening federal probe into stock-options backdating, which is examining conduct at about 140 companies. The pace of investigations appears to be quickening, and more criminal and civil charges are expected in coming weeks.

DOJ_NMG_0130331

Mr. Roberts was fired by McAfee in May 2006. At the time, the company said it took the action after it "became aware of one episode involving the General Counsel in 2000 that was improper." The company hasn't explained further. Mr. Roberts received options dated April 14, 2000, to buy 20,000 shares at $19.75, a deep low in the company's stock price, according to a Securities and Exchange Commission filing. Shares rose to more than $25 that month.

Mr. Roberts described to company lawyers his role in the backdating when the issue surfaced in the spring, according to people familiar with the matter. He couldn't be reached to comment and his lawyer declined to comment. Mr. Roberts joined McAfee in May 1998 from private practice in Dallas. He became general counsel in early 2001.

McAfee, a Santa Clara, Calif., maker of virus-protection software for computers, has been wracked by turmoil surrounding its past options-granting practices. In October, the company announced the retirement of Chairman and Chief Executive George Samenuk, and the firing of Kevin Weiss, its president, as a result of an internal probe into past options-granting practices. The company has said some of its option grants were misdated, and has said it will need to take charges to account for understated compensation costs related to improperly-granted options.

Conduct at McAfee is being investigated by prosecutors at the office of the U.S. attorney for the Northern District of California, in San Francisco, who are handling several high-profile criminal probes into backdating. It isn't clear if Mr. Roberts will cooperate with prosecutors, who often seek the help of lower-level officials in their continuing investigation of high-ranking executives. The SEC also is probing stock-option practices at McAfee.

A stock option provides the right to buy shares of a stock in the future at a set "strike" price, generally the price at the time the option is issued. Backdating involves pretending an option was issued at an earlier time when the stock price was lower, increasing its potential value.

Restatements Still Bedevil Firms (WSJ)

By David Reilly

The Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

Publicly traded companies filed 1,876 restatements of financial results in 2006, setting a record for corrections of financial statements while showing that many still are struggling to get the accounting right for both simple and complex transactions.

In a sign that some of the corporate-governance changes enacted this decade may be taking root, the number of restatements filed by large companies fell in 2006, the first such decline since 2001, according to a study by audit research firm AuditAnalytics. Large companies -- those having more than $700 million in stock that the public is able to buy -- filed 196 restatements in 2006, a nearly 20% drop from the previous year.

By contrast, companies with a public float of less than $75 million, which don't yet have to follow rules related to checks on their internal controls, continued to have restatements climb. In 2006, U.S. companies in this category filed 1,108 restatements, a 42% jump from the previous year. This group accounted for more than two-thirds of the 1,608 restatements filed by U.S. companies. "Presumably the difference is because internal controls are working better," said Mark Cheffers, chief executive of AuditAnalytics.

Restatements of financial results are akin to a product recall and mean that investors no longer can rely on figures companies previously provided and which may have formed the basis for their decision to buy or sell stocks or bonds. Restatements, a black mark both for financial executives within a company and its outside auditors, once were fairly rare and occurred only when major problems were found.

That changed in the wake of corporate scandals such as Enron and WorldCom. Auditors who generally missed the frauds that rocked markets began doing a more-thorough job than they did during the technology boom. The Sarbanes-Oxley Act, passed in 2002, also created a regulator for accounting firms, causing them to further improve audits. Finally, Sarbanes-Oxley mandated that corporate executives attest to having internal systems designed to prevent accounting mistakes and fraud, and that auditors check these mechanisms, known as internal controls.

Combined, the changes caused restatements to soar to 1,876 in 2006 for both U.S. and foreign companies filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission, according AuditAnalytics. Restatements last year rose 17% from 2005 and compare with just 452 restatements in 2001.

Where did companies mess up the most in their accounting? Looking at all restatements filed in 2006, the measurement and recognition of debt and stock or equity instruments caused the most errors, accounting for about 27% of total restatements, according to AuditAnalytics. This seemed to be mainly a small-company problem. Among bigger companies, this area accounted for just 6% of restatements in 2006.

DOJ_NMG_0130332

Big and small companies alike were tripped up by problems related to the backdating of stock options, Mr. Cheffers said. Restatements related to compensation issues accounted for the second-highest category of restatements among all companies. Among larger companies, this issue was the biggest problem, accounting for 38% of their 2006 restatements, according to AuditAnalytics.

Two other problem areas for the big guys: accounting related to cash-flow statements and tax issues. Each area accounted for 21% of 2006 restatements for big companies.

Questions Grow About A Top CNBC Anchor (NYT)

By Landon Thomas Jr.

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

In November 2005, Citigroup gathered top clients at a lush spa resort in Napa Valley for two days of wine tasting and a chance to road test some of the hottest luxury cars on the market.

The test drivers included Todd S. Thomson, then the chief executive of Citigroup's wealth management arm, car collectors, clients of the bank and Maria Bartiromo, the CNBC anchor and celebrity guest.

Their charge: To pick the 2006 car of the year for Robb Report, the luxury magazine. Like many of the judges, Ms. Bartiromo chose the bright red Ferrari Spider, according to one attendee. So did Mr. Thomson, a car enthusiast.

"It's the ultimate package of sex and performance," he told a reporter for the magazine.

With its blend of high living, glitz and privileged access, the event provides a glimpse of the rarefied world inhabited by Ms. Bartiromo, who, in her years as CNBC's most recognizable face, has lent to the reporting of once gray business news a veneer of gloss and celebrity.

Socializing with sources is a long journalistic tradition, especially for television personalities whose renown often allows them to travel in the same elite circles as their subjects.

But for Ms. Bartiromo, who accompanied Mr. Thomson last fall on Citigroup's corporate jet to a series of client and other bank-sponsored functions in China, her ability to gain entree into the exclusive and mostly male world of chief executives and financial titans has made her a valuable commodity to CNBC.

After Mr. Thomson's abrupt departure from Citigroup, however, such ties have raised questions about her closeness to her sources, all of whom she also covers as the cable network's top anchor. CNBC has said that it paid commercial fare to Citigroup for Ms. Bartiromo's trip to China. And last week, Jeffrey R. Immelt, the chief executive of General Electric, CNBC's parent, voiced his support for Ms. Bartiromo and the cable network.

"Substantially, I don't think she did anything wrong," he said.

A CNBC spokesman said that Ms. Bartiromo flew commercial to the California event and that the network paid for her flight as it was network business.

Ms. Bartiromo declined to comment for this article. CNBC declined to comment on whether executives had any discussions with her concerning her relationship with Mr. Thomson. However, people inside of CNBC did say that she will continue to cover the company as part of her regular duties.

Whether it is providing a personalized video tribute — shot from inside the CNBC newsroom — to Stephen A. Schwarzman, the chairman of the buyout giant Blackstone Group to celebrate his 60th birthday or mingling with a source at a benefit for the New York City Ballet, Ms. Bartiromo's proximity to the people she covers has created a model of journalism that jibes perfectly with CNBC's mandate to ramp up its ratings by adding pizzazz and drama to its coverage.

Still, Mr. Thomson's departure and Ms. Bartiromo's connection to him have raised questions within the network over the possible tension between CNBC's duty to pursue big financial news stories and its loyalty to Ms. Bartiromo.

On Dec. 11, after the appointment of Robert Druskin as chief operating officer of Citigroup, Ms. Bartiromo and Charles Gasparino, a CNBC on-air editor, had a brief on-air clash when Ms. Bartiromo remarked that an earlier report by Mr. Gasparino that Sallie L. Krawcheck would leave her job as chief financial officer did not pan out.

"That is not what I said," Mr. Gasparino shot back. "I didn't say that," as he argued that Ms. Krawcheck and Mr. Thomson were no longer heirs to succeed Charles O. Prince as chief executive.

Subsequently, according to people with an understanding of how the story unfolded, Mr. Gasparino learned that, in fact, Mr. Thomson's job was in jeopardy.

He explained this to Jonathan Wald, head of news programming, that he had been told by people within Citigroup that top management had examined Mr. Thomson's conduct, specifically the occasions that Ms. Bartiromo joined him on the company jet. Mr. Wald told Mr. Gasparino to pursue the story, these people say.

When Ms. Bartiromo got wind of Mr. Gasparino's reporting, she told Mr. Wald, complaining that her name was being dragged into the matter, these people say. Mr. Wald said that reporting the story was Mr. Gasparino's job.

DOJ_NMG_0130333

Nevertheless, Mr. Gasparino never reported on Mr. Thomson's threatened job status. He was urged to proceed cautiously with the story, but some within the network say Ms. Bartiromo's role in the story prevented it from being fully reported.

Mr. Wald adamantly disagrees with that interpretation. "We were clear from the beginning about reporting the story to the fullest. We did not air it because it was not adequately sourced. It didn't meet our criteria from a journalist's standpoint, and it clearly wouldn't have met our lawyers' criteria."

On Jan 22, when Citigroup announced Mr. Thomson's resignation, Mr. Gasparino could barely contain his frustration.

"Two weeks ago I caught wind that essentially Todd Thomson was out," he said on air that morning when the news broke. Compounding this tension is the fact that no CNBC reporter or anchor has mentioned Ms. Bartiromo's link to Mr. Thomson's departure.

Typically, Ms Bartiromo's interviewing style can be probing, aggressive and, her special access notwithstanding, she can make even some of her best sources sweat a bit on camera.

In an interview with Robert L. Nardelli, the recently ousted chief executive of Home Depot, she peppered him with sharp questions relating to his conduct and governance at the company. And a question posed to President Bush about his use of Google elicited a revealing response from the president as he referred to the search engine as "the Google."

"She is not a marshmallow," said Gerard R. Roche, the chairman of the executive search firm Heidrick & Struggles, who has been interviewed by Ms. Bartiromo.

John J. Mack, the chief executive of Morgan Stanley, agreed, recalling an interview he had with her. "She put me on the spot big time," he said, adding that he did not socialize with Ms. Bartiromo.

"She is a professional," Mr. Mack said. "You can't assume that you will go on air and that it will be a cakewalk."

At the same time, the occasional gushing aside can betray an admiration for her subjects — many of whom she knows socially, either from events at the New York City Ballet, where she is a trustee, or her regular lunches at San Pietro, the favored restaurant of Wall Street titans.

"When we come back, the allure of John Mack," she once said during an interview.

In many instances, the sentiment on Wall Street seems to be mutual.

It is an appreciation that dates back to Ms. Bartiromo's early days in the mid-1990s, when she made a name for herself as the first journalist to report live from the floor of the New York Stock Exchange.

"At the height of CNBC mania, we had these C.E.O.'s and celebrities beating down our door to ring the stock exchange bell," said Robert T. Zito, a former executive vice president at the stock exchange. "The one thing they wanted to do was meet Maria."

For the daughter of a restaurant owner in Bay Ridge in Brooklyn, her rise to celebrity status — there are Web sites devoted to her, Joey Ramone wrote a song in her honor and she has recently trademarked her "Money Honey" nickname — has been meteoric.

And while much has been made of her Sophia Loren-like looks, her early career ascent was propelled by pluck, ambition and like another famous, albeit fictional, product of Bay Ridge, Tony Manero in "Saturday Night Fever," a hunger to make it big across the river in Manhattan.

She switched from C. W. Post College to New York University, and in her first media job at WMCA Radio, she impressed the radio personality Barry Farber with her willingness to do more than her share of dirty work.

On one occasion, Mr. Farber recalled, he was sent "100 pounds of frozen North Carolina pork barbecue" and before it could melt, Ms. Bartiromo not only found a charity to take it, but delivered the meat herself in her own car. "She had the stuff and she knew how to deploy it," he said.

In 1990, just out of college, she met Jonathan Steinberg, the son of Saul Steinberg, the corporate raider. As the two began dating, it was Mr. Steinberg, who presided over a personal finance magazine and a hedge fund, who attracted the media attention. The couple married in 1999.

But Ms. Bartiromo's public profile would eclipse his. After a stint working for Lou Dobbs at CNN, she moved to CNBC in 1993. She became a star once she started broadcasting from the stock exchange floor.

As her recognition grew, so did the fortunes of CNBC, and it is estimated that her compensation exceeds $1 million.

And when she disclosed last year that the new chairman of the Federal Reserve, Ben S. Bernanke, had told her in a conversation at the White House Correspondents dinner that the markets had misinterpreted his remarks on interest rates, her reputation as an insider became even more entrenched.

Despite the controversy, Ms. Bartiromo remains a staple of CNBC. And she has kept up her public appearances, and her sense of humor.

Earlier this month, she was scheduled to present a lifetime leadership award to former Federal Reserve chairman Alan Greenspan at the CNBC executive achievement award ceremony, at the Mandarin Oriental Hotel in New York.

DOJ_NMG_0130334

"Sorry I'm late," she said with a slight giggle as she stepped up to the dais. "But I had to fly commercial."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Cheney Testimony In Libby Trial Would Carry High Risk (NYT)

By Scott Shane And Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 11 — One figure has dominated the trial of I. Lewis Libby Jr. without even showing up in the courtroom. Day after day, the jury has heard accounts of the actions of Vice President Dick Cheney, watched as his handwritten notes were displayed on a giant screen, heard how he directed leaks to the news media and ordered the White House to publicly defend Mr. Libby, his top aide and close confidante.

Now, as the defense phase of the perjury trial begins, Mr. Cheney is expected to make a historic appearance on the witness stand. It is an act of loyalty that carries considerable risk for Mr. Cheney, a powerful figure in the administration who has in recent months suffered a series of major political and policy setbacks.

If he testifies, Mr. Cheney will bring to the jurors the awesome authority of his office and could attest to Mr. Libby's character as policy adviser and family man, and to his crushing workload and dedication to keeping the country safe. That could give extra heft to Mr. Libby's defense against the charge that he lied to the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the grand jury: that he was so occupied with important matters of state, he did not accurately remember conversations from July 2003.

But the first 10 days of testimony have already exposed some of the long-hidden workings of Mr. Cheney's extraordinary vice presidency, revealing how deeply Mr. Cheney himself was engaged during 2003 in managing public relations as the administration's case for war came under attack.

Under cross-examination by Patrick J. Fitzgerald, a veteran prosecutor who is likely to be deferential but dogged with questions, the vice president may be forced to describe in uncomfortable detail how he directed the counteroffensive on Joseph C. Wilson IV, the former ambassador who accused the administration of twisting prewar intelligence.

"This could be great theater," said Peter M. Shane, a law professor at Ohio State University. Anything Mr. Cheney says for the defense, Mr. Shane said, becomes "fair game" to be picked apart by the prosecution.

If Mr. Cheney makes a statement that conflicts with the public record — and nearly every witness so far has done so at least once — it could prove embarrassing for him and for the administration.

"If Cheney said anything that's contradicted in the record, though I think that's unlikely, Pat will slam him," said a former federal prosecutor who knows Mr. Fitzgerald. "He'll do it respectfully, but I have no doubt he'll do it," said the lawyer, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

No testimony so far has supported the idea, proposed by some critics, that Mr. Cheney deliberately sought to punish Mr. Wilson by ordering the exposure of the covert employment of his wife, Valerie Wilson, by the Central Intelligence Agency. It was the disclosure of Ms. Wilson's C.I.A. job that prompted the criminal investigation that ultimately led to perjury and obstruction of justice charges against Mr. Libby.

But the trial has chipped away at the public image of Mr. Cheney as a sober-minded policy architect and tough political combatant, never rattled by the sniping of critics or the fickle commentary of the press.

When Mr. Wilson published an Op-Ed article in The New York Times on July 6, 2003, lambasting the administration, Mr. Cheney was "upset," Mr. Libby said in 2004 grand jury testimony, replayed at the trial. Contrary to Mr. Wilson's claims, the vice president had known nothing about the former ambassador's trip to Niger on behalf of the C.I.A. or his conclusion that Iraq was not seeking uranium there, Mr. Libby said.

"He often cuts out an article and keeps it on his desk somewhere and thinks about it," Mr. Libby told the grand jury of the vice president. The jury has seen Mr. Cheney's clipping of Mr. Wilson's article, on which he wrote notes and questions.

The jury has also heard how the vice president responded by dictating talking points for the news media to subordinates and hastily summoning conservative columnists to a lunch. Most strikingly, Mr. Cheney cleared with President Bush the secret declassification of an intelligence document on Iraqi weapons so that it could be leaked to a reporter he and Mr. Libby saw as friendly, Judith Miller, then of The Times.

"The vice president instructed me to go and talk to Judith Miller and lay this out for her," Mr. Libby said in the grand jury tapes.

The leak to Ms. Miller, on July 8, 2003, failed — she wrote nothing. But four days later Mr. Cheney was trying again, listing for Mr. Libby the main points he wanted made to Matthew Cooper, then of Time magazine, and other reporters.

DOJ_NMG_0130335

Mr. Cheney, Mr. Libby said, "dictated to me what he wanted me to say to the press," including a "word-for-word" quote to give Time magazine and "background material that he wanted me to use."

A few months later, when Mr. Libby was being publicly discussed as a possible target of the criminal investigation, Mr. Cheney weighed in again. He directed Scott McClellan, then the White House spokesman, to publicly clear Mr. Libby just as he had cleared Karl Rove, Mr. Bush's political adviser.

"Not going to protect one staffer + sacrifice the guy that was asked to stick his neck in the meat grinder because of the incompetence of others," Mr. Cheney wrote in a note after Mr. Libby complained to him. The "meat grinder" apparently referred to Mr. Libby's assignment in leaking to the news media; the "incompetence" is thought by many to be the vice president's characterization of the C.I.A.'s decision to send Mr. Wilson to Niger.

The trial is just the latest challenge for the vice president, who would enter the witness stand as one of the least popular leaders in recent history. Only 16 percent of respondents in the latest CBS News poll, released last month, said they had a favorable opinion of Mr. Cheney, his lowest level ever in any CBS or CBS/New York Times poll. Some 48 percent had an unfavorable opinion.

For six years, Mr. Cheney has worked to protect the Bush White House from what he views as Congressional meddling, media snooping and legal nitpicking. But his assertion of broad executive authority, based on a legal theory he has pursued since the 1970s, has met with a string of defeats.

The administration has backed away from tough policies on terrorist detention and domestic surveillance that Mr. Cheney championed. He has watched control of Congress shift to Democrats who are now working to penetrate his trademark secrecy. Last fall, he endured the dismissal by Mr. Bush of his friend and ally of three decades, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Since then, as the most bullish and optimistic proponent of the president's war strategy, Mr. Cheney has come under increasing fire for comments proclaiming success in Iraq when even Mr. Bush is expressing dissatisfaction.

Senator John McCain, a leading Republican presidential contender for 2008, went on record in an interview last month with The Politico, a new Washington political publication, saying Mr. Bush had been "very badly served" by Mr. Cheney, as well as Mr. Rumsfeld.

In a recent interview on CNN, the host, Wolf Blitzer, told Mr. Cheney, "Some of your good Republican friends in the Senate and the House are now seriously questioning your credibility because of the blunders, of the failures."

Mr. Cheney, in a striking display of pique, responded: "Wolf, Wolf, I simply don't accept the premise of your question. I just think it's hogwash."

Veteran trial lawyers following the case say there is a significant chance Mr. Libby will not take the stand in his own defense, choosing to rely instead upon the seven hours of his taped testimony the jury has already heard. In that event, veteran trial lawyers say, Mr. Cheney could serve as his surrogate, presenting a positive, personal account of Mr. Libby's work without exposing the defendant to the hazards of cross-examination.

But such a strategy would, of course, open Mr. Cheney to unpredictable questioning. Theodore B. Olson, the former solicitor general for Mr. Bush, called Mr. Fitzgerald "a remarkably thorough, meticulous and careful guy with a tremendous memory of the facts" who was likely to mount a formidable cross-examination.

By taking the stand before a rapt national audience, Mr. Cheney would essentially be leaping without a net, because neither the defense nor the prosecution would be duty-bound to protect his interests, said Mr. Olson, who represented Ronald Reagan during the Iran-contra affair.

"You never know what's going to happen on a witness stand with cross-examinations," Mr. Olson said. "Surprises happen all the time."

A Historic Moment If Cheney Testifies Live, As Expected (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 11 — If he testifies as expected, Dick Cheney would be the first sitting vice president, at least in modern times, to appear as a witness in a criminal trial. And if he testifies in court, he may also be the first to give live testimony in defense of a subordinate's actions on his behalf, legal historians said.

Mr. Cheney's testimony as a courtroom witness for his former chief of staff, I. Lewis Libby Jr., would break with one of the closest historical parallels, when former President Ronald Reagan testified in 1990 via videotape as a defense witness in the trial of his former national security adviser, John M. Poindexter.

The Reagan videotape offered an insight into the unpredictability of criminal trials. His appearance seemed to have little direct impact on the trial, but it created a permanent historical record of his failing memory, which would have been preserved through a printed transcript had he appeared as a live witness but would not have caused the same impact as the widely broadcast videotape.

DOJ_NMG_0130336

Courts have traditionally shown great deference to high-ranking executive branch officials, requiring them to testify only when they are thought likely to provide crucial testimony that cannot be obtained elsewhere through documents or other witnesses.

"One of the considerations is, you can't start dragging the vice president or president away from their jobs," said Theodore B. Olson, a lawyer in Washington who represented Mr. Reagan when he was asked to testify in Mr. Poindexter's trial.

Even so, presidents and vice presidents have found themselves caught up in politically volatile inquiries. A few vice presidents were themselves the subjects of criminal proceedings, like Aaron Burr, who was tried for treason and acquitted in 1807 after he left office, and Spiro Agnew, who resigned in 1973 and pleaded no contest to tax and money laundering charges.

In more recent times, presidents and vice presidents have more frequently been questioned as witnesses, usually in private. But even an interview behind closed doors can prove embarrassing, as when a Congressional committee released President Bill Clinton's videotaped deposition in 1998 to an independent prosecutor in the investigation of his involvement with Monica Lewinsky, a White House intern.

Vice President Al Gore was questioned in 2000 by Justice Department prosecutors in a campaign finance investigation, and when he was vice president in 1988, George H. W. Bush was interviewed by an independent prosecutor in the Iran-contra investigation. Those interviews were not made public and never forced either Mr. Gore or Mr. Bush to appear in court.

But no sitting vice president has testified in a criminal trial in recent times, said Joel K. Goldstein, a professor at the St. Louis University law school who has studied the vice presidency. Mr. Reagan was the last president to appear as a witness.

Unlike Mr. Cheney, who would appear as a voluntary witness, Mr. Reagan resisted testifying, primarily because his lawyers said he could shed little light on the obstruction issues in the trial, Mr. Olson said. "There are no hard and fast rules about a president's testimony," he said. "It really is a balancing process. Is this really necessary, or is there a less intrusive way to get the evidence?"

Richard W. Beckler, a lawyer for Mr. Poindexter, said he had wanted Mr. Reagan to appear as a trial witness in court, but accepted an appearance that would have far less impact. "We wanted him to testify live, but that motion got turned down," Mr. Beckler said. As a result, Judge Harold H. Greene of Federal District Court settled on an arrangement in which Mr. Reagan testified, but via a videotaped deposition, which was later publicly released.

The deposition was taken in February 1990 in a closed courtroom in Los Angeles, a year after Mr. Reagan left office. The former president sat in a witness box. Judge Greene was on the bench. Prosecution and defense lawyers were in the court, along with Mr. Reagan's lawyers, Justice Department lawyers representing the administration of George H. W. Bush and an interagency group monitoring the proceedings for inadvertent leaks of classified information.

The defense was permitted to ask Mr. Reagan 154 questions approved by the judge in advance. The procedure was taped to allow for the editing of any state secrets or other statements ruled inadmissible. But in the end, the eight-hour tape was played in its entirety at the trial.

On the tape, Mr. Reagan seemed cooperative, but he had trouble recalling many of the events surrounding the Iran-contra affair. After the trial, jurors said his testimony had a minimal impact on their decision to convict Mr. Poindexter on all five counts against him. A federal appeals court later threw out the conviction on all counts.

The showing of the tape had unforeseen consequences for Mr. Reagan and his legacy. It created a record of Mr. Reagan as a former head of state unable to grasp the facts about the most serious crisis of his presidency, in the unforgiving setting of a criminal trial. That imagery seemed to foreshadow his disclosure in 1994 that he had Alzheimer's disease.

"You just could not have seen all that coming," Mr. Olson said. "But in a live situation it might have been worse." Had Mr. Reagan appeared in court, Mr. Olson said, it might have been more difficult for him to interject on his client's behalf and might not have permitted Mr. Reagan to take the rest breaks he was granted during the deposition.

Cheney Backers Grow Restive (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Dick Cheney's diminished popularity outside the White House hasn't affected his power within the Bush administration, where he continues to hold considerable clout. From the surge of troops in Iraq to the tough line on Iran to opposition to tax increases, the vice president has helped to shape an array of recent administration policies.

But as his standing erodes among the administration's most conservative supporters, Mr. Cheney finds himself being criticized by former allies and emerging as a focal point for Republican anger about the war in Iraq. That is making it easier for Republicans to split with the administration on a number of issues, notably Iraq.

"Cheney's popularity with the Republican base is reflective of the Iraq war's popularity with the Republican base, and that support is waning," said Vin Weber, a Republican strategist and lobbyist. "That's taking a toll on the vice president, who is more closely identified with Iraq than on any other issue."

It is a shift for Mr. Cheney, who remained popular with conservatives as his support among the general public declined. In a September Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll, 43% of those calling themselves conservative Republicans said they felt "very positive" about Mr. Cheney, compared with 13% of all adults surveyed.

That rating fell over the next few months, as Republicans lost control of Congress, support for the Iraq war eroded, and the perjury trial of former Cheney chief of staff I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby put the vice president and his office in the spotlight. By mid-January, the same poll found that 26% of conservative Republicans said they felt "very positive" about Mr. Cheney, compared with 9% for all respondents.

Mr. Cheney could be called to take the stand in the Libby trial as soon as this week, making him the first sitting vice president to testify in a criminal court.

Mr. Cheney's declining support among conservatives leaves him open to criticism from fellow Republicans.

When Mr. Cheney traveled to Capitol Hill recently for a lunch meeting with Republican senators, the lawmakers opened the floor to discuss the administration's "surge" proposal. It was Mr. Cheney's birthday, and participants said the senators began by singing "Happy Birthday."

The warm feelings evaporated as soon as the conversation turned to Iraq, however. Several senators said they remained committed to the war on terror, but questioned the administration's overall management of the war, participants said. Sen. Gordon Smith of Oregon told Mr. Cheney he couldn't find words strong enough to express how bad he thought the administration had overseen the war in Iraq, according to participants.

Other lawmakers told the vice president they feared the additional troops would be unable to stabilize the country, and expressed skepticism about the capabilities and intentions of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, according to participants.

Mr. Cheney listened closely, but didn't say anything in response to the criticism, participants said.

To date, there are few signs that talk outside the White House has changed Mr. Cheney. One reason, administration officials say, is because Mr. Cheney doesn't aim to become president, he can stay loyal to the Bush agenda without having to distance himself from the president.

Mr. Cheney's top foreign policy aide, John Hannah, shaped the administration's "surge" proposal for Iraq. David Wurmser, Mr. Cheney's top Middle East aide, helped to craft the administration's tougher stance toward Iran. On the domestic front, senators from both parties said last week that Mr. Cheney's antitax positions had contributed to derailing talks between congressional Democrats and the administration on a budget plan that might include changes to the Social Security and Medicare entitlement programs.

"He's been a longtime and steady supporter of conservative causes, and conservatives have known that he is consistent in his views and that he's making those conservative views known to the president," said Cesar Conda, a lobbyist and former policy aide to Mr. Cheney. "But they also know that Cheney doesn't win the debates all the time."

A number of conservative figures outside the administration offered three reasons for their displeasure with Mr. Cheney. They point first to Iraq, expressing concerns Mr. Cheney was in denial about how bad the situation was in the country and about the war's political cost for Republicans. Second, they say Mr. Cheney was finally caught up in conservative anger at Mr. Bush for not limiting government spending or balancing the budget.

Lastly, some conservatives say they are uncomfortable with Mr. Cheney's support for his daughter Mary's decision to have a child and raise it with her partner, another woman.

White House officials defended Mr. Cheney, saying the vice president's statements about Iraq were meant to emphasize that political progress had been made in Iraq despite the difficulties there.

"The vice president's insistence on pointing out what has gone well in Iraq -- three elections and substantial progress in many Iraqi provinces -- should not be taken for granted or ignored," said Dan Bartlett, counselor to the president.

The Libby Trial: Who Said What To Whom, And Who Remembers? (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, February 12, 2007

WASHINGTON

The trial of former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, now at a pause point as the defense prepares to mount its case, is about many things.

DOJ_NMG_0130338

Literally, the trial is about whether Vice President Cheney's ex-chief of staff committed perjury and obstruction of justice during a federal investigation into the exposure of a CIA agent's identity. After 11 days of prosecution testimony, some of which appeared damaging to Mr. Libby, the task of the defense team is to sow reasonable doubt in the minds of jurors.

But what has captured the fascination of the press and observers of the Bush administration is how this case has pulled back the curtain on the inner workings of a White House known for being secretive and on the ways of elite Washington – much of it less than flattering. And even if the perjury trial of a former aide may seem to be a sideshow to the weightier issues of the day, the context of the Libby trial remains central: the runup to the Iraq war and its aftermath when the rationale for the war came under question.

"This trial stands for something much bigger than what it is," says Paul Rothstein, a law professor at Georgetown University. "In the public mind, it stands for, 'Was Bush lying about the war, and was he willing to destroy a woman's career to cover up a lie about the war?' Viewed that way, it's a big case. The case doesn't actually go that far, but that's how it will be read if Libby is convicted."

No one, including Libby, is on trial for revealing the identity of Valerie Plame, the woman in question, as a CIA operative. Her status became a point of interest inside the Bush administration when her husband, former US Ambassador Joseph Wilson, came out as a critic of the administration's use of intelligence in building its case for war. At issue in Libby's case is whether he lied in sworn testimony over how he learned Ms. Plame's identity.

The prosecution's final witness, Tim Russert, anchor of NBC's "Meet the Press," provided perhaps the most damaging testimony. Libby had asserted that he learned Plame's identity from Mr. Russert, but Russert denies that the topic ever came up in a phone conversation they had in July 2003. In cross-examination, Libby's chief defense lawyer tried to challenge Russert's memory and impugn his impartiality.

When the defense begins its case Monday, the first witnesses will be other journalists, who will be questioned with an eye toward casting doubt on the ability of prosecution witnesses to remember years-old conversations accurately.

At the heart of Libby's defense is the argument that, as a top White House aide with a full plate, he could not be expected to remember who told him what, when. After Libby stated under oath that he had learned Plame's identity from Russert, it has subsequently come out that he learned the information a month earlier from fellow officials.

The prosecution's argument is that Libby had fingered Russert to avoid implicating administration colleagues. Why Russert would then have not contradicted him is the next question. Perhaps, the reasoning goes, Libby assumed Russert would refuse to testify, in the tradition of journalists refusing to divulge in public the identity of sources and content of conversations with them.

During the days of testimony so far, the public has been treated to a rare behind-the-scenes look at life in the White House. Ari Fleischer, who was White House press secretary during the period in question and who received legal immunity for his testimony, described his dismay when it became clear that the president had made an unsupported statement in his State of the Union address: that Iraq was seeking to acquire uranium from Africa.

Cathie Martin, a former press aide to Mr. Cheney, also expressed frustration over her office's inability to correct a falsehood in the press – that it was Cheney's office that had sent Ambassador Wilson on a mission to Africa to check on the uranium allegation. And in an ironic moment, she laid out the options her office considered in trying to refute that allegation – including the possibility of leaking the information to select journalists.

Perhaps the most startling sign of backroom intrigue at the White House came in the opening arguments of the defense: that Libby was being hung out to dry to protect a more-prominent (read: valuable) White House figure, Bush's top political adviser, Karl Rove.

How all this looks to the American people, a majority of whom already hold the Bush White House in low esteem, is an open question. But to some longtime observers of the ways of Washington, there's a danger that the public will come away with new disgust over how the press interacts with the White House, especially in the realm of "leaks."

"It must look sleazy and underhanded," says Stephen Hess, a Brookings Institution scholar. "It's hard but necessary to also tell them [the public] that an awful lot of important information gets conveyed this way."

Libby Lawyers To Call On High-profile Journalists (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, February 12, 2007

WASHINGTON — Lawyers for Lewis "Scooter" Libby are scheduled to begin their case today by calling a brace of high-profile journalists to give testimony they hope will clear Libby of perjury and obstruction charges.

Among those likely to be called, according to court transcripts: NBC's Andrea Mitchell, Bob Woodward of The Washington Post, Evan Thomas of Newsweek and Jill Abramson, managing editor of The New York Times.

DOJ_NMG_0130339

Libby, Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff and national security adviser, is charged with lying about identifying an undercover CIA officer to reporters in June and July 2003 to undermine her husband, an administration critic.

Federal prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald spent the first three weeks of the trial building his case against Libby. He called 10 witnesses and played eight hours of Libby's grand jury testimony to show that Libby told reporters Valerie Plame worked at the CIA, then lied to investigators because he feared prosecution for leaking classified information.

Plame's husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson, had accused Cheney's office of ignoring a report Wilson made contradicting the claim that Iraq had sought nuclear material in Africa.

No one was charged for the leak.

Theodore Wells, Libby's lead counsel, has said in court filings and statements to the court that he'll call these journalists to show there was no "plot" to unmask Plame's identity and that talk of her CIA job was widespread.

Mitchell said during an October 2003 interview on CNBC that Plame's identity was "widely known." In a 2005 interview with Don Imus, Mitchell said she "may have misspoken."

The defense may also pit journalists from the same newspapers or networks against each other. Former New York Times reporter Judith Miller testified for the prosecution that her editor wasn't interested in a story about Plame's CIA role. The defense has subpoenaed that editor, Abramson, to rebut the claim. Abramson was the Times' Washington bureau chief until August 2003.

While the journalists seem certain to testify, it's less clear that Cheney will also take the stand.

Before the trial, Libby's defense team said they would call Cheney as a witness. If they do, that will make him the first sitting vice president to be a witness in a criminal trial, said vice presidential historian Timothy Walch, director of the Herbert Hoover Presidential Library.

Cheney, if called, could bolster two elements of Libby's defense. One is that Cheney's office was so busy that top aide Libby just forgot but didn't lie about key details of conversations about Plame. The second is that White House adviser Karl Rove, portrayed by the defense as a Libby rival, conspired to trick reporters into thinking Libby was the main source of the leak to cover Rove's role in exposing Plame.

Calling Cheney as a witness presents several problems for the defense, says Joshua Berman, a former federal prosecutor and now a white-collar defense specialist.

"What (Libby's lawyers) hope to get from him they have to weigh very sensitively against any possible backfire effect," Berman says.

That effect could include focusing on Cheney as the No. 2 official in an administration that has become increasingly unpopular because of the Iraq war. Cheney also likely would be asked questions about the flawed intelligence about Iraq's weapons of mass destruction, which helped lead the United States into war in Iraq.

Cheney could also face questioning about who told him that Plame worked for the CIA. Libby told FBI investigators that Cheney told him Plame worked at the CIA in early June 2003, just before a top CIA official told Libby the same thing.

Berman, who has worked with both Fitzgerald and Wells, says that Wells sometimes waits until the last minute before deciding to call a witness. "I've heard him say, 'I often make the decision (to call a key witness) that morning,' " Berman said about Wells' trial tactics.

Berman, however, noted that Wells has been "thinking about it every single morning and night since the trial began."

Media Figures May Be Reluctant Defense Witnesses In Libby Case (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

Defense Exhibit 1972, a tape-recorded interview from the "Imus in the Morning" radio show, is another of those revealing moments in the perjury trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby.

"So . . . what happened?" radio host Don Imus asks NBC News correspondent Andrea Mitchell about her confusing reporting on an undercover CIA officer. "Were you drunk?"

"I obviously screwed up," Mitchell responds in the exchange, which Libby's defense hopes to play for the jury in coming days. "I guess I was drunk," she jokes.

Just when you thought it was impossible for more harm to come to the national news media's reputation, the defense in the trial of Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff is about to present its case.

Starting today, when Libby's attorneys try to show that he did not intentionally lie about his role in leaking the identity of CIA officer Valerie Plame, they will rely heavily on a string of journalists as witnesses. In several ways, those witnesses will be asked to raise doubts about the testimony and accuracy of other reporters, and some may end up tarnishing themselves or their sources.

Libby, 56, is charged with lying to investigators about his conversations with reporters about Plame in the summer of 2003, during what prosecutors allege was a White House campaign to discredit her husband, outspoken war critic Joseph C. Wilson IV. Days after Wilson accused the administration of twisting intelligence he gathered on a CIA-sponsored mission as it defended the invasion of Iraq, Plame's classified CIA role was revealed in a syndicated column by Robert D. Novak. Libby, who has pleaded not guilty, is not charged with the leak itself.

Now the reporters Libby spoke to -- and some he did not -- are unhappily embroiled in the trial as witnesses for both sides.

This past week, a pillar of broadcast news -- Tim Russert, Washington bureau chief for NBC News -- was heard chortling on the air on Oct. 28, 2005, about the possibility that Bush administration officials would be indicted that day. That interview, also with Imus, helped the defense suggest that Russert, a star witness for the prosecution, may have held a grudge against Libby.

The Wall Street Journal editorial page was depicted as carrying water for the White House, insisting in print that it had crucial intelligence supporting the war that did not come from the White House. But Libby has testified that he urged then-Deputy Defense Secretary Paul D. Wolfowitz to leak self-serving parts of an intelligence report to the Journal because Wolfowitz had better connections there. That admission helped the prosecution suggest Libby was part of a White House campaign to discredit Wilson.

In the next several days, three reporters at The Washington Post, a senior New York Times editor, a Times Washington bureau reporter and a Newsweek magazine reporter are expected to take the stand.

Defense attorneys are keen to ask New York Times Managing Editor Jill Abramson about the accuracy of former Times reporter Judith Miller, a prosecution witness who said Libby told her about Plame in June 2003. They want Abramson to rebut Miller's testimony that she urged Abramson, then the Times's Washington bureau chief, to have the paper pursue the story about Wilson's wife working at the CIA. Abramson has been quoted as saying that Miller never made such a suggestion.

But the questioning could get into the gritty business of whether Abramson considered Miller to be accurate and impartial in her work. In the summer of 2003, the time of the events critical to the case, editors told Miller that, because of flaws in previous stories about whether Saddam Hussein's government possessed weapons of mass destruction, she could not write stories alone on intelligence regarding Iraq.

Defense attorneys also are eager to question Mitchell about the memory and credibility of Russert, her NBC colleague. Mitchell professed on CNBC's "Capital Report" in October 2003 that it was "widely known" among intelligence reporters such as herself that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA. Her network issued a statement saying that was inaccurate, and she said in an interview with Imus that she didn't know "what the heck I was talking about."

Libby's defense argued that Mitchell may have told Russert -- who testified for two days last week -- about the CIA operative but later wanted to back away from her assertion of knowledge. If she did know the information, they said, it would bolster Libby's contention that he learned about Plame's identity in a July 10, 2003, telephone call with Russert.

Russert said that was not possible because he did not hear of Plame until several days later.

"Now it turns out his right-hand person, Andrea Mitchell, in October 2003 has said something that totally blows up his core statement that he didn't know about the wife," defense attorney Theodore Wells Jr. told U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton in arguing to play the Mitchell tape for the jury. "He has admitted that if she knew, he knew, and the whole team would have known."

Walton said he will rule today on whether Mitchell's testimony is relevant.

The defense also has said it may call Post Assistant Managing Editor Bob Woodward. He learned about Plame from then-Deputy Secretary of State Richard L. Armitage in June 2003 but said he did not disclose that information because he wanted to avoid being subpoenaed. Woodward told prosecutors what he knew after Libby was indicted in 2005, and he apologized to Post Executive Editor Leonard Downie Jr. for not sharing information on a major story.

Woodward's testimony could help bolster Libby's contention that there was no White House campaign to discredit Wilson and that other reporters knew about Plame before the time that prosecutors say Libby began to discuss her.

Also on the defense witness list are Post reporters Walter Pincus and Glenn Kessler, Newsweek's Evan Thomas, and the Times' David E. Sanger. All are expected to testify that they talked with Libby during that time but that he never mentioned Plame to them.

The defense is expected to use their testimony to raise doubts about the credibility of other key prosecution witnesses.

CHANNEL ISLAND: Russert's Fault? A Lack Of Outrage (LAT)

By Scott Collins

The Los Angeles Times, February 12, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0130341

Those of us who get a kick out of watching Tim Russert every Sunday on NBC's "Meet the Press" are feeling a little hangdog these days. We always thought Big Russ Jr. was tough on the powerful. Now we learn that to some Washington media types on both the right and the left, he's just a tool for the powerful.

What's occasioned this perceptual turnabout is, of course, the perjury and obstruction trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, a former top aide to Vice President Dick Cheney, where Russert wrapped up two days of testimony last week. Libby says the NBC newsman fed him the name of CIA operative Valerie Plame Wilson, who is at the center of the trial. Russert says he didn't.

To ordinary viewers, though, whatever transpired during Libby's phone call to Russert back in 2003 couldn't be as jarring as what the trial has unearthed about Washington's deeply cynical attitude toward "Meet the Press," a venerable, 60-year-old staple of network TV and the No. 1-rated Sunday news talk show.

A former Cheney press aide testified last month that she pushed to get the vice president on Russert's show to bat down negative news because it was "our best format," a program where political handlers can "control the message."

Wow. Really? With his Buick-like physique, piercing stare and rumbling baritone — plus his interrogatory style of brandishing incriminating documents and video in front of his guests — Russert sure doesn't look like any flack's patsy.

But to Russert's longtime critics, this was an a-ha! moment. Arianna Huffington, who once penned the critical "RussertWatch" feature for her liberal Huffington Post website, said she attended the Libby trial last week. There she found fresh confirmation for her view of Russert as one of the media handmaidens who carried water for the Bush administration in the run-up to the Iraq war.

"When we started RussertWatch, we didn't know he was on Dick Cheney and [ex-aide] Mary Matalin's list of ways to get their message out," Huffington told me Friday. She also heaped scorn on Russert's testimony that he always assumed his off-camera conversations with government officials were automatically off-the-record, so as "not to blindside anyone."

"That's the exact opposite of how journalists operate," Huffington said. "Russert's responsibility is to the public, unless there's some specific granting of anonymity."

So which is it? Is Russert the lantern-jawed tough guy many of us thought he was, the hard-boiled lawyer-turned-journo who hoists wayward pols on their own rhetorical petards? Or is he really just a Beltway Cowardly Lion who blows hard but allows his prey to wink and nudge their way out of tight spots with the nation's future at stake? (An NBC spokeswoman, citing the sensitive nature of the court testimony, said neither Russert nor network officials would comment.)

Evidence for Russert as a big softie has long existed. In 2004, when it came time to leverage his celebrity into a book-length treatise, he gave us not the standard "how I became an intrepid reporter" odyssey, the broadcast journalists' default choice, but rather "Big Russ and Me," a sentimental memoir of his categorically decent but emotionally withholding Irish-Catholic father.

"Big Russ" may not stack up as great literature, but it became a surprise bestseller and humanized Russert to millions who'd known him simply as a guy who liked to play "gotcha" with elected officials.

But writing a heartwarming book that merchants might file alongside "Tuesdays With Morrie" doesn't help demonstrate journalistic toughness. And watching "Meet the Press" over the last few weeks, I think I can understand why both Cheney's office and critics such as Huffington believe Russert can be readily controlled.

As an interviewer, Russert relies on documentary evidence to ask the pointed questions you want asked and answered. He hardly permits our leaders to slip away freely. Russert aggressively pursued, for example, the U.S. failure to find weapons of mass destruction in Iraq during President Bush's February 2004 appearance on "Meet the Press."

But Russert can seem overly dispassionate, particularly during a time when opinion has increasingly bled into the news. And it's the lack of emotion that can make his approach look, after a while, less like real toughness than a facsimile of it.

Outrage is the reporter's ultimate stock in trade, from Oriana Fallaci jabbing Ayatollah Khomeini over Islamic veils to the on-camera meltdowns of Anderson Cooper and Shepard Smith during Hurricane Katrina. But Russert doesn't do outrage. He doesn't pound his desk and tell guests to shut up, like Bill O'Reilly. He doesn't try to pry open subjects by telling them, as Mike Wallace is known to have done, that their story is "pabulum." He's not on the receiving end of angry lectures, like the kind that Bill Clinton gave Chris Wallace, or the kind Dan Rather seemed to get from everyone.

Is there something vaudevillian about all these histrionics? Sure, but that's part of journalism. Maybe not the most handsome part, but a part nonetheless. It's revealing that when Libby rang Russert in 2003, it was to lodge a complaint, not about Russert, but about his high-volume MSNBC colleague Chris Matthews. The "Hardball" host is exactly the kind of outburst-prone broadcaster who can drive handlers up the wall.

On the Feb. 4 show, Russert drilled former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards over his stance on the Iraq war, tracing how the Democratic presidential candidate shifted from support to opposition. Russert asked all the right questions, presented all the right evidence, but there was an emotional element missing. Isn't it at least a little disappointing that a leading voice from the supposed opposition party went along for so long with a war plan that he now tells us, with the benefit of several years' hindsight and when the information is of little use, was grievously flawed?

DOJ_NMG_0130342

But because that sense of outrage was missing from the "Meet the Press" host — he asked the questions in the same lawyerly tone of polite urgency and slight incredulousness he always uses — Edwards was basically allowed to shrug: Oh, well. Can't win 'em all.

Russert fans say the host is getting a raw deal. Marvin Kalb, "Meet the Press" host during the 1980s, praises his successor for building the program to its No. 1 status, and said whatever trade-offs Russert lives by were inevitable. "The politician wants exposure, the journalist wants a story," Kalb said. "On 'Meet the Press,' the two attempt to come together with dignity. Most of the time, it works."

It's also probably not a good idea to put too much faith in the proclamations of the pro-Libby folk. "It may be tactically in the interests of the administration to say Russert is easy," noted Tom Rosenstiel, director of the Project for Excellence in Journalism. "Any time a politician plays press critic and tells you who's good, you need to carry a large container of salt."

Even Huffington admits that Russert attracts a lot of attention simply because his Sunday program is No. 1 in the ratings.

Still, it's clear that the ground has shifted beneath Russert's feet. Sixteen years hosting "Meet the Press," and he's suddenly becoming the story. Surely that's not a welcome switch, but Russert's plenty smart enough to know something is going on.

When a Libby attorney, during his cross examination, went over the specifics of a newspaper column critical of Russert and then asked whether it was "one of the more personal attacks you've experienced," Russert replied, "Probably not anymore."

Contact Scott Collins at channelisland@latimes.com.

Relying On The Notepad In The Electronic Age (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

I. Lewis Libby Jr. is charged with lying to federal agents, but no one knows precisely what he said. The jury hearing his case must rely on an F.B.I. agent's recollection, based on notes taken at the time.

Mr. Libby is also charged with lying to a grand jury. That testimony was tape-recorded, and jurors spent eight hours last week assessing every word, inflection, pause and sigh.

Why is the Federal Bureau of Investigation still using Sherlock Holmes methods in the YouTube era?

More than 500 police departments in all 50 states now make electronic recordings of at least some interrogations, often videotaping them. At the F.B.I., by contrast, an agent cannot turn on a tape recorder without first getting a supervisor's permission.

The default method of preserving the statements of witnesses and suspects at our nation's most important law enforcement agency is known as "scribble then type."

Deborah S. Bond, the F.B.I. agent who testified about two interviews with Mr. Libby, said her notes were pretty good but not perfect.

"I can't take a verbatim statement," Ms. Bond testified. "You take notes as quickly as you can and as accurately as you can."

Here are some other reasons to favor recordings:

They eliminate disputes about whether Miranda warnings were given and whether confessions were authentic.

They allow juries to assess people's demeanor and credibility. They preserve clues. They encourage honorable police work.

They allow the investigators to engage people in conversation rather than worry about stenography. They are an excellent training device.

Thomas P. Sullivan, a former United States attorney in Chicago and a bit of a crusader on this point, says local law enforcement agencies that have adopted electronic recording cannot imagine life without it.

"I can say without exaggeration — it's unanimous — that they all love it," Mr. Sullivan said. "They hate it until they do it, and then they love it."

Judges seem to feel the same way. "I find it ironic," Judge Stephen P. Friot of Federal District Court in Oklahoma wrote in a letter to Mr. Sullivan, "that if the cost of repairing a car is at stake in a civil case, the defendant's account of the matter is meticulously recorded" by a court reporter in a deposition. "But agencies with ample opportunity and resources to do so fail to record statements where liberty and perhaps even life are at stake."

DOJ_NMG_0130343

A decision in December by the Iowa Supreme Court illustrates the point. The court was considering a relatively difficult question: Did a 17-year-old immigrant from Bosnia understand what he was saying when he waived his Miranda rights and confessed to burglary and robbery?

But there was a videotape. It showed that the defendant, Arif Hajtic, spoke English well. "He showed no reluctance to ask questions if he did not understand," Justice Jerry L. Larson wrote for the unanimous court. "When the officer asked a question confusing to Hajtic, he asked the officer to clarify it, and the officer did so."

The court ruled that Mr. Hajtic's confession was authentic, and it affirmed his conviction. The case, the court concluded, "illustrates the value of electronic recording, particularly videotaping, of custodial interrogations."

The F.B.I. reviewed its policy about a year ago, and decided to keep it. Valerie E. Caproni, the bureau's general counsel, defended the decision, saying that its specialized work required sensitive case-by-case judgments about when recording was appropriate. The requirement that field agents get approval, Ms. Caproni added, should not be interpreted to mean that recordings are disfavored.

"There are lots of different factors that play into this," she said.

First, she said, the policy has not caused many problems for prosecutors. Then there is money. Making transcripts of recordings can be expensive and burdensome, Ms. Caproni said, especially when translators are involved. "There's a huge fiscal impact to it," Ms. Caproni said. On the other hand, the F.B.I.'s $6 billion budget dwarfs those of the hundreds of police departments that have embraced routine taping.

Most important, Ms. Caproni said, suspects may clam up if they know they are being recorded. "What you really want to do," she said, "is have them spend time talking to you. It's an art, not a science."

But those objections seemed to crumble at the Libby trial. Mr. Libby was interviewed with his lawyer, and it is hard to imagine that the presence of a tape recorder would have changed what he said. And it seems only fair to make the most accurate record possible of statements that could send a man to prison.

Ms. Bond, the F.B.I. agent, was repeatedly questioned about gaps in her notes.

"There might be some mistakes," she said, "because we're all human."

A tape recorder is not human. A really good one, according to a 2005 report of a committee appointed by the New Jersey Supreme Court, costs $300.

Wilkes Warned By FEC (RC)

By Matthew Murray

Roll Call, February 12, 2007

Brent Wilkes has had better years.

The fast-spending defense contractor, for whom jailed ex-Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.) allegedly helped obtain millions of dollars in military contracts, in recent months has seen his fortune dwindle, business fail and personal life go to shambles.

Meanwhile, media reports suggest that the Justice Department likely will indict Wilkes any day for his alleged involvement in Cunningham's pay-to-play contract scandal.

And now the Federal Election Commission could add to Wilkes' legal woes by prying into details involving his firm's political action committee.

Just before Christmas, the agency sent a warning letter to Wilkes promising to fine, audit or worse — "legal or enforcement action" — for failing to file campaign finance disclosure documents going back months on behalf of his company's PAC, ADCS Inc.

"It has come to the attention of the Federal Election Commission that you may have failed to file the [post-general 10/1/2006 to 11/27/2006 report] of receipts and expenditures as required by Federal Election Campaign Act," stated the Dec. 21 letter addressed to Wilkes, the PAC's treasurer. "The civil money penalty calculation for late reports does not include a grace period and begins on the day following the due date for the report."

As of late Friday, Wilkes still had not filed the PAC's disclosure report nor the committee's year-end report, according to the FEC Web site. Mark Geragos, Wilkes' lawyer, did not respond to a request for comment by press time Friday.

The FEC does not discuss ongoing enforcement cases, but according to Brett Kappel, an election law lawyer at Vorys, Sater, Seymour and Pease, there is little chance the agency will seek monetary penalties from Wilkes. With just $1.38 in the PAC's bank account — and banks threatening to foreclose on his property — it would appear difficult for the agency to squeeze blood from a turnip.

DOJ_NMG_0130344

"The PAC appears to have been inactive since spending almost $5,000 on legal fees in June 2006," Kappel said. Under the agency's administrative fine program, the FEC "calculates the fine based upon the level of financial activity during the period covered by the reports that were not filed."

"Since there apparently have been [no transactions]," Kappel said, "[the PAC] probably will not get fined."

And any fine likely would be minimal. With barely enough for bus fare in the committee's coffers, Wilkes could be penalized roughly $900 for failing to file, according to an FEC penalty schedule.

But that could be the least of it. Although Wilkes may dodge a fine, an audit — which the FEC stressed in the letter may be initiated — could open up the PAC's books to further law enforcement scrutiny, perhaps compounding a recent decision by a state campaign finance regulator.

Last month, California's Fair Political Practices Commission fined Wilkes $4,000 for illegally reimbursing an employee and her husband for $500 worth of contributions made to a San Diego mayoral candidate in mid-2000. Although the two counts violated state campaign laws, Kappel speculated that the decision may give further cause to federal investigators looking to scrutinize the transactions of Wilkes' PAC.

"I have to think that the FBI investigation includes a campaign finance angle," Kappel said. "I would be extremely surprised if the FBI is not investigating the PAC and the campaign contributions by Wilkes and others."

Although Wilkes wrote no checks to candidates in 2005-06, according to CQ PoliticalMoneyLine.com, the PAC handed out more than $40,000 to a dozen candidates the previous cycle, including Cunningham, former House Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.), Minority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) and former House Armed Services Chairman and current presidential candidate Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.).

During the 2001-02 cycle, the PAC handed out $89,000 to 19 Republicans. In addition to Cunningham and Hunter, Reps. John Doolittle (R-Calif.) and Darrell Issa (R-Calif.), and Sens. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) and Pete Domenici (R-N.M.) also received contributions.

Even though Wilkes may have bigger fish to fry, Kappel said the potential domino effect set off by failing to file should be reason enough.

"I'm surprised that his lawyers didn't advise him to just file the report. They don't need any more investigations by any more federal agencies," Kappel said.

'95 WORDS MAY SAVE 'MOB' FED (NYPOST)

By Alex Ginsberg

The New York Post, February 12, 2007

Dogged by accusations of corruption, mob-busting FBI supervisor Lindley DeVecchio sat down with Justice Department investigators in May 1995 to defend his relationship with the Colombo capo who'd been his source for 13 years.

What he said helped save his job and his freedom - and it could do so again.

The confidential sworn statement was finally made public last week as part of a massive defense motion to get the Brooklyn district attorney's quadruple-murder case against the former G-man tossed.

In it, DeVecchio concedes that handling Colombo capo Gregory "The Killing Machine" Scarpa Sr. was tricky.

"I established an excellent rapport with Scarpa Sr., but I always remembered that he was a 'wiseguy' and I was an FBI agent," DeVecchio wrote, under oath and with a grant of immunity.

Scarpa dealt only with DeVecchio, a departure from FBI protocol. DeVecchio said FBI brass green-lighted the one-on-one relationship after the gangster himself penned a note asking that an exception be made in his case.

Under Justice Department rules, nothing DeVecchio said in the statement can ever be used against him.

Although the current allegations are different from the ones 12 years ago, DeVecchio's lawyers contend some of the off-limits statements were the indirect basis for the current case.

DeVecchio is charged with helping the mob plot murders.

alex.ginsberg@nypost.com

Promises, Promises (USNEWS)

By Michelle Andrews

U.S. News and World Report, February 12, 2007

When two insurance agents showed up at Dorothy and Charles Holt's Visalia, Calif., home last spring, they offered a deal that seemed too good to pass up. For no monthly premium whatsoever, the couple could get a health insurance policy that would reduce their Medicare costs to just $5 for regular doctor visits and $15 if they saw a specialist, instead of the 20 percent coinsurance they paid with their regular Medicare plan. The agents said the new policy would not replace their coverage under the regular Medicare plan; it would just make it better. The Holts signed up that day.

But it wasn't long before they started running into trouble. The Holts found out that the SecureHorizons plan had indeed replaced their original Medicare plan, which allowed them to see most any doctor. Although the agents had assured them that all doctors would take SecureHorizons, the Holts' doctors told them they wouldn't accept it. The agents had also promised them they'd pay less under the new plan. Dorothy, 75, who suffers from congestive heart failure, requires an injection every two weeks that costs $1,600. Their old Medicare plan had covered the shots, but SecureHorizons would not.

Locked in. When the Holts tried to get out of the plan, they were told they were locked in until 2007. Finally, after filing a complaint with the federal Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, writing their legislators, and enlisting the assistance of the local Health Insurance Counseling and Advocacy Program, they were allowed to go back to regular Medicare. But they're worried that other seniors could be hoodwinked. "It's just not right the way they did this," says Charles Holt.

UnitedHealthcare, which operates Medicare plans under the SecureHorizons name, declined to comment on the specifics of the case. But spokesperson Peter Ashkenaz says the company takes these complaints seriously and investigates them thoroughly. "Based on our findings, we'll take action up to and including termination of the broker's contract," he says.

The plan the Holts signed up for was a Medicare "private fee-for-service" plan (PFFS), a relatively new option that resembles traditional Medicare in that it generally doesn't limit beneficiaries to a defined network of providers. In addition to enticing seniors with low premiums, the plans may offer disease-management services and vision, hearing, dental, and other coverage not available under the regular Medicare plan.

Congress authorized the plans in 1997, but it wasn't until the past two years that enrollment really picked up speed, increasing from 51,000 in 2004 to 864,000 at the end of 2006, according to Mathematica Policy Research. Experts attribute the growth to the Medicare Modernization Act of 2003, which boosted reimbursements to insurers that offer private plans. The law also created Part D, the Medicare drug benefit, which opened the door for private insurers to step up their marketing to seniors, not only of drug plans but of all private Medicare insurance products, from HMOs to PPOs (preferred-provider organizations) to PFFS plans, which are collectively called Medicare Advantage plans.

The Club Scene (WP)

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

THE SHOOTING of a 17-year-old girl in a Northwest nightclub opened a window into the District's world of nightspots that attract young people. It's one involving music, dance, alcohol and, too often, violence. City officials are right to look for ways to improve the safety of people of all ages who go to these establishments. Yet some issues central to the death of this young woman are being given short shrift in a rush to a solution.

Much of the debate spurred by the Jan. 20 death of Taleshia Ford has centered on whether people under age 21 should be allowed to attend clubs that serve alcohol. D.C. Council member Jim Graham (D-Ward 1) is sponsoring legislation that would require any District club, bar or restaurant with entertainment to obtain a special permit in order to admit anyone younger than 21 after 11 p.m. Mr. Graham had floated the idea of banning minors from the clubs until there was an outcry that it would destroy the city's rich musical life. Mr. Graham is rightly outraged by the murder of yet another young person, but his proposal may be more salve than solution.

Those underage shouldn't drink; businesses that serve alcohol to minors should be prosecuted, and we don't think there is an inherent birthright for teenagers to go to nightclubs. But alcohol had little to do with the shooting in the Smarta/Broadway club. She was a bystander when the club's bouncer scuffled with a patron carrying a gun and it went off. Police say she was killed by accident.

Rather than questioning what the teenager was doing at the club, we are curious why this establishment, which had a history of violent incidents, was allowed to stay in business. Only after Taleshia's death was Acting Police Chief Cathy L. Lanier able to use her powers to shut down the club, citing a series of serious criminal activities that predated the teenager's shooting. Answers are needed as to why police and the Alcoholic Beverage Control Board didn't act sooner. Was it a question of not having the authority? Or resources? Or information? Or political will?

Equally urgent is a point made by D.C. Acting Attorney General Linda Singer as she challenged the city to take a more aggressive approach in keeping guns out of such places. Ms. Singer, in testimony to the D.C. Council, has suggested exploring whether certain establishments should be required under specific conditions to have armed D.C. police officers in place to screen for weapons through a reimbursable arrangement. Ms. Singer's emphasis on guns being the true scourge is indeed welcome and we hope will be a priority of her office.

Mr. Graham asks good questions about children as young as 14 being in clubs at 2 in the morning. And he is eloquent in his grief over the murder of children. Yet there are shortcomings to the bill that, to his credit, he acknowledges, and he has promised further study and discussion with those who have a stake in the issue.

DOJ_NMG_0130346

CIVIL LAW:

Firm Seeks Settlement Of Medicaid Claims Probe (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton

The Washington Times, February 12, 2007

U.S. Department of Justice criminal division lawyers say a Reston-based government consulting company either "willfully or recklessly" submitted inaccurate Medicaid claims on behalf of the D.C. government, the company recently disclosed.

Officials with Maximus Inc. said in a recent Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) filing that they disagree with the criminal division lawyers' assessment. The company also said it is engaged in ongoing talks with the Justice Department concerning a potential civil settlement, the SEC filing states.

Federal authorities began investigating Maximus' work for the District more than two years ago.

Though not outlined in the SEC filings, unsealed court records show that investigators have reviewed accusations in a False Claims Act lawsuit in which a former employee says the company overcharged the government tens of millions of dollars while Maximus was working for the District's foster care agency.

No charges have been filed against the company. Last week, Maximus first disclosed in SEC filings that Justice Department criminal division lawyers "have expressed their view that the company either willfully or recklessly submitted inaccurate claims to the federal government on behalf of the District of Columbia."

"Maximus disputes that view," company officials said. "Nevertheless, the criminal division attorneys have referred the company to attorneys for the civil division to determine if a civil resolution of the matter is possible. Those discussions are ongoing."

A spokesman for Jeffrey A. Taylor, U.S. attorney for the District, on Friday declined to comment, saying the matter is pending. There is no indication from Maximus' latest SEC filing that the criminal probe has concluded.

Maximus officials could not be reached for comment Friday. Previously, a company spokeswoman said the company has been cooperating with federal authorities and would not want to jeopardize its efforts by making individuals available for interviews.

In previous SEC filings in 2004 and 2005, Maximus officials said they don't believe the company broke any federal health care laws in connection with the federal investigation.

The SEC filing last week does not specify the scope of the investigation into Maximus' work for the District, beyond stating it is related to "issues pertaining to compliance with federal laws governing Medicaid claims."

The Washington Times reported last year that federal authorities started investigating Maximus after a former employee accused the company of submitting questionable Medicaid claims totaling approximately $33 million while working for the D.C. Child and Family Services Agency.

Under the consulting arrangement, Maximus was paid 10 cents of every Medicaid dollar it helped the city recoup, eventually netting the company more than $3 million for at least $30 million in Medicaid claims, according to the lawsuit.

However, the 2003 False Claims Act lawsuit filed against Maximus by former employee Benjamin Turner says the Medicaid-billing project was "grounded in fraud."

A billing review found more than half of the foster children for whom Maximus prepared Medicaid claims had no record of actually having received services, according to the suit.

In addition, the lawsuit said the D.C. government, unaware of the purported mischarging, lost more than $3 million.

Previously, Maximus has declined to comment on Mr. Turner's lawsuit, saying it has not been served with the complaint and that public records show the suit was ultimately dismissed from Alexandria federal court in June 2005.

Within days of the lawsuit's dismissal in Alexandria, unsealed filings in Mr. Turner's case show that his complaint was filed in D.C. federal court on June 21, 2005.

No records of the case appear on the public docket in federal court in the District. False Claims Act complaints usually are kept under seal until dismissal or until the Justice Department decides whether to take over prosecution of the case.

In the latest filing last week, Maximus said it cannot predict how much the investigation could cost the company beyond $500,000 already set aside for an internal review.

DOJ_NMG_0130347

"We are unable to quantify the probability of criminal or civil prosecution or the probability or magnitude of any other expenditure, fine, penalty or settlement," Maximus officials wrote.

ANTITRUST:

EMI In Talks To Dump Copy Protection (USAT)

By Jefferson Graham

USA Today, February 12, 2007

LOS ANGELES — The music industry is looking ahead to life without copy protection.

Major label EMI — home of Coldplay and Norah Jones — is in discussions with online music stores about selling its music without copy protection, or digital rights management (DRM), according to two sources with direct knowledge of the talks who would not speak for attribution because discussions are ongoing.

Last week, Apple CEO Steve Jobs created a huge stir when he called on the music industry to dump DRM, saying it hinders sales. Yahoo Music general manager Dave Goldberg predicts that by Christmas, most of Yahoo's catalog will be DRM-free.

"The labels understand that DRM has to go," he says. "It's nothing but a tax on digital consumers. There's good momentum behind DRM going away."

He says sales would increase by 15% to 20% without DRM. Consumers have bitterly complained about DRM, which puts rules on how a song can be used. For instance, songs bought at Apple's iTunes Store can be easily played only on an iPod, and not on digital devices from Microsoft and SanDisk.

EMI spokesman Adam Grossberg wouldn't comment on the DRM-free proposal.

Big four music labels EMI, Warner, Sony BMG and Universal long have said they must have their work protected against piracy. Last week Warner reiterated its support for DRM.

Meanwhile, online piracy has continued to grow. Some 15 billion songs were downloaded for free via unauthorized file-sharing services in 2006, says measurement firm BigChampagne. Album sales continue to tumble — down 15% so far in 2007 according to Nielsen SoundScan — and labels are exploring options.

EMI, in fact, offered a non-copy-protected song from Jones on Yahoo Music and eMusic in late 2006.

Without restrictions on entire catalogs, "Sales would explode," says David Pakman, CEO of eMusic, the No. 2 online music retailer behind Apple's iTunes. "DRM has been holding the market back." His company is the only legitimate digital music service selling unrestricted songs, in the MP3 format. Its songs work with any music player, including the iPod.

By taking the DRM-free plunge, EMI "would slow the loss of its sales, and get a lot of attention for its artists," says James McQuivey, an analyst at Forrester Research. "EMI wouldn't have to worry about pirates, because anyone who wants to pirate music is already doing it. The paying customer is a different breed."

Russ Crupnick, an analyst with researcher NPD Group, says ending DRM would put all the music services on an equal footing. "If I'm a label, I'm thinking this is a good thing. I don't want Apple to totally control the market," he says.

Hindalco Pact To Buy Novelis Underlines India's Push Overseas (WSJ)

By Peter Wonacott In New Delhi And Paul Glader

The Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

Corporate India's emergence as a force in global deal making accelerated with Hindalco Industries Ltd.'s agreement to pay $3.43 billion for Novelis Inc., a maker of rolled aluminum used in products such as beer cans and cars.

The deal, announced yesterday, comes about two weeks after India's Tata Group won the bidding for British steelmaker Corus Group PLC, an $11.3 billion deal that was the biggest foreign acquisition by an Indian company. Hindalco's purchase of Novelis, which is incorporated in Canada and has its headquarters in Atlanta, would be the second-largest and underscores the drive of Indian companies to expand overseas by targeting struggling manufacturers and niche players in Western markets.

Hindalco's all-cash purchase would also include $2.4 billion of Novelis debt. If approved by Novelis shareholders and regulators, Novelis shareholders will receive $44.93 for each common share outstanding, according to a statement from the companies. The company's shares closed on the New York Stock Exchange Friday at $38.54, down 56 cents, and had reached a 52-week high of $41.50 on Feb. 6. Hindalco's shares Friday closed at 173.25 rupees ($3.94), down 1%.

The combined entity would be one of Asia's largest aluminum producers and the world's biggest maker of rolled aluminum by production, the companies said. Novelis's aluminum is also used in automobile manufacturing and in construction.

DOJ_NMG_0130348

India's Aditya Birla Group, which owns Hindalco, has been growing rapidly across a broad spectrum of industries, from cement and chemicals to telecommunications and financial services. Kumar Mangalam Birla, chairman of the Birla Group, said: "The acquisition is in line with our long-term strategies of expanding our global presence across our various businesses."

In 2005, Novelis was spun off from Montreal's Alcan Inc., the world's second-largest aluminum producer behind Pittsburgh-based Alcoa Inc. Novelis faces price caps on its long-term contracts, some of which are expected to last at least another two years. Those caps keep Novelis selling canned stock, which is used to make aluminum beverage cans, far below current market prices, according to some industry experts. Novelis reported a net loss of $102 million in the third quarter of 2006 on revenue of $2.5 billion.

"In my opinion, they are overpaying," said Stewart Spector, an aluminum-industry consultant with offices in New York and Florida. "It seems to me that $6 billion is an awful big premium to pay for a messy operation."

James King, a metals consultant in Britain, said he thought other possible bidders could still step up for Novelis, including Russian aluminum maker Rusal and U.S.-based aluminum processor Aleris.

Robert Unger, a New Jersey-based aluminum consultant with Planned Technology Associates Inc., said Hindalco may want to buy Novelis now to benefit from better price contracts in the future.

The Novelis acquisition mirrors other recent Indian bids to buy North American and European companies that may be struggling in their home markets. Earlier this month, Tata beat out a rival bid from Brazil's Cia. Siderurgica Nacional to win Corus. The rising price of iron ore and relatively high labor costs had squeezed margins for the British steelmaker.

Indian companies are striking big deals in pharmaceuticals -- adding to the global reach of the country's drug makers -- and buying overseas energy assets to feed an economy at home that is growing about 9% a year. Meanwhile, the country's technology giants, such as Infosys Technologies Ltd., have aimed for smaller acquisitions in niche markets for software services.

With readily available capital supporting overseas ambitions, the Indian buying binge is expected to pick up speed in the coming months. Indian banks have shown a willingness to lend at low rates while a strong stock market has provided another option to raise cash. In 2006, Indian companies completed a record $7.17 billion in overseas mergers and acquisitions, up from $4.4 billion the year before, according to Dealogic Holding PLC, a market-research firm based in London. Already, the value of completed and announced deals in 2007 far exceeds last year's total.

Still, Indian companies are relative newcomers to overseas deal making. Even established global conglomerates such as the Tata Group have shown a reluctance to substantially revamp their new operations to cut costs, preferring instead to offer newly acquired units plenty of autonomy in an effort to pick up lessons in home markets.

At a news conference to announce the deal, Mr. Birla, the group's chairman, said that Novelis executives will continue to stay with the company and there will be no job cuts. "Novelis is adequately staffed," he said.

While the transaction has been approved by both companies' boards, Novelis shareholders must still agree to the deal by a two-thirds majority. The transaction is also subject to regulatory approvals. The companies said they expect the deal to be completed by the second quarter of 2007.

Nasdaq Concedes On LSE As Offer Lapses (FT)

By Richard Beales In New York

Financial Times, February 12, 2007

Nasdaq has conceded defeat in its most recent bid for the London Stock Exchange, saying on Saturday that the £2.7bn bid had lapsed without the US exchange receiving enough acceptances to control the LSE.

It indicated, however, that it would remain a long-term holder of LSE shares, saying it “will monitor with interest how the business performs going forward.”

Nasdaq cannot make another bid for the LSE for at least 12 months, but the stake it has accumulated is large enough to discourage other likely bidders.

Nasdaq holds a 28.75 per cent stake - or as much as 29.16 per cent after acceptances of just 0.41 per cent, which are not binding now the offer has lapsed - accumulated during its second and latest campaign to buy its London rival. Clara Furse, chief executive of the LSE, has consistently rejected Nasdaq’s overtures and has refused even to discuss the offer with Bob Greifeld, her opposite number at Nasdaq.

“As can be seen from the transaction documentation, Nasdaq and LSE clearly have a significant difference of view on the prospective future performance of the LSE business,” Nasdaq said in a statement on Saturday after the 1pm London deadline for acceptances had passed.

It maintained that its £12.43 a share cash offer represented a “full and fair price.”

“This view has been arrived at following careful consideration of the challenges facing the LSE business model going forward.”

DOJ_NMG_0130349

The outcome was as expected after LSE shares consistently traded above the value of Nasdaq's offer. They closed on Friday at £12.82, about 3 per cent above the £12.43 bid price, albeit short of recent highs above £13 each.

LSE shareholders, including corporate raider Samuel Heyman, Paulson & Co., an activist hedge fund, are among those to have increased their holdings at prices higher than Nasdaq's offer.

Mr Greifeld said yesterday that he was "naturally disappointed" but this "disappointment is tempered by the knowledge that we remained true to our value case."

"We have a highly disciplined approach to acquisitions and will only consummate transactions to the extent that they deliver clear and visible benefits for Nasdaq shareholders, and enable us to allocate benefits to market participants."

The LSE has now fended off four prospective bidders and left itself with no obvious suitor for the first time in more than two years.

It responded yesterday with a short dismissive statement. It said it would continue to fulfill its vision to be the world's capital market "without the distraction of ill-considered approaches which fail to understand the value of the business."

Mr Greifeld said last week that if the bid failed, Nasdaq could hold onto its stake in the LSE for 18 months, keeping its options open. He said the London group and its supporters had not grasped the rapid intensification of competition that would follow the introduction of new European regulations known as Mifid.

Nasdaq repeated that view yesterday, saying that it believed the London equity trading market was facing unprecedented change with the introduction of Mifid.

Nasdaq already faces competition from new share trading platforms in the US, as well as from its New York rival, the NYSE Group. Mr Greifeld suggested the same would begin to happen to the LSE, potentially undermining its profitablity.

"Nasdaq's experience of growing volume in a competitive environment suggests that yield pressure could be intense. This in turn will impact upon LSE's future financial performance and hence its value case. The accuracy or inaccuracy of LSE's projections can only be proven through the passage of time and Nasdaq, as LSE's largest shareholder, will monitor with interest how the business performs going forward."

It also said that Nasdaq would "continue to pursue other opportunities to build on its existing position as the world's largest electronic equities exchange."

Nasdaq Fails In Hostile Takeover Bid For London Stock Exchange (WSJ)

By Alistair Macdonald

The Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

Nasdaq Stock Market Inc. has failed in its bid to buy the London Stock Exchange Group PLC, its second attempt on the LSE.

Nasdaq said that less than 1% of the LSE's shareholders had tendered their shares by today's deadline.

Its chief executive Bob Greifeld said he was "disappointed" with the result but the exchange had shown itself disciplined in its bid by sticking to its valuation of the LSE.

The LSE welcomed the news, saying it can now get on with its business without the "distraction of ill-considered approaches which fail to understand the value of the business."

Chris Gibson-Smith, the LSE's chairman, said the exchange will progress "various competitive, collaborative and strategic opportunities."

Many of its investors partly rejected Nasdaq's bid because they think there are other merger opportunities for the LSE.

The Nasdaq revealed Saturday that it had received acceptances worth just 0.41% of the British bourse's ordinary shares. Even added to the 28.75% share holding the New York-based exchange built up by buying in the market in recent months, that remained well short of the 50% it needed to begin taking control.

Revealing the results after a formal deadline for shareholders to accept the $24.35 per share bid had passed, Nasdaq stuck by its claim that the LSE was overvalued.

Nasdaq was just one of many suitors for the LSE in recent years -- Deutsche Boerse AG and Australia's Macquarie Bank Ltd. made formal approaches while Euronext NV cited interest without naming a price -- amid increasing pressure on stock exchanges to find merger partners so they can compete globally.

The New York Stock Exchange is due to close its $14.3 billion acquisition of Euronext, the operator of the Paris, Amsterdam, Brussels and Lisbon exchanges, within the next couple of months. The NYSE also recently took a major stake in India's largest bourse and signed a broad agreement with the Tokyo Stock Exchange, the world's second-biggest financial market.

A combination of the Nasdaq and LSE would have created the world's second trans-Atlantic exchange with about 6,400 listed companies carrying a total market value of $11.8 trillion.

DOJ_NMG_0130350

Nasdaq is now barred under British takeover law from renewing its bid for a year and declined to say Saturday what it planned to do with the 29.16% stake in the London bourse it retains.

Failed Bid Is Setback For Growth At Nasdaq (NYT)

By Diana B. Henriques

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

The Nasdaq Stock Market faces the task of rebuilding its foreign expansion strategy after the emphatic rejection this weekend of its second unwelcome bid to acquire the London Stock Exchange.

Less than one half of 1 percent of the London exchange's stockholders responded to Nasdaq's offer to acquire their shares for $24.35, leaving the American exchange well short of the majority it needed to take control. The bid, for a total of $5.3 billion, had brought about much public bickering between the two companies, with the London exchange calling the price too low.

The failed takeover leaves both the Nasdaq and the London Stock Exchange without a strong international presence at a time when stock trading has become an increasingly global business. NYSE Group, parent of the New York Stock Exchange, for instance, has made deals with three foreign exchanges within the last year.

One of those deals was a limited alliance last month with the Tokyo Stock Exchange, which is now in talks with the London Stock Exchange over what might become a similar relationship, according to one Tokyo exchange official. If the London and Tokyo exchanges paired up, it could put even more pressure on Nasdaq to find a foreign partner.

The new arrangement between the New York Stock Exchange and the Tokyo exchange includes plans for joint listings of securities and exchange-traded funds, the exchange of trading technology and — at some later time — the possibility of future investments in each other's shares. The Tokyo exchange is the largest and wealthiest trading center in Asia and the second-largest in the world, after the New York Stock Exchange.

That alliance was announced Jan. 31 during a visit to the New York exchange by the Tokyo exchange's president, Taizo Nishimuro. A report by the Kyodo news agency in Japan that Mr. Nishimuro may visit London soon, perhaps in late February, has led to speculation that a similar deal may be imminent.

The London exchange has rejected a string of suitors over the past year, despite pressure from hedge funds and other private investors. After the deadline for the Nasdaq bid passed, the London exchange issued a statement saying that it "looks forward to fulfilling its vision to be the world's capital market, without the distraction of ill-considered approaches which fail to understand the value of the business."

Robert Greifeld, Nasdaq's chief executive, responded to the setback by saying that his exchange "will continue to pursue other opportunities to build on its existing position as the world's largest electronic equities exchange."

Under British takeover rules, Nasdaq cannot make another bid for the London exchange for a year unless someone else does so. Nasdaq still holds about 28 percent of the London exchange's outstanding shares, a stake so large that it would make it hard for anyone else to buy the London exchange without its approval.

Even so, the New York Stock Exchange is seen as a potential bidder. At the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, last month, John A. Thain, the Big Board's chief executive, praised the London Stock Exchange as having the second strongest brand in world stock markets, behind his own.

Mr. Thain said that he was not interested in any new mergers until the New York exchange completed integrating its operations with those of Euronext, the Paris-based European marketplace. That process will take about a year, he said.

People informed about Nasdaq's strategy would say only that the exchange intended to keep its options open. Holding on to its London Stock Exchange stake, which was largely financed with borrowed funds, would be inconsistent with Nasdaq's argument over the past year that the London exchange's shares were overvalued.

Keeping the shares "doesn't make sense," said William C. Freund, a former chief economist at the New York Stock Exchange and now the director of the Center for the Study of Securities Markets at Pace University. "It was a long shot to begin with. I would expect them to sell."

If there is a winner in the weekend's drama, Professor Freund said, it is perhaps the New York Stock Exchange. "There has been an intense competition among markets globally, but particularly between the New York Stock Exchange and the Nasdaq," he said. "It seems to me this puts Nasdaq significantly behind in the race."

Besides its alliance with Tokyo and merger with Euronext, the New York Stock Exchange has also bought a 5 percent stake in the National Stock Exchange, India's largest market. Its Tokyo alliance could lead to a more substantial tie-up after 2009, when the Japanese exchange is scheduled to make its own initial public offering. It had originally planned to do this last year, but delayed the listing after embarrassing and costly computer problems that repeatedly paralyzed trading.

U.K.'s Vodafone Secures A Passage Into India (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0130351

By Eric Bellman In Mumbai And Jason Singer And Cassell Bryan-low In London

The Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

Vodafone Group PLC's deal to acquire a majority stake in Indian cellphone operator Hutchison Essar Ltd. for $11.1 billion is expected to give the British company a perch from which to tackle one of the fastest-growing and most promising cellphone markets.

But the hefty price the world's largest cellphone-service company by sales is paying may test the patience of Vodafone shareholders just as Chief Executive Arun Sarin has been working to rebuild investor confidence. To win the auction for the Hutchison Essar stake, Vodafone ended up with a bid that valued the whole company more than $2 billion higher than its initial nonbinding offer of $16.5 billion. But Mr. Sarin defended the price tag by pointing to the Indian market's fast growth. "This is an excellent investment for our shareholders," he said in a conference call.

The stake was put up for sale several months ago by a unit of Hutchison Whampoa Ltd. of Hong Kong, which owned 67% of the company. India's Essar Group, which owns the rest, said yesterday that Vodafone had offered to be a partner with Essar in running the company. Vodafone said it would also offer to buy Essar's stake at the same per-share price it is paying Hutchison.

"We have been offered by Vodafone to be their partner," said Ravi Ruia, Essar Group vice chairman. "We are at the moment evaluating all our options in the best interest of the group." Essar is expected to decide in the next few weeks.

Mr. Sarin said that while Essar would be Vodafone's preferred partner, if the Indian company does decide to sell its stake, then "we have other partners we can invite in." He didn't say who those partners might be.

The winning bid also provides a valuable exit for Hutchison. Vodafone, which said it is assuming $2 billion in debt, said the deal values all of Hutchison Essar, India's fourth-largest cellular provider by number of subscribers, at $18.8 billion including debt. That sets its worth at a high premium to other telecommunications companies in India and around the world.

Vodafone's willingness to pay what analysts view as a hefty price for the stake, even though Indian laws require Vodafone to have a local partner to operate the company and serve as minority shareholder, reflects the attractiveness of India as a market. Not only is the Indian economy growing about 9% a year, but its cellphone industry is in relative infancy, making it a sharp contrast to many saturated Western markets.

More than six million new subscribers in India are added every month, yet fewer than 15% of Indians use a cellphone now, and cellular networks cover only about half the country. The overall market is expected to expand more than 30% this year, says Gartner India Research & Advisory Services.

ON THE LINE

· What's New: Vodafone will buy a majority stake in Indian cellphone operator Hutchison Essar for $11.1 billion.

· What's at Stake: India is seen as a big growth market for cellphones, and Vodafone had to beat out other bidders to strike a deal.

· What's Next: Vodafone could face investor scrutiny for paying what some consider a hefty price.

Vodafone also had to bid high to beat out others interested in the stake, underscoring another trend in the global cellphone industry. For years, Western operators had the cash and heft to snap up assets in emerging markets. But recently they have been joined by wealthy local players looking to expand their own operations, often with high stock prices to aid acquisitions paid in shares. This has intensified bidding for promising assets in fast-growing markets and driven up prices.

For Vodafone, winning the bidding for Hutchison's stake represents its own bold new bet on emerging markets. It also marks a test for Mr. Sarin, an Indian-born U.S. citizen, and could come to be viewed as the defining moment of his tenure at the company.

Vodafone was one of four bidders for the stake. The others were Reliance Communications Ltd. of India, Hinduja Group of India and Essar Group itself. Hutchison Telecommunications International Ltd., which is controlled by Hutchison Whampoa, decided to sell its 67% stake in Hutchison Essar as the value of mobile-phone operators in the few remaining large and expanding markets surged in recent months.

Reliance, which runs India's second-largest cellular network, and Hinduja weren't available for comment.

Separately, Vodafone said European customers will be able to access Google Inc.'s popular video portal YouTube by mobile phone, building on a series of recent mobile Internet deals.

Initially, Vodafone will have an exclusive deal with YouTube in the U.K., making it the only operator able to offer mobile-phone users a version of the video-clip site. The world's largest mobile-phone operator by revenue plans to extend the service across Europe.

DOJ_NMG_0130352

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

In Congress, Climate Talks Loom (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt

Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

WASHINGTON -- As he begins a series of hearings on climate change, the chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee said he is open to considering caps on harmful carbon emissions and higher fuel-economy standards for autos.

Many environmentalists worry that Rep. John Dingell (D., Mich.), a pivotal player in the looming climate fight in Congress and an ally of U.S. auto makers, could become a roadblock to meaningful legislation. He has long fought big increases in fuel-economy standards, and as Energy and Commerce chair, he has the power to block strict environmental regulations. His flexibility on such measures would boost the chances of them clearing Congress this year.

"We've got to consider every single option we have," Mr. Dingell said in an interview, making clear that he isn't ruling anything out at this point. "There's no way I can."

Starting tomorrow, Mr. Dingell's panel will convene twice-a-week hearings on climate change, with sessions expected to run through at least mid-April. The hearings will focus on the causes and consequences of climate change, as well as potential remedies. Former Vice President Al Gore, who has an Oscar-nominated movie, "An Inconvenient Truth," on global warming, will testify March 21.

A half-dozen different House committees have a claim on legislation addressing climate change, and Speaker Nancy Pelosi is moving to create a select panel that will cut across jurisdictions to focus public attention on the issue.

The heart of the legislative fight will be in the Energy and Commerce Committee, which has sweeping jurisdiction over environmental and business issues, and Mr. Dingell is moving to frame the debate. In a memo to committee members, Mr. Dingell likened it to the 1990 struggle to enact landmark clean-air legislation. He noted that effort -- which he helped shepherd -- was "of similar complexity and extremely hard-fought."

Five of the 57 Energy and Commerce Committee members were on the panel in 1990, and Mr. Dingell's aggressive hearing schedule is designed both to educate members and begin sorting out what is politically possible among rank-and-file lawmakers. Beyond the public sessions, Mr. Dingell is convening closed-door briefings for committee aides every Friday. In a session last week, members of the U.N. panel on climate change spoke to the group. Aides said Mr. Dingell also is meeting with other key lawmakers, including Senate Environment and Public Works Committee Chairman Barbara Boxer (D., Calif.), who has made addressing climate change a priority of her panel.

The goal is to produce legislation ready for House floor action by the end of June, a deadline imposed by Ms. Pelosi. "It's going to be very hard," Mr. Dingell said.

Details remain to be worked out. The House appears to be staking out the clearest course for action on the issue. The Senate has yet to stir to action, but Sens. Boxer and Jeff Bingaman (D., N.M.) are pressing the issue.

Mr. Dingell said conservation measures will be considered, as will proposals to encourage use of biofuels. He also vowed to consider measures raising fuel economy standards for autos, along with proposals to cap carbon emissions from plants and factories.

Sen. Stevens Pushes For Tougher Fuel-economy Standards (LAT)

By Richard Simon

Los Angeles Times, February 12, 2007

Lawmakers who have opposed stricter emissions standards find themselves pressured to combat climate change.

For decades, Sen. Ted Stevens has battled environmentalists, but the Alaska Republican now finds himself in an unusual spot: pushing tougher fuel-economy standards for cars.

Amid heightened concerns over global warming and U.S. dependence on foreign oil, Stevens is one of a number of lawmakers shifting gears in the debate over whether Congress should mandate stricter miles-per-gallon rules.

"I'm trying to protect my state," said Stevens, who recently called climate change "more apparent in Alaska than anywhere else."

The 83-year-old senator's change of heart illustrates how the landscape has shifted in Congress, and could signal a turning point in the long campaign by environmentalists — successfully fended off by Detroit — to toughen fuel-economy standards.

"There is clear bipartisan agreement, for the first time in 30 years, that Congress is going to have to act to increase fuel economy standards," said Philip E. Clapp, president of the National Environmental Trust.

DOJ_NMG_0130353

Cars and light trucks — including SUVs, pickups and vans — account for about one-fifth of U.S. carbon dioxide production. The better the fuel economy, the lower the emissions of carbon dioxide, blamed for contributing to global warming.

For years, Congress has debated whether to mandate higher standards as the fleet-average fuel economy has declined from its peak in the mid-1980s. Under a 1975 law passed after the Arab oil embargo, each automaker's car fleet must average 27.5 miles per gallon and its light trucks 22.2 miles per gallon. The car standard has been untouched for 18 years; the truck standard will increase to 24 miles per gallon by 2011.

Stevens is sponsoring a bill to raise the standards for cars to 40 miles per gallon within a decade. Just two years ago, he voted against a similar measure. Stevens said he is convinced Detroit can build more fuel-efficient cars.

"Unless we put some urgency behind it and tell them we mean business," he said in a recent interview, "nothing's going to happen."

Legislation to require an increase faces strong opposition from the U.S. auto industry and its congressional allies, who contend it would lead to lighter, less safe vehicles; threaten auto industry jobs; and limit consumer choice.

Citing Detroit's economic woes, Rep. Joe L. Barton of Texas, the top Republican on the House Energy and Commerce Committee, said: "The last time I looked at the business pages, Ford and GM were ... hemorrhaging jobs, they're losing market share. Yeah, let's pile on and pass a 40-mile-per-gallon mandate."

President Bush, although he called for an increase in fuel-efficiency standards in his State of the Union address, opposes any effort by Congress to mandate stricter rules.

Still, fuel-economy standards are likely to emerge as an issue in the presidential campaign, which could spark action in Congress.

Announced and prospective candidates Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.) and former Sen. John Edwards (D-N.C.) have supported stricter miles-per-gallon rules. That has prompted a Detroit ally, Rep. Joe Knollenberg (R-Mich.), to remind them that the Big Three automakers have plants in 17 states "that account for 225 electoral votes."

The last time the Senate voted on the issue, during consideration of the 2005 energy bill, a proposal to increase the standard to 40 miles per gallon by 2016 drew just 28 votes. In the House, a more modest proposal to raise the standard was rejected 254-177.

But some of those who voted against tougher standards in the past now support an increase, and Detroit's allies are worried. "The threat is at its highest level that it's ever been," said Knollenberg.

Those hoping Congress will act are encouraged.

"We now have Congress members on both sides of the aisle, plus the president, calling for a serious increase in fuel-economy standards," said David Friedman, research director for the clean vehicles program for the Union of Concerned Scientists. "I really do think this is the best chance we've had in quite a long time to actually get something serious passed."

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) has made passage of energy and global-warming legislation a priority and has moved to establish a special committee to recommend legislation, bypassing House Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John D. Dingell (D-Mich.), an auto industry ally who has fought tougher fuel-economy standards. The special committee is expected to be headed by Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.), the House's No. 1 champion of stricter miles-per-gallon rules.

Markey, who plans to introduce his fuel-economy bill this week, said, "I've had both Democrats and Republicans coming up to me on the floor saying they agree with me."

Some hope Dingell, who has invited former Vice President Al Gore to testify before his panel about global warming, may be swayed by his Democratic colleagues to consider at least a modest increase in fuel-economy standards. "He recognizes the demand from the broader caucus to get real action on global warming and oil security," said Daniel Lashof, science director of the climate center for the Natural Resources Defense Council.

On the other side of the Capitol, Sen. Daniel K. Inouye (D-Hawaii), chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee, hopes to begin writing a fuel-economy bill by spring. With both him and Stevens, the committee's top Republican, supporting an increase in the standards, a bill is virtually certain to reach the Senate floor this year.

Inouye is a cosponsor of a bill that would raise average fuel economy standards for all vehicles to 35 miles per gallon by 2019. California's Democratic senators, Dianne Feinstein and Barbara Boxer, are cosponsors.

Bush has set as a goal an increase of 4% per year, which would take average fuel economy to about 34 miles per gallon in 2017. Dan Becker, director of the Sierra Club's global warming program, said Bush's call has given cover to Republicans to support tougher standards.

And David Doniger, climate policy director for the Natural Resources Defense Council, said Stevens' unexpected support suggests that "maybe the time has come" for congressional action.

DOJ_NMG_0130354

Stevens isn't ready to abandon his fight to open the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil drilling. Nor is he ready to support mandatory limits on emissions from power plants. And some environmentalists remain suspicious of his motives, noting that his bill includes loopholes they don't like: for example, it applies only to cars, not SUVs.

But Becker said, "We welcome all epiphanies."

Congress Tackles Global Warming (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, February 12, 2007

More than a dozen competing measures have been introduced in Congress on the issue of global warming -- some minor, such as creating incentives for biofuel research, and others more drastic, such as taxing automakers for selling gas-guzzling sport utility vehicles.

The Democrats controlling Congress -- and a growing number of Republicans -- say this year the government will take significant action against climate change. They say President Bush helped the cause by mentioning it in his State of the Union address last month, as have the presidential candidates pushing the issue.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, has promised to introduce a package of bills by June 1 aimed at cutting greenhouse gases, with a vote slated for July 4.

"As the most adaptable creatures on the planet, it is time for us to continue to adapt," she said Thursday, testifying on global warming before the House Science and Technology Committee. Mrs. Pelosi assured anxious colleagues that global-warming legislation "can create the next generation of good-paying new jobs."

Sen. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut independent and a chief author of a leading global-warming bill, said there is a "very diverse cavalry" calling for action. His Climate Stewardship and Innovation Act is co-sponsored by Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican.

"Doing something about global warming now will cost us a lot less than waiting to pay the cost of the effects of global warming," Mr. Lieberman said of his bill, which imposes mandatory caps on greenhouse gas emissions so that in 2050 the levels would be one-third lower than 2000 levels.

It also would create emission credits to control the costs for businesses and encourage industries to comply, as well as protect poor people from high energy costs, he said.

Mr. McCain is running for president, as are Democratic Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois, who have also signed onto the bill as co-sponsors.

Mr. Obama talked about the issue in his announcement speech Saturday, saying: "We can turn this crisis of global warming into a moment of opportunity for innovation, and job creation, and an incentive for businesses that will serve as a model for the world."

The bill, which the Republican-led Senate defeated two years ago, this year faces a much friendlier group of lawmakers. The debate now stems over whether to impose mandatory emissions caps, and how much the government should aim to reduce heat-trapping gases in the next few decades.

Bills suggesting a gas-guzzler tax or one that authorizes more than $20 million in taxpayer funds to establish four "green" universities have a slim chance of passing Congress.

Others, such as the Republican bill to increase the fuel efficiency standard to 40 miles per gallon for all new cars by 2017, are sure to meet opposition from lawmakers from Michigan, home to the already struggling U.S. auto industry.

Rep. Thaddeus McCotter, Michigan Republican, warned that the swath of global-warming bills is causing "grave concern" for an already struggling economy.

"We're not looking to the federal government to make it harder for them," he said.

Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., Wisconsin Republican, also says he fears that legislation may be pushed "in a way that wrecks the American economy."

The Bush administration has proposed allowing the transportation secretary to raise the fuel standard 18 months before an automaker's model year and creating a credit system for companies with a head start.

Measures offering tax incentives for energy-efficient buildings and hybrid cars have support, and may be included in whatever sweeping measure is approved this year.

House leaders have not announced specific legislation they favor dealing with global warming, but several members have said there is bipartisan agreement on funding research for biofuel production.

Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee Chairman Jeff Bingaman of New Mexico is crafting a compromise bill to slow the increase in greenhouse gas emissions. Supporters describe his plan as moderate and one more likely to meet Mr. Bush's approval.

DOJ_NMG_0130355

Mrs. Pelosi last month announced the creation of a special global-warming panel, a move that irked Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John D. Dingell because it was widely viewed as an attempt to skirt him and tack regulations on automakers.

Last week the speaker and Mr. Dingell, a Michigan Democrat who has fought changes in fuel standards, came to a compromise. They agreed that the new committee, which would expire at the end of the 110th Congress, will hold hearings and recommend legislation but would not have the authority to approve legislation.

Next month, Congress will have extensive global-warming hearings, with former Vice President Al Gore slated to testify March 21. Mrs. Pelosi said the U.S. must be innovative to meet the challenge, adding: "Green can be gold for our country."

Letters (WSJ)

Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

LETTERS

If the Big Six Want to Talk About CO2 Emissions, California Will Listen

In response to your Feb. 6 editorial "Legal Hot Air":

The world's six largest automakers are crying foul about a recent case filed by California seeking redress for CO2-induced damage. They argue that courts are not the proper place for this kind of "global" issue. This sudden aversion to litigation is perplexing, given that these same companies have sued states repeatedly, in numerous jurisdictions, insisting that the courts must overturn all state laws dealing with greenhouse gas emissions. The companies hew to this path of complete resistance despite the fact that the vast majority of climate scientists believe that the world is facing a potential catastrophe.

Let me be clear: I also would prefer to reach solutions outside of the courthouse. Litigation can be expensive and time consuming. That is why I asked for a meeting with each of the CEOs of the car companies to find practical solutions to global warming. If they want to sideline the lawyers and talk about solutions, I am all for it. Meantime, they shouldn't call California's lawsuit "frivolous" while maintaining so many lawsuits of their own.

California's public nuisance case is well grounded in precedent. For more than 100 years the Supreme Court has allowed states to take legal action to prevent the destruction of their air and natural resources. In a case called Georgia v. Tennessee Copper, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes -- not a man known for indulging frivolous claims -- wrote, "It is a fair and reasonable demand on the part of a sovereign that the air over its territory should not be polluted on a great scale . . . or threatened by the act of persons beyond its control. . . ." More recently, the Supreme Court declared, "Air pollution is, of course, one of the most notorious types of public nuisance in modern experience."

The Big Six automakers generate 20% of all of the human-made carbon dioxide emissions in the U.S., and at least 30% of such emissions in California. Yet they oppose any federal action to curtail greenhouse gases. To date, their intense lobbying has been very successful: Congress has not improved fuel efficiency standards in 15 years, President Bush steadfastly refuses to consider caps on greenhouse gases, and the Environmental Protection Agency says that the Clean Air Act does not apply to CO2.

Meanwhile, California, with more than one thousand miles of coastline and a Sierra snow pack containing one third of the state's annual water supply, faces rising sea levels and rapidly melting snow. This threatens levees, flood control systems and California's irrigated agriculture. Already, spring snow melt occurs a week earlier, with greater flooding, than it did 30 years ago. The U.N. Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change just warned us again that the threats from global warming are mounting. It is time to act.

Under our tripartite system of government, courts have an essential role to play, even in issues as complex as global warming. Justice Holmes could be speaking directly to the automakers, when he wrote: "This is a suit by a state for an injury to it in its capacity of quasi-sovereign. In that capacity the state has an interest independent of . . . its citizens, in all the earth and air within its domain. It has the last word as to whether its mountains shall be stripped of their forests and its inhabitants shall breathe pure air." And, we can add, whether emissions of greenhouse gases can harm its economy and environment.

Global warming is a serious, unavoidable challenge and we need to face it. The path of litigation, first taken up by the auto companies, is not my preference. But a legal cease fire requires that both sides lay down their arms. We should use our considerable joint resources to help fashion a common sense and practical approach. I stand ready to do so.

Edmund G. Brown Jr.

Attorney General of California

Sacramento

Required Health Plans Ethically Impossible

We read of health-care plan after plan that in some manner "require" all people to purchase health insurance ("The Budget and Your Wallet -- How Plans to Expand Health Coverage Could Affect Insured," Personal Journal, Feb. 6). Exactly what are we to do with the person who doesn't purchase health insurance (thus, breaking the law), and then who shows up at the door of the ER with chest pains?

DOJ_NMG_0130356

Until we are willing to let people die on the steps of the hospital, an approach that I don't support, any law "requiring" the purchase of coverage, without active enforcement and without penalties for non-compliance, will quickly be written off by the uncovered masses as a law without teeth. "Requiring" coverage is just a feel-good phrase.

Mark McAllister

Johnston, Iowa

Gutter Snipes or Savvy Businessmen?

Friday's piece on strippers and Super Bowl Sunday ("Wardrobe Malfunctions, Inc.," Weekend Journal, Feb. 2) was certainly funny, but the sound of my own chuckles had the fortunate effect of bringing me to my senses. I remembered how our popular culture continues to slide into the gutter without much of a splash or any apparent resistance from those who know better.

Who but a sanctimonious prude would question another man's decision to amuse his friends at half time by paying a stranger to remove her clothing right there in the den among the nachos, chicken wings and Little League trophies? To call it sleazy or dishonorable seems too harsh and uncomfortably judgmental.

And that's my point. Hiring a stripper is sleazy and dishonorable, but I get the sense that, by an unspoken rule among us men, we're all supposed to keep our mouths shut about it and just have a few laughs. The tone of this story, even its publication, suggests that the Journal has, on some level, adopted that unspoken rule. We should all know better. Why not some dissent for a change?

John Mulcahy

Philadelphia

Sam Walker wrote a really terrific article. I administer a class at the University of Arizona designed to encourage science students to become entrepreneurs, and only days ago did we discuss supply-chain management and distribution. When I read this piece, I was delighted how he exposed the business side of this industry and articulated the need for superb supply-chain management and customer-needs analysis to sustain and grow these businesses. The article reinforced a guiding principle I emphasize in my class: The fundamentals of operation, sustainability, growth and expansion of any business are universal across industry lines. The distribution techniques that bring triumph to the "exotic dancing" industry can also bring success in biotechnology and optics. The article serves as a great case study. You can learn a lot from any victorious business, and I hope my students got this message from the piece as much as I did.

Director of Special Projects

College of Science

The University of Arizona

Tucson, Ariz.

What Mean Means

Dr. Robert Myers, in his Feb. 1 Letter to the Editor responding to Charles Murray's three-part editorial-page series "On Education," compounds Mr. Murray's original error regarding definitions of mathematical mean vs. mathematical median. Mr. Murray stated that half of all children in the U.S. are below average intelligence; Dr. Myers stated that Mr. Murray should have written below the mean, not the average.

The mean and the average are the same thing. What both authors should have said is median. The median, by definition, is the value below which exactly half of the sample points fall. Though for many common statistical distributions the mean, a.k.a. average, and the median are close, sometimes equal, they are not necessarily so.

Arthur H.M. Ross, Ph.D.

Laguna Niguel, Calif.

Senator Seeks to Focus The War on al Qaeda

Kimberley A. Strassel's Feb. 2 Potomac Watch column "Senator Feingold's Sin" was right to single out the senator's "honesty" and "backbone" for his effort to require that U.S. troops be redeployed from Iraq. But to say that "the Wisconsin pacifist might not understand the importance of winning in Iraq" misunderstands Sen. Feingold and his effort, which is based on strengthening U.S. national security above all else.

The senator called for redeploying our troops from Iraq because our massive, indefinite presence there is weakening our ability to fight the terrorist networks that threaten this country around the world. He voted to go to war in Afghanistan precisely because he wanted U.S. forces to eliminate the Taliban and destroy a safe haven for terrorist networks that threaten our country.

DOJ_NMG_0130357

As your editorial noted, Congress has the power to end a war. Sen. Feingold wants Congress to use that power to end U.S. involvement in this disastrous war in Iraq, so that we can fight al Qaeda and other global threats more aggressively and effectively. That doesn't sound like a pacifist, does it?

Virgin Thinking (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

Richard Branson's $25 million contest to solicit ways to remove carbon dioxide from the atmosphere has many things to recommend it. Not least that it is anything but climate-change politics as usual.

True, the judges for Mr. Branson's challenge hail from the Apocalypse Now crowd; Al Gore joined Sir Richard for Friday's announcement. But the billionaire Briton is plunking down his own money for the prize, rather than asking middle-class taxpayers to pony up, à la the Kyoto Protocol and other top-down schemes favored by environmentalists and European politicians.

Who knows whether it will prove possible to reduce existing stocks of CO2 from the atmosphere. We're pretty sure, though, that technology and innovation are far more likely to make it happen than Kyoto-style restrictions on emissions. Yes, that means that Mr. Branson and other entrepreneurs may make a profit along the way. Yet if the climate-change activists are truly concerned with saving the Earth -- rather than with punishing "bad" industries like aviation, one source of Mr. Branson's fortune -- then surely they won't object.

As for claims that "we cannot afford to wait for futuristic solutions which may never materialize," as Friends of the Earth director Tony Juniper told Britain's Press Association, there's the obvious irony that the alleged ravages of climate change are themselves decades off. Finding new ways of dealing with these dangers, if they ever do materialize, seems far more sensible than crippling the world economy now. As environmentalists like to say, it's the "sustainable approach."

Producers The New Math Of Alternative Energy (WSJ)

By Rebecca Smith

Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

The numbers are starting to look promising.

For years, the big criticism of alternative energy was cost: It was too expensive compared with energy based on traditional fuels like coal and natural gas.

Even though the fuel was often free -- such as wind or the sun's rays -- alternative-energy producers had to plow lots of money into finding the best way to capture that energy and convert it into electricity. Fossil-fuel producers, on the other hand, could draw on billions of dollars in infrastructure investments and decades of know-how.

Now the equation is showing significant signs of change. Costs are falling for some alternative-energy sources, driven by new technology and renewed development interest.

Alternative energy still can't compete with fossil fuels on price. But the margins are narrowing, particularly since oil and gas prices have been rising. The math looks even more favorable if you consider the environmental cost of fossil fuels -- which most purely economic calculations don't.

Alternative energy still faces obstacles to mainstream success. Many projects need government or utility subsidies and incentives to be viable. Generating costs have risen recently for some types of renewable resources, pushed by higher materials prices, labor costs and demand. Supply chains are prone to hiccups, and wind and solar-energy resources need backup sources of power to compensate on windless or cloudy days.

For all its promise, relatively little electricity currently comes from renewable sources, other than hydropower. According to the Energy Information Administration, renewable resources produced 2.3% of the U.S. electricity supply in 2005. Bio-mass was responsible for 1.5%, wind for 0.44%, geothermal for 0.36% and solar power for a scant 0.01%.

In contrast, coal-fired generation produced 49.7% of U.S. electricity supplies in 2005, followed by nuclear power at 19.3%, natural gas at 19.1%, hydropower at 6.5% and oil-fired generation at 3%.

But alternative energy stands to gain a larger share in years to come. Driven by concerns about global warming and energy security -- as well as the rising cost of electricity generated by fossil fuels -- regulators are forcing electric utilities to broaden their resource mix to include more "green" power.

At the same time, the federal government is requiring oil companies to blend more plant-based biofuels like ethanol with gasoline. Equipment makers are expanding their production lines, which should ease recent shortages of some materials -- like the polysilicon used in solar panels -- and take pressure off prices.

Here's a look at the economics of the various alternative-energy sources -- how much they cost now and what developments could make them more competitive.

WIND

DOJ_NMG_0130358

Wind power stands out as one of the splashiest success stories in renewable energy. Over the past 10 years, as wind farms sprouted around the world, the cost of generating electricity from wind has fallen dramatically.

In 1980, wind-power electricity cost 80 cents per kilowatt hour; by 1991 it cost 10 cents, according to the International Energy Agency.

Today, production costs at the best on-shore sites have dropped as low as 3 cents to 4 cents per kilowatt hour, but are more typically 6 cents to 9 cents, not counting subsidies -- getting closer to the cost of generating electricity from burning coal. In fact, costs are approaching the point where wind power may be able to prosper without subsidies -- currently 1.9 cents a kilowatt hour in the U.S. -- particularly if natural-gas prices stay high.

The Department of Energy's Energy Information Administration has concluded that there isn't much difference between the cost of new power plants using wind and other traditional fuels, such as nuclear, coal and natural gas, if you take into account a broad array of expenses. A plant entering service in 2015, the administration said in a 2006 report, could make electricity from wind for 5.58 cents a kilowatt hour -- versus 5.25 cents for natural gas, 5.31 cents for coal and 5.93 cents for nuclear. The report didn't quantify the differing environmental impacts.

A host of factors have brought down the cost of wind power. The materials used in wind turbines have improved, and the turbines are now much larger and more efficient: 125 meters in rotor diameter, compared with 10 meters in the 1970s. The cost of financing wind farms also has dropped as financial markets become more comfortable with the risks involved.

Governments have also given wind power a boost. In Germany, the largest wind-power producer, the government has been giving grants to builders of wind farms since the late 1980s, and requires utilities to buy electricity generated from renewable sources at premium rates. The extra cost is passed on to consumers.

In the U.S., the extension of the federal Production Tax Credit -- which gives tax credits to alternative-energy companies -- has spurred record development over the past two years, as have state renewable-procurement targets. The nation's wind-power generating capacity increased by 27% in 2006 to 11,603 megawatts, according to the American Wind Energy Association. Only gas-fired generators added more megawatts of capacity in the U.S. The association expects wind-power capacity to increase by an additional 26% this year.

By the end of 2005, there were about 59,000 megawatts of total installed capacity of wind power world-wide, enough for the needs of roughly 20 million homes. Two-thirds of that capacity is in Europe; Germany, Spain, the U.S., India and Denmark are the top five producers of wind power.

Wind power faces hurdles. Factors like location, wind speeds and capital costs have a big impact on the cost of generating wind power. The price of 3 cents to 4 cents per kilowatt hour only holds at sites with the best wind conditions. In some places with less wind, costs can still be as high as 20 cents per kilowatt hour. Meanwhile, a shortage of turbines the past couple of years has pushed up construction costs in the U.S., as has a weak dollar.

The turbine shortage, at least, could be easing soon. ABB Ltd., a big equipment vendor based in Zurich, says it has boosted production of transformers used by the wind industry at its plants in Virginia and Missouri. And in January, American Superconductor, of Westborough, Mass., completed its purchase of Windtec, a wind-turbine designer that recently inked deals with South Korean and Chinese manufacturers to build the machinery.

"As more companies manufacture wind turbines, we think prices will come down," says Jason Fredette, spokesman for American Superconductor, a maker of advanced electrical devices.

SOLAR

For decades, solar power has endured cycles of booms and busts as investors made big bets only to watch the technology fail to achieve its promise. Solar power still accounts for less than 1% of the world's power generation, with 5,400 megawatts of capacity on line, enough for the daytime needs of 2 million to 3 million homes. (Solar power doesn't generate electricity at night, meaning backup energy sources are needed.)

One reason there's relatively little solar electricity is that traditional solar panels aren't very efficient at converting sunlight to electricity. So most solar electricity is made and consumed at a single site -- and in many cases isn't even enough to meet the needs of a single house. A recent study by the New Jersey Board of Public Utilities found that it cost about $77,500 to install a 10 kilowatt-capacity system on a house. Without subsidies, it would take 50 years to pay for itself. With subsidies, it dropped to 9.6 years.

In all, the cost of generating electricity with solar panels is 35 cents to 45 cents per kilowatt hour, according to the International Energy Agency. In the U.S., costs are typically less -- 26 cents to 35 cents -- because there's better sun, says the U.S. Solar Energy Industry Association.

Now, however, a new generation of solar plants is on the cusp of being able to produce electricity on an industrial scale at competitive rates. The new plants use a technology called concentrating solar power, or CSP, which is much more powerful than the classic photovoltaic panels, which use semiconductor chips to convert sunlight into electricity. CSP plants use huge arrays of mirrors or solar dishes to track the sun and collect its heat to make electricity. The plants can generate hundreds of megawatts of power, closer to what fossil-fueled plants make.

DOJ_NMG_0130359

The major hurdle remains bringing generating costs in line with those of conventional power plants. It costs 9 cents to 12 cents to generate one kilowatt hour of electricity by CSP -- not counting any subsidies -- compared with about 3 cents to 5 cents to generate the same amount of electricity by burning coal.

Tom Mancini, CSP program manager at the Energy Department's Sandia National Laboratories, says three factors make CSP plants more expensive than a traditional coal plant even though the raw material -- the sun's rays -- is free. Because the technology is so new, the equipment is pricey in itself and costs more to operate and maintain. And financing such projects is costly because of the perceived risk. CSP is a young technology: Only 6% of solar energy is generated by CSP technology, with the lion's share still coming from traditional solar panels that typically are heavily subsidized by homeowners.

For now, CSP still needs government support to be viable, either in the form of tax breaks to builders of plants or subsidies to buyers of electricity. The industry scored a major coup in 2006 with the creation of a U.S. tax credit that equals 30% of a solar project's cost. A growing system of state-sponsored renewable-energy credits also gives developers a valuable revenue stream. The credits are bought and sold by businesses and utilities trying to meet greenhouse-gas reduction goals.

But the new technology has inspired a burst of development. Major power companies in Europe such as Abengoa SA of Spain and Enel SpA of Italy are spending billions on new plants that will be coming on line in the next few years. In California, utility companies Edison International and Sempra Energy have inked contracts to buy large sums of solar power from proposed projects. In Nevada, Solargenix Energy LLC plans to bring a 64 megawatt solar plant into service this year.

Energy experts argue that as more CSP plants go into operation, the technology will improve and costs will come down. But with current costs high, few companies are willing to take the risk of building without significant government incentives. "It's a chicken-and-egg situation," says Mr. Mancini.

BIOMASS

Although it doesn't get much public attention, biomass is the biggest source of renewable electricity in the U.S. today -- producing more electricity than wind, solar and geothermal sources combined.

Biomass refers to the conversion of plant matter into a transportation fuel (biofuel) or electricity (biopower), usually by incinerating waste material or creating combustible gas through chemical processes. A significant amount of electricity also is made by gathering and burning landfill gas.

It's a growing area of interest because methane, created by decaying organic material, is a more potent greenhouse gas than carbon dioxide -- so people are anxious to put it to use and keep it out of the atmosphere. Many cities also burn solid waste to cut down the volume destined for landfill sites, and they're eager to convert the garbage to something useful.

The biggest biomass power generators in the U.S. aren't utilities. They're forest-products companies with big sawmill and pulp operations, like International Paper Co., Weyerhaeuser Co. and Koch Industries' Georgia-Pacific Corp. Weyerhaeuser, for example, makes electricity by reusing waste heat and by burning hog fuel, or wood waste, and black liquor, a pulp-mill byproduct. It sells the power it produces -- equivalent to the annual energy needs of 140,000 homes -- to local utilities.

Because biomass plants typically are small -- usually less than 50 megwatts in capacity, or one-tenth the size of a conventional fossil-fuel power plant -- equipment costs are high relative to the amount of power produced. That, in turn, makes generating costs somewhat high -- currently, about 5 cents to 10 cents a kilowatt hour without subsidies.

Power costs are also related to the cost of fuel and the amount of heat embedded in it. As many homeowners know, there's more energy locked in an oak log than a pine log. The same holds true for biomass power generation -- some fuels make more heat and, thus, electricity. Better numbers can also be achieved by mixing plant matter with fossil fuels, like coal, and burning them together at large plants to capture the greater efficiencies.

Costs are expected to come down as technology improves and as more waste material gets redirected to electricity production, providing a cheap fuel stream. Many experts believe biomass will expand dramatically in coming years as more industries look for ways to make electricity out of their waste, diverting more material away from landfill sites.

A recent study by the California Biomass Collaborative, a government and industry group, concluded there are 80 million tons of plant material produced in California each year that could be diverted to biomass use. About 30 million tons are practically available. The study said those 30 million tons could be converted into 2,500 megawatts of electricity, equivalent to five large gas-fired plants, and 1.3 billion gallons of transportation fuel at competitive prices.

Biomass has gotten a jolt from renewable-portfolio standards embraced by nearly half the states, which require utilities to get electricity from renewable resources. In California, for instance, the state's energy agencies have set a rough goal of having biomass sources generate 4% of the state's power by 2010.

GEOTHERMAL

DOJ_NMG_0130360

Geothermal energy -- tapping heat deep in the Earth to generate power -- may have more potential, at less impact to society, than any of the other alternative resources. A new study on geothermal energy, produced by an interdisciplinary team at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, found that geothermal energy could produce 10% of the nation's electricity by 2050 at prices that would be competitive with fossil fuels.

Geothermal heat is turned into electricity through a number of methods. In general, producers drill into the ground to release steam and water that have been naturally heated and, until then, trapped. These are used to power a turbine and generator, making electricity. Liquids are reinjected into the ground to keep the process running.

Currently, geothermal energy costs about 6 cents to 10 cents a kilowatt hour, without subsidies. The main expense is actually drilling the holes and building power plants on top of them. And expertise is needed to properly manage a site to make sure the right amount of liquid is cycled through the geothermal source to extract the heat.

The amount of electricity produced depends on many things, including the size of the geothermal field, water pressure and temperature and how quickly the field can heat and release water.

Geothermal energy is especially valuable because it makes electricity around the clock, unlike solar or wind power that require backup sources of generation. Also, unlike wind and solar installations, geothermal plants have a small footprint -- smaller, even, than many fossil-fuel power plants. Advancements in equipment are making it possible to generate electricity with lower-temperature geothermal resources, and new drilling techniques let producers plumb greater depths.

Today, there's about 8,000 megawatts of installed geothermal capacity globally, with 3,000 megawatts in the U.S., the top producer. Mostly, it has been developed where heat is easily accessed and is accompanied by water and porous rock. The biggest developed field in the U.S. lies 72 miles north of San Francisco at The Geysers. Nineteen of the 21 plants at the site are owned by Calpine Corp., which makes 725 megawatts of electricity there, equivalent to one and a half large conventional power plants.

The MIT study found that far more geothermal electricity could be generated if companies -- especially oil companies -- leveraged their knowledge of drilling techniques, geology and hydrology to tackle the problem. An investment of $800 million to $1 billion in research and development would be required, equivalent to the expense of a single coal-fired plant.

The initial units would make electricity for 10 cents or so a kilowatt hour but later plants would see costs fall to 5 cents a kilowatt hour, probably within a decade, as processes became more refined. That would make geothermal operations competitive with modern gas-fired plants. But backers say that for geothermal energy to thrive, supportive policies are needed, including loan guarantees, depletion allowances, tax credits and accelerated depreciation -- things oil, gas and minerals-extraction companies get.

Still, geothermal energy does come with a caveat: Heat sources can be depleted if not carefully managed. At The Geysers, for instance, operators have had to retire at least half a dozen generating units, even though the field was developed largely only in the 1970s and 1980s.

BIOFUELS

Interest in alternative transportation fuels -- mostly ethanol -- soared following President Bush's declaration a year ago that the U.S. is "addicted to oil." Many potential fuels are being discussed, from biodiesel to hydrogen. Most of the buzz is around what's already by far the biggest alternative transportation fuel in the U.S.: ethanol made from corn.

There's lots of talk about the possibility of using ethanol as a standalone fuel to power cars. But virtually all the ethanol consumed in the U.S. today is used in a less-sexy way: It's blended into normal gasoline.

That's done mostly in parts of the country with bad air-pollution problems, because adding ethanol to gasoline reduces smog-causing emissions from the cars that burn the fuel. Ethanol also is used as a gasoline "extender."

The cost of producing ethanol depends largely on the cost of corn, ethanol's main feedstock. It also depends on the cost of the energy -- typically natural gas -- used to power the process that turns the corn into ethanol. Keith Collins, chief economist at the U.S. Department of Agriculture, estimates that today it costs about $1.60 to produce a gallon of ethanol.

Ethanol producers sell their brew on a wholesale market -- sometimes to gasoline refiners and sometimes to middlemen who sell to those refiners. The price of ethanol typically rises and falls with that of gasoline, which itself is a function of the global oil price. Ethanol typically has sold for up to 51 cents per gallon more than gasoline, because the federal government gives ethanol blenders a 51-cent-per-gallon tax break to encourage production of the supplemental fuel.

Over the past year, the industry that produces ethanol has had a wild ride. Last summer, ethanol prices soared, due to increases in both gasoline prices and ethanol demand. Gasoline blenders who had been using another emission-reducing additive -- methyl tertiary butyl ether, or MTBE -- were switching over to ethanol because of concerns that MTBE was contaminating ground water.

DOJ_NMG_0130361

Ethanol's per-gallon price premium over gasoline widened to more than $1. Margins for ethanol producers ballooned. Yet by late last year, the ethanol boom was cooling. The sudden profitability of the ethanol business, combined with increasing federal requirements for the production of alternative fuels, sparked a rush of investment in new ethanol plants.

Meanwhile, gasoline prices, and thus ethanol prices, were falling from their mid-2006 highs. The production costs for ethanol were also rising, largely because the rush to produce more ethanol had driven up the price of the fuel's main feedstock, corn.

On Friday, the price of ethanol for March delivery closed at $2.06 a gallon on the Chicago Board of Trade, and the price of gasoline for March delivery closed at $1.61 a gallon on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Where ethanol prices will go from here is a matter of debate. President Bush, in his State of the Union speech last month, laid out an ambitious target for the U.S. to consume about 35 billion gallons of ethanol and other alternative transportation fuels by 2017. (The U.S. currently consumes about 5.2 billion gallons of ethanol per year.)

Reaching the numbers outlined by President Bush won't be easy. It probably would require significantly increasing the concentration of ethanol that's blended into gasoline. That, paradoxically, is a move that scientists say raises potential air-pollution problems of its own. Studies show that while ethanol added to gasoline in low concentrations helps reduce certain emissions, such as carbon monoxide, it tends to increase some other emissions.

Another option to meet the government mandate would be to increase the use of ethanol as a standalone fuel. That would require the installation of ethanol pumps at gas stations -- a move that could cost the oil industry billions of dollars.

Zakaria: Unfortunately, We Can't Stop Global Warming (NSWK)

By Fareed Zakaria

Newsweek, February 12, 2007

The most inconvenient truth about global warming is that we cannot stop it. Please don't mistake me for a skeptic. I'm fully persuaded by the evidence that climate change is real and serious. Of the 12 hottest years on record, 11 have occurred since 1995. Temperatures have risen by 0.74 degrees Celsius over the past century. (If that seems small, keep in mind that the difference in temperature between the ice age and now is about 5 degrees C.) And human activity appears to be one important cause. The concentration of greenhouse gases in the atmosphere has risen dramatically since the industrial revolution. Methane has doubled and carbon-dioxide levels are up 30 percent since 1750. The projections going forward are highly plausible scientific estimations. The recent report from the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change predicts that by 2100, temperatures will have risen by somewhere between 1.1 and 6.4 degrees, and as a result, sea levels will rise by 18 to 59 centimeters. The trouble is, if you accept all these facts and theories about global warming, it is difficult to see how any human response launched today can avert it.

The gases that are warming the Earth have built up over hundreds of years. They do not disappear or dissipate easily. Even if the world adopted the most far-reaching plans to combat climate change, most scientists agree that the concentration of greenhouse gases will continue to rise for the next few decades. In other words, global warming is already baked into Earth's future.

Scientists estimate that simply to keep greenhouse gases at their current levels, we would need to slash carbon-dioxide emissions by 60 percent. Given current and foreseeable technology, that would require cutting back on industrial activity across the globe on a scale that would make the Great Depression look very small. In fact, the future will almost certainly involve substantially greater emissions of CO2. Most studies predict that the world will double its consumption of energy by 2050. Since much of that growth in consumption will take place in China and India, it will involve the burning of fossil fuels.

Between them, these two countries are currently building 650 coal-fired power plants. The combined CO2 emissions of these new plants is five times the total savings of the Kyoto accords—that is, if the Kyoto targets were being adhered to by Western countries, which they are not. Even under the most optimistic scenarios the industrialized world will continue to burn substantial amounts of coal and oil.

I state these facts plainly not to induce fatalism or complacency. It's scandalous that we're not weaning ourselves off dirty fuels. Perfecting just two new (and almost workable) technologies—clean coal and hybrid cars—would be a giant leap forward. We could be experimenting with hundreds more technologies and techniques. But even so, the Earth would still warm substantially over the next few decades. So in addition to our efforts to prevent and mitigate climate change, we need to employ another strategy—adaptation.

No one likes to talk about adapting to global warming because it seems defeatist. But the result is that, as we debate the meta-theories about global warming, we're increasingly unprepared to deal with its consequences. Whether or not CO2 emissions are triggering certain reactions in the atmosphere, we can see that sea levels are rising. What are we going to do about it?

DOJ_NMG_0130362

In an intelligent, practical speech last September, the president of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, Frances Cairncross, urged that we begin such a discussion. "We need to think about policies that prepare for a hotter, drier world, especially in poor countries," she said. "That may involve, for instance, developing new crops, constructing flood defenses, setting different building regulations or banning building close to sea level." She points out that adaptation programs could move forward fast. Unlike plans to slow down global warming, which require massive and simultaneous international efforts, adaptation strategies can be pursued by individual countries, states, cities and localities.

Three years ago the Pew Foundation sponsored an excellent study, "Coping With Global Climate Change," which focused on the role of adaptation. The report found that moving in this direction would be costly and fraught with uncertainty and error. Yet, the authors point out, humankind's long history has shown it's possible; we have adapted as the environment around us has changed. The costs of relocating seaside communities are extremely high, but they will be even higher if we wait 20 years. The most important conclusion of the Pew study was that early planning is far more effective than managing the consequences of a breakdown. In other words, strengthening the levees in New Orleans costs much, much less than rebuilding the city.

Many environmental advocates fear that talking about coping with global warming will hamper efforts to slow it down. In fact, we have no alternative but to do both. Mitigation and adaptation complement each other. In both cases, the crucial need is to stop talking and start acting.

U.S. Labor Laws Apply To Tribes, Court Says (SDUT)

By James P. Sweeney, Copley News Service

The San Diego Union-Tribune, February 12, 2007

Broad implications seen for their casino workers

Indian tribes must comply with federal labor laws, an appeals court ruled yesterday in a California case that could affect thousands of casino workers across the country.

The decision against one of the state's wealthiest tribes, the San Manuel band of San Bernardino County, also took another bite out of the immunity that tribes have long enjoyed as sovereign governments.

It was unclear how the ruling might affect an impasse between labor and five big Southern California tribes, including Sycuan of El Cajon and Pechanga of Temecula. The stalemate has blocked legislative ratification of expansive new gambling agreements that would authorize 22,500 more slot machines for the tribes.

A three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit concluded that San Manuel operated its thriving casino as a commercial enterprise, rather than a government operation.

“The principle of tribal sovereignty in American law exists as a matter of respect for Indian communities. It recognizes the independence of these communities,” Janice Rogers Brown, a former California Supreme Court justice, wrote for the court.

“But tribal sovereignty is not absolute autonomy, permitting a tribe to operate in a commercial capacity without legal restraint,” Brown concluded.

Indian gaming has become a $23 billion industry nationally, with more than 400 casinos in 28 states. California alone has 58 casinos that employ 58,000 workers and gross more than $7 billion a year. Only a handful of California's casinos have labor agreements.

The appeals court ruling allows the National Labor Relations Board to hear allegations that San Manuel “interfered with, coerced and restrained employees” trying to exercise collective bargaining rights at the tribe's casino, which grosses more than $450 million a year.

A 1999 complaint filed by the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees International Union alleged that San Manuel denied its organizers equal access to casino workers while the tribe cooperated with a rival union, the Communication Workers of America. The tribe and the CWA ultimately agreed to a contract.

When the NLRB later concluded that federal labor law applied to the tribe, San Manuel appealed to the circuit court. The tribe invoked its sovereign immunity, contending that federal labor law did not apply to actions of tribal governments on their reservations.

The court said the case was “particularly difficult” because of “conflicting Supreme Court canons” relevant to the dispute.

In addition, Brown wrote, the National Labor Relations Act “was enacted by a Congress that in all likelihood never contemplated the statute's potential application to tribal employers.”

Moreover, she added, “probably no member of that Congress imagined a small Indian tribe might operate like a closely held corporation, employing hundreds, or even thousands, of non-Indians to produce a product . . . marketed to non-Indians.”

Howard Dickstein, one of the state's leading tribal attorneys, said the decision, if it stands, could have broad implications and would reverse “many years of judicial precedent.”

DOJ_NMG_0130363

"Traditionally, the courts said if Congress didn't expressly refer to tribes as included under a federal statute, then they were excluded," he said. "Now they are saying the opposite."

Dickstein believed the case was an ill-advised legal challenge, much like a powerful Palm Springs tribe's test of the state's ability to enforce California campaign and political disclosure laws against tribes. In December, a divided state Supreme Court ruled against the Agua Caliente band.

San Manuel was weighing its options yesterday. The tribe could ask the full court to reconsider the ruling or it could appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court.

"We are disappointed by the ruling," San Manuel Chairman Henry Duro said in a statement. "We believe that these gaming projects help tribes to fulfill essential government functions by providing education, health care, housing, senior care and other key programs.

"Those are basic governmental obligations that could be impacted by this decision."

Jack Gribbon, the hotel and restaurant employee union's state political director, took a measured view of the legal victory. Any final decision is probably more than a year away, he cautioned.

"This is just a single moment in time that is not a final decision," Gribbon said. "But I think it's a very good heads-up to those tribes in California . . . who have been unwilling to deal with workers' rights in a comprehensive way."

Gribbon's union, now known as UNITE HERE, led the fight last summer that blocked new compacts for Sycuan, Pechanga, San Manuel, Agua Caliente and the Morongo tribe of Riverside County.

Those compacts, which are still pending before the Legislature, contain labor terms negotiated by former Gov. Gray Davis' administration in 1999. But UNITE HERE, backed by the California Labor Federation and other powerful unions, wants what is known as "card-check neutrality," the ability to establish a union by collecting signatures from employees without interference from management.

Adam Day, a spokesman for Sycuan, said no one had ever tried to organize the tribe's casino workers.

"Organized labor has unprecedented rights under our tribal labor relations ordinance that they've never taken advantage of at Sycuan," Day said. "So, in that respect, the decision doesn't change what labor has had the right to do for more than eight years at Sycuan, and yet they've never lifted a finger to take advantage of the ordinance."

Gribbon has argued that the 1999 labor language does not adequately protect casino workers from harassment and intimidation by tribal employers. Yesterday's decision seemingly would bring federal protections to bear.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

ATF Officials Who Challenged Director Moved To Lower Posts (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

Two senior officials at the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives who opposed many questionable management and spending decisions by the agency's former director are being moved to lower-ranking positions effective Thursday, officials said.

Deputy Director Edgar A. Domenech, who also served as acting director last year, is being moved out of ATF headquarters to lead the agency's Washington field office. The assistant director for field operations, Michael Bouchard, will become an assistant to Michael J. Sullivan, a U.S. attorney who is temporarily running ATF.

The transfers are widely seen within ATF as demotions. They come seven months after the sudden departure of Carl J. Truscott, the former director, who clashed with Domenech and other senior executives over spending and management practices.

An inspector general's report issued after his departure showed that Truscott -- who previously served as head of President Bush's security detail at the Secret Service -- engaged in a wide-ranging pattern of questionable expenditures on a new ATF headquarters, personal security and other items. The report also said that he violated ethics rules by forcing employees to help his nephew prepare a high school video project.

Domenech took over for Truscott after he resigned and reversed a decision to include a costly engraved quotation from Bush's speech to Congress after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks at the new headquarters entrance.

ATF spokeswoman Sheree Mixell characterized the moves as routine and said "both are important positions."

Domenech and Bouchard could not be reached to comment last week.

DOJ_NMG_0130364

The new deputy director will be Ronnie A. Carter, a 27-year ATF veteran, who has headed the agency's Dallas office since 2002. Bouchard's replacement is William J. Hoover, a 20-year veteran. Hoover headed the Boston office for about three years before taking over the Washington office in January 2006.

Dizzying Rise, Fall Of A Local Drug Lord (PHI)

By George Anastasia

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 11, 2007

When he came to the attention of federal drug agents three years ago, Benjamin Ton, then 30, was an unemployed copy-machine repairman inexplicably living the American dream.

A Vietnamese emigre, he and his wife, Lena Le, had just moved from a modest rowhouse in Folcroft, Delaware County, to the upscale Cobblestone Farms section of Sicklerville. Parked in the driveway of their new home were a Corvette, a BMW and a Lexus.

"It was obvious there was a lot of money coming from somewhere," said Christopher A. Jakim, the Drug Enforcement Administration agent who supervised the squad working the case.

Eight months later, Ton was arrested on charges of heading a $50 million drug operation that in just two years had brought nearly 10 tons of high-quality marijuana and more than 300,000 ecstasy pills to the Philadelphia area from Canada, a quietly growing source for those illegal drugs in the United States.

At the time of his arrest, Ton was a major player in the Philadelphia region's thriving drug market, an industry with at least $1 billion in illegal street sales annually, authorities say.

The rise and fall of Benjamin Ton, who has pleaded guilty and is awaiting sentencing, offers a glimpse into that highly lucrative drug underworld and a look at a new breed of American gangster.

Operating in close-knit ethnic groups and using language and culture as shields, these Asian, Latino and African American mobsters pose a more difficult challenge to law enforcement than the overexposed and largely disorganized American Mafia.

Wiretapped conversations during the Ton investigation, for example, were recorded in four languages.

"In two years, this guy was making more money than Nicky Scarfo ever dreamed of," said Assistant U.S. Attorney David Fritchey, who helped bring down Philadelphia Mafia bosses Scarfo, Ralph Natale and Joseph "Skinny Joey" Merlino and is prosecuting the Ton case.

Ton's story also is a look at the top of a drug empire. Authorities seized about $500,000 when he and 25 associates were arrested.

Seduced by money

Ton's organization sprang from a chance encounter, say Jakim and other DEA agents who have debriefed Ton since he began cooperating.

In 2002, Ton said, a Vietnamese friend from Canada told him that he was having trouble moving 100 pounds of marijuana he had shipped to Philadelphia.

Would Ton be interested in finding buyers?

Ton agreed, and a drug operation was born.

With connections to the Vietnamese communities in Philadelphia and Toronto, Ton was the right person in the right place at the right time.

"He was an ambitious, aggressive young guy who saw an opportunity and seized it," Jakim said. "We don't think he was involved in drugs before that."

"He's remorseful for what he has done," said Ton's lawyer, Elliott M. Cohen, who said his client could not be interviewed. "He started out living an honest life and got seduced by the money."

Ton faces a life sentence, but his cooperation could result in less jail time.

Ton took his first deliveries on consignment. Eventually, he had a network of Canadian suppliers who competed for his business through a broker he hired in Toronto.

Weekly, he received shipments of 100 to 300 pounds of marijuana, hidden in trucks transporting legitimate goods across the border. One major shipment, for example, came in a tractor-trailer loaded with futons heading for Kmarts in North Carolina, according to the DEA.

The ecstasy, usually in shipments of 40,000 pills, was typically hidden in the door panels of cars, sometimes driven by Ton or his associates. Cash was brought up; ecstasy pills were brought back.

Fritchey estimates that Ton sent $25 million to $50 million to Canada over two years.

Ton paid between $1,700 and $2,700 a pound for marijuana and $2.25 to $3 per pill for ecstasy. His wholesale network would then sell the drugs for about double that.

DOJ_NMG_0130365

According to the indictment, that network included about two dozen Asian American associates in Camden, in Eddystone, and in Masschusetts, Georgia and North Carolina.

The most potent and expensive marijuana was cultivated by the "Vietnamese Mafia" in "grow houses" - indoor hydroponic operations that have proliferated in Canada in the last decade, according to a Royal Canadian Mounted Police report.

Labeled "AAA" or "purple haze," this premium marijuana had a level of THC (the psychoactive ingredient) that was sometimes 25 to 30 percent, investigators said, instead of the usual 3 to 5 percent.

The even more potent ecstasy pills were stamped "puppy" or "strawberry," and sold for $25 to $30 apiece at "rave parties" popular with teenagers and young adults.

Phony receipts

By late 2003, Ton and his wife were buying fine clothes and jewelry and enjoying vacations abroad and visits to Atlantic City casinos.

In his debriefing sessions, Ton said he had always kept about $100,000 in cash in a home safe and hundreds of thousands more in bank accounts and safe-deposit boxes.

He traveled to Canada and Vietnam for business and pleasure, meeting in both countries with a Vietnamese movie star and singer with whom he had begun an affair, authorities said.

Ton would eventually spend $300,000 to build his girlfriend a home in Vietnam, a bit more than he and Lena Le had paid for their South Jersey house.

But just as a chance encounter brought Ton into the drug trade, another sparked his downfall.

In March 2004, DEA agents in New York City, working a different case, overheard a target on a wiretap discuss a shipment of marijuana and ecstasy to Philadelphia.

Within days, DEA agents here had won court authorization to set up their own wiretaps, which quickly pointed to Ton.

"He was the guy in charge," Jakim said.

In all, Jakim and agents Philip Bernal, Carl Rideout and William Schohn would record more than 1,000 conversations in English, Vietnamese, Chinese and Spanish as they worked the case.

They still shake their heads at the business acumen and ingenuity of the young, charismatic former Canon copier repairman.

At one point, Ton was able to write off a debt of $200,000 after police in the United States stopped one of his couriers en route to Canada and seized the cash he was carrying.

As is standard procedure, police gave the courier a receipt. Ton showed that receipt to his Canadian supplier, who accepted Ton's explanation and wrote off the loss.

Later Ton and one of his top associates, Sergio Caldera, faked a similar incident to save $600,000 earmarked for another Canadian supplier.

"They went on the Internet and copied the logo of a police department. Then they dummied up another seizure receipt," Jakim said.

"One of the interesting things was the phony cash-seizure receipt wasn't for $600,000 but for something like $580,000," Jakim said.

This made the seizure seem even more realistic, the agent said, because many drug dealers assume police pocket some of the cash they seize.

"Ton and Caldera split the $600,000," said Jakim, whose investigators found a copy of the phony receipt during searches after Ton, Caldera, and 24 other members of the organization were arrested.

Hidden cash, hidden pills

Early on Nov. 6, 2004, a Saturday, Jakim was scrunched down in the backseat of his car, conducting what he hoped would be the last night of surveillance on Ton's home.

Parked a half-block away, the agent focused on the garage, where, he knew, Ton and Caldera were running $525,000 in bills collected that week through a machine that counted and bundled them.

Shortly after sunrise, Caldera pulled a silver Acura out of the garage. Based on wiretaps, Jakim knew that the cash was hidden behind the car's door panels and fenders and was destined for Canada to cover a previous drug buy and to "front" a shipment of ecstasy coming back down.

Caldera drove to his girlfriend's apartment in Northeast Philadelphia. She then set off alone on the journey north.

Diana Rivera, who owned the Acura, had made several trips for the drug ring, usually for a 2 percent fee. This trip was worth about $10,500 to her.

DOJ_NMG_0130366

All day, the DEA listened as Caldera and Rivera - who have pleaded guilty to drug charges and are cooperating with authorities - talked on their cell phones. Investigators learned when she crossed the border, dropped the car off in Toronto, and picked it up later for her journey south.

As Rivera crossed the Rainbrow Bridge at Niagara Falls, DEA agents began tailing her. At the Fort Washington exit of the Pennsylvania Turnpike, they pulled her over and quickly found the stash of pills behind the car's door panels.

At $30 each, the shipment of 55,000 tablets had a street value of $1.65 million.

"It was time to shut them down," Jakim said.

13 Cases Collapse After Disclosure Of Informant Offenses (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

An undercover narcotics investigation touted by the government as a significant blow to a notorious haven for drug dealing has been left in tatters after damning revelations about an informant, among them that he was using the same sort of drugs he was buying for the police.

The U.S. attorney's office in the District said it has dropped or is preparing to drop charges against 13 of 23 people charged in a five-month investigation in and around the Woodland Terrace public housing complex in Southeast Washington. The cases collapsed less than five months after the arrests were announced.

During the investigation, while working for another police unit conducting a separate operation, the informant crashed an unmarked police car into a moving car and several parked cars, according to court documents. But he was not charged, despite the considerable damage and the fact that he didn't have a driver's license.

Little of the information about the informant's conduct during the investigation or his checkered history working for the police was initially turned over to attorneys for those charged in the Woodland Terrace investigation.

By the time it was provided, some defendants had already pleaded guilty. Other defendants were about to go on trial when the U.S. attorney's office made the disclosures.

On Friday in D.C. Superior Court, three defendants who had entered guilty pleas were allowed to withdraw them, and the charges were dismissed by prosecutors.

Channing Phillips, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office, said that prosecutors were not aware of the problems with the informant when the first defendants pleaded guilty but that the office acted promptly once it learned of the issues.

The unraveling of the cases has renewed questions about how police use paid informants and how prosecutors determine which evidence they must turn over to the defense in the early stages.

The problems were first reported in the Legal Times.

Prosecutors are required to turn over information favorable to a defendant, such as a statement from a witness implicating another person in the crime or details of a plea agreement of a person cooperating with the government.

Defense attorneys in the District have complained that the U.S. attorney's office is delinquent in turning over such information.

The disclosure of such information, or the failure to promptly provide it, is a near-constant source of contention in D.C. Superior Court between the defense bar and prosecutors. It can be important in cases in which police and prosecutors are relying on information from people who are being paid by the government or who have pending criminal cases, or both.

Superior Court judges periodically have rebuked the U.S. attorney's office for not turning over such material. In this case, the U.S. attorney's office said it did not receive the information from police until it was too late.

For the Woodland Terrace investigation, the consequences were colossal.

Despite its location -- about a block from the D.C. police department's 7th District station -- Woodland Terrace was a hot spot for people selling cocaine, PCP and marijuana.

Last spring, the 7th District's Focused Mission Unit embarked on an ambitious effort to rout out drug dealers there. Woodland, a 234-unit low-rise complex, is bounded by Ainger, Bruce, Raynolds and Langston places. Neighborhood residents had said last fall that the police attention made a difference in ridding the area of the drug trafficking.

Working with the D.C. Housing Authority Police, the U.S. attorney's office and other agencies, D.C. police set up dozens of drug buys during the investigation. Many were made by undercover officers, but many others were made by the informant, according to prosecutors.

It was not until the first cases were about to go before a jury that some of the most damaging new information was handed over to defense attorneys.

DOJ_NMG_0130367

Donna Beasley, an attorney for one defendant, said she learned not long before the Jan. 10 trial date that years earlier the informant was thrown out of the witness protection program. Then, on the day of trial, the prosecutor, Assistant U.S. Attorney George P. Varghese, told her that the informant had not been licensed to drive when he crashed the police car.

The revelation prompted Judge Craig S. Iscoe to postpone the trial. But it wasn't the only notable disclosure that day, Beasley said. While the judge was deciding what to do, Beasley said she was told that the informant had identified someone other than her client in a photo identification of the suspects -- evidence she says was as potentially exculpatory as anything the government could have given her.

On Tuesday, the charges against her client -- and three others planning to go to trial -- were dismissed.

"Yes, they did the right thing by dismissing it," Beasley said, "but what's going on?"

Drug Czar Reports Drop In Drug Use (AP)

AP, February 9, 2007

PORTLAND, Ore. (AP) — Illegal drug use in the United States has dropped sharply since 2001 but abuse of prescription drugs remains a problem, the director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy said Friday.

John Walters said that President Bush's anti-drug plan for 2007-08 is to reduce prescription drug abuse by 15% over three years. The administration ranks the problem second only to marijuana.

The plan singled out the pain reliever OxyContin as one of the prescription drugs most abused. It calls for more states to adopt prescription drug monitoring programs to prevent "doctor-shopping" to get prescriptions for more drugs.

Walters said overall use of illegal drugs among young people is down 23% from 2001, with 840,000 fewer teenagers using drugs now. He credited drug testing for much of the decline and urged its expansion in schools. He also said abuse among older people declined.

About 1,000 school districts carry out drug tests, which can trigger an intervention that keeps a young drug abuser from carrying the habit into adulthood, Walters said. Despite some concerns for invasion of privacy, he said, the United States will "look stupid in five or ten years if we don't do this."

Walters said the data came from a survey done at the University of Michigan for the National Institute For Substance Abuse. The report says about 19.7 million Americans reported using at least one illegal substance in the previous month.

In Washington, D.C, Bill Piper, director of affairs for the Drug Policy Alliance, called the strategy a "spin on the failure of the war on drugs."

He said in a statement that despite incarcerating millions of Americans, drugs are as available as ever and the related harms of addiction, overdose, and the spread of disease continue to mount.

Piper said drug use rates are less important than whether the death, disease, crime and other suffering associated with abuse go up or down.

Drug Control Plan Heavy On Prevention (OREG)

By Bryan Denson, The Oregonian

The Oregonian, February 10, 2007

White House - The strategy to reduce abuse by teens includes $7.5 million for nonpunitive testing in schools

President Bush's chief drug adviser released the White House's latest drug control strategy Friday in downtown Portland, a plan that calls for a broad public health approach to prevent teenage drug abuse.

John Walters, director of the Office of National Drug Control Policy, offered high points of the new strategy -- along with some good and bad news -- at the Union Gospel Mission, which offers recovery services to adults addicted to methamphetamine and other drugs.

The good news: Meth use among teens declined 41 percent between 2001 and 2006. The bad news: Teen usage of illegal prescription drugs is up.

In an interview with The Oregonian Friday morning, Walters said public officials must approach today's teen drug abuse in much the way it approached the epidemic of gun violence that swept America's big cities in the early 1990s. Like gunfire, he said, teen drug use is a preventable public health problem that can't be treated solely by the criminal justice system.

Preventing the onset of drug abuse is key to the National Drug Control Strategy released Friday, Walters explained. The White House strategy seeks an extra $7.5 million for nonpunitive drug testing in school districts across the nation and an additional $30 million to blitz the airwaves and the Internet with anti-drug messages aimed at teens.

Walters acknowledged that randomly testing teens for drugs is controversial. But he said the tests are an important public health tool.

DOJ_NMG_0130368

"Random testing may not be used to punish," he said, adding that results cannot be turned over to law enforcement or school officials for disciplinary reasons. "If you want to find the troubled young people . . . random drug testing is a powerful tool, along with screening in the health care system."

Science is changing the easy-going attitudes parents once held about drugs, Walters said. And their children recognize the trauma that drugs such as methamphetamine inflict on the human brain.

Charting global distribution of pseudoephedrine, which is used to manufacture meth, takes up much of Walters' time these days. Last December, for instance, authorities in Mexico seized nearly 20 tons of what was reported to be pseudoephedrine shipped from China. Walters met earlier this week with his counterpart from China and is following up on the bust in Mexico. U.S. authorities are working with officials in Mexico to identify how the shipment got there from China.

As the United States finds ways to cut off the supply of meth and its precursor drugs from other nations, smugglers find new ways to come in the back door, Walters said. "The question becomes, can our defense out-do their offense?" he said.

The President's Drug Control Budget calls for $12.9 billion to support reduction of drug supplies, prevention of drug abuse and treatment of addicts. But when Walters publicly released the drug control strategy Friday, he focused his remarks on teens.

Drug abuse spreads like tuberculosis from one child to the next, he told reporters.

"I recognize there are critics of random drug tests," Walters said. "But trust me, they're gonna look stupid" in coming years.

Sometimes, he said, you have to take unpopular measures to fight against drugs -- such as putting cold remedies behind the counter, as Oregon officials did, to prevent people from turning them into meth.

"Meth was too bad," he said. "This was a reasonable change."

Fugitive Honduran Street Gang Leader May Be In Houston (HC)

By Susan Carroll, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, February 12, 2007

TEGUCIGALPA, HONDURAS — A reputed killer and leader of one of the world's most notorious street gangs escaped during a botched custody transfer in Honduras and has been a fugitive for more than a year, the Houston Chronicle has learned.

Ever Anibal Rivera Paz, the alleged chief of the Honduran arm of the Mara Salvatrucha gang, was being extradited on charges of plotting a massacre that left 28 people, including six children, dead on Dec. 23, 2004.

Also known as "El Culiche," The Tapeworm, Rivera Paz was last seen boarding a deportation flight from Houston to Honduras on Nov. 17, 2005, according to U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement records.

The FBI fears Rivera Paz may have returned to the United States or may be headed that way, according to a confidential May 2006 FBI bulletin obtained by the Chronicle.

"Officers should be aware that he has threatened to assassinate any officer that attempts to apprehend him," the bulletin states.

Honduran officials confirmed Rivera Paz's disappearance but said they were never notified that he was scheduled for deportation.

U.S. immigration officials insisted that the Honduran government was notified in writing through multiple channels that "Culiche" was headed back after a stint in a U.S. prison for re-entering the country illegally.

"I don't want to blame anybody," said Oscar Alvarez, former security minister for Honduras, "but somebody didn't do his job."

Nine months before Rivera Paz disappeared, top FBI officials and then-President of Honduras Ricardo Marduro called news conferences to announce his capture. He was arrested by a Texas state trooper near Falfurrias on Feb. 10, 2005, after a traffic stop about 110 miles from the border.

Twelve days after the arrest, U.S. officials matched Rivera Paz to a Department of Homeland Security alert, based on Honduran intelligence, that warned he could be heading north to avoid prosecution in the massacre. His arrest was called a major blow to Mara Salvatrucha, or MS-13, and a model of international cooperation.

Now, two years after his arrest, the Rivera Paz case has raised serious questions about security procedures in both countries and about the integrity of the deportation process.

U.S. and Honduran officials could not, or would not, explain exactly how he escaped.

When the alleged MS-13 leader was deported, "nobody advised anybody" that he was coming home, said Alvarez, now the vice consul in Houston. The problem wasn't just on the U.S. side, he added, conceding that Hondurans also failed to catch his arrival.

Luisa Deason, an ICE spokeswoman in Houston, said U.S. authorities notified the Honduran government that Rivera Paz would be deported that day. She said ICE listed his name on a roster of deportees arriving in Honduras who had criminal records in the United States. The Honduran government also issued travel papers for Rivera Paz, she said, clearing the way for his deportation.

DOJ_NMG_0130369

"We executed that removal order and turned everyone on that flight over to the government," Deason said. "If there's a question after that, perhaps what you need to do (is) ask that government."

The international law enforcement organization Interpol has reissued a lookout for Rivera Paz, who is described as "extremely dangerous."

- - - - - -

On the night of the 2004 massacre, Alvarez arrived at the crime scene to coordinate the manhunt for the assailants, who had ambushed a crowded bus.

There were bodies in the road, blood on the bus steps. The killers left a note on the front windshield decrying a government proposal to legalize the death penalty as part of a crackdown on gangs.

"I don't want to remember," he said. "It was a terrorist attack."

At 7:15 p.m., an old, yellow Ford bus headed along a dirt road that runs through Chamelecon, a poor suburb of San Pedro Sula in northern Honduras. The bus was packed with 56 people, factory workers and last-minute Christmas shoppers, some standing in the aisle.

Witnesses said a truck and a car pulled out of the darkness, forcing the bus to the shoulder next to a grassy soccer field. The gunmen started shooting from outside the bus, the witnesses said, and then moved up the steps.

"People were screaming, and the more they screamed in the bus, the more they shot," said a teenage factory worker who was shot 16 times.

Alvarez said witnesses on the bus identified one of the gunmen as Rivera Paz. They said he was carrying an M-16 rifle.

Oldin Alexander Rodriguez, a young father, was in the 13th row with his wife and their baby, Isaac.

It was dark on the bus, he said. So dark he never saw a thing. But he heard people screaming and dropping to the floor.

He wrapped his hulking body around his wife, Glenda Yaqueline Ramos, who pulled Isaac into her lap. She shielded him with her knees, her arms and her head. She tried not to scream.

- - - - - -

When international travelers — tourists, missionaries and business travelers — arrive at the newly remodeled airport in Tegucigalpa, they are required to pass through a Honduran customs inspection. They are asked to show their passports. They put their right, then left, index fingers on a digital scanner. They look up at the camera to have their retinas scanned.

It's different for Hondurans deported from the U.S.

They are corralled into a low-slung, beige building off the runway. There is no fingerprint scanner. The recent arrivals fill out forms with their names, ages and dates of birth. The paperwork is filed away in three-ring binders by date of arrival.

Honduran immigration officials said they are poorly equipped to deal with a record influx of deportees from the U.S., more than 24,000 in 2006. They don't have money to provide new arrivals with diapers for their babies, much less to hire more staff, said Rosario Murillo, with the Center for Attention to the Returned Migrant.

The system is chaotic. Sometimes the office gets a list of deported criminals, Murillo said, but sometimes it does not. A roster of deported criminals that ICE passed along to Honduran officials early this month contained the names of 59 people accused of offenses including illegal re-entry and sex crimes.

Jorge Bustillo Rivera, who is in charge of fugitive captures for Interpol in Tegucigalpa, reviews the names on the U.S. flight rosters, checks for outstanding warrants in Honduras and tries to detect deportees using aliases.

But Bustillo said he also has to juggle a workload that grows by eight to 10 fugitive cases daily. The nearest FBI office is in El Salvador.

"We don't have the necessary resources to do the job right," Bustillo said.

Rivera Paz must have known the drill when the plane landed on Nov. 17, 2005.

It was his fifth deportation flight.

- - - - - -

No one's sure how long the bus attack lasted that night. Some passengers said two minutes. Others said five.

Alexander, the young father, was shot in the leg and side. The bullets ricocheted around inside his torso.

His 23-year-old wife felt his body go limp. She panicked and raised herself up, screaming. A bullet hit her right shoulder first. She was hit again, and stopped moving.

Alexander regained consciousness but still saw nothing, he said. He heard a stranger's voice, one of the attackers, moving methodically through the bus. The gunman paused over people who were still breathing, Alexander recalls. He'd ask, "Are you still alive?" Then he would shoot.

Alexander checked on his family. His wife still wasn't moving. The baby in her lap was covered in blood.

DOJ_NMG_0130370

- - - - - -

U.S. investigators described Rivera Paz as intelligent, articulate and highly mobile. They said he uses different birth dates but is thought to be about 31.

He carries fake IDs, uses multiple cell phones and has 38 known aliases, according to Honduran authorities and the FBI. He has a number of nicknames in addition to "The Tapeworm," including "The Little Baby."

An early member of the Normandie Locos, a particularly violent Los Angeles-based clique, Rivera Paz's criminal history dates to the early 1990s. He's been arrested at least eight times in California, accused of drug trafficking, aggravated assault, burglary, using fake IDs, writing bad checks and driving without a license, according to federal law enforcement sources.

But most of the serious charges were dropped or sealed in his juvenile record. His convictions in the U.S. were relatively minor: misdemeanor burglary in San Francisco, false representation to a police officer in Los Angeles and giving law enforcement a fake ID in San Luis Obispo. He served 13 days in jail in California in 2001, according to his federal court complaint.

Rivera Paz was deported twice in 1996, once in 1997 and again in 2001.

In 2003, he was arrested in Comayagua, Honduras, allegedly with 19 marijuana joints, 29 baggies of cocaine and an AK-47 in his possession, according to Honduran court records. The documents also referred to an outstanding warrant in two murders in 2003 in Comayagua, allegedly of a woman and teenager who wanted out of the gang. The disposition of those cases was unclear.

The intelligence report in the Interpol file accuses Rivera Paz and his associates of hiring out their services as kidnappers, drug traffickers and hitmen.

"These gangs in Honduras aren't just gangs anymore," Bustillo said. "They're linked to organized crime."

According to Honduran court records, Rivera Paz claimed to have retired from the gang life after his mother died, telling the judge, "I declare myself innocent of everything."

On Aug. 17, 2004, he and two other inmates allegedly broke out of a prison in Comayagua, beating and severely injuring a guard in the process, according to Interpol.

It was in that picturesque, colonial town that the MS-13 leaders reportedly plotted the massacre.

Honduran investigators said they've identified seven suspects directly involved and 24 with possible knowledge of it. They still call Rivera Paz the mastermind behind the attack.

A handful of Rivera Paz's alleged accomplices are on trial in San Pedro Sula.

After Rivera Paz's arrest in South Texas, he went before a judge in federal court in Houston to face a charge of unlawfully re-entering the country. He pleaded guilty.

On July 8, 2005, U.S. District Court Judge David Hittner sentenced him to seven months in prison — in line with federal sentencing guidelines. Much of his federal court file remains sealed.

When he appeared before the judge, Rivera Paz said: "Please, send me back to my own country to pay for the crimes I caused there."

- - - - - - -

On Christmas Day 2004, the families of Chamelecon buried their dead, including 16 women and six children. One of the women was three months pregnant.

There are still questions about the motives behind the massacre. Some are convinced it was a gesture of defiance against Honduran authorities. Others say it was revenge against a rival gang.

In their tin-roofed house on the outskirts of San Pedro Sula, Alexander gently tucks a stray hair behind Yaqueline's ear, on the side of her head that she can't reach because of her injuries. Their son, Isaac, now 3, wears SpongeBob SquarePants T-shirts and chases around the puppy, "Bear."

Yaqueline pushes her wheelchair with her good arm, the strong one.

She is not expected to walk again.

A while ago, the prosecutor in the trial of the other MS-13 members came by their house. He was looking for witnesses.

"I told him, we didn't see a thing," Alexander said.

Yaqueline nodded.

"It was so dark. I didn't see a thing."

Boldness, Violence Kept Drug Kingpin Atop Mexican Cartel (AP)

AP, February 12, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0130371

HOUSTON — Osiel Cardenas-Guillen could easily be mistaken for a bureaucrat. But the short man with a receding hairline and a forgettable face had a penchant for grotesque violence and ruby-encrusted handguns as leader of the Gulf drug cartel, federal agents say.

Court documents filed when Cardenas-Guillen was extradited to the United States last month reveal some of the brutal tactics and corruption that investigators say went into his business moving drugs along the billion-dollar smuggling route from Mexico to Texas.

Federal agents say Cardenas-Guillen, who seized the leadership of the cartel from Juan Garcia Abrego when Garcia Abrego was imprisoned in the United States, employed former Mexican special forces soldiers who called themselves the Zetas and tortured, beat and beheaded rivals and police.

Cardenas-Guillen faces trial in Houston, accused in a Brownsville indictment of drug smuggling, threatening U.S. federal agents and being responsible for much of the violence that has plagued the Texas-Mexico border.

His new defense attorney, Mike Ramsey, said Friday that Cardenas-Guillen was "in good spirits" but declined further comment.

Cardenas-Guillen had been sent to a prison near Mexico City but continued to run the Gulf cartel from a relatively luxurious cell with impunity.

Frustrated, Mexican officials extradited Cardenas-Guillen, three other kingpins and about a dozen lesser cartel soldiers to the United States.

"He authorized the murder of countless rivals. He killed his way up the ladder to lead the Gulf cartel," Karen Tandy, chief of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, said after Cardenas-Guillen's extradition last month.

He earned the nickname "the friend-killer" for his willingness to murder people within his own cartel, court documents said. And he favored a gold-plated .45-caliber pistol whose grips were decorated with ruby-encrusted panthers and skulls.

Investigators believe that at its height, Cardenas-Guillen's cartel had cells in Houston, Chicago, Atlanta and other cities and moved four to six tons of cocaine per month into the United States.

"He's one of the biggest of the big fish," said George W. Grayson, a professor of Latin American politics at the College of William & Mary in Williamsburg, Va.

Cardenas-Guillen's Zetas were the first paramilitary group to join a drug cartel. They helped him gain control of Nuevo Laredo, considered to be a prime smuggling route for drugs from Mexico into the U.S..

Cardenas-Guillen reigned over the city until his arrest in March 2003, according to court documents. Like many crime lords, he used his money to insinuate himself into the communities he controlled. From his cell in Mexico, he financed a Children's Day party in Piedras Negras, across the Rio Grande from Eagle Pass.

Mexican federal prisons allowed traffickers to hold long cartel business meetings with Cardenas-Guillen, according to a report by the Washington Office on Latin America, a policy and research group.

Cardenas-Guillen "retained control of the Gulf cartel thanks to these conditions and to the loyalty of the Zetas," the report said.

But imprisonment did loosen his grip on the Gulf cartel.

Sensing weakness in the Gulf cartel after his arrest, the rival Sinaloa cartel tried to take over Nuevo Laredo, sparking a bloody and ongoing turf battle.

In that battle, the Zetas beat, beheaded, tortured and kidnapped rival drug traffickers and Mexican police officers, including some U.S. citizens. They were blamed for the June 2005 murder of Nuevo Laredo Police Chief Alejandro Dominguez, who was gunned down six hours after being sworn into office.

"The violence was unprecedented. I was born and raised here. I've never seen it escalate to such a degree," said Sheriff Rick Flores of Webb County, which includes Laredo.

Venezuela A Hot Spot For Drug Trafficking (MH)

By Gerardo Reyes And Steven Dudley

The Miami Herald, February 12, 2007

CARACAS - A Boeing DC-9 can carry as many as 90 passengers or, as one recent drug case showed, about 128 suitcases of cocaine.

Last April, Mexican authorities seized 5.1 tons of cocaine aboard a DC-9 coming from Venezuela. The traffickers had removed the seats in the airplane and packed the drugs in identical suitcases that somehow got past security at Caracas' principal airport, Maiquetía.

The case was a watershed, illustrating the brazen attitude with which drug traffickers seemed to be operating in Venezuela and apparent cover they could expect from high-level Venezuelan government officials.

Following the bust, officials from three governments who were tracking the shipment, said the traffickers loaded the suitcases at Maiquetía. But Venezuela's then-drug czar Luis Correa claimed the cocaine had been loaded in the northern Colombian city of Barranquilla. When confronted directly with more evidence -- flight path, fuel used by the aircraft, time of the flight -- by other officials, Correa held his ground.

The Venezuelan government announced last week that Correa had been removed as head of the National Antidrug Office, but gave no reason, and there is no official investigation into his strange declarations. The DC-9 case nevertheless remains part of a growing dossier on high-level Venezuelan officials possibly involved in an increasing amount of drug trafficking in this country.

MYSTERIOUS ESCAPES

The dossier includes mysterious escapes of wanted drug traffickers who were in Venezuelan custody, documents seized from right-wing Colombian paramilitaries and testimony of accused drug traffickers in jail.

Authorities from Colombia and the United States also say that top traffickers from Colombia and Haiti have made Venezuela their home in order to avoid detection from Colombian and U.S. authorities.

The rise in drug trafficking in Venezuela has coincided with crackdowns in neighboring Colombia, part of a $7 billion effort to fight the illegal drug industry in that country, and the rule of Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez.

A former army lieutenant colonel who became president in 1999, Chávez has banned U.S. surveillance aircraft in Venezuelan airspace and effectively ended cooperation on drug matters with Washington.

Prior to Chávez, Venezuela was a transit point; now it appears to be a sieve: Since 1999, seizures are up four-fold, just one of many signs investigators use to measure the permissiveness of the environment for traffickers.

Another measure is the size of the loads decommissioned.

One trafficker, who allegedly took part in the five-ton DC-9 deal and is now jailed in Colombia, told Colombian authorities that the huge load was split between three organizations, including one that he called "the generals," a reference to the high-level Venezuelan officers involved in the trafficking.

The trafficker, Feris Farid Domínguez, told authorities he worked as a ``coordinator of aerial routes."

He told El Nuevo Herald in a jailhouse interview that he had regular contacts with top-level officials in the Venezuelan government's investigative police, National Guard, the national registry and anti-drug office, including Correa. He added that officials issued him a Venezuelan diplomatic passport, which he showed to El Nuevo Herald, designating him as a Finance Ministry advisor, and they provided him with government bodyguards.

`CARTEL OF THE SUNS'

Domínguez also had said, according to records of his declarations to Colombian investigators obtained by El Nuevo Herald, that he had met personally with Correa and that Correa had helped coordinate drug shipments for the so-called "Cartel of the Suns," allegedly run by top Venezuelan National Guard officers. The suns are insignia of rank worn by Venezuelan generals, as U.S. generals wear stars.

It's not clear whether Domínguez's declarations, some of which were published last month in El Nuevo Herald, led to Correa's departure last week.

Correa has denied Domínguez's allegations, but did not grant repeated Miami Herald requests for an interview.

The Venezuelan government has made strides in recent months to crack down on drug trafficking. Authorities captured two high-level traffickers this year and five last year, including Domínguez, which President Chávez himself trumpeted as a triumph of anti-drug authorities.

OPENING UP

The Venezuelans also have begun to work more openly with foreign governments, most notably the British and the Dutch, which are working closely on intelligence matters with a vetted 15-man Venezuelan police unit.

"We have the impression that they are serious about [combating drug trafficking] at all levels," Holland's ambassador to Venezuela, Hinkinus Nijenhuis, told The Miami Herald in an interview.

But U.S. authorities have a decidely different impression. The Venezuelan government cut relations with the Drug Enforcement Administration last year and has yet to sign an addendum to a bilateral cooperation agreement that establishes the guidelines for how U.S. counter-drug officials can operate in Venezuela.

Colombian authorities are also troubled.

Many large-scale drug traffickers have simply moved their operations to Venezuela, a top official at the country's investigative police told The Miami Herald on the condition of anonymity given the sensitive nature of relations between the nations.

OUTGOING SHIPS

DOJ_NMG_0130373

The official said that police had detected an increasing amount of drugs on outgoing Venezuelan ships in a manner that he described as "blatant" and ``wanton."

In October last year, the head of a Venezuelan counter-drug unit captured, then released, Hermagoras González Polanco, a Colombian man with a $5 million reward and an Interpol red alert attached to his name. The Interpol report said that González, who is wanted in the United States and Colombia, told the Venezuelans that ``he had dedicated his whole life to farming."

Other evidence of Venezuelan officials' complicity in drug trafficking is piling up at the Colombian attorney general's office as its investigators sift through computer files confiscated during an arrest of a member of a right-wing paramilitary group.

Both paramilitary units and their leftist guerrilla foes have financed their fight by delving into the profitable drug trade.

In one of the files obtained by The Miami Herald, investigators say the paramilitaries worked through a "commander general of the National Guard." The file does not identify the general, but goes on to say that the "general" facilitated drug trafficking through Venezuela.

Giuliani: Gun Control Helped Lower Crime (AP)

AP, February 12, 2007

Rudy Giuliani addressed a potentially troublesome issue with conservative voters, saying his policies as mayor to get handguns off the street helped reduce crime in New York.

"I used gun control as mayor," he said at a news conference Saturday during a swing through California. But "I understand the Second Amendment. I understand the right to bear arms."

He said what he did as mayor would have no effect on hunting.

Addressing another potential trouble spot with conservatives, Giuliani spoke in favor of a border fence, saying, "You have to have secure borders, you have to have a fence, and the fence I think has to be a highly technological one."

The nation needs to know, he said, who is coming into the country and why. But he provided scant details on how he would deal with illegal immigrants already in the country. Citizens, he added, should be able to read and write English.

Giuliani was to make an address Monday in Silicon Valley and he was to appear Tuesday at an agricultural fair in the Central Valley.

Asked when he would make a formal announcement that he is a candidate for the Republican nomination, Giuliani said: "Well, formally announce? I don't know."

He then alluded to making an announcement in multiple locations "so we get more attention" but provided no details.

IMMIGRATION:

The Attrition Solution (WT)

By Steve King

The Washington Times, February 12, 2007

I emphatically disagree with statements Sen. Mel Martinez made recently to the Washington Times ("New RNC chief backs bill with guest-worker plan" Page 1, Feb. 2). Mr. Martinez wants to grant illegal aliens a "path to citizenship." This represents nothing less than endorsement of a mass amnesty for many millions of illegal aliens. Americans reject mass amnesty by large margins. Amnesty is an affront to native-born Americans, to legal immigrants, and to the very concept of the rule of law.

Amnesty can be dressed up as "earned legalization," "going to the back of the line" or a "path to citizenship," but it is still amnesty. Do we give bank robbers "earned plunder" or make them "go to the end of the line" to get their pillage or a "path towards keeping their prize"? Consider two brothers living in Mexico City. One came to the United States illegally. The other stayed in Mexico and supports his family there. Mr. Martinez would grant the brother who broke our laws permanent residence and then citizenship in our country. He would grant no such prizes to the brother who stayed in Mexico. This is the worst kind of amnesty -- it grants huge benefits that are reserved only for those who have broken our laws.

Amnesty will not, as advertised, increase national security; it will imperil us all. Some argue that if we grant amnesty we will at least know "who is in our country." They are fundamentally mistaken. We will not learn who the illegal immigrants are, but who they want us to believe they are. Aliens who want to create false identities will provide counterfeit or fraudulent documents from their "home country" and we will catch only those unlucky few whose can't afford quality fakes or who have fingerprints in the FBI system. There was a massive number of fraudulent applications filed for the 1986 amnesty. An estimated two-thirds of the applications for amnesty for agricultural workers were fraudulent and most of those fraudulent applications were approved.

As retired INS investigator Mike Cutler has testified before the Immigration, Border Security and Claims Subcommittee, "it will be a simple matter for illegal aliens, including terrorists or criminals, to walk into an immigration office, along with millions of other illegal aliens, and produce a false name and then get an official identity document from our government bureaucrats. These documents would then enable them to circumvent the various no-fly and terror watch lists. They would be able to use these documents as breeder documents -- all the while staying under the radar and obscuring and concealing their true identity."

DOJ_NMG_0130374

Mahmud Abouhalima, a leader of the 1993 World Trade Center bombing, was legalized under the 1986 amnesty. It was only after he got his amnesty that he was able to travel outside of the country, including severaltripstothe Afghanistan/Pakistan border, where he received the terrorist training he used in the bombing. Three-quarters of Americans have little or no confidence in the government's ability to weed out terrorists and criminals from the millions who would apply for amnesty.

Mr. Martinez presents the false choice of mass amnesty or mass deportations. The sensible middle ground -- supported by Americans over amnesty by more than two to one -- is a policy of attrition. Vigorous enforcement of our current immigration laws will substantially decrease the illegal-immigrant population over time. Experience has proven that illegal immigrants who could no longer easily obtain jobs would simply return to their home countries. The Center for Immigration Studies has concluded that a policy of vigorous enforcement would cut the illegal immigrant population in half in just five years.

Mr. Martinez claims that House Republican opposition to amnesty has alienated Hispanic voters. There is no evidence to support Mr. Martinez's position. According to the William C. Velasquez Institute's exit polls, only eight percent of Latino voters picked immigration as the issue that mattered most to them in deciding how to vote for Congress last election. Would support for amnesty have helped Republicans? In the 1986 election, after a Republican president signed into law the largest amnesty for illegal immigrants in American history, only 23 percent of Hispanics voted for Republican candidates, far less than the 30 percent support rate in 2006.

The one segment of voters who Mr. Martinez and Sen. John McCain threaten to alienate is not Hispanics, but the Republicans' law-and-order base. If they manage to do that, Democratic control of Congress won't be just a two-year aberration, but something we will have to live with for many years. The most important principle for the survival of the United States of America would be destroyed -- the rule of law.

Rep. Steve King, Iowa Republican, is ranking member of the immigration subcommittee.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Inspector Waxman's Inquest (USNEWS)

By Silla Brush

U.S. News and World Report, February 12, 2007

Rep. Henry Waxman and the Democratic detectives are back on the case. That was the message last week from the diminutive, soft-spoken California congressman and his powerful House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, which grilled 29 different witnesses on everything from Iraq reconstruction and military and homeland security contracts to prescription drug pricing. Waxman says he's focusing on waste, fraud, and abuse, and his committee holds unique subpoena power, so these days, Waxman is one of the most feared representatives in Washington. "I suppose some people have had a free ride for the last six years," he allowed after three hours of questioning, "when Congress wasn't asking some of the questions."

A tough assessment perhaps, but Democrats want to make this much clear: The Bush administration is going to be answering a lot of questions. Elected with a mandate to clean up Washington, congressional Democrats on oversight committees across Capitol Hill are still just revving up; many are hiring staff and deciding what exactly to investigate. Those investigations can take months, and the showdown hearings could be a long way off. But investigations are coming. Lots of them. And potential targets from the White House to private corporations are keeping a close eye on Congress and hiring new attorneys just in case they come under the spotlight.

Waxman, a 32-year veteran of Congress with a lengthy record of hearings and legislation, is one of those leading the charge. He wrote the Clean Air Act in 1990, and four years later, he presided over a hearing during which the nation's top cigarette makers said smoking wasn't addictive, testimony that led to a flurry of lawsuits. While he was in the minority, his staff of 40-now 80-produced roughly 2,000 reports. "He is very systematic," says Rep. Elijah Cummings, a Maryland Democrat.

Already at one Waxman hearing, the Army announced it would withhold $19.6 million from the Halliburton Co. The Army had told congressional investigators until last week that it couldn't find evidence Halliburton had hired Blackwater USA, a firm Waxman is investigating that provides private guards-a potential breach of Halliburton's Iraq reconstruction contract with the Army. Last week, the Army said it did find evidence that Halliburton hired Blackwater; Halliburton denies wrongdoing. "There doesn't have to be one 'gotcha' moment," says Rep. Chris Van Hollen, a Maryland Democrat, for the public "to understand that Congress is doing its job." Republicans, so far, are bristling at some of the hearings. "It's old news," carped the top Republican, Rep. Tom Davis. Added Rep. Darrell Issa of California: "I hope [Waxman] would do more of recognizing what we did in the past."

DOJ_NMG_0130375

Targets. But the way the Democrats see it, the Bush administration had a free pass from a Republican Congress for six years. So they're gearing up. Democratic Rep. Ike Skelton, chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, has a revamped oversight panel. Rep. John Dingell, atop the Energy and Commerce Committee, has suggested many areas to investigate, including drug and food safety regulations. "There is an abundance of riches," says Rep. Bill Delahunt of Massachusetts, who leads an international relations oversight panel. "There are so many beats. There is still an insufficient number of cops."

A real flash point could come if the Bush administration claims executive privilege and withholds information from Democratic investigative committees. "The rubber hasn't hit the road yet," says Stan Brand, a longtime lawyer with House Democrats. But an inkling of that struggle emerged last week when Ambassador Timothy Carney, the new overseer of Iraq reconstruction projects, did not appear before Waxman. The State Department said Carney was working in Iraq, but Waxman left an empty seat for him at the table and declared, "The chair won't be empty for too long." Presidential advisers say they'll be relying on new White House counsel Fred Fielding, a Ronald Reagan and Richard Nixon hand; he has a reputation for defending executive branch powers, working with Congress, and taking the public relations side of the job seriously. "Fred's advice is to be as cooperative as we can," says a longtime associate. One concern of Bush advisers is that the administration not appear to be obsessed with secrecy; another is dealing with Vice President Dick Cheney and his acolytes, fierce defenders of executive prerogatives.

Meanwhile, though, Waxman and his colleagues have a packed schedule. This week's topics: Iraq reconstruction, whistle-blower protection, and the Freedom of Information Act. And plenty more to come.

White House Sees Strong Productivity (WSJ)

By John D. Mckinnon

The Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

WASHINGTON -- President Bush's economic team predicts rapid gains in U.S. productivity can continue for the foreseeable future, as long as rising protectionist sentiment and higher taxes don't get in the way.

In the annual Economic Report of the President, to be released today, Mr. Bush's advisers said productivity increases in the past five years have produced a range of economic benefits including strong overall growth, a solid job market and low inflation. From 2000 to 2005, productivity -- a measure of the goods and services produced per hour of work -- has increased at about 3% a year, higher even than the 2.5% growth during the late 1990s, when productivity growth was credited with creating a rare environment of both low unemployment and low inflation.

This helped the economy weather shocks such as the 2001 terrorist attacks, the collapse of the stock-market bubble, a recession and Hurricane Katrina. In recent months, White House economists said productivity gains finally have begun delivering another benefit: higher real earnings for ordinary workers.

Administration officials are optimistic they will see more productivity-driven earnings growth in the years ahead. That could help them score some political points with lower-wage workers, who have been falling further behind the well-to-do for years. It could help blunt attacks by Democrats that Bush policies have exacerbated differences between the haves and have-nots.

"If you care about the standard of living of the average worker, productivity is the story," Edward Lazear, chairman of Mr. Bush's Council of Economic Advisers, said in an interview. He added "productivity can continue to increase...as long as the fundamental conditions remain," particularly on trade and taxes.

The report focuses on gains in workers' overall compensation growth, rather than on wages alone. Administration officials have acknowledged real wage growth has lagged behind compensation growth, which includes the rising cost of health-insurance benefits.

Most economic forecasters, however, doubt the U.S. economy can maintain a 3% productivity pace in the next decade, and there are signs that productivity growth is tapering off. The new White House budget relies on an economic forecast -- largely comparable with private-sector predictions -- that implicitly sees productivity growth of about 2% a year for the next five years.

Productivity growth will become more vital to the economy in the future, as Baby Boomers start to retire and growth in hours worked begins to slow. Maintaining rapid productivity growth will require advances on several fronts, unlike the gains of the recent past.

The strong productivity gains of the late 1990s were due in large measure to a rapid increase in deployment of new capital, especially computers and software, Mr. Bush's advisers said. The recent wave of productivity gains has come in large part because companies have become more efficient in using the new technology, the report said.

Going forward, productivity gains will depend on continued strong investment and increased efficiency but also on increasing workers' skills, the report said. It will urge keeping taxes low on capital gains and dividends, strengthening education and keeping the U.S. open to foreign investment. In the long run, overhauling Medicare, Social Security and other entitlement programs also is important.

DOJ_NMG_0130376

Future breakthroughs in alternative energy sources and improving efficiency in the health-care sector could provide big sources of productivity gains, comparable to the high-tech revolution of the 1980s and 1990s, Mr. Lazear said.

Bernanke's Congressional Testimony Could Set Tone For Treasurys (WSJ)

By Danielle Reed

The Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke's semiannual monetary-policy report to Congress could well set the bond market's direction this week, with scope for added volatility if he wavers from the tone of his recent comments.

Barring any surprises from Mr. Bernanke's two-day testimony or on the data front, the 10-year yield is expected to stay in a range of 4.7% to 4.95% this week.

Late Friday, the price of the benchmark 10-year note fell 14/32 point, or $4.375 for each $1,000 invested, to 98 24/32. The yield, which moves inversely to the price, rose to 4.784% from 4.730%.

Mr. Bernanke's report to Congress "certainly has the potential" to set the tone for the market, said Michael Pond, Treasury and inflation-linked strategist for Barclays Capital in New York.

Given how far the market has scaled back its interest-rate-cut expectations -- it now sees just one cut by year's end -- it is equally possible, unless the chairman strikes a much more upbeat tone on the economy or a far harsher tone on inflation, that "the market doesn't react a whole lot," Mr. Pond said.

In recent comments, Federal Reserve officials have been careful to stress that inflation remains a risk and rates may well have further to rise, particularly if economic growth remains strong.

That, in turn, has echoed the tone of the Federal Open Market Committee's postmeeting statement at the end of last month, in which the FOMC left rates unchanged at 5.25% for a fifth straight gathering.

Mr. Bernanke, who testifies Wednesday and Thursday, is widely expected to "reinforce the notion that the economy is regaining some traction after a midyear soft patch," while policy makers will remain "on guard against the possibility of an unwanted cyclical rise in inflation," Deutsche Bank economist Joseph LaVorgna wrote in a research note.

The market's reaction to Mr. Bernanke's testimony, though, could play either way, Mr. LaVorgna said.

Data that could move yields this week include retail-sales figures Wednesday and housing data Thursday.

New York Fed Forms Market Practices Group

The Federal Reserve Bank of New York on Friday announced the formation of the Treasury Market Practices Group, a private-sector group whose role is to strengthen trading and compliance practices in the Treasury cash and repurchase and related markets.

The group comprises representatives from dealer banks, large investors and custodians in the Treasury market.

"The role of this private-sector group is to strengthen market integrity by promotion of best practices in the Treasury market," the New York Fed said in a statement.

The formation of the group comes in response to concerns about price manipulation and questionable trading activities in the government bond market and follows a meeting at the New York Fed Nov. 6 with industry participants. The group Friday put forward a preliminary best-practices guide, which includes recommendations to promote market making and liquidity. It is soliciting comments from industry and the broader public by March 1, after which it will publish final recommendations.

Fed Turnover Presents Challenge For Bernanke (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, February 12, 2007

WASHINGTON — Even as Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke prepares to update Congress this week on the outlook for the economy, he faces new challenges within the central bank.

Fed Governor Susan Bies, 59, a former Tennessee banking executive and economics professor, said Friday she would leave the Fed at the end of March. Bies' decision means Fed Vice Chair Donald Kohn will be the sole member of the seven-person Board of Governors who has been there longer than Bernanke.

Bies' departure deprives Bernanke, who became chairman a year ago, of his chief expert on commercial banking, even as the Democratic Congress threatens to clamp down on mortgage and credit card lending.

Because there was already one vacancy on the board, President Bush must get two nominees confirmed by the Senate.

"For effective bank regulation and to understand the economy, we think it's important that you have some banker experience as part of that team," said Ed Yingling, president of the American Bankers Association.

DOJ_NMG_0130377

Bies, who has been commuting between Washington and South Carolina, where her husband lives, is the sole woman on the board. There has not been a minority Fed governor since former vice chair Roger Ferguson, an African-American, left in 2006.

In addition, Bernanke faces higher-than-usual turnover at the 12 regional Fed banks. In January, Chicago Fed President Michael Moskow and Boston Fed President Cathy Minehan announced their retirements. Dennis Lockhart, a Georgetown University professor, will take over as president of the Atlanta Bank in March.

The seven Fed governors and five of the 12 Fed bank presidents make up the Federal Open Market Committee, which sets interest rate policy.

Despite the churning, a former Fed official says the central bank has a stable core of appointees and staff. "I would not expect any significant change in the direction of monetary policy," says Alfred Broaddus, former president of the Richmond Fed. "You're going to still have 18 or 19 people around that table, many of whom have been there for a while. There should be plenty of continuity."

Broaddus says the White House should search beyond white men to fill Bies' seat. While the average consumer may not spend much time thinking about the FOMC, "It affects everybody's life. It's important for it to be representative of the society at large," he says.

Fed Bank presidents are selected by boards of directors.

Bernanke will appear before Congress on Wednesday and Thursday to present his semiannual outlook on the economy.

Bank Executive Is Expected To Receive Treasury Post (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

This copy is for your personal, non-commercial use only. To order presentation-ready copies for distribution to your colleagues, clients or customers, use the Order Reprints tool at the bottom of any article or visit:

T. Timothy Ryan, a former bank regulator with international experience in the private sector, has emerged as the front-runner to become the Treasury Department's top international-policy adviser, a person familiar with the situation said. Mr. Ryan is managing director of the Global Government Institutions Group at J.P. Morgan Chase. He would succeed Timothy Adams as the Treasury's undersecretary for international affairs. Mr. Ryan declined to comment through a J.P. Morgan spokesman. The Treasury and White House declined to comment.

Gazprom, Nabucco Discuss Russia's Role in Pipeline

Fresh talks are under way that could result in Russia supplying natural gas to a giant pipeline intended to cut Europe's reliance on Russia as a source. The Nabucco pipeline consortium and Russian state gas company OAO Gazprom began formal talks in the past month on Russia providing some of the gas for the proposed pipeline, according to a top official from one of the consortium's five members.

Iran Won't Stop Enriching Uranium, President Says

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad vowed during yesterday's celebration of the 28th anniversary of the Islamic Revolution that Iran wouldn't give up uranium enrichment. He said he was prepared to negotiate with the international community; his speech fell short of an expected announcement that Iran had started installing 3,000 centrifuges to enrich uranium.

A Renewed Call To Televise High Court (WP)

By Robert Barnes

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

With Supreme Court justices becoming increasingly comfortable in the spotlight, Sen. Arlen Specter says it might finally be time for their close-ups.

Spector (Pa.), joined by two other Republican and three Democratic senators, has refiled his legislation to require the court to televise its proceedings. Although getting the rest of Congress to agree still seems very much a long shot, Specter said there is a big difference between now and last year, when the bill did not reach the Senate floor.

"I think the frequency with which the justices are appearing on television can be a very significant factor" in changing minds in Congress, Specter said in an interview.

There is no doubt that the once-cloistered justices are making themselves more available to the media, giving on-the-record interviews with newspapers and magazines and popping up on television. Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. starred in PBS's recent look at the history of the court.

Specter, former chairman of the Judiciary Committee and sometimes a sharp critic of the court, said the individual justices have been "extensively televised."

DOJ_NMG_0130378

"Chief Justice Roberts and Justice [John Paul] Stevens were on . . . on ABC TV," Specter said in introducing the bill on the Senate floor. "Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg was on CBS with Mike Wallace. Justice [Stephen G.] Breyer was on 'Fox News Sunday.' Justice [Antonin] Scalia and Justice Breyer had an extensive debate last December, which is available for viewing on the Web -- and in television archives.

"So there has been very extensive participation by court members, which totally undercuts one of the arguments [against the bill]: that the notoriety would imperil the security of Supreme Court justices."

More substantive arguments -- that cameras would alter the deliberative nature of the court or that lawyers would play to television rather than answer the justices' questions -- are overruled by the importance of increasing the public's knowledge of the court, Specter said.

The court makes monumental decisions -- who lives and dies, in some cases, and in 2000, who should occupy the Oval Office -- but is a mystery to most Americans, Specter said.

"It is, I think, fundamental that the court's work, the court's operation, ought to be more broadly understood," Specter said in his floor speech. "That can be achieved by television."

While the Supreme Court is the most insular of the nation's public institutions, justices like to say they are already the most open. Every piece of paper that comes to the court -- petitions, briefs, decisions -- is a public document, justices say, and they contend that they are the only public officials who must explain the decisions they make.

"We're judged ultimately by what we write," Justice Anthony M. Kennedy told a congressional committee last year -- not on the oral arguments or the private conferences at which justices vote on decisions.

The court has made some concessions to modernity: Starting with Gore v. Bush in 2000, it has released same-day audiotapes in 16 high-profile oral arguments, and beginning this term, it has quickly posted transcripts of the arguments on the court's Web site.

But several of the justices seem unwilling to go further. Justice David H. Souter, perhaps the most publicity-averse of the nine, is famous for his statement that cameras will enter the chamber "over my dead body."

Justice Clarence Thomas is opposed, and while Scalia and Ginsburg have said they could support gavel-to-gavel coverage of oral arguments, Scalia acknowledges that is unrealistic. A frequent critic of Supreme Court journalism that he says reduces the court's complex decisions to whether "the good guys lost and the bad guys won," he said in 2005 that showing clips of the proceedings would "misinform rather than inform" the public.

The two newest justices, Roberts and Samuel A. Alito Jr., sounded open to the possibility during their confirmation hearings, and Alito favored allowing cameras in his previous job as an appellate court judge. But neither seems inclined to push the issue with justices who are opposed.

The issue of who decides seems as important to some justices as the decision itself.

"We feel strongly that we have intimate knowledge of the dynamics and the needs of the court," Kennedy told Congress last year, "and we think that proposals mandating and directing television in our court are inconsistent with the deference and etiquette that should apply between the branches."

That just sets Specter off.

He runs off a long list of cases in which the court found fault with federal legislation, and he seems particularly peeved about a 5 to 4 decision striking down a domestic violence act, in which former Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist questioned Congress's "method of reasoning."

"When I read United States v. Morrison. . . I wondered what kind of a transformation there was when you leave the Senate chamber, where our columns are aligned exactly with the Supreme Court columns across the green, what kind of a transformation there was with method of reasoning that there is such superior status when going to the court," Specter said.

Such comments -- Specter also questioned the dwindling number of cases the court accepts and its process for reviewing petitions -- open the senator to criticism that his proposal for cameras seems born of pique more than concern.

"No, I respect their authority to make the final decision," Specter said. "But I think it ought to be known to the public."

Bush's Farm Bill Outlines Bold Move (CSM)

By Amanda Paulson

The Christian Science Monitor, February 12, 2007

CHICAGO

The Bush administration's recent proposals for the next farm bill – due for reauthorization this fall – have been winning accolades and criticisms from some surprising quarters.

DOJ_NMG_0130379

Environmentalists have lauded it as an important step in the right direction, even as the largely Republican agricultural community has met many of its proposals – such as a plan to scrap subsidies for any farmer with an adjusted gross income of more than $200,000 a year – with skepticism.

Conservation and energy programs get a boost in the administration's plan, while several billion dollars are cut from payments to some of the nation's largest farmers. In comparison with the 2002 farm bill, the overall bill would spend $10 billion less over the next five years, according to the Department of Agriculture.

"We have some major concerns," says Mary Kay Thatcher, director of public policy for the American Farm Bureau Federation, which bills itself as "the voice of agriculture." "We're supportive of [conservation, energy, and rural development] getting additional funding, but we don't think you ought to reduce farmers' safety net to do that."

One of the most significant elements of the proposed bill would change the countercyclical program – the means by which the federal government helps farmers in an off year. It would go from one that's price-based to one that's revenue-based. That responds to complaints some farmers have had for years that they can face, say, a disastrous drought – which lowers supply of a crop enough that prices go up – and receive no payments.

This way, says Ken McCauley, president of the National Corn Growers Association, "you're actually getting the money to the farmer who needs the support." Moreover, he notes that corn growers – who have seen prices roughly double in the past year – may be heading into an era of higher prices because of ethanol, but they will still shoulder significant risk. "We'll still need a safety net, and a revenue-based one is a good way to go into it," he says.

The American Farm Bureau Federation is skeptical of that shift, noting that what helps a corn farmer in Iowa might not be so good for a corn farmer in a place like Texas. Ultimately, says Ms. Thatcher, she worries this new method would reduce the overall safety net for farmers.

But her major concerns have to do with the new income limits and payment caps, which would limit payments to a single farmer to $360,000. They would also eliminate some of the ways the farmer could get around such limits before, by setting up different "entities" through which he or she was paid.

The new income limit – lowered from the previous limit of a $2.5 million adjusted gross income per farmer per year – would affect about 80,000 farmers, says Chuck Conner, deputy secretary of Agriculture. He says the decision was not a difficult one.

"These are income subsidies, pure and simple," Mr. Conner says. "We maintain that it's an important principle that we not be using these income subsidies for people who are some of the most well-to-do people out there."

Much of the pushback on the new limits is coming from the South, where it's not uncommon for large cotton and rice farmers to earn more than $200,000 in a year.

But some of them say that what may seem an obvious principle – that they make enough already – doesn't take into account the huge amount of risk and debt they need to shoulder, or how much operations can vary from year to year.

"I've been in farming all my life, but we've been in the expanding mode," says Stanley Reed, president of the Arkansas Farm Bureau Federation and a cotton farmer who works 4,000 acres in Marianna, Ark., with his son and daughter. "In the 1980s, we had an opportunity to load up on debt, and had to make land payments. If we'd had limits during that time on what our income could have been [in order to get subsidies], we wouldn't have gotten loans, and we wouldn't have been able to apply the earnings back to the land debt."

But others have applauded the fact that the limits will get subsidies into the hands of those who need it most, and free up some money for other programs: conservation, rural development, incentives and help for new and young farmers, and alternative energy development.

"There's really a groundswell of support on Capitol Hill for a farm safety net that helps more farmers, that is less costly, and that does much more to reward stewardship," says Scott Faber, farm policy director for Environmental Defense in Washington. "The secretary has hit all the right notes." Mr. Faber is particularly pleased about the increased emphasis on helping farmers who are producing for ethanol to develop best practices that minimize erosion and use less fertilizer. He also cites the loans and incentives for farmers to grow feedstock like switch grass for cellulosic ethanol. In addition, farmers who are tempted by the high corn prices to break into new, marginal land wouldn't get subsidies.

Conner says he's been happy with the reception the bill has received so far in Congress and among the key stakeholders. But some expect a battle over several key provisions.

"This is going to be interesting as we watch the debate unfold," says Michael Duffy, an agricultural economist at Iowa State University. "We may start seeing more of a regional push and pull, and regional conflicts, given who's affected."

Senators Enter Spin Cycle (RC)

By Erin P. Billings And John Stanton

Roll Call, February 12, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0130380

Following a week of virtual gridlock over the Iraq War debate that left little for either side to gloat about, Senate Democrats and Republicans today will begin competing public relations campaigns designed to secure some stronger political ground heading into the first recess of the 110th Congress.

Democrats will spend the coming days trying to increase party momentum under the broad message that the voters put them in charge because they wanted change, and the majority has started to deliver. Republicans, meanwhile, will use the week to poke holes in the Democrats' initial stewardship of the chamber, while outlining the specifics of a Congressional agenda they hope to sell to the public in the coming months.

Senate Democrats started to set the tone last week, arguing that they have made a strong case over the past two months that they are delivering change and insisting on accountability from the Bush administration. The Democrats will use this week and the recess to tout passage of an ethics package and a minimum-wage increase, while reiterating their resolve to oppose the president's call to increase U.S. troops in Iraq.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said late last week that despite the logjam over how to debate the troop surge, he believes "the American public is satisfied with what is happening." And, he added, "The American public is watching what we're doing and is pretty happy with it."

But Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott (R-Miss.) suggested that the Democrats shouldn't be patting themselves on the back so fast: "We've been here two months and not one bill we've passed has been signed into law and we've only done two" bills.

The Senate has moved at a slower clip than the House, where Democrats with a 15-seat advantage have passed numerous bills and are set to do this week what the Senate could not — debate a resolution opposing Bush's troop increase. Senate Democrats have a much bigger challenge given they have a narrow two-seat majority and the chamber's rules afford the minority significant power.

Democrats and Republicans alike acknowledge that pace is likely to slow even more in the coming weeks as the Senate considers more controversial legislation and the 2008 elections muddy motivations. "It's going to get harder," Reid spokesman Jim Manley conceded. "Last week was probably only a taste of what's to come. As everyone understands, a determined minority can be effective at thwarting the will of the majority."

As such, GOP Senators have focused much of their energy over the first seven-week legislative stretch on trying to amend Democratic proposals, beginning with the ethics package and including the wage hike and the Iraq resolution debate. But Republicans also will try to move beyond the Democrats' agenda this week when they lay out a detailed blueprint of their priorities for the 110th Congress.

"It was Republicans that made earmark reform part of the lobby reform bill to protect against waste; it was Republicans that ensured that tax relief was added to the minimum-wage bill to protect jobs; and it was Republicans that kept the funding bill within the administration's budget to protect taxpayers," argued Don Stewart, spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.). "We promised reform and bipartisan accomplishments. We've delivered both."

Sources familiar with the Republicans' plans say GOP leaders, led by Republican Conference Chairman Jon Kyl (Ariz.), will arm Senators with their new agenda heading into the break. Still in the works, the Republicans' agenda will center on fiscal discipline, tax relief, health care and energy reform, fair treatment of judicial nominations, immigration reform and the war on terrorism, sources said.

"We're going to have a very positive message we can carry to our constituents," Kyl said.

At the same time, Reid's office late Friday circulated recess packages to Democratic Caucus members focusing on "a message of accomplishments," a senior aide to Reid said. According to this source, Caucus members are being asked to spend much of the recess focusing on legislation passed thus far in the 110th — including ethics reform, the fiscal 2007 continuing resolution and minimum-wage legislation.

Reid also has asked Caucus members to use those themes to contrast themselves with the "do-nothing Congress" of the 109th to boost Democrats' image as being more ethical and fiscally responsible than the GOP.

Reid's communications "war room" has included a series of talking points and background documents as part of the recess package, as well as examples of the types of events they should hold. For instance, Reid suggests Caucus members arrange to tour the facilities of a local company that will be increasing workers' wages to meet the minimum wage. Likewise, members are being encouraged to hold a press event with a group of women who currently make the minimum wage to highlight the impact on women.

Additionally, Democrats have been asked to highlight the Republican filibuster of Sen. John Warner's (R-Va.) resolution opposing President Bush's Iraq War "surge" proposal while in their home states.

The Senate was set to consider the troop surge early last week, but the GOP mounted a procedural block to moving forward on the matter — unhappy with the conditions of the debate laid out by the Democrats. In the end, the Democrats backed out of the negotiations and opted to punt the issue until after the House debates it this week and after Senators return to Capitol Hill following a week off.

DOJ_NMG_0130381

Democratic sources explained that although Reid wanted to complete work on the resolution before the recess, his Caucus members now can paint Republicans as out of step with a public increasingly unhappy with the war — and also put pressure on vulnerable Republicans to break with their party and support the resolution.

Arguably, both parties have some ground to make up. While Republicans got much of the blame for the impasse over the Iraq resolution, leaders maintain that they simply are digging in for minority Senate rights. Late last week, McConnell still refused to concede a loss for his party, saying: "It's not about keeping score. This is an extraordinarily important issue."

But Democrats seem to be taking a tally and giving themselves points for pushing back against the Republicans and for their overall handling of their seven weeks of leading Congress for the first time in practically 12 years.

"Congress is beginning to play its role again," said Sen. Charles Schumer (N.Y.), chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee and Caucus vice chairman. "We're feeling pretty good."

FEDERAL DIARY: Pay Unrelated To Performance, Workers Say (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, February 12, 2007

The results are in, but what they mean is by no means settled.

In a government-wide survey, federal employees were presented with this statement: "Pay raises depend on how well employees perform their jobs."

The responses: 45 percent disagreed with the statement, 22 percent agreed, and 25 percent were neutral.

The query had not appeared on previous government-wide surveys and was added to the most recent one by the Office of Personnel Management in hopes of better understanding employee attitudes on pay. The Bush administration has called for more closely linking pay raises to job performance, and two large departments, Homeland Security and Defense, are moving to set up performance-based pay systems, which would give managers greater discretion in setting salaries.

It is not surprising to some civil service experts that a high percentage of employees do not see their pay as linked to job performance.

The majority of federal employees in the survey are covered by the General Schedule system, where pay, by and large, is dependent on time in the job and not how the employee performs, said John M. Palguta, a vice president at the nonprofit Partnership for Public Service.

"The responses are an accurate reflection for the government as a whole," he said. "Pay raises are not heavily dependent on job performance."

Howard Risher, a consultant who has studied federal compensation practices, said the General Schedule, which was designed more than 50 years ago, has failed to recognize and reward the best employees in the civil service.

"I have heard the phrase 'living and breathing increases' more than a couple of times," he said. "I've also been told promotions are virtually automatic in the early years of their careers."

The employee survey was conducted during the summer of 2006. More than 221,400 employees completed it, for a response rate of 57 percent. The pay-and-performance question received the highest negative rating in the survey, OPM said.

But it was not the only troublesome response in the survey. About 35 percent of the federal employees said promotions are not based on merit, 36 percent did not see differences in performance "recognized in a meaningful way," and 33 percent said bonuses do not depend on how well employees perform their jobs.

The survey results have raised questions about whether the government is ready to transition to more rigorous systems that reward performance.

John Gage, president of the American Federation of Government Employees, said the survey results say less about the current pay system and more about why a performance-based system would not work in federal agencies.

"I think the survey response indicates most federal workers don't trust a system by which they would be compensated or receive raises based on how they are judged on their performance by their managers," Gage said. "Federal workers don't believe that they are compensated based on their performance but on other more subjective factors."

Mark A. Abramson, executive director of the IBM Center for the Business of Government, thinks one solution is to begin the process with the managers. "What government really needs to do now is better train and equip their managers for implementing pay for performance," he said. "The managers are behind, and the government has not spent enough time preparing them for the implementation, because it is going to make their job different and harder."

In performance-based systems, managers should expect to spend more time setting out expectations and talking with each employee about their job goals, Abramson and Risher said.

"Too often managers do not see this as a central part of their jobs," Risher said. "It would be highly advantageous to see their pay at least in part dependent on how well they manage the performance of their people."

Clay Johnson III, deputy director for management at the Office of Management and Budget, said federal agencies have started pilot projects to test new personnel practices. By the end of this year, he said at a recent briefing, more rigorous job rating systems will cover about 20 percent of the federal workforce.

One of the obstacles to improving government performance, Johnson said, "is that every employee, from unsatisfactory to outstanding, gets the same annual raise. I think that is an insult to the outstanding employee, and I think that is a miscommunication or an unfair communication to the unsatisfactory employee."

Did Help Get Left Behind? (USNEWS)

By Elizabeth Weiss Green

U.S. News and World Report, February 12, 2007

The throw-up reports started not long after the law was passed: children getting sick before the test, during the test, even right onto the test. It was just one exceptional response to the passage of the federal No Child Left Behind Act. Behind the scenes, teachers, administrators, and state officials often fared worse, working late nights and weekends to create and grade the multiple tests the landmark law required.

Five years later, educators and lawmakers are asking whether the stomachaches caused by the legislation have been worth it. Over the next several weeks, congressional committees will hold hearings on the law as they try to decide before it expires whether to reauthorize the act as is, change it, or throw it out.

In some ways, the decision looks easy. Both leading Democrats and President George Bush say they are committed to keeping the law-one of only a few big domestic initiatives produced in the past five years. Further, the two sides appear unanimous on what aspects of the law need to be changed-a consensus that will inform a blueprint for reform scheduled for release this week by the bipartisan No Child Left Behind Commission.

But talk to the nine school districts that have filed a lawsuit challenging the act as an unfunded mandate or to the many newly elected U.S. representatives who campaigned against the law, and you will hear a different story. Every child may have been tested, the critics say, but the real question is: Has every child been helped?

The law was based on the idea that one thing would lead to the other. That's why it requires two tests a year in grades three through eight and one test in high school. And because the results are disaggregated by groups, the government learns not only how well a whole third grade scores; it also learns how the black, white, low-income, and disabled third graders score. If enough students in each group reach a certain level, the school is labeled "adequate." If they don't, the school is required to take remedial measures-consequences that get more serious with every year it fails to meet its goal.

Success stories. The result of all this testing is supposed to be improved performance. Ivan Small, the superintendent of schools in Poplar, Mont., tells one success story for that model. The law's requirement to break down test scores by poverty level, Small says, caused him to figure out why his low-income students were underperforming the higher-income ones. His findings, in turn, led him to replace old readers with a whole new literacy curriculum. It also changed the way he thought about homework. "There are multiple families living in a household of two or three bedrooms . ... Is there time or a place for homework?" The answer was often "No," so Small and his staff created an after-school study program.

Centennial Place Elementary School in Atlanta has also benefited from NCLB.The school had been collecting data even before the law was passed, but it had never separated out special education students. When it did, it found dramatic results. "We had a big gap," says Cynthia Kuhlman, the school's former principal. "Seeing that right there ... was a critical picture for us." The staff started giving these students extra help, reviewing their progress, and holding more parent conferences. As a result, proficiency levels rose from 41 to more than 80 percent.

Yet the success stories may omit a crucial point: Although both of these schools owe their gains to NCLB, the law got them only so far. It requires a diagnosis, but it does not prescribe a cure. Or at least it doesn't pay much for one.

No Child does call for consistently failing schools to address their problems, by allowing students to transfer to another public school, for instance, or providing free help to low-income students. But these requirements have hardly guaranteed improvement. In Poplar, all tutoring services are offered online, but few families have Internet access. As for the transfer option, there is no other place to go. Nationwide, only 17 percent of students eligible for tutoring took advantage of it in the 2003-04 school year, and less than 1 percent chose to transfer. In some cases, as with Poplar, there were no alternatives; in others, the districts failed to adequately inform families about their options.

Required reforms become stronger and more specific when a school fails four years in a row. But as substantial as hiring new staff and changing curricula may seem, the White House would go even further. Its proposal for reauthorization calls for more sweeping changes, like overriding state bans to establish charter schools or enabling all-out takeovers by elected officials.

DOJ_NMG_0130383

Many more obstacles block the path from testing students to helping them, and at the top of the list is money. Like other turnaround schools, Centennial Place owes much of its success to outside resources: Even before No Child, members of the local community volunteered as tutors and built a YMCA whose gym the school shares. Coca-Cola donated $50,000 in new books for the school's media center. Elsewhere in the country, failing schools often have to fend for themselves.

There is confusion, too, over what constitutes a failing school in the first place. A Maryland superintendent just informed the staff at Annapolis High School that they will all have to reapply for their jobs next year because they failed to meet No Child standards for four years in a row. Yet the same school exceeded the world average for scores on International Baccalaureate exams. Why the failing grade? It hinged on the poor performance of a single subgroup.

Dozens more issues will fuel the debate over No Child in the months ahead, including how to improve teaching, how to make state standards more uniform, and how to test children with limited English abilities or special needs. A bigger question is whether Congress can avoid partisan bickering and actually fix the flaws in the law before the act expires. If the law remains as it is, it could mean no relief for schools at a time they need it most.

As of last year, less than 1 percent of schools-about 600-had entered the "restructuring" phase that comes after five years of failure. "But that will increase every year," says Jack Jennings, president of the Center on Education Policy. Not only are more schools testing; but as a 2014 deadline for 100 percent proficiency nears, they will face higher standards. "You can't just establish a goal and say, 'Y'all go at it,'" Jennings says. "We need to figure out ways to help schools and teachers do better, not just tell them that they've got problems."

A Fair Health Fix (USNEWS)

By Michael Barone

U.S. News and World Report, February 12, 2007

Not many expected George W. Bush to advance a serious healthcare proposal in his State of the Union address, and few expect anyone in Congress to act in response to it. But Bush did, and at least one member of Congress seems interested. More ought to be paying attention.

Bush's proposal in a nutshell is to end the preferential tax treatment for employer-provided health insurance. In 1943, in the midst of World War II, when wage and price controls were in effect, the government decided that employers could deduct the cost of health insurance for their employees and that employees would not be taxed on the value of the policies. This decision has saddled us with a system in which health insurance has been tied to employment, with many perverse results. Healthcare is perceived as a free good, and consumers have no incentive to take costs into account.

Bush proposes to change this by giving every couple paying taxes a standard $15,000 deduction ($7,500 for individuals) for the cost of health insurance. Those with employer-provided insurance worth more than $15,000 (about 20 percent of the total) would be taxed on the additional amount; this would very likely discourage expensive policies.

Penalizing the poor. As a Washington Post editorial on the speech pointed out, this would be a progressive change. The biggest beneficiaries of the current system are high earners with employer-provided insurance. The biggest losers in the current system are low earners without employer-provided insurance. Health insurance experts on the left, right, and center have long called for ending the tax code's preference for employer-provided health insurance. But employers haven't wanted to lose the deduction, and politicians have flinched at the prospect of taxing voters on something they have been getting tax free. Bush has found a way out, by equalizing the tax treatment of health insurance wherever it comes from.

Bush's point was not lost on Oregon's Democratic Sen. Ron Wyden, who over a long congressional career has specialized in assembling bipartisan coalitions for various reforms. He notes that government single-payer health insurance-the goal of some senior liberal Democrats in Congress-was rejected by the voters of his liberal state by a 4-to-1 margin. He notes that we don't have employer-provided auto insurance; we buy that out of after-tax earnings. He argues that people should be able to buy health insurance as members of Congress and federal employees do, from an array of choices offered by private insurers. He's looking to make something of a political deal. Republicans would get Bush's standard deduction and a private insurance market in which consumers would have incentives to hold down costs. In return, Democrats would get universal coverage, with subsidies for low earners to pay for coverage. As John Goodman of the free market National Center for Policy Analysis points out, additional revenues from those with policies worth more than $15,000 could be used to subsidize low earners.

Wyden has been talking with Republican senators, especially fellow members of the Finance Committee, and says he has been getting positive reactions. As for Democrats, those who seek more government provision of healthcare will probably be uninterested. But some may be affected by the apparent success of the Medicare Part D prescription drug benefit. Many Democrats believed that seniors would have a hard time choosing policies from an array of choices and that they would end up being gouged by private insurers. But polls indicate that the vast majority of seniors are pleased with the results, and the cost of premiums-and costs to the government-have come in lower than experts predicted. One of the prime lessons of the last third of the 20th century has been proved once again: Markets work.

DOJ_NMG_0130384

And more quickly than government mandates: It took 38 years to get a prescription drug benefit in Medicare. In contrast, in the parts of the healthcare sector where market forces are free to work, technology improvements can result in lower costs, as with Lasik eye surgery or cosmetic surgery. Bush's proposal, or Wyden's version, would give markets more room. This kind of major reform is a long shot in this Congress. But it does show a way forward.

Passing The Buck On Health Care (NYT)

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

President Bush's new budget would extend the administration's warped priorities deep into the realm of federally supported health care programs. The administration long ago sacrificed any meaningful domestic agenda to finance tax cuts for the wealthy and its reckless war in Iraq. The White House's reckless determination to make the tax cuts permanent is now driving it to slash domestic spending in health and other vital programs.

Instead of trying to address the underlying problems of escalating health care costs, Mr. Bush's strategy is to cut services or shift more of the bill to states, health care providers and individuals.

In the Medicare program, which covers health care for Americans aged 65 and over, the administration would find most of its savings by slowing the annual increase in reimbursements for services, forcing hospitals and other providers to absorb the burden. Given Medicare's precarious financial straits, the package appears broadly acceptable.

The real outrage is that the administration has not proposed comparable reductions in the large overpayments — roughly 12 percent more per patient — made to private managed care plans that enroll Medicare beneficiaries. The budget would also phase out Medicare bad-debt payments, forcing hospitals to swallow beneficiaries' unpaid bills.

The budget also looks to save money by eliminating inflation indexing so that as incomes rise, so would the number of people required to pay higher premiums. Although this is a sneaky way to raise premiums, it is hard to argue with the notion that better-off beneficiaries should pay more to help rescue a financially strained program.

What seems counterproductive is Mr. Bush's plan to lower federal matching funds for Medicaid administration — forcing the states to find more of their own funds or sacrifice good management and oversight. More worrisome is his plan to cut back on state programs that insure the young.

The most shortsighted restrictions would come in the highly acclaimed State Children's Health Insurance Program, which uses federal matching funds to provide coverage for low- and moderate-income children who are not quite poor enough to qualify for Medicaid. The program has been enormously successful in reducing the number of uninsured children. Yet now the administration wants to reduce its matching rate and limit enrollment to children in households earning no more than twice the federal poverty level. That would undercut programs in 16 states that have expanded coverage to children above that level.

Although the administration's budget would grant the children's program a small $5 billion increase spread over five years, that's less than half, and possibly only a third, of the amount needed just to maintain current enrollments and participation rates. This is too high a price to pay for more tax cuts and Mr. Bush's ill-managed presidency.

Appalachia Redux (NYT)

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

Forty-three years ago, President Lyndon Johnson stood on a ramshackle porch in a Kentucky coal hollow to take up the cause of Appalachia. An unusual quasigovernmental commission was created, embracing 410 impoverished counties in 13 states — a trench line in Johnson's war on poverty that swept from northern Mississippi to southern New York.

The Appalachian Regional Commission is still going strong. Over the decades the area's poverty rate has fallen by half and infant mortality by two-thirds. We cite this overlooked bit of hard-knocks progress not just to puncture the canard that government is always the problem, not the solution. (President Ronald Reagan tried and failed to abolish the commission.) But also to urge renewal of the commission's authority for its unfinished business.

As an innovative joint effort of local, state and federal government plus private business, the commission has leveraged aid and loans to develop 2,300 miles of new highways, bring water and sewer pipes to hundreds of thousands of households, and build hundreds of rural health care outposts and vocational education centers. Not all of the investments have been bull's-eyes. And there are areas where severe poverty reigns. But a five-year renewal is in order, particularly considering the returns reaped for a $90 million annual federal investment.

A renewal bill foundered last year when appropriators tried to weight its budget with pork. This year, a bill with a truer agenda is heading for the House floor, shepherded by Representative James Oberstar. He is a Democrat from Minnesota whose ties to Appalachia date back to his days as a young Congressional staff member who helped write the commission's founding legislation. “The structure’s sound, the investments need to continue,” the congressman properly insists, emboldened to claim government’s role has not been half bad.

DOJ_NMG_0130385

OTHER NEWS:

Time To Face The Music (USNEWS)

By Mortimer B. Zuckerman

U.S. News and World Report, February 12, 2007

Ever worry where the next billion is coming from? Not if you're this spendthrift federal government, with a national debt of $8.7 trillion. Yes, President Bush is fond of pointing to the decline in the federal deficit over the past two years, but that's virtually irrelevant to the long term. How many of us realize, for instance, that Uncle Sam is spending almost four times as much on paying interest on borrowed money as on education, transportation, and NASA combined?

One person who knows-and it gives him plenty of sleepless nights-is Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke. He tells us we are in "the calm before the storm" because Social Security, Medicare, and Medicaid costs now amount to almost half of federal noninterest spending. President Bush has not increased taxes to pay for this expansion of Medicare; in fact, taxes have been cut-repeatedly. Hence, by 2030 the ratio of publicly held federal deficits to overall economic output is likely to triple, from roughly 37 percent today to a mind-boggling 100 percent. This will produce a terrible torque on our economy, since financing deficits means paying out still more in interest, adding still further to the deficit. Bernanke has a not-so-quaint term for this phenomenon. He calls it a "death spiral."

This looming financial crisis can be avoided if we start raising taxes, cutting spending, or both right now. But President Bush is a graduate of the have-your-cake-and-eat-it school and says the deficit can be eliminated in five years without a tax increase. He describes his tax cuts as the cause of the surging economy and the lower-than-predicted federal deficit. Is he right?

There is no doubt that the economy has been strong over the past five years. Our gross domestic product has been growing for a record 20 consecutive quarters. The blue-chip companies in the Standard & Poor's index racked up 18 straight quarters of 10 percent or greater increases in profits; consumers are spending more; unemployment is low, as is inflation; energy prices are plunging just in time to provide consumers with an additional jolt of discretionary income for a post-Christmas binge; hiring has been strong in the past few months, suggesting that wage gains will continue; and the softening of the housing market has had a surprisingly limited effect on the national economy.

Companies have responded to the boom by plowing billions of dollars into new factories, offices, equipment, and software, in an effort to expand operations and take advantage of growth opportunities at home and abroad. Given the continued strength in corporate profits and low-cost financing by the capital markets, financing for a whole range of new ventures is readily available, and companies are in an excellent position to borrow at a time when interest rates are still low and the rising trend in stock prices is a boost for equity financing. As a result, we are continuing to create jobs.

Bad math. The real concern in 2006 and maybe 2007 was whether the housing slump would drag down consumer spending and the economy. The concern was that if home prices fell, that would shrink the equity available for extraction through refinancing and put many properties into a negative equity position, forcing many households to cut spending. But the strength of the economy has greatly diminished this concern.

Samuelson: The Stubborn Welfare State (NSWK)

By Robert J. Samuelson

Newsweek, February 12, 2007

Spend a moment studying the small charts that appear on page 39 of this week's magazine that compares federal budget expenditures in 1956 and 2006. They illuminate why another of our annual budget battles—begun last week, when President Bush submitted his 2008 proposal—seems so fruitless and (yes) repetitious. Every year we hear complaints about accounting gimmicks and unrealistic assumptions. There's a ferocious cross-fire of charges and countercharges. Hardly anything ever gets resolved. Budgets almost always remain in deficit (41 out of 47 years since 1960).

The charts show the rise of the American welfare state. In 1956, defense dominated the budget; the cold-war buildup was in full swing. The welfare state, which is what "payments to individuals" signifies, was modest. Now everything's reversed. Despite the war in Iraq, defense spending is only a fifth of the budget; so-called entitlement payments to individuals are 60 percent—and rising. In fiscal 2006, the federal government spent almost $2.7 trillion. Social Security ($544 billion), Medicare ($374 billion) and Medicaid ($181 billion) dominated. There was $199 billion more for payments to the poor, including the earned income-tax credit and food stamps, among others.

DOJ_NMG_0130386

Almost no one wants to slash these programs. They have huge constituencies; they're popular. Paradoxically, their invulnerability and size also protect much of the rest of the budget. Look again at the charts. After payments to individuals, defense spending and interest on the debt (which must be paid), only about a ninth of the budget remains. Many of these remaining programs are widely supported. Does anyone really want to end the National Institutes of Health at $28 billion? Or how about the $41 billion we spend to support federal courts, prosecutors and police (the FBI, DEA, border patrol)?

Of course, some programs are wasteful, ineffective or outmoded. My perennial favorite is Amtrak, which serves a tiny number of passengers, is concentrated in the Northeast and costs $1.3 billion annually. But politically, ending programs like this is hardly worth the trouble. The bad publicity of antagonizing aggrieved advocates—here, railroad buffs and maybe environmentalists—is too high for the small budget savings. In a nearly $3 trillion budget, even 10 Amtraks are a footnote.

The welfare state has made budgeting an exercise in futility. Both liberals and conservatives, in their own ways, peddle phony solutions. Cut waste, say conservatives. Well, network-TV reports of $20 million federal programs that don't work may seem—and be—scandalous, but like Amtrak, they're usually mere blips on the total budget. For its 2008 budget, the Bush administration brags it would end or sharply reduce 141 programs. But most are microscopic; total savings would be $12 billion, or 0.4 percent of spending. Worse, Congress has previously rejected some of these cuts.

Liberals have their own cures. Cut defense, some say. OK. In 2006, military spending (including the war in Iraq) totaled $520 billion, slightly less than Social Security. If it had been halved, the savings would have just covered the deficit ($248 billion). Little would be left for new programs. Raise taxes on the richest 1 percent, say some. OK. The richest 1 percent pay about a quarter of all federal taxes. In 2006, that was about $600 billion. To cover the deficit would require about a 40 percent tax increase. Needless to say, neither proposal is politically plausible.

Annual budget debates are sterile—long on rhetoric, short on action—because each side blames the other for a situation that neither chooses to change. To cut spending significantly, conservatives would have to go after popular welfare programs, including Social Security and Medicare. To raise taxes significantly, liberals would have to go after the upper-middle class, a constituency they covet (two thirds of all federal taxes come from the richest fifth). Deficits persist, because neither side risks its popularity, and indeed, both sides nurture it with new spending programs and tax breaks.

It might help if Americans called welfare programs—current benefits for select populations, paid for by current taxes—by their proper name, rather than by the soothing (and misleading) labels of "entitlements" and "social insurance." That way, we might ask ourselves who deserves welfare and why. We could consider all of federal spending and not just small bits of it. But most Americans don't want to admit that they're current or prospective welfare recipients. They prefer to think that they automatically deserve whatever they've been promised simply because they've been promised. They do not want to pose the basic questions, and their political leaders mirror that reluctance. This makes the welfare state immovable and the budget situation intractable.

Saudi Oil Minister Says Market Is Balanced, Requires No Changes (WSJ)

By Karen Elliott House

Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

RIYADH, Saudi Arabia -- The world oil market is in "much, much better health and balance" now and, if trends hold, there will be no need for further production cuts or increases in supply when members of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries meet next month, Saudi Arabian Oil Minister Ali Naimi said yesterday.

In an interview, Mr. Naimi said the kingdom's production is now 8.5 million to 8.6 million barrels a day, confirming its reduction by one million barrels a day from its output about six months ago.

The reduction is part of a push by OPEC to shrink stockpiles of oil that climbed sharply last year as demand growth stumbled. The U.S. benchmark crude price fell through the turn of the year to a 20-month low in mid-January of $49.90 a barrel. It has since rebounded to settle Friday at $59.89 a barrel.

Mostly mild winter weather, heavy selling by financial funds and falling oil use among developed nations have contributed to prices dropping from the record $77.03 a barrel settlement price last summer.

OPEC, whose members supply about 40% of the world's oil, is to meet March 15 in Vienna to assess its production policy.

"If you are asking me are we going to take additional cuts or increase supply, I do not know," said Mr. Naimi, the oil cartel's de facto leader. "But, most probably if the trend is like what it is like today, with the market getting in much, much better health and balance, there may not be any reason to change." He added that the situation can still change: "I would not be surprised to see different figures and a different situation on the 15th of March. That is the benefit of getting together with 12 other oil ministers to review the data."

DOJ_NMG_0130387

Saudi Arabia's one-million-barrel-a-day reduction, reported in The Wall Street Journal last month, is nearly double what it agreed to under two OPEC output cuts hammered out by the cartel at meetings in Doha, Qatar, in October and in Abuja, Nigeria, in December.

Asked about his plans and rumors he may want to retire, Mr. Naimi hinted that he would like to stay on in his role when King Abdullah undertakes his first major cabinet shuffle soon. The king is said to be planning the shuffle to inject new blood into his 20-member cabinet.

"Ministers normally do not retire," the 71-year-old Mr. Naimi said. "Ministers are appointed by the king and relieved by the king, unless there is serious medical reason, and as you can see, I am fairly fit and in good shape.

"There are still many challenges ahead of us," he added. He serves at the disposal of the king and "anything else has no basis."

Mr. Naimi said that beginning in May 2004, the kingdom "went almost all out" to produce 9.5 million barrels a day to satisfy rising demand. "We kept that level until August/September last year," he said. When the kingdom saw demand slacken in the summer of 2006, it voluntarily cut production by 450,000 to 500,000 barrels a day and then by another 400,000 to 500,000 barrels a day in concert with OPEC. "So you can say one million barrels was taken off the market," he said, "but gradually."

The drop in oil prices from last summer's highs and a surge in interest in rival forms of energy haven't forced the kingdom, the world's largest crude exporter, to rethink its investment plans.

"From what we see, the world will need what Saudi Arabia produces," Mr. Naimi said. Therefore, the kingdom will proceed with its plan to increase capacity by the end of 2009 to 12.5 million barrels a day from 11.3 million barrels.

"There is no question demand will be there in 2009," he said. "There is no reason to think otherwise."

President Bush declared in January a more-than-fivefold increase in target levels for renewable-fuel production, to 35 billion gallons annually by 2017.

"Alternatives will be needed over the next 30 years," Mr. Naimi acknowledged. The world, he added, will need every unit of energy "it can generate, whether from alternatives, conservation or greater efficiency." Still, he said, "it is a global market, so what one country does isn't really relevant."

Among the reasons world leaders cite to diversify their energy sources is mounting concern over the future reliability of the world's oil and natural-gas suppliers -- those in the Middle East, Russia and Venezuela, to name but three.

Mr. Naimi responded that the major threat to oil stability is "all these outside influences, strikes, tension, geopolitical events." But one has to keep it all in perspective. "We have had a lot of tension, many wars and the flow of oil has not been interrupted. There is a determination to keep the flow of oil uninterrupted," he said.

He conceded that terrorist threats pose a serious challenge. "Security in the kingdom against terrorism is very, very high," he said. "But you can never have enough security, enough protection, because you are dealing with a threat that is very, very well organized and erratic. It can happen anytime." Mr. Naimi, who has served as minister of petroleum and minerals in the world's most important oil-exporting nation for nearly a dozen years, met yesterday with Russian oil-company heads in advance of the visit by Russian President Vladimir Putin, who was to arrive later in the day."When the two biggest producers and exporters of oil meet, energy will be a subject -- but not the subject," Mr. Naimi said.

Mr. Putin's visit is the first by a Russian leader to the kingdom since its founding. Even though the Soviet Union was the first nation to recognize parts of what eventually became the kingdom, its leaders were never welcome here during the communist rule because the leadership of Saudi Arabia, a religious nation, didn't approve of Moscow's policies or principles as a country that was antireligion.

The distaste for the Soviet Union was particularly high after the Soviets invaded Afghanistan in l979, prompting many deeply religious young Saudis to join the Afghan resistance and creating some of the radical Saudi jihadists that threaten the kingdom today.

A Deadline May Be Extended For Claims In Holocaust Case (NYT)

By Joseph B. Treaster

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

Survivors of the Holocaust and their relatives, who have been fighting to compel European insurance companies to pay death benefits for victims of the Nazis, are getting a break from a big Italian insurance company, lawyers for the insurer and policyholders said yesterday.

As part of a proposed class-action settlement, the company, Assicurazoni Generali, has agreed to give heirs of Holocaust victims another 18 months to uncover documentation on unpaid life insurance policies at long-sealed Nazi archives in Bad Arolsen, Germany.

Representatives of several countries, including the United States, have been pushing to open the archives since May.

DOJ_NMG_0130388

"This adds another motivation and a very concrete one to get the archives opened right now," Paul Shapiro, an executive of the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, said of the deadline extension.

Staff technicians at the archives are meeting today to discuss progress on scanning more than 50 million pages of Nazi and Allied records of the period. The documents include reports on the arrest and transfer of millions of people to concentration camps as well as on hundreds of thousands of deaths.

A meeting of representatives of the United States and 10 other countries that control the archives has been called for March. Those countries have kept the archives sealed for 62 years, mainly for privacy reasons.

The deadline extension came at the behest of a United States judge in Manhattan who is conducting hearings on the fairness of a settlement reached by Generali and class-action lawyers last fall.

The concession by Generali suggested a desire to close a long, painful chapter in which the company has been persistently accused of abusing the trust of Jewish policyholders. Generali has insisted that it was never a company policy to reject any valid claim or require survivors of Holocaust victims to produce death certificates and copies of policies in order to collect benefits.

At the same time, it has refused to give survivors access to its Holocaust-era records or to publish full lists of policyholders from that period that might help relatives in filing claims.

Yet for Generali, the accommodation on the German archives may not have been a major concession. Lawyers for Generali said there was little chance that useful insurance data would be found among the documents. Holocaust specialists say they do not know what is in the documents, but Mr. Shapiro said the heirs of victims "should have the right to explore every possibility."

The issue of the archives, among the most extensive and varied ever compiled, was raised at a hearing in Federal District Court in Manhattan on Jan. 31 by Samuel Dubbin, a Miami lawyer who opposes the settlement on several grounds, including that potential payments to policyholders are inadequate and that the settlement has not been sufficiently publicized to ensure full participation. Mr. Dubbin represents a separate group of heirs not taking part in the class action.

Judge George B. Daniels, who gave preliminary approval of the agreement in October, had called the hearing to listen to objections and determine, finally, whether the deal was fair and reasonable.

After listening to Mr. Dubbin argue for delaying the settlement and interrupting frequently with questions, Judge Daniels halted the hearing and called the lawyers who drafted the agreement into his chambers.

After a discussion, he returned to the bench and, without explanation, abruptly adjourned the hearing.

Court papers filed on Friday in Federal District Court in Manhattan suggested that the judge had urged that the agreement be modified so that material from the archive could be considered.

In the filing, the insurance company said that "out of respect to Generali's former insureds or beneficiaries who may have been Holocaust victims, and their heirs, Generali wishes to provide reasonable additional time" for considering material from the archives.

The agreement opens a window of 18 months. If the archives open by January 2008, survivors will have six months to file new claims. After that, the period for filing claims shrinks each month until Aug. 31, 2008, when no more claims will be considered. Before the change, the deadline for claims had been March 31, 2007.

On Thursday, lawyers on both sides outlined the changes to Judge Daniels, who issued an order to resume the hearing on Feb. 27.

Robert A. Swift, one of the class-action lawyers, referred to the extension of time as "a good-faith effort to try to bridge a concern."

Mr. Dubbin said he thought the change improved the agreement, but that it left "many problems unresolved." He said he would continue to oppose the settlement and, separately planned to continue appealing an earlier decision by a federal judge to dismiss the Holocaust insurance claims on several grounds.

"We want a full opportunity to review Generali's records," he said, "and a jury trial if necessary. If we win, we certainly think we'll get more money than my clients are being offered now."

The Right Man (NYM)

By John Heilemann

New York Magazine, February 12, 2007

Wllard Mitt Romney enters the press room at the Baltimore Marriott Waterfront, where a conclave of conservative GOP congressmen has gathered to plot its resurrection. Assuming his place before the cameras, the former Massachusetts governor checks the floor to find his mark: two strips of white tape forming a small X on the low-pile carpet beneath his feet. Romney plants his shoes squarely on the X and starts offering answers so tightly scripted and robotic that he brings to mind Max

DOJ_NMG_0130389

Headroom—then, all of a sudden, he's distracted and off-kilter. "This white spot on the floor here, this marker, is stuck to my heel here," he mutters, staring downward and doing a little jig, ignoring the question just put to him (on Iran) until the damn thing finally falls from his loafer.

The metaphor suggested by Romney's performance is too perfect to resist. By all accounts, including his own, Romney has been for most of his life a middle-of-the-road Republican of moderate views on issues from abortion to gun control to taxes. But ever since he decided to run for president—a decision he will make official on February 13—he has labored to present himself as a rock-ribbed man of the right. He has hired a team of White Tape People to tell him where he needs to stand to win his party's nomination. He has gamely hit his marks. And yet now, just as Romney seemed to be establishing a foothold, he finds himself increasingly tangled up in his own inconvenient record.

The conspicuous and occasionally ruinous flip-floppery of presidential candidates is nothing new, of course. (See Kerry, John, 2004.) Nor is avid pandering to the GOP's extremist constituencies by previously non-wing-nut Republicans. (See McCain, John, 2008.) Romney's offenses in both these categories are, no doubt, egregious. But the fact that, in spite of his current struggles, Romney is still taken seriously illustrates a number of the central dynamics driving the campaign on the Republican side. At a moment when the Democrats, miraculously, have at hand a troika of top-tier candidates—Clinton, Obama, Edwards—who are capable of drawing thousands-strong crowds (in early 2007, for heaven's sake) and look like eminently credible winners, the GOP is saddled with a crop of hopefuls at once uninspiring and implausible. Also with a president who seems determined to dig the already-cavernous hole in which the party is mired all the way to China. As Republican despond edges toward despair, the desperate search for a savior is beginning to kick into high gear. Hence the rise of Romney.

At first glance, he has the appearance of an attractive standard-bearer. A successful businessman (he made a fortune as the CEO of Bain & Company and founder of Bain Capital) and organizer of the 2002 Salt Lake City Olympics before becoming the Bay State's governor, in office he pushed for the passage of a health-care reform plan applauded on both the right and the left. He's well spoken and great-looking, with blindingly white teeth and a head of hair that rivals Ronald Reagan's in the annals of Republican follicular achievement.

But Romney's drawbacks are as glaring as his assets—starting with his Mormonism. "Look, let's be honest, Mormons are weird," says a former Democratic gubernatorial candidate from Massachusetts, voicing a view widely shared by secularists and Evangelicals alike. (According to a recent poll, only 38 percent of voters say they'd definitely consider backing a Mormon for president.) Romney, a church "elder" who served as a missionary and whose great-grandfather had five wives, will surely attempt to deal with the issue by pulling a JFK: declaring that his faith would never impinge on his political obligations. Equally likely is that he'll abandon lame-ass humor as a tactic, given that his japes in the past—"I believe that marriage should be between a man and a woman … and a woman … and a woman," he cracked to Don Imus last year—seem, unsurprisingly, to have put no one's mind at ease.

At the moment, however, Romney's religion is causing him fewer headaches than his policy gymnasticism. As a challenger to Ted Kennedy in 1994 and in his 2002 statehouse bid, Romney was unequivocally pro-choice ("I believe that abortion should be safe and legal"). Today, he is just as unequivocally pro-life. On gun control, Romney in 1994 supported the Brady bill and a ban on assault weapons, adding, "I don't line up with the NRA." Today, he declares, "I'm a member of the NRA." On gay rights, in 1994 and 2002, Romney argued that he'd be a more aggressive advocate of domestic partnerships than his Democratic foes—and then did little, in the view of the right, to resist the legalization of gay marriage in his state. Today, Romney thunders against the latter concept and against civil unions too. Same story on stem-cell research.

The Right Man

Bad as all this reads on paper, it's even worse on video. And here Romney has run smack up against one of the defining realities of the 2008 campaign: YouTube, where clips of the old Romney stating his liberalish social views with apparently firm conviction have been on display for weeks. "Words on a page have an intellectual impact," says Californian Republican media strategist Dan Schnur, "but words captured on video have much more emotional impact." A print gotcha, in other words, makes a candidate look inconsistent or craven. A YouTube gotcha makes him look as if his pants are a towering inferno.

Romney doesn't need to be loved by the right. "He just needs to be the tallest jockey at the track," says a consultant.

Thus is Romney scrambling around the country, meeting with the hard-right brigades, offering deeply—deeply!—felt reassurances that he is really—really!—one of them. These reassurances take the form of a narrative, in which Romney, while grappling with the stem-cell question, meets with researchers and experiences a road-to-Damascus conversion. "I concluded that we should be wary of people who experiment with life, who experiment with our kids, and who toy with the building blocks of family and society," he said in Baltimore. "On the issue of life, this fiscal conservative became a social conservative."

How convincing is he about all this? To my mind, not very. God knows any half-sane columnist will defend to the death the right to change one's mind. Yet the timing of Romney's policy U-turns—at precisely the moment when he first got that I'm-a-gonna-run-for-president gleam in his eye—inevitably raises suspicions. What can you say about a guy who used to maintain that his role model was his father, former moderate Michigan governor George Romney, but now leaves his dad conspicuously off the list of his political heroes, instead citing Reagan, Teddy Roosevelt, and Dwight D. Eisenhower?

DOJ_NMG_0130390

Needless to say, what matters isn't what people like me might say but whether Republicans find Romney's account of his switcheroos persuasive. And here the news is no less grim for Mitt. According to the latest Fox News poll, Romney's support among Republicans nationally fell from 8 percent in December to just 3 percent at the end of January. To a large extent, Romney's desultory numbers reflect low name recognition. But that they're trending down instead of up should be, must be, freaking him out, even at this early stage.

In truth, the emergence of Romney as a top-tier candidate in the eyes of political insiders has had less to do with his strengths than with the staggering weakness of the Republican field. Until last fall, the putative front-runners for the support of the GOP's Establishment conservative faction were senators George Allen and Bill Frist. But Frist was laid low by his joined-at-the-hipness to George W. Bush, while Allen consigned himself to the ash can of history by losing to Jim Webb in Virginia. Giuliani and McCain, despite their dogged efforts to assuage the right, continue to be viewed warily there—the former for his own social liberalism, the latter for his manifold betrayals to the cause eight years ago. And though Christianist wannabes such as Kansas senator Sam Brownback appeal to the GOP fringes, their obvious unelectability dooms them from the get-go.

The case for Romney's viability, therefore, boils down to this: He's the minimally acceptable man to the right who has a chance of winning. "Social conservatives rarely get their first choice, but they have veto power," says Schnur, McCain's communications director in 2000. "Romney doesn't need to be their best friend; he just needs to be better than McCain or Giuliani. He needs to be the tallest jockey at the track."

Can Romney be the Willie Shoemaker of presidential politics? Maybe so—but the more likely outcome, it seems to me, is that he'll be the Pete Wilson of 2008. Back in 1995, recall, Wilson was the au courant Republican governor (of California) who was going to sweep into the presidential race and vanquish all before him. Like Romney, Wilson hailed from a state with a history of spawning presidential nominees. Like Romney, he had access to big money and a record of policy innovation. And, like Romney, he was a moderate whose drift to the right (on immigration) seemed utterly inauthentic. Wilson exited the race before the first primary vote was cast.

A fair observer would point out that that parallel is by no means perfect. Romney has assembled an A-list campaign team with tons of national experience; Wilson didn't. And, unlike Romney, Wilson refused to yield to, er, modify his pro-choice stance. Even so, the central similarity is undeniable—and so are its implications. The real problem for Romney, as it was for Wilson, is not that he's a cultist or a contortionist but that he's a hollow man. And there's nothing that the White Tape People will be able to do about that.

Obama Blasts War In Iraq In Ames Speech (MCGG)

By Charlotte Eby

Mason City Globe Gazette, February 12, 2007

AMES — A day after jumping into the presidential race, Democrat Barack Obama began the courting of Iowa party activists Sunday with a blistering critique of the war in Iraq.

More than 6,000 people who came to hear him at the Iowa State University campus saved their biggest cheers for his criticism of the war.

"We ended up launching a war that should have never been authorized and should have never been waged and to which we now have spent $400 billion and have seen over 3,000 lives of the bravest young Americans wasted," Obama said.

The first-term U.S. senator from Illinois has pushed for a goal of removing all combat brigades from Iraq by March 2008, with a limited number of troops remaining in the country for basic protection and counter-terrorism efforts.

Both his main rivals for the Democratic nomination, Sen. Hillary Clinton and former Sen. John Edwards, voted in favor of authorizing President Bush to use force in Iraq.

In an interview with Lee Enterprises, Obama predicted the war in Iraq will dominate American politics for some time to come and wants the discussion to include creating a broader foreign policy framework.

"We've still got young men and women dying over there, and that means it's still going to be a pressing issue," Obama said.

On Sunday, two state officials, Attorney General Tom Miller and Treasurer Michael Fitzgerald, threw their support behind the senator's campaign and joined him on stage at the Ames rally.

At the podium, Fitzgerald called Obama a "good and decent man" and praised his judgment for being against the war in Iraq.

"He's the only candidate out there that was against this crazy war from the get-go," Fitzgerald said to cheers.

Obama's best-selling memoir, "The Audacity of Hope," served as a call for civility in politics and a rejection of cynicism.

DOJ_NMG_0130391

But Obama recounted a meeting this weekend with Iowa college student leaders who told him their friends don't want to be involved in politics because the image they have is "these hacks who are saying mean things about people, bickering all the time."

Obama said the challenge will be making politics "fun and interesting again."

He pointed to the civil rights movement and the Vietnam War as issues where young people had a voice.

"I think lifting up those examples of where participation has led to positive change is absolutely critical," he said.

Obama said he's trying to translate anger from voters into hope for a positive future. He said last's year's election was a rejection of the Republican agenda. But he said Democrats still have not won over a consensus of the country that would allow them to lead forcefully.

"That's, I think, the job of the next presidential candidate, and our next president," Obama said.

Although Obama draws crowds of thousands for his appearances, he said he doesn't expect it will affect his ability to do the sort of retail politicking in coffee shops and living rooms that is central to an Iowa caucus campaign.

"At some point, folks will get tired of me because I will have been here so much," Obama said, chuckling. "And so you won't end up having as big crowds. They'll say, 'Oh, it's Obama again, he was just here last week.' "

He expects over time he will be able to meet with Iowans one on one where he can find out what their concerns are and "look 'em in the eye and ask them to caucus for us."

When asked what his strategy will be if he loses the Iowa caucuses, Obama predicted he would emerge victorious.

"I don't intend plan to lose Iowa so I don't even have to consider what's next. We are confident that if we do what we need to do and work hard here that we'll do just fine," Obama said.

Patti Boone, an ISU employee from Madrid, approved of Obama's message that the country needs to extract itself from the war in Iraq.

"It's too long. We need to get out," she said.

She is convinced she will support Obama in the Iowa caucuses next January.

"I chose him a year and a half ago," she said.

Tens Of Thousands Turn Out To See Obama (LAT)

By Mark Z. Barabak

The Los Angeles Times, February 12, 2007

AMES, Iowa -- Soon enough the novelty will end, says Barack Obama. But not now. Not this weekend.

Over two days, tens of thousands of people turned out across Illinois and Iowa to see the freshly declared White House hopeful, spilling over city blocks and filling gymnasiums rafter-high with their red, white and blue posters, lusty cheers and wide-eyed fervor.

They came to see history, many said, to launch the journey of the most formidable black presidential candidate the nation has witnessed. They shouted their affection and cheered the Democrat's call for a new style of politics -- bigger, bolder and more audacious, to borrow from the title of his best-selling autobiography, than Americans have seen in a long while.

But, truth be told, there was little that was really new or different about the issues Obama raised in his maiden swing as a formal presidential candidate.

Washington gridlock. Poison politics. Overweening special interests. Poverty, poor schools and an exorbitantly expensive health-care system. Candidates cluck over them every presidential election.

Obama offered little in the way of concrete solutions. And most of the proposals he did throw out, such as harnessing technology to bring greater efficiencies to the health-care system, were hardly novel.

"Every campaign evolves," said David Axelrod, chief strategist of the Obama campaign. "Of course we'll address specific issues in detail along the way."

But, he went on, "This thing is not going to turn on whether his 10-point plan is better than someone else's 10-point plan." Rather, the presidential contest will be about leadership and the ability to inspire and motivate -- demonstrated, Axelrod said, by the ability "to get 7,000 people to come out to an arena in Ames, Iowa" nearly a year before the first vote of the 2008 campaign.

That may be so. But that did not prevent Obama from repeatedly emphasizing his stance on the war in Iraq, which promises to dominate the early discussion in the Democratic primary just as it did four years ago.

At each stop, Obama noted that he was against the war from the start, a distinction he drew with his chief rivals, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, who initially backed the war before turning against it. Both claim they were misled. Obama told reporters Sunday his early opposition "indicates that even at the time it was possible to make judgments that this would not work out."

DOJ_NMG_0130392

(Obama was forced to issue a clarification later Sunday after referring during an Iowa State rally to the "wasted" lives of more 3,000 U.S. troops killed in Iraq. "I was upset with myself," Obama said. "The sacrifices they are making are unbelievable. I meant to say that those sacrifices have not been honored by the same attention to strategy and diplomacy needed to be successful in Iraq.")

On Saturday night, in Waterloo, Iowa, Obama urged voters to demand of each candidate: "What is your plan? It's not enough to simply say, 'I'm going to end the war.' You've got to suggest how you're going to end the war."

Obama has called for a withdrawal of U.S. combat troops by the end of March 2008. Asked at a Sunday news conference where he differs with Clinton, Obama acknowledged her opposition to the war but added, "I am not clear on how she would proceed at this point to wind down the war in a specific way."

A Clinton spokesman, Howard Wolfson, responded by calling the senator "a forceful critic of the Iraq war" who supports a phased redeployment of troops and opposes President Bush's plan to send additional forces. "Had she been president in October of 2002, she would not have started this war and if Congress doesn't end this war by January of 2009, as president, she will," Wolfson said.

As a candidate making his first run for national office, Obama is clearly a work in progress.

During his 20-minute news conference he effectively took a clean-campaign pledge.

He also showed some peevishness over the mostly friendly news coverage he has enjoyed, suggesting that portrayals of him as more dazzle than substance ignore a large body of speeches and other illuminating works that spell out his stance on issues and personal history in exhaustive detail. "You've been reporting on how I look in a swimsuit," he chided.

A day earlier, in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, the audience groaned when it was time for the candidate to go. That's when Obama told them the novelty soon would wear off and he would be back again and again until the crowds thinned and people tired of seeing him.

But not yet.

Obama Questions Rivals On Iraq (WP)

By Anne E. Kornblut And Dan Balz

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

CHICAGO, Feb. 11 -- Sen. Barack Obama, circling through Iowa on Sunday before returning here on Day 2 of his presidential launch, challenged his Democratic rivals to lay out specifics for withdrawing U.S. troops from Iraq and declared that the thousands of lives lost so far in the war had been "wasted."

The senator from Illinois later said he regretted his choice of words, telling an interviewer that he meant the troops' sacrifices "have not been honored" by an adequate policy.

But Obama indicated in his earliest steps on the campaign trail that he considers Iraq a central distinction between himself and the rest of the Democratic field.

Obama opposed invading Iraq from the outset and has proposed a deadline of March 31, 2008, for removing troops from the country. He called Sunday for other candidates to explain their exit strategies. In particular, he said, he did not see an explicit blueprint for redeployment from Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), the early Democratic front-runner.

"I am not clear on how she would proceed at this point to wind down the war in a specific way," he told reporters before a boisterous rally at Iowa State University. "I know that she has stated that she thinks that the war should end by the start of the next president's first term. Beyond that, though, how she wants to accomplish that, I'm not clear on."

In his speech at the university, Obama issued an indictment of how Washington dealt with Iraq:

"We ended up launching a war that should have never been authorized and should have never been waged -- and to which we now have spent $400 billion and have seen over 3,000 lives of the bravest young Americans wasted."

He backtracked in an interview with the Des Moines Register, saying: "I was actually upset with myself. Their sacrifices are never wasted; that was sort of a slip of the tongue as I was speaking.

"The sacrifices they have made are unbelievable. What I meant to say was those sacrifices have not been honored by the same attention to strategy, diplomacy and honesty on the part of civilian leadership," he added.

Two days in, Obama's campaign already had the feel of a candidacy in full swing. Thousands of Iowans filled an auditorium in Ames on Sunday morning to catch a glimpse of the now-official candidate.

On Saturday, after announcing his candidacy in the Illinois capital of Springfield, Obama drew sizable and enthusiastic crowds at town-hall meetings in Cedar Rapids and Waterloo. Thousands more greeted him upon his arrival back in Chicago, his adopted home town, for a rally on Sunday night.

He took on a relatively serious tone for much of his first days on the campaign trail. He gave lengthy and substantive answers to policy questions from audience members, at times bringing crowds to a hush as he laid out his political philosophy.

DOJ_NMG_0130393

His more subdued approach came as a surprise to some in the audiences along the way. "I think a lot of people realize there's been a lot of rock star-ness about him up to now," said Grant Sovern, an immigration lawyer from Madison, Wis., who came to see Obama speak in Cedar Rapids on Saturday. "I think you can see he's trying to bring things down and talk about issues more."

But, Sovern said, it was the rousing part of Obama's speech, toward the end that afternoon, that he expected would carry the candidate forward.

"I hope that the excitement he showed at the end -- that's what a lot of people are looking for," Sovern said.

That spirit came out in force when Obama returned to Chicago. He brought a crowd to its feet at the University of Illinois at Chicago with calls for higher salaries for teachers, help with college tuition, a movement to eradicate special interests' influence over government, and a universal health-care system.

He talked over Iraq war protesters who interrupted his speech with chants for immediate withdrawal of the troops. "We're on the same side," he chided. "Come on, guys."

"I'm proud of the fact that I was against the war from the start," he said minutes later, drawing a rousing response from the audience as he called the war a "tragic mistake."

Clinton has refused to characterize her vote authorizing the war as a mistake, an opening that Obama appears intent on using to his advantage. Howard Wolfson, a spokesman for Clinton, did not directly respond Sunday to Obama's comments about her plans on Iraq but described her as a "forceful critic" of the administration's execution of the war.

"She has supported a phased redeployment of our troops to start bringing them home and has strongly opposed President Bush's escalation of the war by proposing a cap on troops," Wolfson said.

When he was first available to the media, on Sunday, Obama faced a crush of reporters and cameras. He calmly answered questions about the war in Iraq ("We are not more safe as a consequence of it," he began); his hiring of opposition researchers (to answer potential attacks and draw distinctions on the candidates' records, he said); and whether he is still smoking ("No -- I've been chewing Nicorette all day long," he said).

Perhaps the most memorable moment came when he needled the press corps about an emerging story line on his candidacy.

"I know that one of the running threads, one of the narratives that has established itself among the mainstream media, is this notion, 'Well, you know, Obama has pretty good style, he can deliver a pretty good speech, but he seems to prioritize rhetoric over substance,' " Obama said. "Now factually, that's incorrect."

He said his two best-selling books, each of which has sold nearly a million copies, "probably give people more insight into how I think and how I feel about issues facing America than any candidate in the field and probably any candidate who's run for office in recent memory."

He continued: "The problem is not that the information's not out there. The problem is that that's not what you guys have been reporting on. You've been reporting on how I look in a swimsuit." He was referring to a People magazine photograph of him while vacationing in Hawaii several weeks ago.

Obama Homecoming Turns Into Anti-war Rally (CHIT)

By Christi Parsons And John Mccormick

Chicago Tribune, February 12, 2007

AMES, Iowa -- A homecoming for Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) turned into an anti-war rally Sunday evening, as he returned to his home city following the weekend launch of his candidacy for president to find a crowd of 7,300 troubled over the Iraq war.

Obama had already spent much of the day talking tough about Iraq, critiquing the war positions of other Democratic candidates for president and serving up a sharp retort to a foreign leader who had publicly mocked Obama's own plan for withdrawing troops.

Then a vocal crowd of anti-war protesters quickly made the issue the central focus of Obama's evening rally at the University of Illinois at Chicago Pavilion, holding up a sign that read "Cut the Funding" during his address and chanting loudly as he tried to speak.

"I'm glad they were there," Obama said later. "They feel a sense of urgency about a war that should have never been authorized and a war that should have never been fought."

But he said he doesn't want to cut funding for the military personnel who are already serving in Iraq, saying that could mean they don't get the equipment they need.

"We need to bring this war to an end," he said, "but we need to do it in a way that makes our troops safe."

The rally was the last public event on Obama's weekend tour, which began with his official announcement that he would seek the presidency and continued with a tour of Iowa through Sunday afternoon.

DOJ_NMG_0130394

But the day-long discussion of the war ultimately was overtaken by political reality, as Obama--now under the gun to catch up with the political fundraising of other leading candidates--left the rally to attend a downtown fundraiser hosted for him by Chicago billionaire Penny Pritzker.

"I need your money. I need your time. I need your energy," Obama told more than 700 donors gathered at the Hyatt Regency Chicago on East Wacker Drive, where they sampled sandwich meat and fruit, in exchange for checks or credit card payments of up to $2,300.

Throughout the weekend, Obama talked to every crowd he addressed about the need to end the war, a roundly popular assertion at every venue where he spoke.

But in talking with reporters over the noon hour on Sunday, Obama talked pointedly for the first time about Sen. Hillary Clinton's position on the war, by many assessments the New York senator's weakest spot in the primary race.

Obama said that he was "not clear" on how Clinton would end the war, which she says she wishes to do.

He also pointed out that he was against the war from the beginning, and said he thought it was possible at the time to tell that the military action "would not work out well." Both Clinton and Democratic candidate John Edwards voted in 2002 to authorize the war, a position that each is now working to finesse with Democratic voters.

In the same question-and-answer session with reporters, Obama had harsh words for Australian Prime Minister John Howard, who said that Obama's proposal to withdraw combat troops by March of 2008 would "just encourage those who want to completely destabilize and destroy Iraq."

Obama said that Australia had sent only 1,400 troops to join the effort in Iraq, a fraction of the 140,000 American troops now serving there.

"I would suggest that he call up another 20,000 Australians and send them to Iraq," Obama said. "Otherwise, it's just a bunch of empty rhetoric."

At the rally that night, Obama greeted thousands of supporters with his wife, Michelle, at his side, addressing them from a theater-in-the-round-style stage and reiterating the ideas of his announcement speech.

He hadn't yet gotten to his points about the Iraq war when the protesters began to chant "Troops out now!" prompting Obama to stop his talk and try to engage them.

"I hear you," he said. "We'll talk about that in a second. ... You've made your point, so why don't you relax?"

But the protesters continued to chant, and the rest of the crowd began to drown them out with deafening chants of "O-ba-ma!" Someone grabbed the sign from the protesters' hands--the protesters said later that security officers did so--and they left.

"They kicked us out," said Ryan Donnelly, a UIC student who participated in the protest with about 20 other students.

Obama's message was popular with the crowd. Heather Lewis, 20, a DePaul psychology student, had used black, red and blue markers to create an Obama logo on her white tank top.

Sharon Olsen, a postal carrier from Warrenville, declared, "I believe he is the future of politics for the United States. He has the ability to work with both sides of the aisle, and we need a change."

Rep. Luis Gutierrez (D-Ill.) compared Obama to Harold Washington, who was elected Chicago's first black mayor in 1983. "He brought excitement to the air, just like Obama," he said.

Others said they liked Obama even if they aren't yet completely won over.

"I think he handled the war piece very well," said Dwight McKee, a trade association director from Chicago. "I'm sold on the need for Obama right now more than I'm sold on Obama."

The evening fundraiser attracted top Illinois Democrats, including state Comptroller Dan Hynes and Atty. Gen. Lisa Madigan. Actor Dennis Hopper also attended.

David Keyt, a health and benefits consultant from Chicago, attended the fundraiser and wrote a check for $1,000 to cover attendance for himself and his wife. He said he was originally backing Clinton but is warming to Obama.

"He represents something new, fresh and not tied to the history of Washington," he said as he arrived for the evening event at the Hyatt. "But we are still learning about him and reading his books."

Obama Comes Out Swinging In Iowa (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, February 12, 2007

AMES, Iowa — At the final stop of his first campaign trip to Iowa, Illinois Sen. Barack Obama invited a cheering crowd Sunday to help him "take this country back."

"Ultimately I am an imperfect vessel for your hopes and dreams," Obama told several thousand people at Iowa State University's basketball arena. "I can't do this alone. I'm going to need all of you, and I hope that you guys decide it's something that's worth doing."

DOJ_NMG_0130395

PHOTO GALLERY: Obama announces '08 run

Obama, 45, a Democrat who has been in the U.S. Senate for two years, would be the first African-American president if elected. He announced his candidacy Saturday at the Old State Capitol in Springfield, Ill., and made four stops this weekend in Iowa, which holds the nation's first presidential caucuses. He campaigns today in New Hampshire, host of the first presidential primary.

During a news conference here, Obama criticized New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's record on Iraq and health care, underscoring the intensity of the campaign with the first votes almost a year away. Clinton leads the Democratic field in most polls.

Obama opposed the war with Iraq in 2002, when Clinton and 28 other Democrats in the Senate voted to authorize it. She has since said that President Bush misused Congress' support but has not said her vote was a mistake.

"Even at the time, it was possible to make judgments that this would not work out well," Obama said, referring to Clinton and others.

Without naming Clinton, he also referred to her leading role in failed efforts to reform health care during her husband's administration. Since then, he said, Congress has been willing only to "tinker around the edges" of the issue.

Obama also was the target of some critics. His frequent invocations of Abraham Lincoln, his political hero, prompted likely Republican presidential candidate Rudy Giuliani to note Saturday, "We're the party of Abraham Lincoln."

Australian Prime Minister John Howard said Sunday that Obama's plan to withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq by March 2008 would "create chaos and a victory for the terrorists." Obama replied, "It's flattering that one of George Bush's allies on the other side of the world started to attack me the day after I announced." Unless Howard sends 20,000 troops to join the 1,400 Australians now serving in Iraq, Obama said, "It's just a bunch of empty rhetoric."

Obama also chided reporters for stories that he said suggest he "can deliver a pretty good speech, but he seems to prioritize rhetoric over substance."

Noting his speeches, two best-selling books and Iraq proposal, Obama said, "The problem is not that the information is not out there. The problem is that that's not what you guys have been reporting on. You've been reporting on how I look in a swimsuit."

Last month, People magazine published a photo of Obama in swimming trunks during a Hawaiian vacation.

Obama's audience here was filled with supporters such as Jeff Edmonson, 20, an Iowa State student who says he's been a fan since Obama was elected to the Senate in 2004.

"He's someone that will bring change: less corruption, more excitement," Edmonson said.

Seven blocks away at a Hy-Vee grocery store, though, 11 of 12 people asked about Obama said they need to know more before deciding whether to vote for him.

"I have a favorable impression of him, but we're being forced to focus on the race way too soon," said Bruce Workman, 50, a Burlington firefighter. "I don't know what he stands for," said student Coda Skeffington-Vos, 20.

"All I know is that he's a two-year senator from Illinois, he's young, and I like what he has to say about things," said Bill Morrison, 44, a carpenter from Ames. "There's a lot of things that need to get figured out, and it's early yet."

Obama Turns To Lincoln And Heats Up Illinois (FT)

By Andrew Ward In Springfield, Illinois

Financial Times, February 12, 2007

On a rainy day in February 1861, hundreds of people gathered at the Great Western Railway depot in Springfield, Illinois, to bid farewell to Abraham Lincoln, the city's most famous son, when he boarded a train to Washington to take office as US president.

Almost 146 years to the day later, Springfield witnessed the start of another political journey when Barack Obama, the junior Democratic senator for Illinois, launched his bid for the presidency outside the city's Old State Capitol building.

While Lincoln was heading directly to the White House, Mr Obama's journey promises to be long and winding, with the risk that it could hit a wall in the Democratic primaries next year.

But the scale of Saturday's rally – the crowd was in the thousands despite freezing temperatures – and the frenzied excitement surrounding it showed that Mr Obama is already in possession of that most precious of political commodities: momentum.

"I know it's a little chilly, but I'm fired up," he told the crowd.

For the next 20 minutes he dazzled his audience with the sparkling oratory that has become his trademark, calling for a new generation to reject the "smallness" and cynicism of contemporary US politics and build "a more hopeful America".

DOJ_NMG_0130396

There were some concrete proposals amid the rhetoric, including a plan to return combat troops from Iraq by March 2008 and a vow to introduce universal healthcare coverage by the end of his first term. But it was clear that Mr Obama's campaign will rest as much on his promise of a new style of leadership as it will on policy.

"I know I haven't spent a lot of time learning the ways of Washington," said the 45-year-old first-term senator. "But I've been there long enough to know that the ways must change."

It was in a speech at the Old State Capitol that Lincoln famously called for the abolition of slavery by warning that a "house divided" cannot stand.

By inviting parallels with the man widely regarded as America's greatest president, Mr Obama was also answering critics who believe he lacks experience. Lincoln served four terms in the Illinois state legislature and two years in Congress before seeking the presidency – exactly the same career path so far trodden by Mr Obama.

For many, Mr Obama's youth and freshness are his greatest appeals.

"It's time for change and we're more likely to get that from Obama than Clinton," said David Hudson, a young Democrat, referring to Hillary Clinton, the frontrunner for the party nomination.

Andrew Smith, a political scientist at the University of New Hampshire, said Democrats were falling in love with Mr Obama in a way they never had with Ms Clinton.

"Hillary brings experience and the sense of someone who can get the job done. Obama brings the Kennedyesque or Reaganesque vision that Hillary seems to lack."

Del Ali, of Research 2000, a non-partisan polling firm, said Mr Obama's consistent stance against the war in Iraq gave him an important advantage over Ms Clinton and other candidates whose positions had changed. But the odds were stacked against him because of her greater fundraising power, Mr Ali added.

Another uncertainty is whether America is ready to elect a black president.

"It is the issue that no one wants to discuss," said Mr Ali. "Democrats see the 2008 election as theirs to lose. Are they prepared to take a risk on Obama if he can't pick up any states in the south?"

Back in Springfield, Mr Obama urged America to look beyond old divisions and prejudices.

"The life of a tall, gangly Springfield lawyer tells us that a different future is possible," he said, referring to Lincoln. "He tells us that ... beneath all the differences of race and region, faith and station, we are one people. He tells us that there is power in hope."

Australian Leader: Al-Qaida Wants Obama (AP)

AP, February 11, 2007

Australia's conservative prime minister slammed Barack Obama on Sunday over his opposition to the Iraq war, a day after the first-term U.S. senator announced his intention to run for the White House in 2008.

Obama said Saturday at his campaign kickoff in Springfield, Ill., that one of the country's first priorities should be ending the war in Iraq. He has also introduced a bill in the Senate to prevent President Bush from increasing American troop levels in Iraq and to remove U.S. combat forces from the country by March 31, 2008.

Australian Prime Minister John Howard, a staunch Bush ally who has sent troops to Iraq and faces his own re-election bid later this year, said Obama's proposals would spell disaster for the Middle East.

"I think that will just encourage those who want to completely destabilize and destroy Iraq, and create chaos and a victory for the terrorists to hang on and hope for an Obama victory," Howard said on Nine Network television.

"If I were running al-Qaida in Iraq, I would put a circle around March 2008 and be praying as many times as possible for a victory, not only for Obama but also for the Democrats."

Howard has defied widespread domestic opposition to the war, keeping about 1,400 Australian troops in and around Iraq, mostly in non-combat roles. He is seeking a fifth term later this year, and recent polls suggest voters are increasingly unhappy about his refusal to set a deadline for withdrawing Australian troops from the Middle East.

"You either rat on the ally or you stay with the ally," he said. "If it's all right for us to go, it's all right for the Americans and the British to go, and if everybody goes, Iraq will descend into total civil war and there'll be a lot of bloodshed."

Obama Plan Has A Critic In Australia (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

AMES, Iowa, Feb. 11 — On his first trip to Iowa as a presidential candidate, Senator Barack Obama, Democrat of Illinois, found himself responding to an unexpected critic: John Howard, Australia's prime minister.

DOJ_NMG_0130397

Mr. Howard, a conservative leader who is a close ally of the White House, denounced Mr. Obama's proposal to withdraw American combat troops from Iraq by March 31, 2008. In a television interview in Australia, Mr. Howard said the senator's redeployment plan would simply inspire insurgent violence in Iraq.

"If I were running Al Qaeda in Iraq," Mr. Howard said, "I would put a circle around March 2008 and be praying as many times as possible for a victory not only for Obama but also for the Democrats."

In a news conference here, Mr. Obama dismissed the remarks, saying it was "flattering that one of George Bush's allies on the other side of the world started attacking me the day after I announced."

Mr. Obama said Australia had sent 1,400 troops to Iraq, a fraction of the American force.

"If he's ginned up to fight the good fight in Iraq, I would suggest that he calls up another 20,000 Australians and send them to Iraq," Mr. Obama said. "Otherwise, it's just a bunch of empty rhetoric."

Obama Stresses Appreciation For Faith (AP)

By Henry C. Jackson

AP, February 12, 2007

Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama said Sunday he does not think voters have a litmus test on religion, whether evangelical Christianity or his childhood years in a largely Muslim country.

"If your name is Barack Hussein Obama, you can expect it, some of that. I think the majority of voters know that I'm a member of the United Church of Christ, and that I take my faith seriously," Obama said in an interview with The Associated Press.

"Ultimately what I think voters will be looking for is not so much a litmus test on faith as an assurance that a candidate has a value system and that is appreciative of the role that religious faith can play in helping shape people's lives," he said.

In the interview, Obama also said his race might be a "novelty" this early in the presidential contest, sparred with the prime minister of Australia over Iraq, and said he has a higher burden of proof with voters because of his relative inexperience. Obama formally announced his candidacy in Illinois on Saturday and made a beeline for Iowa, site of the first nominating contest next Jan. 14.

Obama, who was born in Hawaii, lived in mostly Muslim Indonesia with his mother and stepfather from 1967 to 1971. He subsequently returned to Hawaii to live with his maternal grandparents.

He attends a Chicago church with his wife and two young daughters. The 2008 presidential field also includes Republican Mitt Romney, a Mormon, and Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., an evangelical Christian who converted to Catholicism in recent years.

Obama's leading rivals for the Democratic nomination are far better known to voters, the U.S. senator from Illinois said. He was elected in 2004.

"At least two of my fellow candidates have been campaigning nationally for years," Obama said, referring to New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards. "They have an infrastructure and name recognition that are higher than mine so there will probably be a higher burden of proof for me."

Few minorities reside in early voting Iowa and New Hampshire but Obama said his race — his mother is white, his father is black — will not play a determining role.

"I think that early on it may spark some curiosity or a sense of novelty, but I think very quickly people will be judging me on the merits. Do I have a message that resonates with people's concerns about health care and education, jobs and terrorism?" he said. "And if they do, then I think race won't be a major factor."

At a press conference later in Ames, Obama said he was proud to have opposed the Iraq war from the start while Clinton and others authorized the U.S.-led invasion.

"I don't think there is a more significant set of decisions than the decision to go to war," Obama said. "I think the war was a tragic mistake and it never should have been authorized."

Obama made a habit of stressing his position at every stop, to loud applause. Clinton, meanwhile, ran into some tough questioning while campaigning over the weekend in New Hampshire. One man demanded that she repudiate her 2002 Senate vote to send U.S. troops into battle.

Obama told reporters he thinks his early opposition to the war shows "it was possible to make judgments that this would not work out well" and that it speaks "to the kind of judgment that I will be bringing to the office of president."

The senator has called for capping the number of U.S. troops in Iraq and then beginning to withdraw them on May 1. He wants a complete pullout of combat brigades by March 31, 2008.

Clinton says she is working to pass legislation capping troop levels and bring to a vote a resolution disapproving of Bush's planned troop increase.

DOJ_NMG_0130398

"I am not clear on how she would proceed at this point to wind down the war in a specific way," Obama said. "I know that's she's stated that she thinks the war should end by the start of the next president's first term. Beyond that, though, how she wants to accomplish that, I'm not clear on."

In his speech before thousands at Iowa State University, Obama did not mention Clinton, but he did draw a clear comparison. "We ended up launching a war that should have never been authorized and should have never been waged," Obama said to cheers.

In the AP interview, Obama laughed off criticism Saturday from Australian Prime Minister John Howard, who said Obama's plans for Iraq "encourage those who wanted to completely destabilize and destroy Iraq."

"It's flattering that one of George W. Bush's allies feels obliged to attack me," Obama said.

Obama said that if Howard did not think enough was being done in Iraq, he should consider sending more Australian troops to the region. Australia has about 1,400 troops in Iraq, mostly in noncombat roles.

The senator dismissed concerns about his own security, but would not answer directly when asked if he had received death threats. The Rev. Jesse Jackson drew early Secret Service protection because of violent threats during his campaigns for president in the 1980s.

"I face the same security issues as anybody," he told the AP. "We're comfortable with the steps we have taken."

Obama campaigned in Cedar Rapids and Waterloo on Saturday after his kickoff announcement in Springfield, Ill. On Sunday, Obama met with party activists at a private home in Iowa Falls and attended the Ames rally.

He won the endorsement of two top state officials — Attorney General Tom Miller and Treasurer Michael Fitzgerald. Miller called Obama "a once in a generation talent."

On Sunday night, Obama returned home to Chicago, where he was greeted by a roaring crowd of more than 7,000 people.

"I am an imperfect vessel for your hopes and dreams," Obama told the crowd during a raucous rally at the arena of the University of Illinois at Chicago.

From Washington, Obama came under criticism from a presidential rival, 26-year veteran Sen. Christopher Dodd of Connecticut, for his lack of experience.

"I think experience matters to people. The stakes are very, very high right now," Dodd said on "Face the Nation" on CBS. "This is not a time for on-the-job training."

At the house party in Iowa Falls, Obama said, "I'm going to have to be run through the paces, people are going to have to lift up the hood, kick the tires and be clear that I have a grasp of the issues that are of utmost importance in people's lives."

In that vein, Obama said he has quit his cigarette habit and now chews nonprescription Nicorette gum all day.

Trying To Manage Obama's Message (USNEWS)

By Kenneth T. Walsh

U.S. News and World Report, February 12, 2007

The 2008 election could well make history in a new and special way. Americans could elect the first female president in Hillary Rodham Clinton. They could choose the first Mormon president in Mitt Romney, or the oldest president in John McCain. Or they could elect the first African-American president in Barack Obama. Given America's bitter heritage of slavery, segregation, and discrimination, Obama's election could represent the most groundbreaking possibility of all.

Certainly he has generated more excitement than any other candidate. And as he accelerates his campaign this week, the buzz will get louder. "Is he just a streak across the sky or something more?' asks a strategist for one Republican presidential hopeful. "He is developing a cult of personality, but what is his real constituency?" Good question-and one that a growing number of political professionals and everyday voters are asking as well.

Obama already has demonstrated strong appeal to white voters. He comes in second to Senator Clinton in national polls of preferences for the Democratic nomination. And he impresses many as a talented newcomer who, because of his multicultural background, could conceivably redefine America's debate on race-away from a focus on the consequences of slavery toward an emphasis on the benefits of diversity. "It's a measure of our progress that a woman and a Mormon and an African-American can compete for this office that has always been the province of men and white people," asserts David Axelrod, one of Obama's advisers. But being an African-American, says Axelrod, is only part of Obama's story. "His hallmark in his years in politics," notes Axelrod, "has been bringing people together." In a recent interview with U.S. News, Obama said Americans are looking for a "change in tone and a return to some notion of the common good and some sense of cooperation, of pragmatism over ideology."

Cornell Belcher, Obama's pollster-and an African-American himself-says the Illinois senator represents a fulfillment of the civil rights movement: a black man who overcame prejudice, worked hard, and excelled. "It's not a wonderful black story; it's a great American story," Belcher told U.S. News.

DOJ_NMG_0130399

But questions remain about how Obama will fare in the African-American community, where some, such as columnist Stanley Crouch and author Debra Dickerson, don't think Obama has shared enough of the black experience to truly bond with the community. Those who disagree cite the controversial remarks of Delaware Sen. Joe Biden, another presidential candidate, who called Obama "the first mainstream African-American [candidate] who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy" and then apologized for being insensitive. Obama supporters contend that Biden's remarks show Obama can never escape his black heritage, and they say that fact should create sympathy and support for him among skeptical African-American leaders.

Color war. "He's not 'black enough'?" asks Democratic pollster Geoff Garin. "It's ridiculous. Obama is going to do very well with African-American voters. ... This will be the first real opportunity to elect a person of color," and that prospect will be compelling, says Garin. "People are looking for the things that unite us, not separate us. ... He is able to put his finger on things we have in common."

Until The War Ends ... (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

Almost all the talk about the 2008 presidential election is about the horse race: Who's up? Who's down? Can Hillary hold her lead? Can a pro-choice, pro-gay-rights candidate like Rudy Giuliani outrun a hawkish maverick like John McCain?

It's a sport. It's fun. Why spoil it by being too serious?

Senator Barack Obama, in his speech in Illinois Saturday formally launching his presidential bid, gave us an excellent reason for being serious:

Ladies and gentlemen, there's a war on.

After going through a litany of lofty goals for a new generation to strive for, including health care for all Americans, a rejuvenated public education system, an end to poverty and real progress in dealing with global warming, the senator offered a hard and simple truth:

"All of this cannot come to pass until we bring an end to this war in Iraq."

The war — which, in addition to its human toll, will ultimately cost $2 trillion or more — has put America in a straitjacket, precluding progress on a range of important issues that will only worsen with continued neglect.

The public seems to understand this. It was voters fed up with the war who snatched control of both houses of Congress from the Republicans in last November's elections. And they were the ones giving Senator Hillary Clinton a hard time in New Hampshire over the weekend.

While Senator Obama is pushing a plan to bring American combat troops home by March 2008 (and former Senator John Edwards is calling for an immediate withdrawal), Senator Clinton continues to dance on the war issue. "I know that there is a great deal of frustration and anger and outrage," she said on Saturday, "but we can't just wave a magic wand and make things change."

We've moved beyond the absurd when it comes to the war. President Bush responded to the antiwar sentiment in last November's election by escalating U.S. involvement in Iraq. Vice President Dick Cheney, lost in a zone of unreality, is blithely spreading the fantasy of "enormous progress." He may not have noticed that the last three months have been among the worst of the war.

The Democrats who benefited from the antiwar vote reacted to the president's thumb in the eye of the voters with their usual timidity. They've put their hearts and souls into a marathon effort to pass a nonbinding resolution opposing the troop surge. Be still my heart.

The bottom line is that nothing has changed. The horror stories continue to spew out of Iraq: the helicopters being shot down, the mass killings in marketplaces, the steady stream of U.S. soldiers returning in body bags.

We need to stop pretending that there is something sane about continued U.S. involvement in this ruinous war. We keep sending troops into the combat zone and they keep sinking ever deeper into the ancient Middle East sand. To keep sending young people off to die in a war that everybody knows is pointless is criminal.

On NBC's "Nightly News" last Friday the correspondent Richard Engel, traveling with a convoy of soldiers from the First Infantry Division, had a close call when a roadside bomb detonated several feet away. No one was hurt, and Staff Sgt. Chris Copley said into the camera, with a laugh and a hint of bravado, "It gets the adrenaline going a little bit, doesn't it?"

But Mr. Engel noted that when the convoy returned to its patrol base, Sergeant Copley and other soldiers were openly wondering, "What are they doing out here?"

It's a question that deserves a clear, straight answer, especially from their commander in chief and the politicians running for president. As the casualties mount and success seems more and more unlikely, a sense of resignation is spreading among U.S. troops.

DOJ_NMG_0130400

Sergeant Copley told Mr. Engel: “It’s pretty much almost a lost cause. Nothing it seems that we do is doing any good.”

Mr. Engel said all of the soldiers he talked with believed it was “time to end this war.” He closed his piece by telling Brian Williams, “Earlier in the week some of the soldiers I was embedded with were hit by a larger I.E.D. That I.E.D. tore the door off the Humvee and the soldier inside had to have both of his legs amputated.”

Senator Obama’s capacity for leadership will be tested in large part by whether he can get the country to rally around his crucial point — that all further progress on important issues here at home depends on whether we can find the will to extricate ourselves from Iraq.

Obama's 'Improbable Quest' (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

AMES, Iowa -- Illinois Sen. Barack Obama formally opened what he calls his "improbable quest" for the presidency, styling his campaign as a crusade in which Americans' biggest enemy is cynicism -- "the belief that we can't change things anymore."

His own challenge is battling cynicism that he has the experience and ideas to make such change.

After two years in the U.S. Senate, and eight in the Illinois senate, the 45-year-old Mr. Obama remains relatively untested as he seeks to make history as the first African-American president. His sudden fame owes to his charismatic style and eloquence in two best-selling books and a memorable address at the 2004 Democratic Convention. So now, perhaps more than any other candidate in the crowded 2008 race, he is under pressure to show some policy substance as well.

Mr. Obama knows that. In a weekend tour of Iowa, site of the first presidential contest, after announcing his candidacy Saturday in Abraham Lincoln's Springfield, Ill., the senator offered a few specifics. To Iowans' questions, he said he opposed defense-spending cuts, for example, and called for direct U.S. talks with North Korea on nuclear weapons.

Mostly he kept up an audience-stirring diagnosis of the nation's ills and offered promises -- chiefly to provide universal health care by the end of a first term -- but no specific remedies. By yesterday, sensitive to critics calling for details, he took the offensive during a news conference at the University of Iowa.

"One of the narratives that's established itself in the mainstream media is this notion that, 'Well, you know, Obama has a pretty good style. He can deliver a pretty good speech, but he seems to prioritize rhetoric over substance.' Now, factually that's incorrect," Mr. Obama said.

He said he has "the most specific plan" on leaving Iraq, gave major speeches on health, education and energy in the two years before he decided to run for president, and has two books giving more "insights into how I think and how I feel about the issues facing America than any candidate in the field." As for the press, he teased, "you've been reporting how I look in a bathing suit" -- referring to a photo taken while he visited Hawaii over the holidays.

He and top campaign aides promised specifics will come, noting that the campaign has only begun. Meanwhile, as Mr. Obama's announcement confirmed, he will seek to turn his inexperience to advantage, positioning himself as a Washington outsider.

"I recognize that there is a certain presumptuousness -- a certain audacity -- to this announcement," he told the thousands braving frigid temperatures for his announcement in the square before Illinois' Old State Capitol in Springfield. "I know that I haven't spent a lot of time learning the ways of Washington. But I've been there long enough to know that the ways of Washington must change."

By that message, he separates himself from New York Sen. Hillary Clinton, though he remains significantly behind her in polls, organization and money. But among the rest of the Democratic field, he is a top competitor for what amounts to a spot as the Clinton alternative, against former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards.

While Mr. Edwards is ahead in Iowa polls, Mr. Obama poses a fresh-faced challenge. After Mr. Obama's packed townhall meeting Saturday in Cedar Rapids, 80-year-old Bonnie Young of Marion, Iowa, and her 60-year-old daughter Claudia Young, both of whom worked for Mr. Edwards' 2004 presidential bid, said they have been torn between the two men. The mother left favoring Mr. Obama.

Mr. Edwards added to the pressure on Mr. Obama to be more specific with his recent unveiling of a health plan. But Democrats say Mr. Obama provoked the style-versus-substance talk himself, by his recent address to local Democratic Party leaders meeting in Washington, in which he seemed dismissive of "white papers" of policy specifics: "We've had a lot of plans, Democrats. What we've had is a shortage of hope."

As a committee chairman in the Illinois Senate, Mr. Obama tried to get consensus for universal health care, but could only pass a measure calling for a study of coverage options. Now, at each campaign stop, he calls not only for universal health care, but more resources for education and an effort akin to the Apollo Project to develop alternative fuels to end U.S. reliance on Mideast oil and help arrest global warming.

DOJ_NMG_0130401

But no such progress is possible, he adds, "until we bring this ill-conceived war in Iraq to a close."

The applause for that line from the mostly Democratic crowds made plain that the war is the issue most on voters' minds. Mr. Obama reminds them, to more applause, "I was against this war from the start" -- which distinguishes him, as many Iowa Democrats know, from Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Edwards. And he outlines his Iraq plan: a phased withdrawal of all U.S. combat troops starting in May and ending by the end of March next year, allowing for enough U.S. forces to keep training Iraqi forces.

Mr. Obama didn't always give the answers his inquisitors may have liked. In Cedar Rapids, to a question from a man associated with a group that espouses reduced military spending, the senator said that because the Iraq war "has depleted our military...there's probably going to be a bump under an Obama presidency in initial spending just to get back to where we were."

To a public school teacher, he reiterated his call for teachers to be paid significantly more. "I have to say, though, there's got to be a bargain," he added, in which teachers in turn accept greater accountability for performance.

Voters Seek Clarity On Clinton Iraq Vote (AP)

By Beth Fouhy

AP, February 12, 2007

After nearly four years of war and more than 3,000 U.S. dead, New Hampshire voters are demanding more than nuance on Iraq from Democratic front-runner Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton.

From crowded town hall meetings to smaller gathering at private homes, Clinton was enthusiastically received by voters throughout the key early voting state on Saturday and Sunday. She deftly fielded questions on a range of subjects, from education to health care to the genocide in Darfur.

But invariably, the questions returned to Iraq. What would she do to end the conflict if elected president? Would she support cutting funds to stop President Bush's planned increase in troop levels? And, perhaps most importantly, why won't she recant her 2002 vote authorizing the military invasion?

"She has a very nuanced explanation, and it's a pretty good explanation. But many people want to hear her clearly say that her vote was a mistake," said Paul LeBlanc, a Clinton supporter and president of Southern New Hampshire University.

It's a vexing matter for Clinton, who is hoping to become the nation's first female commander in chief. If she repudiates her vote — buckling to pressure from anti-war activists and two top Democratic rivals, Illinois Sen. Barack Obama and former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards — Clinton opens herself to accusations of flip-flopping. But defending her vote means she'll continue to be dogged by skeptical questions about it as she campaigns in not only the early voting states but around the country.

On Sunday, Obama told reporters in Iowa that the war was a "tragic mistake" that never should have been authorized — a swipe at his Senate rivals who backed the 2002 resolution. Responding specifically to Clinton's stand, he said he was uncertain how she would proceed to reduce U.S. forces.

"I know that's she's stated that she thinks the war should end by the start of the next president's first term. Beyond that, though, how she wants to accomplish that, I'm not clear on," he said.

Throughout her weekend campaign visit here, Clinton stuck to her guns: She said she voted to give Bush authority to send weapons inspectors to Iraq, and that her vote was not an endorsement of pre-emptive war. She also said she would never have sought to invade Iraq if she had been president in 2002.

But that wasn't enough for Claire Helfman, a retired nurse who attended a Nashua house party to meet Clinton.

"I've heard your explanation for your vote: 'I didn't think I was voting for the war, I was voting for inspections.' It doesn't fly. It just doesn't fly," Helfman told Clinton.

The New York senator repeated her long-standing mantra — "If we knew then what we know now, I would never have voted to give this president the authority." And she again batted down calls for her to describe her vote as a mistake.

"I'm sorry, what I say is what I believe," she said. "I understand that some people disagree or think it's not adequate, but it's what I believe."

At a house party in Manchester on Sunday, Clinton offered an outline of what she would do as president to scale back the conflict. She vowed she would engage diplomatically with other countries in the region, relaunch the Middle East peace process and force Iraqis to take charge of their own security.

"I would tell the Iraqis, 'We are going to stop funding you unless you start doing what you've promised all these years,'" Clinton said. "I would say: 'I'm sorry, it's over. We've done all we can do for you. We liberated you, we got rid of Saddam Hussein for you, we are not going to baby-sit a civil war.'"

But she also said she would not redeploy all troops out of the region, insisting that some are still needed to quell terrorist activity in Anbar province and to protect the Kurds in northern Iraq.

"There will still be missions," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0130402

She also said she was not in favor of cutting funding for Bush's proposed troop increase, despite some activists' calls to do so.

At a town hall meeting in Keene, N.H., Clinton discussed Democratic efforts to pass a nonbinding resolution expressing disapproval of Bush's plan to increase troops in Iraq.

"To those who say, 'It's a nonbinding resolution, what does it mean?' — all I can say is, the White House is working very hard to defeat it," Clinton said.

But voters should remember that Democrats still need some Republican support to get anything done, she said.

"I know that is hard medicine for some people because people say, 'Just do something!'" she said. "In order to do something, we've got to have Republicans to help us, at least until the election of 2008 when we'll have 60 Democrats, I hope."

In Nashua, Clinton thrilled many attendees by insisting that she has the mettle to take on Republicans in a general election, saying, "I'm the one person they're most afraid of because Bill and I know how to beat them and we have consistently."

But the Republican National Committee appeared eager to point out potential problems with Clinton's arguments on Iraq. In an e-mail titled "Hillary's Kerry-oake on Iraq," the committee likened her statements to Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry, the 2004 Democratic presidential nominee who was badly weakened by accusations he had flip-flopped on the war.

For Clinton And Obama, Different Tests On Iraq (NYT)

By Patrick Healy And Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

KEENE, N.H., Feb. 11 — Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton was challenged on Iraq from corner to corner of New Hampshire this weekend, while Senator Barack Obama drew cheers in Iowa for his opposition to the war.

Besides giving voters a chance to probe the views of two major rivals for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination, the weekend appearances gave the two campaigns a chance to road test their strategies for dealing with the central issue of Iraq in the primaries and beyond.

At nearly every stop in New Hampshire, Mrs. Clinton, the junior senator from New York, has been greeted warmly but has been met by skeptical voters asking pointedly about her 2002 vote authorizing the use of force in Iraq. On Sunday in Nashua, one person told her that her explanation “doesn’t fly,” while another asked why she did not simply say that the vote was a mistake.

In these instances and similar moments in New Hampshire, Mrs. Clinton stuck to a set of talking points that she and her advisers hope will ultimately overcome the antiwar anger that is particularly strong among Democrats likely to vote in primaries. She took full responsibility for the vote, said she would not vote for military action in Iraq again, and then pivoted quickly to frame Iraq as President Bush’s war. This answer was usually met with applause.

Yet Mrs. Clinton’s refusal to use clear, categorical phrases — “I’m sorry” or “I made a mistake” — has created an opening for Mr. Obama and another rival, former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina, who has openly apologized for his identical 2002 vote.

On Sunday, at a news conference in Ames, Iowa, Mr. Obama declined to say whether Mrs. Clinton should explicitly express regret for the vote, but he phrased his answer to keep the onus on her.

“I will let her speak to her plan, and I will let her address both past decisions and how she wants to move forward,” Mr. Obama said. “I am not clear on how she would proceed at this point to wind down the war in a specific way.”

In two days of public appearances in New Hampshire, Mrs. Clinton did not mention Mr. Obama’s name or explicitly contrast her positions on the war with his, though she did say at one point that it was “very easy to go around saying, ‘End the war now.’ ”

She was never asked directly about Mr. Obama; she held no news conferences with the two dozen reporters following her, nor did voters publicly press her on Mr. Obama’s views.

In Iowa on Sunday, on his first trip there as a presidential candidate, Mr. Obama reminded voters that he had been against the war from the start and said he had offered a plan for winding down American involvement. His strong statements against the war in Iraq drew applause at each of four stops, from Waterloo to Ames.

He said it was the obligation of his Democratic rivals to offer their own ideas on how to get out of Iraq, telling an audience at John F. Kennedy High School in Cedar Rapids: “We cannot have our troops trying to maintain order in the midst of a civil war. Anyone running for president has an obligation to say what you would do now.”

Though Mr. Obama, the junior senator from Illinois, was a vocal critic of the Iraq war during his time as a state legislator and as a Senate candidate in 2004, the level of his criticism lowered when he arrived in Washington. In his first year in the Senate, he delivered one speech on Iraq, calling for a phased withdrawal by the end of 2006. But last November, Mr. Obama revised that time frame, saying the drawdown should begin in four to six months. Legislation he introduced late last month calls for redeployment to begin no later than May 1, with a goal of removing all combat brigades in Iraq by March 31, 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0130403

Mr. Obama's aides said they viewed Mrs. Clinton's vote on the war in 2002 and her refusal to explicitly disavow that vote as her single biggest vulnerability, and that Mr. Obama would point it out at every opportunity. From that perspective, the juxtaposition of Mr. Obama's announcement tour in Iowa and Mrs. Clinton's appearances in New Hampshire was propitious.

On Sunday, Mrs. Clinton for the first time on the campaign trail used the phrase "civil war" to describe the violence in Iraq. Speaking about building coalitions with Middle Eastern nations, she said she would take a new approach: "I would say 'I'm sorry, it's over. We are not going to baby-sit a civil war.' "

In introducing the phrase on the campaign trail, where it resonates with the antiwar voters whose opinions matter in early primaries and caucuses, Mrs. Clinton is using language that Mr. Obama and other rivals have already embraced.

Her advisers deny, however, that she felt pressure as a candidate to use those words — which she has used sparingly, and somewhat obliquely, in the Senate.

Analysts say that Mr. Obama and Mr. Edwards are more in sync with the most energized likely Democratic primary voters on Iraq. But advisers to Mrs. Clinton say her position reflects the political mainstream of the nation, and they are banking that Democrats who want to regain the White House will take a broad view of the race.

These advisers say Mrs. Clinton's other advantages — experience, debate skills, fund-raising muscle, a well-organized political operation, her popularity in the party (as well as her husband's) and her agenda — will carry her past any second-guessing about her Iraq war vote.

Mrs. Clinton herself made a nod to her broader strengths during a house party in Nashua on Sunday, when she was asked how she would combat the hard-edged campaign tactics of Karl Rove, Mr. Bush's political adviser and a chief strategist of his two winning campaigns.

"I know what Gingrich tells people privately, I know what DeLay tells people privately, I know what Karl Rove tells people privately," Senator Clinton said in reference to Newt Gingrich, the former Republican speaker, and Tom DeLay, the former Republican congressman. "I'm the one person they are most afraid of. Bill and I have beaten them before and we will again."

Mrs. Clinton, at another house party, in Manchester on Sunday, emphasized her opposition to the war in some of her most searing language yet.

"It is a gnawing, painful sore," she said of Iraq. "People are beside themselves with frustration, and I understand that completely. We are trying in the Senate to set forth a strategy that has the best hope of getting the president's attention."

Clearly, however, Mrs. Clinton's advisers do not relish the idea of someone bringing up her 2002 Senate vote at every campaign stop.

Some advisers believe the issue of her vote will fade with time; even so, they emphasize that she is taking a principled position of responsibility for it.

Mark Penn, Mrs. Clinton's chief strategist, said in an interview: "It's important for all Democrats to keep the word 'mistake' firmly on the Republicans and on President Bush. Senator Clinton has been very clear that we, as a party, should keep the focus on Bush — these were his mistakes. Ultimately that's very important, not just for her, but for the entire Democratic party."

At Mr. Obama's rally in Waterloo, Barbara Gifford, a 69-year-old retiree, illustrated the challenge to the Clinton campaign, saying that she would not rule out supporting her candidacy but that the senator's stance on Iraq troubled her. It was reminiscent, Ms. Gifford said, of how Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts fumbled in his 2004 presidential campaign as he sought to answer questions about war financing.

"I think Hillary is kind of doing the Kerry flip-flop," she said in an interview. "People like somebody to admit when they were wrong."

Mr. Obama gained the endorsement of two top state Democratic officials in Iowa on Sunday. The attorney general, Tom Miller, and the treasurer, Michael L. Fitzgerald, signed onto his campaign, they said, at least in part because of his steady opposition to the war.

"He has the right judgment," Mr. Miller said of Mr. Obama. "He made the right call on Iraq."

Clinton Addresses 2002 Iraq Vote During N.H. Visit (USAT)

By Fredreka Schouten

USA Today, February 12, 2007

New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton wrapped up her first visit to New Hampshire as a presidential candidate Sunday, facing pointed questions from Democratic activists about her early support for the war in Iraq.

Clinton refused to characterize her 2002 vote authorizing the invasion as a mistake.

"If we knew then what we know now, I would never have voted to give this president the authority," she said at a private house party in Nashua, near the end of a two-day swing through the early-primary state.

DOJ_NMG_0130404

"I'm sorry, what I say is what I believe," she said. "I understand that some people disagree or think it's not adequate, but it's what I believe."

Earlier in the day, Clinton reiterated her opposition to cutting funds for U.S. troops as a means to force an end to the nearly four-year war. "We don't yet have all the gear and equipment our troops are supposed to have," she said.

Clinton, campaigning to become the nation's first female president, said her strategy to scale back U.S. involvement in the war would include new diplomatic efforts in region, including a push to restart the Middle East peace process. "We cannot be telling people what to do," she said. "We have to be moving them with carrots and sticks and a lot of coalition-building."

In news Sunday from other presidential candidates:

·Sen. Chris Dodd, a Connecticut Democrat, said he would back efforts in Congress to attach measures to spending bills to cut off some of the funding for the Iraq war. "We've got to stand up and offer real legislation with real teeth and real accountability or the American public are going to be very, very disappointed, to put it mildly," Dodd said on CBS' Face the Nation.

·In an interview televised Sunday, former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee said he believes the country is in "the middle or at least the beginnings" of a worldwide religious war in which "Islamic fascists … really would like to annihilate us."

Huckabee, a Republican presidential candidate, said the next president will have combat those forces by urging moderate Muslims "to take a more visible and, frankly, vocal role in bringing a sense of balance and sanity within the Islamic community." He spoke on ABC News' This Week.

·Likely GOP contender Rudy Giuliani, in California over the weekend, defended his actions on gun measures as New York City mayor. Giuliani said he was trying to reduce crime by supporting bans on certain rifles and initiating a lawsuit against gunmakers over handgun deaths in New York. Giuliani is scheduled to deliver a speech today in Santa Clara, Calif.

Clinton's Search For Common Ground Gets Mixed Reviews In N.H. (WP)

By Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

KEENE, N.H., Feb. 11 -- Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) touted the politics of the possible Sunday during her inaugural visit to New Hampshire as a presidential candidate, a message that found an energetic but not ecstatic reception in town-hall meetings and house parties across the state.

Clinton veered away from drawing simple conclusions on issues such as the war in Iraq and health care, insisting that each is a complex problem that does not lend itself to a simple solution.

On Iraq, an area where Clinton has drawn considerable criticism for her unwillingness to apologize for her 2002 vote authorizing the war, she defended the Senate's effort to pass a nonbinding resolution condemning President Bush's plan to send 21,500 more combat troops to Iraq, calling it a first step in changing U.S. policy on the war. She also said she opposes any proposal to defund U.S. troops now or in the future.

"I know that is hard medicine for people," Clinton said at a town-hall meeting Sunday night in Keene, a western New Hampshire town.

Earlier in the day in Manchester, Clinton described Iraq as a "gnawing, painful sore" and added that she understands "the anguish and the outrage of people" about the conflict. Even so, she repeatedly rejected the opportunity to call her 2002 vote a mistake.

"What I say is what I believe," Clinton said. "The problem with this president is he should not have been trusted with this authority." She added that she would love to "wave a magic wand" and change the circumstances in Iraq but that is simply not possible. She did use the phrase "civil war" to describe the conflict in Iraq -- a description she has used before but not since becoming a candidate for president.

Clinton's unwillingness to offer a rhetorical olive branch to the antiwar left contrasts sharply with the positions taken by her two main rivals for the Democratic nomination -- Sen. Barack Obama (Ill.) and former senator John Edwards (N.C.). Obama, who formally entered the race Saturday, has called for all U.S. troops to be out of Iraq by March 2008 and on Sunday called on Clinton to better explain her plan to extricate troops from Iraq. Edwards has advocated an immediate withdrawal of U.S. military forces.

Clinton is sending a message to primary voters as well as to her opponents that governing -- unlike campaigning -- is about finding common ground and forging compromise, not making difficult promises. It's a message she believes is striking fear in Republicans. "I'm the one person they are most afraid of," she said during a stop in Nashua. "Bill and I have beaten them before, and we will again."

Her approach is evident on health care, which Clinton unsuccessfully tried to revamp in the early 1990s while she was first lady. She pointedly refused to offer a comprehensive proposal over the weekend, instead theorizing on how the current system is failing and criticizing those who she said believe that throwing more money at the problem will solve it.

DOJ_NMG_0130405

This month, Edwards unveiled a health-care proposal that would cost $90 billion to $120 billion annually and be funded mainly by raising taxes on the wealthiest Americans.

"I am looking for answers that will not have us spend more money," Clinton said. "I am convinced we can do that."

The response to Clinton's approach was mixed. A woman who attended a house party in Manchester on Sunday told the senator that the explanation that her 2002 vote was not an authorization for war "doesn't fly." But she seemed satisfied when Clinton said -- as she did multiple times during her two-day trip -- that if she knew then what she knows now, she never would have voted for the war.

Others were less easily pleased. One man hoisting a sign that read "No More Pro War Candidates" said that even if Clinton apologized for her vote, he could not support her. "We want people with better judgment than that," he said.

Through it all, Clinton stuck to the script, summing up her political philosophy in Nashua: "You have to find common ground, but you also have to stand your ground."

Clinton On The Trail In N.H. (NSDY)

By J. Jioni Palmer

Long Island Newsday, February 12, 2007

BERLIN, N.H. - With the snowcapped, windswept peaks of the White Mountains nearby, Sen. Hillary Clinton talked to residents of this city in the northernmost reaches of the Granite State in her first New Hampshire appearance as a candidate for the White House.

She was generally well-received by the overflow crowds, although she had to face tough questions about her position on Iraq.

In this paper-mill town straddling the Androscoggin River, and later in Concord, the state capital, Clinton began what she called a "conversation" that sought to cast her as a political centrist with mainstream values who cares about Main Street.

"I grew up in a middle-class family, in the middle of the country, in the middle of the last century," she said, describing her childhood in Illinois to the residents of the state where the first primary will take place.

Her upbringing, she said, instilled a conviction that any parent could provide a better future for their children through their own hard work and that the government would provide an infrastructure to make that happen.

"There was a basic bargain in America: If you did your part, if you worked hard and played by the rules, then you would be given the chance to go as far as your dreams and your ambition and your hard work would take you," Clinton said. "The other part of the bargain was that your government would be on your side ... I look now and it seems to me we are in danger of breaking that bargain because of the decisions being made by the leaders in our country."

The sounds of Aerosmith and Bob Marley filled the auditorium at Berlin City Hall, and the crowd - some of whom had driven more than four hours - rustled with excitement as the time of Clinton's appearance drew near. Some clutched copies of her autobiography, others gripped former President Bill Clinton's. A few carried both.

A button vendor did a brisk business. At three for $10 or one for $5, buyers could choose from among a half-dozen, including one with a picture of Bill Clinton that said "First Gentleman."

Wearing a wireless microphone, Clinton walked around the two venues talking about the need to provide universal health care, pitching energy independence as national security issue and emphasizing her opposition to President George W. Bush's planned troop surge in Iraq.

Clinton fielded questions from the audience - most dealing with topics she touched on during her opening remarks - that were largely friendly. But she did take occasional heat for her stance on the war.

Perhaps to head off such queries, Clinton said that if she had been president in 2003 the United States never would have gone to war, and that should she be elected, if the troops are still there, she'd take them out.

That wasn't enough for some.

"I want to know if right here, right now, once and for all and without nuance, you can say that war authorization was a mistake," said Roger Tilton, 46, of Nashua. "I, and I think a lot of other primary voters - until we hear you say it, we're not going to hear all the other great things you are saying."

Clinton responded that if she knew then what she knows now, "I never would have voted for the war."

But Tilton, a financial adviser, said he still wasn't satisfied.

"I can't listen to her until I hear her say it was a mistake," he said afterward. "You know what, there were a lot of the people in the Senate [23 members] at the time who didn't vote for it. There were a lot of people in the Senate at the time who voted for it and now say it was a mistake."

Smart Money Is On Clinton As She Homes In On Primary (FT)

DOJ_NMG_0130406

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner In New Hampshire

Financial Times, February 12, 2007

It is hockey night at Mr Pizza's in Gorham, New Hampshire, but a handful of couples and a few lone diners sitting around the bar in the popular local spot are talking about the imminent arrival in the Granite State of Hillary Clinton, her first visit in more than a decade.

Ed Miars recalls how he spent an hour with Bill Clinton "just shooting the bull" during the campaign of the governor of Arkansas, whose second-place New Hampshire finish in the 1992 primary saved his candidacy. Mr Miars, a state representative, does not expect the New York senator and Democratic presidential frontrunner to spend as much time courting New Hampshire voters as her then-obscure husband did, but says he thinks she is a "great candidate" and that others "don't have a chance".

A burly veteran of both Gulf wars, named Oscar, says he does not respect Ms Clinton. "How is she going to control the country if she cannot control her husband?" he quips, before being berated by Lorraine Leclerc, a beautician who is ecstatic about Ms Clinton's run.

"I think she's going to go the whole way, and I'm not voting for her because she's a woman. I'm voting for her because she's smart," she says as a handful of other women nod in agreement.

To be relevant to the critical and largely independent voters of New Hampshire, traditionally home to the first primary, Mr Miars says Ms Clinton will have to deliver a message that speaks to the economic hardships of the state's north, which last year saw its pulp mill shut down and whose citizens are grappling with healthcare costs.

The next morning, in a packed city hall in Berlin, Ms Clinton tries to do just that, comparing the difficult economic environment to that of areas in her adopted home state of New York. "I'm not going to tell you that we have magically turned things around, but we have made progress."

In this, her first New Hampshire campaign stop, she promises to fix the healthcare crisis, implement a foreign policy that would improve the nation's standing in the world and enact a new energy strategy.

But even those who appear to adore Ms Clinton take her to task on the biggest issue for many voters: her 2002 vote to authorise President George W. Bush to invade Iraq. In a second stop in Concord that day, Monique Cesna asks Ms Clinton to explain the "seeming contradiction" between the vote and her call to end the war.

Dave Tiffany, who claims a Clinton staff member took away a sign that said "Quit stalling. Bring our troops home", criticised the senator for not urging Congress to cut off war funding. Unlike her rival, former senator John Edwards, Ms Clinton has refused to admit her 2002 vote was a mistake and insists it was not meant to give Mr Bush the authority to wage pre-emptive war.

Charlie Cook, editor of the Cook Political Report, says ultimately, Ms Clinton will be able to take the issue of Iraq "off the table". The more important question now, he says, is how voters respond to Ms Clinton, who holds a lead in New Hampshire and national polls.

Candace Landroche, an administrator at a private school who attended Ms Clinton's Concord meeting, says the senator has been portrayed as being "tough and hard", but she found her "warm and sensitive".

Dick Bennett, who heads a non-partisan polling firm in New Hampshire, says that, barring any big mis-steps, Ms Clinton's candidacy is like a "freight train".

"I look at this and think, does Barack Obama know what is going to happen to him?"

Mr Bennett says his research shows Ms Clinton's advantage over rivals such as Mr Obama, who on Saturday announced his candidacy, is that voters give the senator a "pass" when it comes to having to prove she is competent and understands America's problems. "They already believe she knows. She's married to the guy who has already solved and worked on those problems," he says.

Clinton Is Pressed By Obama (NYS)

By Jill Gardiner

New York Sun, February 12, 2007

KEENE, N.H. — Senators Obama and Clinton banged heads over the Iraq war yesterday, marking their first dustup since the start of the presidential campaign.

Just a day after officially announcing his candidacy in Illinois, Mr. Obama took aim at Mrs. Clinton's vote to authorize the war, saying, "I think the war was a tragic mistake and it never should have been authorized."

Mrs. Clinton's vote is the one issue that has been dogging her thus far in the campaign. Otherwise, enthusiastic crowds have been giving her standing ovations on her proposals covering everything from health care to energy dependency. Mr. Obama told reporters that his early opposition to the war is proof positive that "it was possible to make judgments that this would not work out well" and that it speaks "to the kind of judgment that I will be bringing to the office of president."

DOJ_NMG_0130407

"I am not clear on how she would proceed at this point to wind down the war in a specific way," Mr. Obama told the Associated Press in an interview. "I know that she's stated that she thinks the war should end by the start of the next president's first term. Beyond that, though, how she wants to accomplish that, I'm not clear on."

A spokesman for Mrs. Clinton, Howard Wolfson, issued a statement last night in response to Mr. Obama's comment, saying the former first lady has been a "forceful critic" of the war and has "strongly opposed President Bush's escalation."

"Had she been president in October of 2002, she would not have started this war and if Congress doesn't end this war by January of 2009, as president, she will," Mr. Wolfson said.

Yesterday's clash came as the two Democrats were campaigning in the two most crucial early nominating states. Mrs. Clinton was here in New Hampshire wrapping up a two-day campaign swing, while Mr. Obama was stumping in Iowa and Illinois and preparing for his own trip to New Hampshire today.

At an event at Keene High School, in the southwest corner of this state, a questioner at a town hall meeting, as if on cue, asked Mrs. Clinton to pledge that she would "not put down my fellow Democrats."

Mrs. Clinton answered with an emphatic "yes" and said a positive tone in the campaign would lead the country in a better direction. "I want to run a campaign about the future and about the issues and what I would do as president, and I would leave it to the voters to sort out the differences among us," she told roughly 2,500 people in the gym and an overflowing auditorium. "I want to be positive and optimistic about what we can do together." Earlier in the day, Mrs. Clinton bluntly told a group of about 50 New Hampshire residents that high-ranking Republicans are more afraid of her than of any of her opponents.

"I know what Gingrich tells people privately. I know what DeLay tells people privately. I know what Karl Rove tells people privately," Mrs. Clinton said at a private party in Nashua in response to a question about how she would deal with Mr. Rove's notoriously shrewd political tactics.

"I'm the one person they are most afraid of. Bill and I have beaten them before and we will again," she declared.

She also ramped up her rhetoric on the infighting in Iraq, saying several times that America would not be left to "babysit a civil war." A New Hampshire resident, Eric Schumacher, who attended yesterday's event in Keene, said it would be "disingenuous for the candidates to not talk about Iraq" and draw comparisons.

"We do not have the luxury of not focusing on that," he said as Mrs. Clinton signed copies of her book for supporters in the school's gymnasium. "I think that at the end of the day is going to emerge as the issue."

A business owner, Philip Huber — who was at Keene High School to see Mrs. Clinton, but was carrying a copy of Mr. Obama's book — called it "absurd" to ask politicians to take pledges.

Mrs. Clinton stuck largely to her stump speech in Keene, talking about CEO pay, health care costs, No Child Left Behind, global climate change, and the squeeze on the middle class.

The crowd was mostly wowed, but the decision to insist that President Bush made a mistake on Iraq rather than taking that responsibility is trailing her like a bad odor. She has introduced legislation to cap troop levels at their January 1 strength and to cut off funding for Iraqi, but not American, forces. Mr. Obama has proposed starting a troop withdrawal in May. Senator Edwards, another of her Democratic rivals, has proposed pulling out 40,000 to 50,000 troops.

At a party in Manchester, a woman told Mrs. Clinton that her explanation for voting to authorize the Iraq war "doesn't fly."

Meanwhile, Mrs. Clinton received praise yesterday from an unexpected source. A former Arkansas governor, Mike Huckabee, told George Stephanopoulos on ABC that she is a "brilliant human being" and said Republicans "underestimate Hillary Clinton at their own peril."

"I think people underestimate her. And I think, when they do, they're going to be sorry," he said. A waitress at Pappy's Pizza in Manchester, Kelly Riley, had a similar take. After Mrs. Clinton dropped in yesterday morning, Ms. Riley predicted that New York's junior senator would win the presidency.

"You usually know who is going to be the winner. She's gonna win. She's going to be the president."

Not Sold On Clinton (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

The buzz in Democratic circles for the past two weeks has been over the decision to raise money for Sen. Barack Obama by two or three multimillionaire liberals from Hollywood who were thought to be supporting Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton for president. An explanation that this is the movie industry's delayed reaction to some of President Bill Clinton's policies is not credible. The real reason for the defection is more troubling for Clinton's campaign.

In fact, the Hollywood defections have the same root as resistance to Clinton's candidacy among less glittering Democratic activists throughout the country. A substantial number of them do not want to participate in a coronation of the former first lady because they still doubt her viability as a presidential candidate. They question both her positions on the issues and her skills on the campaign trail.

DOJ_NMG_0130408

What's wrong with Clinton was demonstrated by the Feb. 4 performance on NBC's "Meet the Press" of a competitor, former senator John Edwards, who displayed the qualities she lacks. He took firm positions and admitted error, in contrast to Clinton's careful parsing. It followed his virtuoso performance at the Democratic National Committee meeting two days earlier that overshadowed Clinton's speech there. Comparing Clinton and Edwards, one longtime observer of the Democratic scene called it "caution versus courage."

For many months, long before Clinton confirmed that she was a candidate, her agents have been pinning down commitments from a staggering array of Democrats who were connected in large or small degree to her husband to create an aura of inevitability about her nomination. That effort hit a bump two weeks ago with the announcement that David Geffen, Jeffrey Katzenberg and Steven Spielberg, the founders of the DreamWorks film studios who all were thought to be staunch Clintonites, were sponsoring a fundraiser for Obama.

According to Democratic sources, former President Clinton got Spielberg to step away from a tacit endorsement of Obama. Spielberg has let it be known that he will host a future fundraiser for Clinton as part of a policy of helping all Democratic presidential candidates. But Katzenberg and Geffen seem to be clearly in Obama's camp.

Two theories for these defections have been put out by Democrats favorable to Clinton. First, the gay community in Hollywood is seeking revenge against Bill Clinton's "don't ask, don't tell" policy restricting open homosexuality in the military. Second, the entertainment industry still harbors resentment about Clinton-Gore administration criticism of the material that is presented to children.

But these explanations defy reality, in the opinion of Democrats not yet committed to any candidate. Hollywood, including the DreamWorks founders, was solidly behind Bill Clinton in 1996 and Al Gore in 2000.

The real reason for not desiring a Hillary coronation, as described to me by California Democrats, is resentment of her cautious sidestep rightward over the past six years. They still cannot get over her sponsorship in 2005 of legislation against flag burning. The whispered worry is that Clinton as the presidential nominee would be a loser in a year when the stars seem aligned for a Republican defeat.

What's wrong with Clinton was pointed out by Edwards in his "Meet the Press" performance. He not only said he was "wrong" about Iraq when he first supported the intervention, but he advocated universal health care and asserted: "Yes, we'll have to raise taxes." Clinton has hedged on each of these issues (as Edwards pointed out in the case of her stance on Iraq).

Edwards is not popular with the Democratic elite, who view him as a glib and shallow trial lawyer. They remember that he began his 2004 campaign for president as a centrist Southern Democrat in the Jimmy Carter-Bill Clinton mold, but after not getting anywhere he switched to left-wing populism. The viable alternative to Clinton may be Obama.

Nevertheless, Edwards's "courage" energized DNC members as Clinton's "caution" did not. The point is that many Democrats are voting no on a Hillary coronation.

Campaign '08: Who Is The 'Real' John Edwards? (NSWK)

By Jonathan Darman

Newsweek, February 12, 2007

In the fall of 2005, John Edwards sat down with a pad and pen and scrawled out three simple words: "I was wrong." It was nearly three years after he'd joined a Senate majority in voting to authorize war in Iraq. After an unsuccessful run as John Kerry's vice presidential candidate in the 2004 election, Edwards had returned home to North Carolina and watched as the war descended into chaos. Increasingly filled with regret, he concluded that the three-word confession would be the right way to start a Washington Post op-ed admitting his vote was a mistake.

But when a draft came back from his aides in Washington, Edwards's admission was gone. Determined, the senator reinserted the sentence. Again a draft came back from Washington; again the sentence had been taken out. "We went back and forth, back and forth," Edwards tells NEWSWEEK. "They didn't want me to say it. They were saying I should stress that I'd been misled." The opening sentence remained. "That was the single most important thing for me to say," Edwards recalls. "I had to show how I really feel."

The "real" John Edwards is not someone America knows well. When he first crossed the national stage, he called himself the "son of a mill worker," but he seemed more like a creature spawned in a focus group—attractive, well spoken and safe. Since then, he has weathered enormous hardship—his wife, Elizabeth, has battled breast cancer—but hardly a wrinkle has crossed his perpetually tanned face. He has spent the better part of five years in one of the most contrived careers known to man: candidate for president of the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0130409

In recent weeks, however, Edwards has been trying to draw attention to his less- scripted side. First there was his "silence is betrayal" attack on his main rivals for the 2008 Democratic nomination, Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama, for not speaking out against the escalation of the Iraq war. On Feb. 4, in an appearance on "Meet the Press," he broke the cardinal rule of presidential politics and admitted that his proposal for universal health care would require raising taxes. Then, last week, he refused to fire two campaign employees who'd criticized Roman Catholics and religious conservatives on their personal blogs, despite pressure from conservative leaders.

It's perhaps no accident that Genuine John Edwards has chosen this particular moment to emerge. The senator is campaigning as an alternative to Clinton, the front runner whose chief weakness with primary voters is the impression she is driven more by polling than principle. He has lost supporters, and even some staff, to Obama—a candidate who's connected with Democrats by seeming to always speak from his heart. And the success of blunt-spoken Democratic Senate candidates like Montana's Jon Tester and Virginia's Jim Webb has left Washington consultants advising their clients to act like, well, they don't listen to consultants.

Still, Edwards's new commitment to authenticity may have real roots: in 2004, the candidate learned the hard way that too much caution can be fatal. When the Kerry campaign faltered, Edwards and his wife were convinced that a broad swath of competing consultants, offering conflicting advice, were largely to blame. "Consultants can make it hard to tell the truth," Edwards says. "They want you to be so cautious it makes it hard to say anything." Aides, who didn't want to be named discussing their boss's internal thinking, say he walked away from 2004 convinced that only strong, centralized decision making works in presidential campaigns.

He was already thinking of the next election—but Edwards had a more pressing task. When Elizabeth was diagnosed with breast cancer, Edwards became her chief caretaker, sitting beside her as she underwent debilitating treatment. (Elizabeth is now in remission.) By her bedside, he pondered his own future and contemplated Iraq. How could he go on rationalizing his vote to authorize support for the war? "I knew I couldn't keep explaining a vote ... I had serious doubts about," he says.

Aides saw a new confidence in Edwards after he publicly repudiated his war vote in November 2005. He had developed his own world view and could converse easily about foreign policy. He'd also taken on fighting poverty as his central cause. It seemed an odd choice for the old John Edwards—"electable" centrist candidates don't waste time on the poor while vying for middle-class voters. "Yeah, I heard all that," Edwards told NEWSWEEK in 2006. "It's what I want to do." (Critics claim Edwards's new 28,000-square-foot home in Orange County, N.C., shows his commitment to the poor may not be as all-consuming as he suggests.)

All his talk about the working class has helped Edwards get cozy with labor. In 2004, he peppered his speeches with sympathy for unions but largely sat out of the major jockeying for endorsements from Big Labor. Now he has led an aggressive courtship, naming union-friendly former congressman David Bonior as his campaign chairman and pitching labor leaders. Andy Stern, president of the influential Service Employees International Union (SEIU), has seemed especially drawn to Edwards's message. But associates, who would only speak about his intentions anonymously, say he is wary of alienating the Clintons. (An SEIU spokesman said the union would not make an endorsement until September at the earliest.)

Edwards has also recast himself as the Internet candidate. In 2004, his campaign largely ceded the Web money chase to Howard Dean. But Elizabeth, who was an early habitué of online communities, has long urged her husband to take more-aggressive steps on the Internet. He has wooed bloggers during private dinners and invested in a Web site that many consider to be the most sophisticated of any candidate in either party. Last week he declined calls to dismiss campaign bloggers Amanda Marcotte and Melissa McEwan, amid allegations they were antireligion. "The first response normally would have been to listen to these Beltway actors who were saying, 'Clearly, you have to fire these people'," says Jonathan Singer, a blogger for the liberal site MyDD. "He has some spine."

But to win the Democratic nomination, Edwards needs cash as much as he needs resolve. To stay in the same sentence as Clinton and Obama, Edwards must have an impressive fund-raising total at the end of the first filing period on March 31. He will spend the next two months crisscrossing the country, picking up checks. "The travel bothers me more than it used to," he admits. "Maybe it's just that I'm older." The new John Edwards is still running for president—but now admits when he feels a little pain.

A 'Straight Shooter' Or A Temperament Problem? (NSWK)

By Jonathan Alter

Newsweek, February 12, 2007

Until recently, discussion about which GOP candidate might be temperamentally unsuited for the presidency has revolved around Sen. John McCain, who has a short fuse. But with former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani now poised to run, questions about the Big T are also hovering over Hizzoner.

Giuliani gets mostly high marks as mayor—for cutting crime and welfare and for heroic leadership after 9/11. But New Yorkers also remember his thirst for power and bouts of unwarranted nastiness. After 9/11, the mayor briefly weighed challenging the city constitution that barred a third term. "He was hellbent on doing it," says one former aide from this period, who wouldn't be named for fear of retaliation. McCain was among those who talked Giuliani out of it, arguing that he'd be better off going out on top.

Other examples of temperamentally questionable behavior go back more than a decade. After Police Commissioner William Bratton's innovative crime-fighting landed him on the cover of Time magazine in 1994, Giuliani sacked him, apparently for getting too much publicity. When New York Magazine placed ads on buses in 1997 referring to the publication as "Possibly the only good thing in New York Rudy hasn't taken credit for," Giuliani leaned on the transit authority to take the ads down. A judge upheld the magazine's free-speech rights.

A critical new documentary, "Giuliani Time," chronicles the mayor's tone-deaf response to local police shootings. For instance, after police killed Patrick Dorismond, an unarmed Haitian-American, in 2000, the mayor improperly released Dorismond's juvenile arrest record, bizarrely said that an earlier argument between Dorismond and his girlfriend might have been a factor in his death and refused to express sympathy to his family. Giuliani later apologized. The same year, he used a press conference to inform his second wife, Donna Hanover, that he wanted a divorce. (She responded with her own announcement that her husband had been having an affair with an aide for "several years.")

A Giuliani campaign spokesperson, Katie Levinson, says his temperament is a plus: "Rudy is a straight shooter." But will a less flattering version of the personality issue be used against him in debates? Says an aide to one rival, insisting on anonymity for himself and his candidate: "You just have to wait and watch."

Democrats Accelerate Effort To Aid Johnson (RC)

By Erin P. Billings And Tory Newmyer

Roll Call, February 12, 2007

In what may be the strongest signal yet that Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) will run for re-election in 2008, at least seven of his Democratic Senate colleagues are organizing big-ticket fundraisers in the coming weeks to help him fill his campaign coffers as he continues to recover from emergency brain surgery.

Majority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.), Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman and Democratic Caucus Vice Chairman Charles Schumer (N.Y.) and five other prominent Democratic Senators are hosting the D.C. events that begin Wednesday and run through March. Sen. Kent Conrad (N.D.) is organizing the Wednesday fundraiser in a private office at 101 Constitution Ave. NW, with Reid holding an event on Thursday at a private home on Capitol Hill.

“A number of Senators are holding fundraisers for Tim,” said Drey Samuelson, Johnson’s chief of staff. “We’ve been really touched by the outpouring of support from different Senators.”

Johnson continues to recover at The George Washington University Hospital, where he has been undergoing rehabilitation since suffering a brain hemorrhage on Dec. 13. The South Dakota Democrat is making major strides, and sources say he possibly could return to work part-time in the coming months.

In a statement from Johnson’s office Friday afternoon, Philip Marion, medical director for the Department of Rehabilitative Medicine at George Washington University Hospital, said Johnson “is actively making decisions about his health care and expressing his opinions about his daily activities. He continues to initiate more conversations and questions. His therapy now includes computer exercises and problem-solving activities.”

Samuelson said those close to the Senator are “encouraged by his recovery” and by the level of support shown by his fellow Senate Democrats for a possible 2008 campaign. Samuelson said Johnson’s staff has done little to solicit the financial help from Senators; rather, “most of them have offered on their own.”

“We are excited about the prospect of him running again, and we are doing everything we can so if he chooses to do that, he will be in an excellent position to do so,” Samuelson said. “We’ve gotten calls from different folks who said, ‘Anything we can to do to help, we’re happy to host a fundraiser for you.’”

A Democratic operative with ties to South Dakota politics said the upcoming rash of Johnson fundraisers is a clear indicator that he is preparing to run for re-election and that he understands he cannot afford to waste any time filling his campaign accounts. “This is essentially what Tim would be doing himself if he were able to,” the source said. “It is absolutely right to view this as a pretty strong signal to everyone that he is operating under the assumption he’s running for re-election.”

Sen. Max Baucus (Mont.) kicked off the Johnson fundraising efforts earlier this month when he created a joint fundraising committee to allow him to raise money for his own re-election campaign while simultaneously collecting funds for his Midwestern Democratic colleague.

DOJ_NMG_0130411

Baucus also is one of the seven Senators who will host an event on Johnson's behalf in the coming weeks. The Montana Democrat is planning a luncheon on March 12 at The Monocle Restaurant to raise money for the two Senators' joint fundraising committee, asking $5,000 per host, $2,500 per political action committee and $1,000 per person.

"Everyone who has ever met Tim Johnson knows what a great person and a national leader he is," said Baucus' top aide, Jim Messina. "True friends help when their friends need it, and Tim needs it."

Indeed, Johnson could use the financial boost from his allies. As of Dec. 31, Johnson had just $629,000 in the bank — a relatively small sum in a state that easily could tilt to a Republican next cycle.

So far, no one has stepped in to challenge Johnson, but some well-known candidates could emerge, including Republican Gov. Mike Rounds. Rounds is almost a sure bet to run if Johnson opts out of a re-election bid, but the GOP governor's candidacy is less clear if Johnson enters the race. On the Democratic side, Rep. Stephanie Herseth is a likely and formidable candidate if Johnson decides to sit it out.

Regardless, Democratic Senators clearly don't want to take any chances, especially as they look to increase their narrow 51-49 seat hold on the Senate in 2008. In addition to the upcoming events hosted by Conrad, Reid, Schumer and Baucus, Sens. Jeff Bingaman (N.M.), Evan Bayh (Ind.) and Edward Kennedy (Mass.) also are putting together Johnson fundraisers.

"We are putting our full support behind Senator Tim Johnson and are urging senators and others to support his reelection bid," Schumer said in a statement.

Jim Manley, spokesman for Reid, said his boss has made it clear he will do whatever is necessary to help Johnson as he recovers. "Everyone is extremely pleased with the fact that Sen. Johnson is progressing so well, and while he's still away they are happy to do everything possible to make sure he can run a vigorous campaign when he returns."

K Street Democrats said they will rally to the cause. "I think there is a strong level of support for Sen. Johnson, and people respect and appreciate his colleagues' efforts to be helpful," said Bruce Andrews, a Democratic lobbyist with Quinn Gillespie & Associates.

Paul Equale, a Democratic consultant, said he will attend the Conrad event that will kick off the series of fundraisers. "There is a vast wellspring of affection for Tim Johnson in the Washington community," he said.

For Democrats, Time To Pad Senate Majority And Think 60 Seats (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, February 12, 2007

Democrats probably don't have to worry about losing their Senate majority in 2008, but that doesn't mean next year's elections aren't crucial for them.

A strong '08 could put the party in sight of a 60-seat majority in 2010, and that filibuster-proof majority would change the rules of the game on Capitol Hill.

Last year, Democrats won a stunning 24 of 33 races, which means over the next two Senate cycles they will need to win another 36 seats, out of the 67 that will be up, to give them the magic number of 60. Given the small Democratic classes next year (12) and in 2010 (15), and the fact that Republicans will be defending a total of 40 seats over the two cycles, it's certainly possible that Democrats can net nine seats to get to 60.

Sixty-seat majorities are possible only when a party has a mega-year that produces a huge class. The Republicans did that in 2002 and put themselves in reach of 60 seats with a good 2004. But last year was a disaster, and now it is the Democrats who have a mathematical chance to hit the all-important 60-seat mark. But first, they must build on their numbers next year.

Five or six of the GOP's 21 Senate seats up next year already look to be at some risk, and that number could grow if there are key retirements and if President Bush's problems continue to drag down Republican Party numbers.

Colorado topped the list of vulnerable '08 Senate seats even before Sen. Wayne Allard (R) announced that he would not seek re-election. Democratic Rep. Mark Udall already had signaled he would run for the Senate, and it is far from clear whether Republican chances of holding the Colorado seat have been hurt or improved by Allard's decision.

Udall's appeal, combined with Colorado's recent Democratic drift and the GOP's current national dilemma, certainly improves Democrats' chances of picking up the Senate seat.

Another Democratic Representative, Maine's Tom Allen, also is heading for a Senate race, and his challenge of incumbent Republican Sen. Susan Collins immediately makes the race a top-tier contest. Collins is always underestimated, and she begins her reelection bid well-liked, but the state's Democratic bent, Allen's assets and the Republican Party's current standing mean that Collins will have a tough race.

At least three GOP Senators in competitive or Democratic-leaning states also could have tough races, depending on Democratic recruitment efforts.

DOJ_NMG_0130412

Minnesota Sen. Norm Coleman seems certain to draw a serious challenger, while Oregon Sen. Gordon Smith can't take his re-election for granted. Both Republicans have started to criticize Bush's Iraq policy, but they represent states that went for Democratic Sen. John Kerry (Mass.) in the 2004 presidential race and that could well go Democratic again in 2008.

New Hampshire Sen. John Sununu (R) also could have a very tough fight for a second term. He won narrowly in 2002, and his party took an absolute bath in the state in 2006, losing two House seats and getting swept out of both chambers of the state Legislature.

Other Republicans look to be in relatively good shape for re-election — if they seek it. And that could be the National Republican Senatorial Committee's problem.

At least a few Republican Senators up next year will remain on everyone's retirement watch list, and while all of them eventually may seek (and win) re-election, for now NRSC Chairman John Ensign (Nev.) has to be worrying at least a bit about their decisions.

The names on this list include Sens. John Warner (Va.), Chuck Hagel (Neb.), Pete Domenici (N.M.), Thad Cochran (Miss.) and Elizabeth Dole (N.C.).

Savvy Republican observers agree that this cycle is a "very challenging" one for the GOP, given the numbers of Republican and Democratic seats up and the current national political environment, which would slow GOP candidate recruitment and hurt committee fundraising.

But they also know that election cycles have a way of changing dramatically over two years, and it's possible that the picture could be brighter for the GOP 18 months from now when it comes to the 2008 elections.

Right now, Louisiana Sen. Mary Landrieu is the most vulnerable Democratic Senator up next year, but other Democratic Senate seats could become competitive depending on retirements and Republican recruiting.

Still, given the recent electoral performance of states with Democratic-held seats up in 2008 — including Illinois, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Michigan and Rhode Island — it is hard to see Republicans seriously contesting more than a few of those seats. So the most likely Republican scenario for winning back the Senate is to retain all of the GOP seats, knock off Landrieu and win the White House again, giving them a tie in the Senate and control with the vice president breaking the tie.

Talking about a Democratic super-majority in the Senate in 2010 may seem odd and premature, and it is. The 2008 presidential results and unknowable events over the next few years could change the political equation completely, denying Democrats an opportunity to keep their majority, let alone grow it to 60. But given the makeup of the three Senate classes, party strategists would be foolish not to be thinking about the arithmetic even now.

Lawmakers Hold 'Tele-town Hall Meetings' (USAT/AP)

By Sam Hananel

USA Today, February 12, 2007

WASHINGTON — On a recent weeknight, Kansas Rep. Jerry Moran spoke to nearly 10,000 of his constituents at once — from the comfort of his Capitol Hill office.

Technology that can connect thousands of people on a single phone call is letting Moran and other members of Congress connect with voters like never before.

"I'm not trying to replace the time I spend in Kansas," said Moran, a Republican. "But this kind of technology allows me to tie my district together in a way that 69 individual town hall meetings does not."

A "tele-town hall meeting" lets lawmakers call up to 35,000 households in their district at random by using a special automated dialing system. A recorded voice tells those who answer to stay on the line if they want to participate in the meeting.

More than 50 members of Congress, including a few senators, have tried the technology over the past year, said Rodney Smith, founder of Washington, D.C.-based Tele-Town Hall LLC.

"It's like listening to a party line," Smith said. "People very much enjoy the interaction, the fact that a congressman would call them, the fact that they get a chance to ask a question."

Between 200 and 1,000 constituents stay on for an extended portion of a typical call. Thousands more drift on and off the line as the system dials 6,000 numbers per minute. As many as 12,000 people can be on the line at one time.

Listeners can participate too. Press the pound key and you can get in line to ask a question. A lawmaker can also poll the audience on a topic and listeners can press numbers to vote.

"The technology is terrific because it allows me to have conversations with constituents in a way that, prior to this, was simply impossible," said Rep. John Kline, R-Minn. He has held eight tele-town hall meetings since hearing about the concept from Rep. Dan Lungren, R-Calif., who was the first lawmaker to try the service.

The lawmaker conducting the call can track the names and addresses of everyone lining up to ask questions on a computer screen through a special website.

DOJ_NMG_0130413

About a half hour into Moran's most recent tele-town hall meeting, the screen shows 946 households on the call and 230 waiting to ask a question. He sounds like a radio talk show host as he scrolls through the list of those who want to talk, looking for a sampling of residents from different parts of his district.

"Let's go to Hutchinson, is this a caller from Hutchinson?" Moran asks.

He has asked his listeners to let him know what they think about President Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq. The computer screen keeps a running total of those who have pressed the number one for yes and two for no. By the end of the call, the tally is 479 in favor and 298 against.

Tele-Town Hall founder Smith, a former political fundraiser, said he first tried the concept 10 years ago, but at that time the phone system could not handle the call volume. Today, he has 22 computers located at strategic sites in New York City and Las Vegas that can handle more than one meeting at a time.

The service has a patent pending and Smith just finished a business plan to see if he can get outside financing to help boost his customer base.

The service costs $2,500 for the first 25,000 answered calls, those either picked up by a live person, or go to an answering machine or voice mail. Lawmakers pay for the service with the same funds used to set up local town hall meetings.

At one of those usual get-togethers in his suburban Minneapolis district, Kline said he can expect between 25 and 100 people to show up. The chance to draw thousands of constituents without having to advertise lets lawmakers broaden their reach beyond political activists and interest groups that can dominate local meetings, he said.

"You get to hear things from people who probably wouldn't pack up and head down on a winter night in Minnesota to come to a town hall meeting, but they will sit in their kitchen and happily participate," Kline said.

Moran, whose district covers 69 counties over more than 55,000 square miles, said he likes how the tele-town hall can bring people together from all over the state.

Residents in Liberal, Kan., in the southeast corner of the state, can hear what people from Sabetha, in the far northeast corner have to say.

At the end of the meeting, anyone who stays on the line can leave a voice mail with comments that will later be e-mailed to Moran's office as audio files. His staff will listen to every message and respond with an e-mail or follow-up phone call.

Not everyone is impressed by the new technology.

Curtis Gans, director of the Committee for the Study of the American Electorate, guessed that most of the callers who stay on the line are more politically active than those who drop off.

"It's not a revolution," Gans said. "As it takes hold and people talk about it, it may bring in people beyond the activist community, but that hasn't been proved yet."

Taming The Deficit, Together (NYT)

By Bill Frenzel, Charles Stenholm, William Hoagland And Isabel Sawhill

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

WITH the new Democratic majority in Congress, President Bush finally talking about fiscal responsibility and the 2008 primary season about to begin, finding common ground between Democrats and Republicans on budget issues could not be more important. We are borrowing large sums from foreigners, leaving a legacy of debt, paying more than $1,600 per family in taxes just to cover the interest on the debt, and setting aside nothing to deal with future contingencies or investments.

True, last year's deficit of $248 billion, at 1.9 percent of gross domestic product, was not large by historical standards, and next year's may be even smaller. But a failure to deal with deficits and overall debt sends the message that we have no plan for the sea of red ink that will engulf the nation when the baby boomers begin to retire next year.

With this in mind, the four of us propose a balanced package of spending cuts and revenue increases that could eliminate the deficit in five years and set the nation on a sustainable course for the long term. None of us agrees with every part of this proposal, but we think as a whole it works as a model for compromise. More important, it demonstrates how people of good will from both parties can come together to produce a package that not only curtails deficits but also greatly improves the long-term fiscal outlook.

On spending, we would put a hard cap on all appropriations that freezes spending at fiscal 2008 levels. This would allow one federal program's financing to increase only if another program's budget were cut. We also propose accelerating the increase in the retirement age to 67 from 66, improving the way Social Security benefits are indexed for inflation and making other modest adjustments in the major entitlement programs.

These cuts to spending, however, would save only about half of the money needed to balance the budget in 2013. Further spending reductions are unlikely to garner much Congressional support and could even compromise national security. To make up the balance we propose to increase revenues — not by raising income tax rates but by dealing with some of the flaws in the current tax system.

DOJ_NMG_0130414

The major reform would be to broaden and simplify the tax base by turning almost all itemized deductions into 15 percent credits against taxes. We would also place a cap on how much of employer-paid health insurance premiums could be excluded from taxes.

To increase energy security and reduce global warming, we would impose a carbon fee or tax on energy producers of $15 per metric ton of carbon emissions, phased in over a three-year interval, which could raise about $35 billion a year. This fee could be collected by auctioning off permits to private companies under a cap-and-trade system, or levied as a direct tax on the businesses (which in turn, of course, would pass costs along to consumers).

We must also collect more of the taxes already owed. The Internal Revenue Service recently did an audit analysis of the tax year 2001, and found a gap between what was owed and what was remitted of at least $290 billion.

Finally, we suggest reforming the alternative minimum tax, probably through adjusting the way it is pegged to inflation; as it is, too many middle- and upper-middle-class families will find their taxes rising in the next few years because of the tax. The resulting shortfall in revenues would be made up for by continuing to tax the very small number of estates worth more than $7 million per couple.

In all, our plan would give the nation a fiscal-responsibility dividend of $57 billion per year over five years, the interest saved on the debt. Some of this money would be put toward deficit reduction, but the remainder could be invested in high-priority programs like early childhood education, combating terrorism around the globe and state-based children's health insurance programs.

Of course, reining in the deficit is only part of the challenge. To chip away at the national debt and sustain a healthy fiscal outlook into the deep future, fundamental reform of Social Security and Medicare will be needed, and everything will have to be on the table. On Social Security, for example, lifting or removing the cap on payroll taxes, indexing benefits for our increased longevity, and slowing the growth of payments to wealthier retirees would go a long way toward improving its solvency.

Festering deficits, a poorly designed tax system, an addiction to oil and uncontrolled entitlement spending are all symptoms of what is wrong with our current politics. Those jockeying for position in the 2008 presidential race should emphasize that deficits matter, that bipartisan solutions are needed and that it is possible to make fiscal progress while improving the tax system, health care and energy security. More specifically, they should promise to eliminate the deficit within five years and to set the budget on a sustainable trajectory for the longer term. Our package shows that it can be done.

800,000 Uninsured (WP)

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

Helping them is a worthy goal -- but worthy compared to what?

IN A RICH STATE such as Maryland, the presence of 800,000 people without medical insurance is an embarrassment and a burden on state finances. But a $600 million proposal in the House of Delegates, which would double the cigarette tax to $2 a pack and extend coverage to nearly a third of the uninsured, raises an ever-larger question: How is Maryland to tackle projected annual deficits of well over $1 billion starting next year? And when it comes to health insurance, what can the state afford?

Backers of the health plan in the House, including Speaker Michael E. Busch (D-Anne Arundel), argue their case in moral terms, not without justification. They point out that cigarette-related diseases account for a sixth of the deaths in the state; that those covered by insurance pay an extra $1,000 on their premiums a year to compensate for the uninsured; that middle-class and well-to-do individuals and families should be required to buy coverage.

The bill they have proposed would expand Medicaid eligibility, extend subsidies to small businesses to help them provide insurance to their workers, and force families in the middle class and above to buy insurance if they don't have it. Doubling the cigarette tax and expanding Medicaid would not only leverage matching funds from the federal government but also cut the rate of smoking. All worthy goals.

But worthy compared with what? Like it or not, that's the debate that lawmakers need to have now, before it is forced on them by next year's projected budget shortfalls. Senate President Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr. (D-Calvert) contends that any new revenue, including a cigarette tax, should be used to help eliminate the deficit, as the law requires. Mr. Miller has a not-so-hidden agenda -- he is prepared to hold any initiative hostage to his perennial goal of expanding slot machine gambling -- but that does not negate the logic of his argument.

Thanks to a robust economy and a runaway housing market, Maryland has had the luxury for several years of ignoring the gathering budgetary storm. But it can no longer consider spending and revenue proposals piecemeal without looking at the deficits and to competing priorities. Expanding health coverage is important; so are improvements to the transportation network, and to public schools, and to higher education, and to juvenile detention facilities, and to the Chesapeake Bay. It's time for a comprehensive debate that addresses health care and much more.

DOJ_NMG_0130415

Now She Tells Us (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

After hiding her intentions during last year's campaign, Connecticut Governor M. Jodi Rell wants to thank constituents for electing her with 63% of the vote by socking them with a 10% hike in the personal income tax rate. Fellow Republicans in the state legislature are understandably scratching their heads. But the proposal has no doubt also left many taxpayers wondering why they even bother to pull the lever for Republicans.

Ms. Rell dropped this bombshell last week when she presented her biennial budget. In addition to the income tax increase, which would push the top marginal rate to 5.5% from the current 5% over two years, the Governor also proposes increasing cigarette taxes, hiking bus fares and phasing out a $500 property tax credit.

Democrats, who control both houses of the legislature, welcome the plan. So does much of the state's liberal media, who are hailing Ms. Rell as "brave" and "courageous." But as Susan Kniep of the Federation of Connecticut Taxpayer Organizations put it to the Associated Press, "Gee, why didn't we kind of hear about this before we went into the polls?"

Governor Rell says a tax increase is necessary to fund more education spending. But Connecticut already spends more money per student on public schools than all but three states. According to the latest Census data, which is from the 2004 school year, Connecticut's per-pupil spending is $10,788, or more than 30% above the national average of $8,287. In such urban districts as New Haven and Hartford, the state is spending well over $13,000 per student, and the state's teachers are among the highest paid in the nation.

All of which suggests that Connecticut's problem isn't too little education spending so much as how current expenditures are being used. For instance, public charter schools in the state, such as New Haven's Amistad Academy and Bridgeport's Bridge Academy, spend thousands of dollars less per-pupil than surrounding traditional public schools. Yet student test scores in math and reading far surpass those of neighboring schools and often match the scores of students in wealthier towns such as Greenwich. Perhaps money isn't what really matters in education achievement.

The larger danger of a tax increase is its impact on the state's overall economy. Connecticut adopted its income tax in 1991, and it has since ranked last nationally in employment growth while losing tens of thousands of people to other states. Increasing the income tax rate seems an odd way to reverse these trends.

"When looking at states that have growing economies and are thriving," said Republican state senator David Cappiello in an interview, "they're the states that either have no income tax or are looking to phase down their income tax. Connecticut is moving in the opposite direction." An income tax hike could also affect whether a small business -- such as a limited liability or Subchapter S corporation -- decides to expand or move to a more business-friendly environment.

By the way, it's not as if Connecticut taxpayers haven't been doing their part; the state will end the current fiscal year with a $600 million revenue surplus. The problem is that the politicians want to spend the money faster than it comes in. Governor Rell's budget would grow government by nearly 13% over two years and bust constitutional spending caps approved by 81% of voters back in 1992. No wonder she kept her plans secret until after the election.

America's Long Dance With The Mideast (NSWK)

By Christopher Dickey

Newsweek, February 12, 2007

The Statue of Liberty, in her curious way, helps tell the tale of America's long, complicated experiences and profoundly contradictory ambitions in the Middle East. The French sculptor Frédéric Bartholdi wanted to build a colossus bestriding the entrance to the newly opened Suez Canal in the 1870s. She would be veiled, like a peasant woman of the Nile, and would hold aloft her torch as "Egypt (or Progress) Bringing Light to Asia." But the pasha whose largesse was supposed to fund the project went bankrupt, the British occupied his country to collect their debts and Egypt's light failed. Bartholdi rethought his plan, redrew the design, and the Orient's loss was America's gain: "Liberty Enlightening the World."

This anecdote about the statue stands near the middle of Michael Oren's vast new best seller, "Power, Faith and Fantasy: America in the Middle East, 1776 to the Present." It served as a metaphor for the mingled, often mirrored fates of two regions strangely bound by grandiose dreams and hardheaded commerce, conflicting beliefs in one God, mutual fears, great hopes and grim bloodshed. Because there is no other book with such a sweeping view of the subject, the vast cast of characters Oren presents and the exhaustively researched tales of the way they played on each other will shape our thinking about America and the Middle East for years. And because much of this largely unremembered past reads as prologue to the present day, the admonition of Ecclesiastes that "there is no new thing under the sun" seems to emerge constantly from between the lines.

DOJ_NMG_0130416

Thus one of the first great tests for the newly formed United States of America was a decades-long confrontation with the Arab corsairs of North Africa. In the aftermath of independence, the American central government was weak, the Navy almost nonexistent, and debate raged at the highest levels—between Thomas Jefferson and John Adams, among others. Should the United States pay ransoms to the pirates (which was cheaper) or build a military strong enough to prevent them from preying on merchantmen that flew the Stars and Stripes? The young American nation would learn "that in the Middle East power alone was respected and that, in order to gain peace, the United States had no alternative but to wield it," Oren writes—a theme he underscores at several opportunities. But his narrative is also honest enough to show us that the feckless leaders of North Africa became convenient scapegoats once the United States finally had its Navy. Thus after the British returned to American shores in 1812 and burned Washington, D.C., the American public turned its anger against ... the Arabs. In 1815, scant months after a stalemated peace was signed with Britain, Washington shifted its attention to the Barbary pirates, declared war, and defeated them with great fanfare.

But of course problems in the Middle East seem to endure like the Pyramids. Almost 90 years later, President Teddy Roosevelt would once again send gunboats to the North African coast, this time to win the freedom of an American businessman named Ion Pedicaris, who was held by a local Berber chieftain known as Raisuli. Roosevelt sent the bluntest possible warning to the sultan in Tangiers: we want Pedicaris alive or Raisuli dead. The hostage was freed. American pride and power were preserved once again.

It wasn't just the projection of military might that characterized America's interaction with the Middle East, it was also the projection of missionary zeal—the faith that Oren talks about in the title of his book. From the time of the Puritans, American Christians had seen the New World as a New Zion or Promised Land, "a light unto the nations." But by the early 19th century, there was growing enthusiasm for expeditions to the original Zion. Indeed, Palestine in the 1840s was viewed by some Americans as part of their self-proclaimed "manifest destiny." And a large part of their zeal sprang from the notion that restoring the Jews to the Holy Land, and converting them to Christianity, would bring on the Second Coming. This "restorationism," or Christian Zionism, was a powerful force in 19th-century America—just as it is in the 21st-century United States.

As if the sense of déjà vu were not strong enough already, Oren informs us that in 1844 a Biblical scholar and professor of Hebrew at New York University by the name of George Bush wrote an influential tract called "The Valley of Vision; or, The Dry Bones of Israel Revived," which advocated "elevating" the Jews "to a rank of honorable repute among the nations of the earth" by re-creating the state of Palestine for them. (According to Oren, who spent two days in the genealogical room of the Library of Congress researching family trees, George Bush was a direct forebear of the two presidents with the same name, both of whom made a major impact on the Middle East.) For Oren, questions of Zionism, first as dreamed of by American Christians and then as conceived and implemented by 20th-century Jews, are absolutely central to the story of U.S. involvement in the Middle East.

Oren's account of President Truman's role in the creation of Israel is one of the most complex and compelling chapters of the book. Here was an American leader who fiercely resisted the lobbying of American Zionists. "The Jews, I find are very, very selfish," Truman ranted in his diary, "neither Hitler nor Stalin has anything on them for cruelty or mistreatment to the under dog." Yet when the final decision had to be made, Truman's government was the first in the world to recognize the Jewish state. His reasons were political (he noted that he had few Arab constituents) and moral (the Holocaust weighed more heavily on his mind than the fear of Arab retaliation in the oil market). And the president's Baptist background gave him an intimate sense of Biblical history. By the 1950s, Oren writes, Americans had "transformed themselves from largely passive observers of Middle Eastern affairs into the region's primary architects and arbiters."

Oren, who has four degrees in Arab history and the best-selling "Six Days of War" to his credit, is himself an ardent Zionist. Born in New Jersey 51 years ago, he immigrated to Israel as a young man and has served as a reserve officer in the Israeli military ever since, now with the rank of major. In 1982, he was on the front with Lebanon and took part in the invasion. Also in the 1980s, he worked underground in the Soviet Union making contact with dissident Jews. More recently, he served in last summer's war against Hizbullah. Oren often contributes passionate op-ed pieces to The Wall Street Journal and other publications defending Israel and its policies. He says writing "Power, Faith and Fantasy" was partly meant to bring together the two halves of his identity, American and Israeli, and he admits that balanced historical reporting doesn't come easy. "If you want to understand how we got from point A to point Z and point A is 1776 and Z is Iraq, indulging your prejudices is not very helpful," Oren told NEWSWEEK. "It's something I struggle with. I weigh every word." Indeed, for all his emphasis on showing strength in the Middle East, Oren publicly opposed the American invasion of Iraq, arguing the United States could never be, and probably should never be, ruthless enough to suppress rebellion there. And for all his emphasis on the spiritual virtues of the United States, he sees calls for U.S.-style democracy in the Arab world as naive. Its culture is not, he says, a tarnished mirror image of America waiting to be polished into a replica of America.

DOJ_NMG_0130417

What is it, then? What did the Arabs themselves think through this long chronicle of disillusionments and disasters? Oren says "that book is yet to be written." For now "Power, Faith and Fantasy" is the best history we have of the history we've had, and an indispensable guide from point A to point Z.

Gates Brushes Aside Putin's Anti-US Tirade (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo And Stephen Fidle

Financial Times, February 12, 2007

Robert Gates, the US defence secretary, on Sunday brushed aside a blistering attack on US foreign policy by Vladimir Putin, the Russian president, saying that "one cold war was quite enough".

Mr Putin lambasted US foreign policy in a theatrical display at a high-profile Munich security conference on Saturday, saying "illegal" unilateral military action had plunged the world into an "abyss of permanent conflicts".

In his first major international speech since succeeding Donald Rumsfeld in December, Mr Gates avoided upping the ante with the former KGB officer by laughing off his polemic.

"As an old cold warrior, one of yesterday's speeches almost filled me with nostalgia for a less complex time," said Mr Gates. "Almost."

The former head of the Central Intelligence Agency continued: "I guess, old spies have a habit of blunt speaking. However, I have been to re-education camp, spending four and-[a]-half years as a university president and dealing with faculty. And, as more than a few university presidents have learned in recent years, when it comes to faculty it is either 'be nice' or 'be gone'."

Mr Gates, who said he had accepted an offer from Mr Putin to visit Russia, dismissed suggestions of a new cold war. But he did register US displeasure with Russian foreign policy, including its use of energy resources for "political coercion".

Mr Putin had also accused Washington of sparking a new arms race with its missile defence system, and criticised the expansion of Nato to include former members of the Soviet Union.

Mr Putin's speech at the normally august conference drew surprise and criticism. Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, Nato's secretary-general, expressed disappointment that the Russian president had made such a "remarkable" speech at such a venue.

US senator Lindsey Graham half-joked that Mr Putin had done "more in a single speech to unite Europe and America than anything we could have done in a decade", while Senator John McCain said the speech included the "most aggressive remarks by a Russian leader since the end of the cold war".

But Karel Schwarzenberg, the Czech Republic foreign minister, drew loud applause – and a smile on the face of Russian defence minister Sergei Ivanov – by thanking Mr Putin for bringing attention to the normally sleepier conference. In a more serious vein, however, he said the Russian president had "clearly and convincingly" shown why Nato should be enlarged.

Mr Ivanov agreed on Sunday that a new cold war was not imminent. He said Russia was spending just 2.6 per cent of GDP on defence. "We are not spending on defence what the Soviet Union did – which was 30 per cent. Three per cent: feel the difference," he said.

Speaking to an audience that included defence ministers from many Nato countries, Mr Gates also stressed the importance of resolve in Afghanistan, saying the alliance needed to ensure the "offensive in Afghanistan this spring will be our offensive".

In comments intended to up the pressure on European allies, Mr Gates said it would be a "mark of shame" if Nato let its successes in Afghanistan "slip away through neglect of lack of political will or resolve".

Responding to Kenneth Roth, the director of Human Rights Watch, Mr Gates conceded that the US detention facility at Guantanamo Bay and prisoner abuses in Iraq had damaged the reputation of the US. He added that the military tribunals to try the prisoners would be "transparent", with full media access.

Gates Counters Putin's Words On U.S. Power (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

New York Times, February 12, 2007

MUNICH, Feb. 11 — Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, disputing a lengthy critique of American power by President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia on Saturday, said Sunday at a European security conference here, "One cold war was quite enough."

Government leaders, legislators and military officials here continued speculating on Mr. Putin's motivation for delivering his long list of complaints about American domination of global affairs, but Mr. Gates chose words of velvet, not steel, in offering Washington's fullest response. As Mr. Putin had, he invoked the cold war more than once.

"As an old cold warrior, one of yesterday's speeches almost filled me with nostalgia for a less complex time," he said. "Almost."

DOJ_NMG_0130418

Mr. Gates, a former director of the Central Intelligence Agency called back to government service from academia to become defense secretary, told attendees of the 43rd Munich Conference on Security Policy that both he and Mr. Putin had spent most of their careers in their governments' spy agencies.

"And, I guess, old spies have a habit of blunt speaking," Mr. Gates said. "However, I have been to re-education camp — spending four and half years as a university president and dealing with faculty." His remark drew laughs and applause.

His sharpest response to Mr. Putin was gently couched. "Russia is a partner in endeavors," Mr. Gates said. "But we wonder, too, about some Russian policies that seem to work against international stability, such as its arms transfers and its temptation to use energy resources for political coercion."

Throughout the rebuttal, and in a longer discourse on how America's European allies must help rebuild Afghanistan and remain engaged in the fight against terrorism, Mr. Gates mentioned Mr. Putin only once by name. That came when he said he had accepted an invitation from Mr. Putin to visit Moscow.

On Saturday, Russia's defense minister, Sergei B. Ivanov, a Putin confidant, denied that Mr. Putin's speech had been confrontational. "We are not interested in imposing our opinion on anybody," Mr. Ivanov said. But he cautioned that his government would not support international actions taken without consultation with Russia, nor those taken without its consent, and certainly none that are "imposed on Russia."

The speech by Mr. Gates was delivered under the long shadow of his predecessor, Donald H. Rumsfeld, who both charmed and offended European audiences during his tenure as defense secretary, which included several speeches to this conference.

Mr. Gates cast himself as a geopolitical realist and drew a knowing laugh when he focused on Mr. Putin's assertion that the United States and its allies were dividing Europe.

"All of these characterizations belong in the past," Mr. Gates said. "The free world versus those behind the Iron Curtain. North versus South. East versus West, and I am told that some have even spoken in terms of 'Old Europe' versus 'new.' "

The last was a reference to a characterization Mr. Rumsfeld made in January 2003 to contrast Germany and France, which objected to the United States plan to invade Iraq, with neighboring supporters, not all of which are NATO members.

Reviewing NATO's success in standing up to the Soviet threat, "it seems clear that totalitarianism was defeated as much by ideas the West championed then and now as by ICBMs, tanks and warships that the West deployed," Mr. Gates said. The alliance's most effective weapon, he said, was a "shared belief in political and economic freedom, religious toleration, human rights, representative government and the rule of law."

"These values kept our side united, and inspired those on the other side," he added.

Shifting to current threats and challenges, he called on NATO members to support a comprehensive strategy to stabilize Afghanistan, "combining a muscular military effort with effective support for governance, economic development and counternarcotics."

He also urged NATO allies to increase their military spending to meet the benchmark of 2 percent of gross domestic product set by the alliance; only 6 of NATO's 26 members fulfill that standard.

Mr. Gates briefly turned to the war in Iraq, to echo President Bush's insistence that the United States and its partners there must prevail. If chaos tears Iraq apart, Mr. Gates warned, "every member of this alliance will feel the consequences" of regional turmoil and terrorism.

He acknowledged the damage done to America's global standing by its conduct in the campaign against terrorism, particularly in holding detainees without due process at the United States naval base in Cuba.

"There is no question in my mind that Guantánamo and some of the abuses that have taken place in Iraq have negatively impacted the reputation of the United States," Mr. Gates said. "It is also true, though, that there are real terrorists at Guantánamo."

Repeating comments from a number of American officials, Mr. Gates said most members of the Bush administration would like to close the detention center, and he pledged that tribunals for detainees would be conducted in a legitimate and transparent manner.

Gates To Putin: 'One Cold War Is Enough' (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, February 12, 2007

Pentagon chief Robert Gates responded Sunday to Vladimir Putin's assault on U.S. foreign policy by saying "one Cold War is enough" and that he would go to Moscow to try to reduce tensions. Gates also sought more allied help in Afghanistan.

He delivered his first speech as Pentagon chief at a security conference in Germany and then flew to Pakistan to discuss fears of a renewed spring offensive by Taliban fighters in neighboring Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0130419

Pakistan, a close U.S. ally in the fight against terrorism, has faced charges that the Taliban militia stage attacks from Pakistan against Afghan government troops and NATO- and U.S.-led coalition troops.

Gates' rebuke of the Russian president relied on humor and some pointed jabs.

"As an old Cold Warrior, one of yesterday's speeches almost filled me with nostalgia for a less complex time. Almost," Gates said. Then, as the audience chuckled, the defense secretary said he has accepted Putin's invitation to visit Russia.

"We all face many common problems and challenges that must be addressed in partnership with other countries, including Russia," said Gates. "One Cold War was quite enough."

In his speech Saturday, Putin blamed U.S. foreign policy for inciting other countries to seek nuclear weapons to defend themselves from an "almost uncontained use of military force."

The Russian leader said "unilateral, illegitimate actions have not solved a single problem, they have become a hotbed of further conflicts" and that "one state, the United States, has overstepped its national borders in every way."

Gates also made an urgent call for NATO allies to live up to their promises to supply military and economic aid for Afghanistan.

"It is vitally important that the success Afghanistan has achieved not be allowed to slip away through neglect or lack of political will or resolve," Gates said. Failure to muster a strong military effort combined with economic development and a counternarcotics plan "would be a mark of shame," he said.

Gates also said that prisoner abuse scandals in Iraq and Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and other mistakes have damaged America's reputation. It will take work, he said, to prove that the U.S. still is a force for good in the world.

While he did not mention the war in Iraq, Gates told officials at the security conference that Washington must do a better job of explaining its policies and actions.

For the past century, he said, most people believed that "while we might from time to time do something stupid, that we were a force for good in the world."

Many continue to believe that, Gates said. But, he added, "I think we also have made some mistakes and have not presented our case as well as we might in many instances. I think we have to work on that."

The bulk of his speech was devoted to the future of the NATO alliance and the need to work together to defend against threats.

Gates also sketched out the challenges ahead, from Iran's nuclear ambitions and the situation in the Middle East to China's recent anti-satellite tests and Russia's arms sales.

Just eight weeks on the job, Gates used the conference and a NATO gathering this past week to debut on the international stage and meet privately with some of his counterparts.

In other comments, he said the Bush administration would like to close the Guantanamo Bay detention facility, but there are some terrorists there who should never be let free. Gates also said detainee trials there will be conducted in the open and with adequate defense for the prisoners.

The first public test of Gates' diplomatic skills came at a venue that at times was dominated by his more bombastic Pentagon predecessor, Donald H. Rumsfeld.

So as Gates neared the end of his remarks, he made a deliberate move to separate himself from Rumsfeld.

In the run-up to the Iraq war, Rumsfeld sharply criticized nations opposed to the conflict — specifically France and Germany — and referred to them as part of "Old Europe."

Without mentioning Rumsfeld's name, Gates said some people have tried to divide the allies along lines such as East and West, North and South.

"I'm even told that some have even spoken in terms of 'old' Europe versus 'new,'" Gates said. "All of these characterizations belong in the past."

In Pakistan, Gates planned talks with the president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf and other top officials on cooperation in counterterrorism and efforts by Pakistan to stop militants from moving across the border with Afghanistan, a senior Pakistani government official said Sunday. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because he did not have the authority to speak formally about Gates' visit.

Pakistan denies the charges that the Taliban are staging attacks from inside Pakistan and says it has deployed some 80,000 troops along its rugged border with Afghanistan to track down militants.

Pakistan's border regions along Afghanistan long have been suspected to be the hiding places for al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden and his deputy, Ayman al-Zawahri.

American forces in eastern Afghanistan have launched artillery rounds into Pakistan to strike Taliban fighters who attack remote U.S. outposts, the commander of U.S. forces in the region told The Associated Press on Sunday.

DOJ_NMG_0130420

Musharraf acknowledged recently that his outgunned Pakistani frontier guards have allowed insurgents to cross the border and said the army soon would fence parts of the border to stem the problem.

The Pentagon has plans to extend its recent buildup of several thousand combat troops in Afghanistan, initially announced as lasting until late spring, well into next year, a senior U.S. military official said last week.

That move would keep U.S. troop levels at between 26,000 and 27,000 until at least the spring of 2008.

Russia Intensifies Efforts To Rebuild Its Military Machine (CSM)

By Fred Weir

The Christian Science Monitor, February 12, 2007

MOSCOW

At a major security conference this past weekend, Russian President Vladimir Putin blasted the US for its militaristic approach to foreign policy, saying its actions were "nourishing an arms race."

But little noticed amid the sharp US and European response to Mr. Putin's comments is Russia's burgeoning military-industrial complex, generally thought to have collapsed with the Soviet Union.

The cold war days when the USSR matched the US missile-for-missile may be gone. But experts say that Russia is increasingly capable of turning out cutting-edge weaponry and selling it to countries that are shunned by Western suppliers.

"The fact that our country is playing a leading role in the world in the sphere of export of military production is a sign that the Russian defense industry has not only survived but has a powerful potential for further development," Sergei Chemezov, the head of the state arms-export monopoly Rosoboronexport, told a political meeting late last year.

Russian defense budgets have been soaring since Putin came to power, buoyed by a rising tide of petroleum income, and are set to jump by 23 percent in 2007 to a post-Soviet high of $32.4 billion. Moscow does arms business with over 70 countries, including China, Iran, and Venezuela, and in 2006 exported $6 billion worth of arms.

"Under Putin there has been a wish and an attempt to go beyond the Soviet inheritance," in developing high-tech military capabilities, says Ivan Saffranchuk, Moscow director of the independent World Security Institute. "Now there's cash, and a good political situation, to intensify that effort."

Missiles for Iran

· Last week Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov unveiled a $189 billion rearmament program that will replace about half of Russia's current military equipment by 2015. Among the armed forces' acquisitions will be a completely revamped early-warning radar network, new intercontinental missiles, a fleet of supersonic Tu-160 strategic bombers, and 31 new warships, including aircraft carriers.

· Last month Mr. Putin offered to partner with India to build a futuristic "fifth generation" fighter plane, which Russian designers is already under development and could be flying as early as 2009. Only the US has so far managed to field one of these new era combat jets – which have breakthrough capabilities of stealthiness, supersonic cruising, ultramaneuverability and over-the-horizon electronic visibility. And at $260 million per model, the new F/A-22 Raptor is by far the world's most expensive warplane.

· Russia is already supplying India with the Sukhoi-30MKI, an advanced "fourth generation" warplane that consistently defeats its Western counterparts, such as the frontline US fighters, the F-15C and F-16. Versions of the Su-30 are also being sold to China, Venezuela, and Malaysia.

· At a recent press conference, Putin said that Russia has nothing to fear from US missile defense systems because the new Topol-M intercontinental ballistic missile has stealth characteristics that enable it to penetrate the American shield. "But this is not all," he added, mentioning a "new generation ... of strategic weapons systems," against which missile defense systems would be "powerless."

· In January, Moscow announced it had completed deliveries of 29 sophisticated Tor-M1 mobile antiaircraft batteries to Iran, and Mr. Ivanov hinted that Russia might also supply S-300 long-range air defense weapons. Experts believe that the Tor-M1, which can track 48 targets simultaneously, could seriously complicate any potential air strike on Iran's nuclear facilities.

"The Tor, in combination with the S-300, would provide a large envelope of protection to the Iranian nuclear complex," says Ariel Cohen, an analyst with the conservative Heritage Foundation in Washington.

· According to Russian media reports, last year Israel complained to Moscow over Hizbullah's use of Russian-made antitank missiles, which inflicted serious casualties and inhibited Israel's armored mobility, during last summer's war in Lebanon. The Israeli media pointed to the Kornet-E, a new laser-guided rocket that can punch through meter-thick armor at a range of five kilometers, which Russia has officially provided to Syria. Russia denied that the weapons might have been diverted to Hizbullah, however.

Key supplier for 'rogue regimes'

DOJ_NMG_0130421

The former USSR maintained a sprawling military-industrial complex that absorbed as much as a third of the country's GDP. With the demise of the Soviet Union, defense budgets imploded, the Russian armed forces virtually halted procurement of new weapons, thousands of factories went bankrupt, and skilled workers migrated en masse to other jobs.

Though capital is now flowing back into the defense sector, experts doubt that the Putin-era increases are enough to restore the vast web of specialized industries that kept the Soviet military machine supplied with everything from bullets to antisatellite missiles.

"There have been dramatic increases in procurement funds, but this is not being used efficiently," says Alexander Golts, a military expert with the online newspaper Yezhednevny Zhurnal. "I am dubious about Russia's ability to produce weapons of a truly new generation."

Most Russian arms exports during the 1990s involved sell-offs of Soviet-era stockpiles, including small arms, armored vehicles, and older aircraft. Those fueled vicious wars in Africa and the former Yugoslavia, but did not worry the West much. But Putin-era sales have shifted increasingly to sophisticated weapons, including warplanes, precision-guided munitions, and advanced air-defense systems.

"The US still has a solid lead in the top end of weaponry," says Mr. Cohen. "But at the next level Russia is advancing fast. Geopolitically, it is cornering the market for rogue regimes, such as Iran and Venezuela, and this is most worrisome."

Overhaul needed

Experts say that about 1,550 Russian firms are now involved in arms production, and they have proven adept at modernizing Soviet designs. For example, the Su-30, which accounted for almost half of all Russia's arms-export earnings in 2005, is a development of the USSR's Su-27 frontline combat jet.

But fresh products, such as Sukhoi's new T-50 "fifth-generation" fighter, could give the industry a needed boost.

"The situation in our military-industrial complex is improving, and this [fifth- generation] project will change our position radically," says Konstantin Makiyenko, deputy director of the independent Center of Analysis of Strategies and Technologies in Moscow. "If India agrees to participate, the [financing] will be better. It could give a big boost to many branches of our military industry."

Still, some experts say that sweeping reforms and more state funding are needed before Russia's arms industry can resupply a flagging military machine with cutting-edge weapons, much less compete globally with Western arms merchants.

"We need a completely new military industry, not just remnants of the old one," says Vitaly Shlykov, a former Soviet war planning official and member of the Russian Defense Ministry's public advisory council. "And these new defense industries will need a lot of attention, and an influx of resources on the level that today is only going into the oil and gas industry."

Putin Seeks Expanded Ties With Saudis On Arab Tour (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates, Feb. 11 — President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia arrived Sunday night in Riyadh, the Saudi capital, for a visit intended to expand trade and military links between the nations, among the world's largest oil producers.

The overnight visit was part of a three-day tour of the Middle East intended to bolster bilateral ties with major Arab countries.

Mr. Putin and King Abdullah, the Saudi leader, were expected to discuss Iran's nuclear program, the war in Iraq and the Arab-Israeli conflict, in addition to the simmering Lebanese political crisis, officials said. In an interview with the Russian news agency ITAR-Tass, King Abdullah emphasized that he also hoped the two nations could expand cooperation on investment, air transportation and customs conventions as well as scientific and educational exchanges.

Mr. Putin was greeted at the airport by King Abdullah; Crown Prince Sultan; Prince Saud al-Faisal, the foreign minister; and other Saudi officials, the official Saudi press agency reported. The Russian president, who was accompanied by a trade delegation and various officials, attended a state dinner later in the evening and was to sign trade agreements with Abdullah and other Saudi officials, ITAR-Tass reported.

He was expected to meet Monday with Saudi businessmen and to visit the Saudi National Museum in Riyadh before traveling to Qatar and Jordan.

Russia has sought to bolster its military and trade relations with countries in the Middle East and is hoping to win a major order from Saudi Arabia for Russian weapons. Russia and Saudi Arabia had no diplomatic relations for more than 50 years until they were restored after Iraq's invasion of Kuwait in August 1990. In September 2003, Abdullah, then the crown prince, traveled to Moscow, warming relations further between the countries.

DOJ_NMG_0130422

In a speech on Saturday at a NATO security conference in Munich, Mr. Putin accused the United States of provoking a new nuclear arms race by developing ballistic missile defenses, undermining international institutions and making the Middle East more unstable through its clumsy handling of the war in Iraq.

Mr. Putin recited a list of complaints about American domination of global affairs, including many of the themes that have strained relations between the Kremlin and the United States during his seven-year administration.

The comments were the sternest yet from Mr. Putin, who has long bristled over criticism from the United States and its European allies as he and other former Soviet intelligence officials have consolidated their hold on Russia's government, energy reserves and arms-manufacturing and trading complexes.

Russian Official Says Insurgency In Chechnya Has Been Tamed (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

MOSCOW, Feb. 11 — Russia's defense minister said Sunday that Russia had succeeded in its latest war in Chechnya, defeating separatists and what he called their "emissaries from 50 states."

"We have scored a success in Chechnya," said the defense minister, Sergei B. Ivanov. "The problem has been solved."

Mr. Ivanov, speaking before an international audience of defense officials and diplomats at the Munich Conference on Security Policy, underscored the Kremlin's confidence that the second war in Chechnya since the dissolution of the Soviet Union had largely ended, and that the separatists' ranks had been shrunk by military operations and offers of amnesty.

The second Chechnya war began late in 1999. There has been a sharp turn in Russia's favor since late 2004, and the insurgents have not conducted a large-scale guerrilla operation since 2005 or a major terrorist attack since the seizure of a public school in the autumn of 2004.

The military situation in Chechnya contrasts sharply with that of the United States in Afghanistan and Iraq, where American forces are struggling against growing insurgencies.

Attacks still occur in and near Chechnya, and an insurgency persists, mixing militant Islam, separatism and local vengeance codes.

But the pace of fighting is much slower than it was two years ago, and many of the insurgency's principal leaders — including Shamil Basayev, the terrorist leader — have been killed since 2005.

The turnaround has defied predictions from many analysts and critics of Russia, who believed that its army was hopelessly bogged down and that its rough and often indiscriminate tactics were creating more insurgents than were killed.

Russia has also found strong indigenous forces to serve as local proxies to do much of the continued fighting. These military allies, criticized by human rights organizations as corrupt and ruthlessly brutal, are now largely in control of the region's government.

Mr. Ivanov drew a distinction between Chechnya and the wars that the United States is fighting. He noted, for example, that Chechnya "is a small territory compared to Afghanistan or Iraq."

Mr. Ivanov is viewed as a possible successor to President Vladimir V. Putin, whose second term ends next year.

Kasparov's Gambit (WP)

By Fred Hiatt

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

If any ordinary person predicted trouble ahead for the cocky and seemingly untouchable KGB-regime of Russian President Vladimir Putin, you might say he ought to have his head examined.

But if the head happened to contain one of the most formidable brains of our era, you might at least listen to the argument. Garry Kasparov, legendary world chess champion and now a leader of Russia's political dissidents, possesses such a brain. And having peered two or three or 10 moves into the future, Kasparov says that Putin's petro-Kremlin autocracy may be more brittle than it seems as it approaches a promised presidential succession next year.

Putin, who traveled to Munich this weekend to alternately bash and condescend to the West, certainly doesn't seem to worry, and why should he? German prime ministers jump onto his payroll as they leave office. Foreign oil executives thank him obsequiously as he pockets their fields. Political opponents abroad turn up poisoned, neighboring countries are bullied, and Putin pays no price. He sells weapons to Iran, and U.S. officials are grateful that he's not doing worse.

At home, meanwhile, he has systematically neutered anyone and anything that might challenge him: the press, big business, parliament, political parties, governors, mayors, civic organizations. Kasparov, who has helped gather the remnants of opposition from across the ideological spectrum into an umbrella group called Other Russia, admits it's an uneven match.

DOJ_NMG_0130423

The regime raided Other Russia's office in December and confiscated all the books and documents it could find. When the group tried to stage a rally, 600 people were detained on their way to Moscow, and the few thousand demonstrators who made it were surrounded by police in far greater numbers. Noting how stolen elections became the focus for popular uprisings in Ukraine and elsewhere, Putin changed election law to make it almost impossible for an opposition candidate to qualify for a spot on the ballot.

"If we have to evaluate our chances today -- slim to none," Kasparov says, noting how the absence of political space constricts any strategizing. "If you're at risk of being mated in one or two, you can't think about pawn structure for the long term."

And yet Kasparov -- fast-talking, exuberant, indignant one moment and laughing sardonically the next -- clearly relishes the fight. He was, after all, the youngest world champion ever, who famously took on the darling of the Soviet chess establishment and prevailed, and then took on the world chess establishment, and then IBM's Deep Blue -- and remained, through ups and downs, the world's No. 1-ranked player for longer than anyone else in history.

"He may not be a politician," says a senior U.S. official who knows him, "but he's proved to be a masterful dissident opposition organizer, and unfortunately that's what Russia needs right now." Kasparov, 43, has "passion, toughness, fearlessness and a good organizational head, both operational and conceptual."

And Kasparov believes that not all the challenges are on the opposition's side. As Putin contemplates retirement, he needs a successor strong enough to preserve the regime but not so strong as to challenge whatever wealth or power Putin intends to take with him, Kasparov says.

Beneath Putin a half-dozen would-be heirs battle each other in a "lawless jungle," and "they know that the winner in the battle will eat the others alive." Many Russians feel left out of the oil boom that has brought skyscrapers and Ferraris to Moscow. And the regime's repression of Other Russia reflects an anxiety unsurprising in rulers who have stifled most channels of free expression and complaint.

"If we succeed in uniting behind a candidate and that candidate is not registered, it could lead people to rally," Kasparov says. "And 50,000 might be enough for the regime to collapse because of its paranoia."

Ultimately the regime's vulnerability lies in its basic nature, Kasparov suggests. In the system Putin has created, Kasparov sees elements of feudalism ("local bosses loyal to the top man in exchange for rights to loot the region"), Mussolini-style corporate fascism and old-style KGB brutality. But in the end, "this is not the geopolitical monster of Soviet times. This is all about money. The government is business. It's about Gazprom, it's about Rosneft."

Coincidentally, when I asked Turkey's visiting foreign minister last week about energy politics and relations with Russia, he said, "Putin himself is an expert in this. He studied very well. He is like the CEO of an energy company."

"Putin leads a ruling elite that has very different dreams than in Soviet times," Kasparov says. "They're all thinking about their great life in the Cote d'Azur."

How they may behave if they see their faction losing out, and their wealth in danger, is not easy to predict. Which is, in the end, as far out on a limb as the chess master will climb: "You can probably count on an interesting year ahead of us," he says. Then he prepares to fly home and make it more so.

fredhiatt@washpost.com

Olmert Withholds Judgment On Pact (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, February 12, 2007

JERUSALEM -- Israel wouldn't automatically reject the Palestinian unity government accord between Hamas and Fatah, even though it doesn't contain recognition of the Jewish state, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said yesterday.

"Israel neither rejects nor accepts the agreements at this stage," Mr. Olmert said at a weekly Cabinet meeting. "Like the international community, we're studying what was achieved and what was said."

By withholding judgment on the agreement reached last week in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, analysts said, Israel is being careful not to rupture ties with Palestinian moderates such as President Mahmoud Abbas just a week before Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice arrives in the region for a three-way summit with Mr. Olmert and Mr. Abbas.

The Mecca accord has already breached a previously united front among the Quartet of peace-process sponsors -- the United States, United Nations, European Union and Russia -- to boycott a Palestinian government that refuses to recognize Israel, previous peace agreements or renounce violence.

Worried that sponsors of the peace process might follow the lead of Russia and endorse the agreement, Israel also doesn't want to risk staking out a position that will be blatantly at odds with the international community.

"Some of the leaders around the world are saying, 'Hold on, and wait and see what government is formed,' " said Gershon Baskin, the head of the Israel/Palestine Center for Research and Information.

DOJ_NMG_0130424

"Secretary of State Rice is very serious about making progress in the trilateral talks, and closing the door on it would look bad," he said.

Although the Palestinians have not said who will fill the top Cabinet posts, there is wide speculation that the new finance minister will be Salam Fayyad and that the deputy prime minister could be Mohammed Dahlan -- two figures with strong ties to the United States and its allies.

Israeli newspapers, meanwhile, have quoted anonymous sources in the Israeli defense establishment suggesting the Mecca accord will boost chances for a prisoner exchange that would free Cpl. Gilad Shalit after more than a half year in captivity in the Gaza Strip.

An agreement that puts to an end the escalating violence in Gaza between the military wings of Hamas and Fatah is in Israel's interest, wrote veteran military commentator Ron Ben Yishai.

"Armed chaos allows Iran, Hezbollah and al Qaeda to penetrate the territories and boost their influence," he wrote on the Ynet Web site.

Also yesterday, Israel's Cabinet gave a green light for renovation work on a bridge leading to the Temple Mount in Jerusalem's Old City. The construction and an archeological dig sparked a week of Palestinian demonstrations that culminated Friday in the worst riots on the Temple Mount -- known to Muslims as the Noble Sanctuary -- in years.

Islamic authorities have claimed that Israeli archeological excavations near the base of the Western Wall threaten the foundations under the Al Aqsa Mosque and have sounded the alarm abroad. Israel's Islamic Movement has appealed to the United Nations to intervene and stop the work.

Defiant at the Cabinet meeting, Mr. Olmert insisted that Israel would not allow the Palestinians to dictate what type of renovation work was permissible in the Old City.

Arabs Try Outreach To Israel, U.S. Jews (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, February 12, 2007

WASHINGTON — Arab states, led by Saudi Arabia, are making some of their most public overtures ever to Israel and American Jews in an effort to undercut Iran's growing influence, contain violence in Iraq and Lebanon and push for a Palestinian solution.

The high-profile gestures coincide with Saudi Arabia's lead role last week in brokering a deal for a coalition Palestinian government.

Last month, Prince Turki al-Faisal, Saudi Arabia's departing ambassador to the United States, attended a Washington reception sponsored by American Jewish organizations. The event honored a State Department diplomat appointed to combat anti-Semitism.

The appearance of a Saudi diplomat is "unprecedented," said William Daroff, Washington office director for the United Jewish Communities, which organized the reception.

Saudi Arabia, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates have stepped up contacts with Israel and pro-Israel Jewish groups in the USA. The outreach has the Bush administration's blessing: Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has said six Gulf states and Egypt, Jordan and Israel are a new alignment of moderates to oppose extremists backed by Iran and Syria. She has said an Israeli-Palestinian peace deal would weaken militants such as Hamas and Hezbollah.

Contacts have intensified as part of a strategy meant to undercut extremists and build momentum for a peace deal between Israelis and Palestinians, said Jamal Kashoggi, an aide to Saudi Prince Turki.

Judith Kipper, a Middle East expert at the Council on Foreign Relations, said, "What really concerns pro-U.S. Arab states is that Iran is setting the political agenda in the region."

Saudi and Gulf Arab contacts with Israelis and American Jews go back more than a decade but have never been so public. Arab countries have treated Israel as a pariah since it gained independence in 1948. Most Arab countries ban travel to Israel, investment there and other commercial ties with the Jewish state and routinely refer to it as the "Zionist entity."

Only three of 21 Arab nations recognize Israel: Egypt, Jordan and Mauritania. A 2002 peace plan put forward by Saudi Arabia offers diplomatic relations with the other 18 Arab states if Israel withdraws to the borders it had in 1967 — meaning giving up the West Bank and the Golan Heights — and cedes land for a new Palestinian state.

Among the other recent Arab-Jewish contacts:

·Saudi national security adviser Bandar bin Sultan met privately with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert in Jordan in September, said Daniel Ayalon, Israel's former ambassador to Washington. He said it was the highest-level Saudi-Israeli meeting he'd ever heard of.

DOJ_NMG_0130425

·The United Arab Emirates has invited a delegation from the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations. The conference, a 51-member umbrella group, is a strong supporter of Israel.

·Israeli Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres met the emir of Qatar in late January after taking part in a debate with Arab students there. It was the highest-level Israeli meeting with the Gulf nation since 1996, when Peres visited as prime minister.

Fallon To Recruit Arab Nations For Help (WT)

By Richard Halloran

The Washington Times, February 12, 2007

HONOLULU -- The new commander of U.S. military forces in the Middle East, Adm. William Fallon, says he will set a high priority on enlisting the help of friendly Arab and Asian nations in the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, and against the al Qaeda terrorist network led by Osama bin Laden.

"There are a lot of people out there just standing around not doing anything to help us," Adm. Fallon said late Saturday in his first newspaper interview since he was named last month to succeed Army Gen. John Abizaid as commander of the world's most sensitive region. "We need to turn that around. The neighboring nations there have to play a role."

The admiral, who will have authority over all U.S. forces in the region, including those led by the new commander of U.S. ground forces in Iraq, Gen. David Petraeus, did not name specific Arab nations to which he would look for support.

But Egypt -- a leader in the Arab world that gets $2.5 billion a year in military assistance from the United States -- and Saudi Arabia, which has long been a target for al Qaeda terrorists, seemed likely candidates.

Adm. Fallon spoke by telephone from his airplane as he returned to his Pacific Command headquarters here from Washington, where he was unanimously confirmed to his new post in a Senate vote on Thursday.

Drawing on his experience over the past two years as head of the Pacific Command, Adm. Fallon said he would also seek support from Indonesia, the world's most populous Muslim nation, and Malaysia, in which Islam is the dominant religion. He visited both countries a year ago to meet their senior political and military leaders.

Adm. Fallon also said he might look for help from India, which has a large Muslim minority. Adm. Fallon noted that the United States had been helped in Iraq and Afghanistan by Japan, Australia, South Korea and New Zealand. "I'm interested in seeing how we can leverage this into more support," he said.

The admiral has spent much of his watch at Pacific Command on political military matters, traveling to about 25 nations to talk with everyone from the heads of government to horse breeders on the Mongolian steppes and sailors in the remote Indonesian port of Manado.

In his new assignment, Adm. Fallon said, "I expect to be doing the same thing and even more because of the urgency of the situation. I expect to be meeting a lot of leaders who could be playing a role in the Middle East."

As Pacific commander, Adm. Fallon nurtured a gradual expansion of military exchanges with China that were intended to assure the Chinese that the United States is not planning to attack them while warning them not to underestimate U.S. military power.

He is the first naval officer to head Central Command, which has its headquarters at MacDill Air Force Base in Tampa, Fla., taking up the post while the command is engaged in major ground combat operations in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Adm. Fallon replaces Gen. Abizaid, who in turn took over from Gen. Tommy Franks in July 2003, both career Army officers. The admiral indicated in the interview that he would leave most of the ground warfare task in Iraq to Gen. Petraeus.

Adm. Fallon said Gen. Petraeus, with whom he has not served before, "has a great reputation as a skilled combat commander."

"I'm going to do whatever I can to support him," Adm. Fallon said. "I'll be working the region where there's plenty of work to do."

Outside of the ground war, he pointed to similarities in some of the issues facing the Pacific and Central commands. Iran threatens to acquire nuclear weapons much as North Korea has already done. Vital shipping, especially of crude oil, passes through the Straits of Hormuz at the mouth of the Persian Gulf, just as it passes through the Straits of Malacca and the South China Sea in Southeast Asia.

Piracy off the coast of Somalia resembles that near Indonesia, although Indonesian, Singaporean and Malaysian anti-piracy operations have reduced that threat in the South China Sea. Insurgencies in Iraq and Afghanistan have their counterparts in the Philippines and southern Thailand.

Adm. Fallon said some of the lessons learned in the Pacific Command would be pertinent to his duties in the Central Command.

"These nations have a slew of problems," he said. "There are not so many nations as in Pacific Command but they have more problems and problems that are more difficult to deal with."

DOJ_NMG_0130426

He pointed to Lebanon, which was in what he called "complete chaos" only a short time ago. He also mentioned massive unrest and death in Sudan, the lack of security in the Horn of Africa, failed or dysfunctional states and unnamed nations "that have lost confidence in us."

To prepare for his new command, Adm. Fallon has been, to use a favorite phase, "sponging up information." He said he was "deep into immersion" with an extensive reading list, mostly historical texts, to acquire a background on the Middle East, where he has limited experience.

The admiral said that in recent weeks he has spoken with everyone from President Bush on down, including current and former leaders of the State Department, the Agency for International Development and the Defense Department. He has met as many ambassadors and military attaches as possible from the embassies of Middle East nations in Washington, plus retired American diplomats who have served in the region.

He has been deluged with briefing papers, scholarly essays and news articles. Adm. Fallon, who has a reputation as a quick study, said, "I have been trying to get as many different opinions as I can so that nothing falls out of sight." He has particularly studied counterinsurgency, which is the main thrust of the new U.S. strategy in Iraq.

"With all these papers flying around," Adm. Fallon said, "it's been like a blizzard driving in from Lake Ontario."

Sunni Arab States Fortify Against Iran (WT)

By Gethin Chamberlain

The Washington Times, February 12, 2007

Leaders of Sunni Arab states are embarking on a military spending spree in an attempt to contain the growing threat from Iran.

Alarmed by the progress of Iran's nuclear program and the prospect of a military clash between its Shi'ite regime and the United States, Persian Gulf leaders intend to use billions of dollars of oil revenue to purchase a huge array of military hardware.

Many of the deals will be finalized at a massive arms fair scheduled to open in the United Arab Emirates on Sunday.

Saudi Arabia alone has a shopping list that runs to nearly $50 billion, including fighter aircraft, cruise missiles, attack helicopters and more than 300 new tanks.

The UAE has earmarked $2 billion for a rapid-reaction brigade -- possibly to take a lead role in a regional protection force. An additional $6 billion will go for missile-defense batteries, airborne early-warning systems and aircraft.

Both countries are members of the Gulf Cooperation Council, established in 1981 to provide security against the threat posed by Iran. Other members, including Kuwait, Bahrain and Qatar, are expected to spend heavily in the coming months.

Gulf leaders have watched with growing alarm as Iran's Shi'ite theocracy has flexed its military muscles -- filling the postwar power vacuum in Iraq, exerting influence in the Palestinian territories and Lebanon, and refusing to back down over its nuclear program.

Many are now convinced that the only way to avoid being sucked into a war between the United States and Iran, or being caught up in the turbulence that would follow, is to beef up their own defenses.

Last week, Iran carried out exercises in the Gulf, including test-firing its new Russian defense-missile system, and warned that any attempts to halt its nuclear program would result in attacks on U.S. interests around the world.

In a speech yesterday marking the 28th anniversary of the country's Islamic revolution, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad again insisted that Iran would not give up its uranium-enrichment program, which is regarded by the U.S. and its allies as the precursor to a nuclear weapon.

U.S. plans for a possible attack on Iran's nuclear sites are reported to be well-advanced, despite public denials, and many in the Gulf states fear that they could be caught in the backlash.

One highly placed Saudi diplomatic source told the Sunday Telegraph that there were concerns about U.S. intentions and doubts about the real threat from Iran.

"There are some people who are wary about Iran, but the Americans are running a very successful public relations campaign against Tehran. A lot of Saudis fear that the U.S. will come and make mischief then go away, but we have to live here afterwards."

Some analysts argue that many Gulf states would prefer to be able to adopt a position of well-armed neutrality.

"They are genuinely concerned about Iran because not only are the Iranians not Arabs, they are Shias. For the Saudis in particular, they are sworn enemies. But they share a common enemy with Iran -- the West and its way of life. They don't really want to depend on the Americans," said military analyst Paul Beaver.

With oil pushing $60 a barrel, the spending power of the Sunni states has been boosted, with the UAE government alone looking at a windfall of more than $100 billion if prices stay at present levels for the next two to three years. Up to 20 percent of that extra revenue may be devoted to defense modernization.

DOJ_NMG_0130427

Tim Ripley, the Middle East analyst with Jane's Defense Weekly, said: "The Gulf states have a shopping list of arms worth more than $60 billion if all the deals under discussion eventually go through."

The largest deal is Saudi Arabia's purchase of 72 Eurofighter Typhoon jets from BAE Systems.

After the Gulf War in 1991, Saudi Arabia and a number of other states spent $10 billion. Now countries are again flocking to the arms bazaars and more than 900 exhibitors will be competing for their business at the Idex 2007 exhibition in Abu Dhabi.

Although much of the equipment being purchased is designed to counter an external military threat, many are also spending heavily on homeland security.

"People are concerned that if there is a complete breakdown in Iraq it may wash over to them," said Marc Lee, the organizer of a conference on defense in the region that will be held the day before the arms fair. "They are acutely conscious of the instability threats on the other side of the Gulf and the threat from Iran."

At the last Idex exhibition, in 2005, $2 billion of deals were done in five days, but this year is expected to break all records. Up to 45,000 delegates are expected, and the UAE tourism ministry has hired two cruise liners to cope with demand for accommodations.

Across Arab World, A Widening Rift (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

CAIRO Egypt is the Arab world's largest Sunni Muslim country, but as a writer once quipped, it has a Shiite heart and a Sunni mind. In its eclectic popular culture, Sunnis enjoy a sweet dish with raisins and nuts to mark Ashura, the most sacred Shiite Muslim holiday. Raucous festivals bring Cairenes into the street to celebrate the birthdays of Shiite saints, a practice disparaged by austere Sunnis. The city's Islamic quarter tangles like a vine around a shrine to Imam Hussein, Shiite Islam's most revered figure.

The syncretic blend makes the words of Mahmoud Ahmed, a book vendor sitting on the shrine's marble and granite promenade, even more striking.

"The Shiites are rising," he said, arching his eyebrows in an expression suggesting both revelation and fear.

The growing Sunni-Shiite divide is roiling an Arab world as unsettled as at any time in a generation. Fought in speeches, newspaper columns, rumors swirling through cafes and the Internet, and occasional bursts of strife, the conflict is predominantly shaped by politics: a disintegrating Iraq, an ascendant Iran, a sense of Arab powerlessness and a persistent suspicion of American intentions. But the division has begun to seep into the region's social fabric, too. The sectarian fault line has long existed and sometimes ruptured, but never, perhaps, has it been revealed in such a stark, disruptive fashion.

Newspapers are replete with assertions, some little more than incendiary rumors, of Shiite aggressiveness. The Jordanian newspaper Ad-Dustour, aligned with the government, wrote of a conspiracy last month to spread Shiism from India to Egypt. On the conspirators' agenda, it said: assassinating "prominent Sunni figures." The same day, an Algerian newspaper reported that parents were calling on the government to stop Shiite proselytizing in schools. An Egyptian columnist accused Iran of trying to convert Sunnis to Shiism in an attempt to revive the Persian Safavid dynasty, which came to power in the 16th century.

At Madbuli's, a storied bookstore in downtown Cairo, five new titles lined the display window: "The Shiites," "The Shiites in History," "Twelve Shiites," and so on. A newspaper on sale nearby featured a warning by its editor that the conflict could lead to a "sectarian holocaust."

"To us Egyptians," said writer and analyst Mohammed al-Sayid Said, the sectarian division is "entirely artificial. It resonates with nothing in our culture, nothing in our daily life. It's not part of our social experience, cultural experience or religious experience." But he added: "I think this can devastate the region."

The violence remains confined to Iraq and, on a far smaller scale, Lebanon, but to some, the four-year-long entropy of Iraq offers a metaphor for the forces emerging across the region: People there watched the rise of sectarian identity, railed against it, blamed the United States and others for inflaming it, then were often helpless to stop the descent into bloodshed.

"This tension is the most dangerous problem now in the region," said Ghassan Charbel, editor of the Arabic-language daily al-Hayat.

The schism between Sunnis and Shiites dates to the 7th century, Islam's earliest days, when a dispute broke out over who would succeed the prophet Muhammad. Shiites believe the descendants of Muhammad's daughter, Fatima, and son-in-law, Ali, were deprived of divinely ordained leadership in a narrative of martyrdom and injustice that still influences devout Shiite readings of the faith.

Over centuries, differences in ritual, jurisprudence and theology evolved, some of them slight. But the Shiite community -- as a majority in Iraq and Bahrain and a sizable minority in Lebanon, Saudi Arabia and Kuwait -- is shaped far more today by the underprivileged status it has often endured in an Arab world that is predominantly Sunni. For decades, the Saudi government banned Shiite rituals; a Sunni minority rules a restive Shiite majority in Bahrain; Lebanese Shiites, long poor and disenfranchised, often faced chauvinism that still lingers.

DOJ_NMG_0130428

Episodes of sectarian conflict litter the region's history: Shiites revolted in medieval Baghdad, and rival gangs ransacked one another's tombs and shrines. The conflict between the Sunni Ottoman Empire and the Shiite Safavid Empire in Persia was often cast as a sectarian struggle. The 1979 Islamic revolution in Iran was portrayed in parts of the Arab world as a Shiite resurgence.

But rarely has the region witnessed so many events, in so brief a time, that have been so widely interpreted through a sectarian lens: the empowering of Iraq's Shiite-led government and the bloodletting that has devastated the country; the lack of support by America's Sunni Arab allies -- Egypt, Jordan and Saudi Arabia -- for the Shiite movement Hezbollah in its fight with Israel last summer; and, most decisively, the perception among many Sunni Arabs that Saddam Hussein was lynched by Shiites bent on revenge. In the background is the growing assertiveness of Shiite Iran as the influence of other traditional regional powers such as Egypt and Saudi Arabia diminishes.

In Lebanon, where the Hezbollah-led opposition has mobilized in an effort to force the government's resignation, the sectarian divide colors even a contest over urban space. Some Sunnis are angered most by the fact that the Beirut sit-in -- in their eyes, an occupation -- by Shiites from the hardscrabble southern suburbs is taking place in the sleek downtown rebuilt by a former Sunni prime minister, Rafiq al-Hariri, who was assassinated in 2005.

"Politics is perception," said Jamil Mroue, a Lebanese publisher whose father was Shiite and mother Sunni.

Sentiments today remind him of the tribal-like fanaticism that marked another sectarian conflict, Lebanon's 15-year civil war -- which, among other divisions, loosely pitted Christians against Muslims before it ended in 1990.

"It certainly conjures up the feelings of the civil war, when Lebanon started disintegrating, except on a mega-scale," Mroue said. He called it "very scary, because I know that there is a possibility of being moved by this tide."

"At the end of it," he added, "people are going to look back and say, 'What the hell was this all about?' "

In overwhelmingly Sunni countries such as Egypt, where politics were long defined by Arab nationalism or political Islam, visceral notions of sectarian identity remain somewhat alien. It is not unusual to hear people say they realized only as adults that they were Sunnis. Before that, they identified themselves simply as Muslim. Even in Lebanon, despite its communal divisions, intermarriage is not uncommon, and there is a long tradition of Sunnis becoming Shiites so their daughters can receive a more equitable share of inheritance, as allowed under Shiite law.

Across the region, Hezbollah and its leader, Hasan Nasrallah, in particular, still win accolades for their performance in last summer's war in Lebanon.

"You have to give him credit for fighting the Israelis," Abdel-Hamid Ibrahim said of Nasrallah as he stood at a rickety curbside stand in Cairo, boiling water for tea. Overhead were pictures of two Egyptian icons, the singers Um Kalthoum and Abdel-Halim Hafez. "Closest to my heart," he said. Next to them was a portrait of Nasrallah. "A symbol of resistance, the man who defeated Israel," it read.

"Hasan Nasrallah, he's the man who stood in front of the Israelis himself," said Muhsin Mohammed, a customer.

"Who was standing with him?" Ibrahim asked, nodding his head. He pointed to the sky. "Our Lord."

Both scoffed at the sectarian tensions.

"There's a proverb that says, 'Divide and conquer,' " Mohammed said. "Sunnis and Shiites -- they're not both Muslims? What divides them? Who wants to divide them? In whose interest is it to divide them?" he asked.

"It's in the West's interest," he answered. "And at the head of it is America and Israel." He paused. "And Britain."

That sense of Western manipulation is often voiced by Shiite clerics and activists, who say the United States incites sectarianism as a way of blunting Iran's influence. In recent years, some of the most provocative comments have come from America's allies in the region: Egypt's president questioned Shiites' loyalty to their countries, Jordan's king warned of a coming Shiite crescent from Iran to Lebanon, and last month King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia denounced what he called Shiite proselytizing.

The charge drew a lengthy retort from Nasrallah. "Frankly speaking, the aim of saying such things is fomenting strife," he said in a speech. He dismissed charges of Iranian proselytizing or the emergence of a Shiite crescent.

"People in the region always complain about a Shiite crescent. You always hear, 'Shiite crescent, Shiite crescent.' That's just a crescent. What about the full Sunni moon?" said Nimr al-Nimr, a Shiite cleric in the eastern Saudi town of Awamiya, who spent five days in police detention for urging that a Shiite curriculum be taught in his predominantly Shiite region.

Shiites make up less than 15 percent of Saudi Arabia's population, many of them in the oil-rich Eastern Province. The austere Sunni religious establishment considers them heretics. One cleric, Abdul Rahman al-Barak, considered close to the royal family, has called Shiites "infidels, apostates and hypocrites."

DOJ_NMG_0130429

"There are conflicts in Palestine between Sunni sects -- Hamas and Fatah -- in Somalia, in Darfur. None of that is sectarian," said Hassan al-Saffar, the most prominent Shiite cleric in Saudi Arabia. "There's a campaign against Shiites. Why is all this anti-Shiite sentiment being inflamed at a time the United States is trying to pressure Iran because of its nuclear ambitions?"

In Cairo recently, Hassan Kamel sipped sweet tea in a cafe beside the shrine to Imam Hussein, the prophet's grandson, who was killed in battle in 680 in what is now Iraq. The shrine is believed to hold his severed head. Across the street was al-Azhar, one of the foremost academic institutions of Sunni Islam, founded, ironically, by the Shiite Fatimid dynasty that ruled Egypt for 200 years until 1169. On the shrine's wall was a saying attributed to the prophet and often intoned during Shiite commemorations: "Hussein is from me, and I am from Hussein." Kamel pointed to the doors, topped with a Koranic inscription; Shiites and Sunnis like him worshiped at the shrine together, he said.

As cats scurried across the cafe's grimy floor, he wondered aloud about past conflicts that have splintered the Middle East.

"Egyptians, all their lives, without exception, have endured so many crises, catastrophes and problems," he said. He listed wars in 1948, 1956, 1967, 1973. "But they have a gift. It's a gift from God. They have the ability to forget."

Then he talked about the rest of the region, and whether this bout of strife and tension would pass, too.

"They might forget, they might not," he said. "Right now, no one knows what's coming."

Blowup? America's Hidden War With Iran (NSWK)

By Michael Hirsh And Maziar Bahari

Newsweek, February 12, 2007

Jalal Sharafi was carrying a videogame, a gift for his daughter, when he found himself surrounded. On that chilly Sunday morning, the second secretary at the Iranian Embassy in Baghdad had driven himself to the commercial district of Arasat Hindi to checkout the site for a new Iranian bank. He had ducked into a nearby electronics store with his bodyguards, and as they emerged four armored cars roared up and disgorged at least 20 gunmen wearing bulletproof vests and Iraqi National Guard uniforms. They flashed official IDs, and manhandled Sharafi into one car. Iraqi police gave chase, guns blazing. They shot up one of the other vehicles, capturing four assailants who by late last week had yet to be publicly identified. Sharafi and the others disappeared.

At the embassy, the diplomat's colleagues were furious. "This was a group directly under American supervision," said one distraught Iranian official, who was not authorized to speak on the record. Abdul Karim Inizi, a former Iraqi Security minister close to the Iranians, pointed the finger at an Iraqi black-ops unit based out at the Baghdad airport, who answer to American Special Forces officers. "It's plausible," says a senior Coalition adviser who is also not authorized to speak on the record. The unit does exist—and does specialize in snatch operations.

The Iranians have reason to feel paranoid. In recent weeks senior American officers have condemned Tehran for providing training and deadly explosives to insurgents. In a predawn raid on Dec. 21, U.S. troops barged into the compound of the most powerful political party in the country, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, and grabbed two men they claimed were officers in Iran's Revolutionary Guards. Three weeks later U.S. troops stormed an Iranian diplomatic office in Irbil, arresting five more Iranians. The Americans have hinted that as part of an escalating tit-for-tat, Iranians may have had a hand in a spectacular raid in Karbala on Jan. 20, in which four American soldiers were kidnapped and later found shot, execution style, in the head. U.S. forces promised to defend themselves.

Some view the spiraling attacks as a strand in a worrisome pattern. At least one former White House official contends that some Bush advisers secretly want an excuse to attack Iran. "They intend to be as provocative as possible and make the Iranians do something [America] would be forced to retaliate for," says Hillary Mann, the administration's former National Security Council director for Iran and Persian Gulf Affairs. U.S. officials insist they have no intention of provoking or otherwise starting a war with Iran, and they were also quick to deny any link to Sharafi's kidnapping. But the fact remains that the longstanding war of words between Washington and Tehran is edging toward something more dangerous. A second Navy carrier group is steaming toward the Persian Gulf, and NEWSWEEK has learned that a third carrier will likely follow. Iran shot off a few missiles in those same tense waters last week, in a highly publicized test. With Americans and Iranians jousting on the chaotic battleground of Iraq, the chances of a small incident's spiraling into a crisis are higher than they've been in years.

Sometimes it seems as if a state of conflict is natural to the U.S.-Iranian relationship—troubled since the CIA-backed coup that restored the shah to power in 1953, tortured since Ayatollah Khomeini's triumph in 1979. With the election of George W. Bush on the one hand, and Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad on the other, the two countries are now led by men who deeply mistrust the intentions and indeed doubt the sanity of the other. Tehran insists that U.S. policy is aimed at toppling the regime and subjugating Iran. The White House charges that Iran is violently sabotaging U.S. efforts to stabilize the Middle East while not so secretly developing nuclear weapons. As the raids and skirmishes in Iraq underscore, a hidden war is already unfolding.

DOJ_NMG_0130430

Yet a NEWSWEEK investigation has also found periods of marked cooperation and even tentative steps toward possible reconciliation in recent years—far more than is commonly realized. After September 11 in particular, relations grew warmer than at any time since the fall of the shah. America wanted Iran's help in Afghanistan, and Iran gave it, partly out of fear of an angry superpower and partly in order to be rid of its troublesome Taliban neighbors. In time, hard-liners on both sides were able to undo the efforts of diplomats to build on that foundation. The damage only worsened as those hawks became intoxicated with their own success. The secret history of the Bush administration's dealings with Iran is one of arrogance, mistrust and failure. But it is also a history that offers some hope.

For Iran's reformists, 9/11 was a blessing in disguise. Previous attempts to reach out to America had been stymied by conservative mullahs. But the fear that an enraged superpower would blindly lash out focused minds in Tehran. Mohammad Hossein Adeli was one of only two deputies on duty at the Foreign Ministry when the attacks took place, late on a sweltering summer afternoon. He immediately began contacting top officials, insisting that Iran respond quickly. "We wanted to truly condemn the attacks but we also wished to offer an olive branch to the United States, showing we were interested in peace," says Adeli. To his relief, Iran's top official, Ayatollah Ali Khameini, quickly agreed. "The Supreme Leader was deeply suspicious of the American government," says a Khameini aide whose position does not allow him to be named. "But [he] was repulsed by these terrorist acts and was truly sad about the loss of the civilian lives in America." For two weeks worshipers at Friday prayers even stopped chanting "Death to America."

The fear dissipated after Sept. 20, when the FBI announced that Al Qaeda was behind the attacks. But there was new reason for cooperation: for years Tehran had been backing the Afghan guerrillas fighting the Taliban, Osama bin Laden's hosts. Suddenly, having U.S. troops next door in Afghanistan didn't seem like a bad idea. American and Iranian officials met repeatedly in Geneva in the days before the Oct. 7 U.S. invasion. The Iranians were more than supportive. "In fact, they were impatient," says a U.S. official involved in the talks, who asked not to be named speaking about topics that remain sensitive. "They'd ask, 'When's the military action going to start? Let's get going!' "

Opinions differ wildly over how much help the Iranians actually were on the ground. But what is beyond doubt is how critical they were to stabilizing the country after the fall of Kabul. In late November 2001, the leaders of Afghanistan's triumphant anti-Taliban factions flew to Bonn, Germany, to map out an interim Afghan government with the help of representatives from 18 Coalition countries. It was rainy and unseasonably cold, and the penitential month of Ramadan was in full sway, but a carnival mood prevailed. The setting was a splendid hotel on the Rhine, and after sunset the German hosts laid on generous buffet meals under a big sign promising that everything was pork-free.

The Iranian team's leader, Javad Zarif, was a good-humored University of Denver alumnus with a deep, measured voice, who would later become U.N. ambassador. Jim Dobbins, Bush's first envoy to the Afghans, recalls sharing coffee with Zarif in one of the sitting rooms, poring over a draft of the agreement laying out the new Afghan government. "Zarif asked me, 'Have you looked at it?' I said, 'Yes, I read it over once'," Dobbins recalls. "Then he said, with a certain twinkle in his eye: 'I don't think there's anything in it that mentions democracy. Don't you think there could be some commitment to democratization?' This was before the Bush administration had discovered democracy as a panacea for the Middle East. I said that's a good idea."

Toward the end of the Bonn talks, Dobbins says, "we reached a pivotal moment." The various parties had decided that the suave, American-backed Hamid Karzai would lead the new Afghan government. But he was a Pashtun tribal leader from the south, and rivals from the north had actually won the capital. In the brutal world of Afghan power politics, that was a recipe for conflict. At 2 a.m. on the night before the deal was meant to be signed, the Northern Alliance delegate Yunus Qanooni was stubbornly demanding 18 out of 24 new ministries. Frantic negotiators gathered in the suite of United Nations envoy Lakhdar Brahimi. A sleepy Zarif translated for Qanooni. Finally, at close to 4 a.m., he leaned over to whisper in the Afghan's ear: " 'This is the best deal you're going to get'." Qanooni said, " 'OK'."

That moment, Dobbins says now, was critical. "The Russians and the Indians had been making similar points," he says. "But it wasn't until Zarif took him aside that it was settled ... We might have had a situation like we had in Iraq, where we were never able to settle on a single leader and government." A month later Tehran backed up the political support with financial muscle: at a donor's conference in Tokyo, Iran pledged $500 million (at the time, more than double the Americans') to help rebuild Afghanistan.

In a pattern that would become familiar, however, a chill quickly followed the warming in relations. Barely a week after the Tokyo meeting, Iran was included with Iraq and North Korea in the "Axis of Evil." Michael Gerson, now a NEWSWEEK contributor, headed the White House speechwriting shop at the time. He says Iran and North Korea were inserted into Bush's controversial State of the Union address in order to avoid focusing solely on Iraq. At the time, Bush was already making plans to topple Saddam Hussein, but he wasn't ready to say so. Gerson says it was Condoleezza Rice, then national-security adviser, who told him which two countries to include along with Iraq. But the phrase also appealed to a president who felt himself thrust into a grand struggle. Senior aides say it reminded him of Ronald Reagan's ringing denunciations of the "evil empire."

DOJ_NMG_0130431

Once again, Iran's reformists were knocked back on their heels. "Those who were in favor of a rapprochement with the United States were marginalized," says Adeli. "The speech somehow exonerated those who had always doubted America's intentions." The Khameini aide concurs: "The Axis of Evil speech did not surprise the Supreme Leader. He never trusted the Americans."

It would be another war that nudged the two countries together again. At the beginning of 2003, as the Pentagon readied for battle against Iraq, the Americans wanted Tehran's help in case a flood of refugees headed for the border, or if U.S. pilots were downed inside Iran. After U.S. tanks thundered into Baghdad, those worries eased. "We had the strong hand at that point," recalls Colin Powell, who was secretary of State at the time. If anything, though, America's lightning campaign made the Iranians even more eager to deal. Low-level meetings between the two sides had continued even after the Axis of Evil speech. At one of them that spring, Zarif raised the question of the Mujahedin-e Khalq (MEK), a rabidly anti-Iranian militant group based in Iraq. Iran had detained a number of senior Qaeda operatives after 9/11. Zarif floated the possibility of "reciprocity"—your terrorists for ours.

The idea was brought up at a mid-May meeting between Bush and his chief advisers in the wood-paneled Situation Room in the White House basement. Riding high, Bush seemed to like the idea of a swap, says a participant who asked to remain anonymous because the meeting was classified. Some in the room argued that designating the militants as terrorists had been a mistake, others that they might prove useful against Iran someday. Powell opposed the handover for a different reason: he worried that the captives might be tortured. The vice president, silent through most of the meeting as was his wont, muttered something about "preserving all our options." (Cheney declined to comment.) The MEK's status remains unresolved.

Around this time what struck some in the U.S. government as an even more dramatic offer arrived in Washington—a faxed two-page proposal for comprehensive bilateral talks. To the NSC's Mann, among others, the Iranians seemed willing to discuss, at least, cracking down on Hizbullah and Hamas (or turning them into peaceful political organizations) and "full transparency" on Iran's nuclear program. In return, the Iranian "aims" in the document called for a "halt in U.S. hostile behavior and rectification of the status of Iran in the U.S. and abolishing sanctions," as well as pursuit of the MEK.

An Iranian diplomat admits to NEWSWEEK that he had a hand in preparing the proposal, but denies that he was its original author. Asking not to be named because the topic is politically sensitive, he says he got the rough draft from an intermediary with connections at the White House and the State Department. He suggested some relatively minor revisions in ballpoint pen and dispatched the working draft to Tehran, where it was shown to only the top ranks of the regime. "We didn't want to have an 'Irangate 2'," the diplomat says, referring to the secret negotiations to trade weapons for hostages that ended in scandal during Reagan's administration. After Iran's National Security Council approved the document (under orders from Khameini), a final copy was produced and sent to Washington, according to the diplomat.

The letter received a mixed reception. Powell and his deputy Richard Armitage were suspicious. Armitage says he thinks the letter represented creative diplomacy by the Swiss ambassador, Tim Guldimann, who was serving as a go-between. "We couldn't determine what [in the proposal] was the Iranians' and what was the Swiss ambassador's," he says. He added that his impression at the time was that the Iranians "were trying to put too much on the table." Quizzed about the letter in front of Congress last week, Rice denied ever seeing it. "I don't care if it originally came from Mars," Mann says now. "If the Iranians said it was fully vetted and cleared, then it could have been as important as the two-page document" that Richard Nixon and Henry Kissinger received from Beijing in 1971, indicating Mao Zedong's interest in opening China.

A few days later bombs tore through three housing complexes in Saudi Arabia and killed 29 people, including seven Americans. Furious administration hard-liners blamed Tehran. Citing telephone intercepts, they claimed the bombings had been ordered by Saif al-Adel, a senior Qaeda leader supposedly imprisoned in Iran. "There's no question but that there have been and are today senior Al Qaeda leaders in Iran, and they are busy," Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld growled. Although there was no evidence the Iranian government knew of Adel's activities, his presence in the country was enough to undermine those who wanted to reach out.

Powell, for one, thinks Bush simply wasn't prepared to deal with a regime he thought should not be in power. As secretary of State he met fierce resistance to any diplomatic overtures to Iran and its ally Syria. "My position in the remaining year and a half was that we ought to find ways to restart talks with Iran," he says of the end of his term. "But there was a reluctance on the part of the president to do that." The former secretary of State angrily rejects the administration's characterization of efforts by him and his top aides to deal with Tehran and Damascus as failures. "I don't like the administration saying, 'Powell went, Armitage went ... and [they] got nothing.' We got plenty," he says. "You can't negotiate when you tell the other side, 'Give us what a negotiation would produce before the negotiations start'."

DOJ_NMG_0130432

Terrorism wasn't the only concern when it came to Iran. For decades, Washington's abiding fear has been that Iran might pick up where the shah's nuclear program (initially U.S.-backed) left off, and make the Great Satan the target of its atomic weapons. The Iranians, who were signatories to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, insisted they had nothing to hide. They lied. In August 2002, a group affiliated with the MEK revealed the extent of nuclear activities at a facility in Isfahan, where the Iranians had been converting yellowcake to uranium gas, and in Natanz, where the infrastructure needed to enrich that material to weapons-grade uranium was being built. A year later Pakistani scientist AQ Khan's covert nuclear-technology network unraveled, bringing further embarrassments and investigations.

For months, European negotiators worked to get Tehran to formalize a temporary and tenuous deal to freeze its nuclear fuel-development program. In May 2005, they met with Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, Hassan Rowhani, at the Iranian ambassador's opulent Geneva residence. There was some reason to be optimistic: in Washington, Rice had announced that the United States would not block Iran's bid to join the World Trade Organization. Yet a sense of enormous tension filled the room, according to a diplomat who was there but asked not to be identified revealing official discussions. The Europeans told Rowhani they hadn't nailed down exactly what they could offer in return for a freeze, and the Americans still weren't fully onboard. Iran would have to wait for the details for a few more months. But in the meantime, the program had to remain suspended.

Rowhani, in full clerical robes and turban, obviously was not authorized to make any such deal. "The man was in front of us sweating," says the European diplomat. "He was trapped: he couldn't go further ... I realized very clearly that he couldn't deliver, that he was not allowed to deliver. Psychologically he was broken. Physically he was almost broken."

Part of the problem was that elections in Iran were only a few days away. They brought to power a man who satisfied the darkest stereotypes of Iran's fervid leaders. Mahmoud Ahmadinejad publicly renounced the freeze on Iran's nuclear fuel-development program, broke the seals the International Atomic Energy Agency had placed on Iran's conversion facilities at Isfahan and pushed ahead with work at Natanz. In the span of no more than a month or two, nuclear enrichment had become a symbol of national pride for a much wider spectrum of Iranian society than the voters who elected Ahmadinejad. In a warped parallel to Bush, who found his voice after 9/11 rallying Americans to the struggle against a vast and unforgiving enemy, the Iranian president rose in stature throughout the Middle East as he railed against America. The one problem U.S. negotiators had always had with Iran was determining who in the byzantine regime to talk to, and whether they could deliver anything. Now they faced another: the Iranians had almost no incentive to talk. With the United States bogged down in Iraq, Iran now had the leverage—roles had reversed.

In its second term the Bush administration, despite Powell's sour memories, has supported European efforts to resolve the nuclear impasse diplomatically. Rice has offered to meet her Iranian counterpart "any time, anywhere." "What has blocked such contact is the refusal of Iran to meet the demands of the entire international community," says a White House official, who could not be named discussing Iran. The official expressed deep frustration with critics. He argued they were naive about Tehran's intentions, and "parroting Iranian propaganda."

By last summer Iran seemed ascendant. Hizbullah's performance in the Lebanon war had rallied support for Ahmadinejad, one of the group's loudest proponents, across the Arab world. In a series of meetings in New York in September the Iranian president was defiant, almost giddy. (A senior British official who would only speak anonymously about deliberations with the Americans describes Tehran's mood around this time as "cock-a-hoop.") He would not back down when grilled about his dismissals of the Holocaust, and scoffed at the threat of U.N. sanctions over Iran's nuclear defiance.

The West's patience was running out. In Baghdad, American troops seemed powerless to stop a wave of gruesome sectarian killings that they claimed were fueled by Iran. In Amman and Riyadh, Arab leaders warned darkly of a rising "Shia crescent." After Bush's defeat in the midterm elections, Israeli officials began wondering aloud if they would have to deal with the Iranian threat on their own. Partly in consultation with the British, U.S. officials began to map out a broader strategy to fight back. "We felt we needed to have a much more knitted-together policy, with a number of different strands working, to hit different parts of the Iranian system," says the senior British official.

Critics have questioned how much of that plan is military—whether the administration is secretly setting a course for war as it did back in 2002. Last week officials were at great pains to deny that scenario. "We are not planning offensive military operations against Iran," said Under Secretary of State Nicholas Burns. The Pentagon does have contingency plans for all-out war with Iran, on which Bush was briefed last summer. The targets would include Iran's air-defense systems, its nuclear- and chemical-weapons facilities, ballistic missile sites, naval and Revolutionary Guard bases in the gulf, and intelligence headquarters. But generals are convinced that no amount of firepower could do more than delay Tehran's nuclear program. U.S. military analysts have concluded that nothing short of regime change would completely eliminate the threat—and America simply doesn't have the troops needed.

Iraq is another story. American military officials and politicians accuse the Iranian government of providing Iraqis with an new arsenal of advanced rocket-propelled-grenade launchers, heavy-duty mortars and the newest armor-piercing technology for roadside bombs—explosively formed projectiles (EFPs), said to have been developed by Hizbullah. Military security experts are especially worried by "passive infrared sensors," readily available devices that are often used for burglar alarms or automatic light switches but increasingly seen as triggers for improvised explosive devices (IEDs). Unlike cell phones, remote-control systems and garage-door openers, the sensors emit no signal, making them that much tougher to spot before they detonate.

DOJ_NMG_0130433

What's scant is hard evidence that the weapons are provided by the Iranian government, rather than arms dealers or rogue Revolutionary Guard elements. "Iranian lethal support for select groups of Iraqi Shia militants clearly intensifies the conflict in Iraq," says the latest National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq. But the most that can be said with certainty is that Tehran is failing to stop the traffic. The Iranians themselves admit they're not trying as hard as they could. "I can give you my word that we don't give IEDs to the Mahdi Army," says an Iranian intelligence official who asked not to be named because secrecy is his business. "But if you asked me if we could control our borders better if we wanted to, I would say: 'Yes, if we knew that the Americans would not use Iraq as a base to attack Iran'."

The real thrust of Washington's multipronged attack is political. Banking restrictions levied by the U.S. Treasury have begun to pinch the Iranian economy. Voters angry about rising prices dealt Ahmadinejad an embarrassing blow in municipal elections in December, when his supporters were trounced. That wouldn't much matter if he still retained Khameini's support. But that may no longer be the case. The Khameini aide says the Supreme Leader blames Ahmadinejad's overheated rhetoric about Israel and the Holocaust for the unanimous Security Council resolution that passed in late December, demanding that Tehran suspend its nuclear program.

Every time America or Iran has gained an advantage over the other in the last five years, however, they've overplayed their hand. More pressure on Ahmadinejad could well make him popular again—the chief martyr in a martyr culture. Sunni insurgents in Iraq need only kill some Americans and plant Iranian IDs nearby to start a full-scale war. Like so many times in this complicated relationship, this is a moment of opportunity. And one of equally great danger.

With reporting by Babak Dehghanpisheh in Baghdad and John Barry, Mark Hosenball, Richard Wolffe in Washington, Christopher Dickey in Paris, Stryker McGuire in London, and Christian Caryl, Owen Matthews, Scott Johnson, Kevin Peraino, Ron Moreau and Dan Ephron

Report: Cheney Snubbing Japan Official (AP)

AP, February 12, 2007

Vice President Dick Cheney will not meet with Japan's defense minister during his trip to the country next week, a decision Japanese media characterized as a snub over the official calling the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq a "mistake."

Kyodo news agency said Cheney has asked Japan not to schedule any talks with Defense Minister Jumio Kyuma, who criticized the decision to go to war last month because he said it was based on the erroneous assumption that Saddam Hussein's government had weapons of mass destruction.

Kyuma later backtracked, saying he meant that the decision to attack Iraq should have been thought through more cautiously.

Foreign Ministry officials were not immediately available to comment on the report.

In Washington, Cheney spokeswoman Lea Anne McBride said the vice president's schedule had been filled before he received an invitation from Kyuma to meet.

"He is looking forward to a full day of meetings in Japan, including meetings with the emperor, the prime minister, the chief Cabinet secretary and the foreign minister," McBride said.

"This schedule was set in advance of receiving a request from the defense minister."

Japan sent ground troops to southern Iraq on a humanitarian mission after the March 2003 invasion, but the contingent was pulled out last year. Japan still operates airlifts in the region in support of the U.S.-led forces, a mission set to end in July.

Nuclear Talks On North Korea Hit Roadblock (NYT)

By Jim Yardley And David E. Sanger

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

BEIJING, Feb. 11 — Negotiations on a step-by-step deal that the Bush administration hopes will lead North Korea to give up its nuclear weapons program appeared near collapse on Sunday over North Korea's demands for huge shipments of fuel oil and electricity before agreeing to a schedule for turning over its nuclear weapons and fuel.

The chief American envoy, Christopher R. Hill, said he and North Korea's envoy, Kim Kye-gwan, held a "lengthy and very frank" meeting on Sunday. But Mr. Hill seemed much less optimistic that a deal could be struck. Negotiators are planning to end the talks on Monday, and other envoys were pessimistic that any breakthrough would emerge on the final day.

DOJ_NMG_0130434

Meanwhile, a summary of the proposed agreement being circulated among senior policy makers in Washington makes it clear that even if the North agreed to take the listed first steps — sealing its main nuclear reactor and inviting international inspectors back into the country — it would not be required to turn over any nuclear weapons or weapons fuel that it has produced in recent years for an unspecified period of time, and then only after reaching another agreement.

In essence, the agreement Mr. Hill, an assistant secretary of state, is negotiating could prevent the North from producing more weapons, but defers discussions over the weapons and fuel it has stockpiled. Mr. Hill had earlier suggested that if there was agreement, follow-up talks could be set up in March and April.

The summary calls for all six nations in the talks — the others are South Korea, Japan, China and Russia — to "create working groups for full and rapid implementation" of a September 2005 agreement in which the North agreed in principle to abandon its nuclear weapons. But in the past, the North Korean envoys to similar working groups have proven to have no real negotiating authority. Furthermore, the proposed agreement sets no dates on nuclear action beyond shutting down the nuclear plant at Yongbyon and allowing inspectors in within 60 days; it leaves unresolved what the North would get in return. The summary was given to The New York Times by a source trying to explain the timing and vagueness of the deal's elements.

After months of preparation that created unusual optimism within the Bush administration, failure to reach even a preliminary agreement could cast doubt on the prospects of disarming North Korea in the administration's last two years. Several Asian diplomats said they feared that North Korea had sensed the American distraction in Iraq and could be trying to run out the clock until the election of a new president.

At the same time, the North is under pressure because of the effectiveness of financial sanctions, particularly those aimed at Kim Jong-il and other North Korean leaders, and it may feel this is a good time to extract concessions from the South Korean government, which is clinging to economic ties to the North.

Mr. Hill, a seasoned negotiator who played a critical role in the Dayton accords that ended conflict in the Balkans in 1995, made it clear that the United States would not sign a deal that provided North Korea with energy but failed to ensure that it gave up its nuclear material.

"We're not looking to provide energy assistance so that they could avoid taking the further steps on denuclearization," he said at a news conference late Sunday in Beijing. "We understand that you can't just get there in one jump, you have to take several steps, so we're prepared to take several steps."

He added, "But we're not interested in providing that kind of assistance so that they don't have to take the next step."

In the past, the North has always insisted that it get rewards before giving away the nuclear ability that Mr. Kim regards as his sole international bargaining chip.

Kyodo, the Japanese news agency, has reported that North Korea wants an annual energy package of two million tons of fuel oil and two million kilowatts of electricity for taking the first steps in the agreement. It quoted unidentifed diplomatic sources who said the North also wanted a short-term infusion of hundreds of thousands of tons of fuel oil almost immediately. That presumably would be a reward for shutting down Yongbyon, even though Yongbyon does not provide electric energy to the country.

Any deal would inevitably be compared with the 1994 agreement between the Clinton administration and North Korea. President Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice have criticized that accord because it involved a "freeze" on activity that the North could quickly reverse, and because it left the shipment of weapons and fuel out of the country to the very end. The agreement fell apart in 2002, and the North is believed to have then converted its spent nuclear fuel into weapons.

The North tested its first nuclear device in October, though with only partial success.

Outside experts familiar with the outlines of the proposed deal say that the Bush administration would give up relatively little at the beginning — but it would also receive little.

"Freezing and disabling Yongbyon is an important but modest step," said Michael Green, who negotiated with North Korea as the top Asia expert at the National Security Council until he left a year ago. "It does not yet capture harvested plutonium and the existing weapons."

If a deal holds together, he said, "the key will be retaining leverage" on the North by preventing China, Russia and South Korea from increasing their economic cooperation so much that that their actions negate the United Nations Security Council sanctions on the North.

According to the outline, the proposed agreement would establish "tight timelines for actions that are measured in months, not years," and would include a flurry of activity in the first 60 days. That would include shutting down the Yongbyon facilities.

Inspectors would return to the country for the first time in more than four years, and the North would have to declare "all of its existing nuclear programs." That is a reference to the American accusation that the North has a hidden program to enrich uranium, purchased from the rogue Pakistani scientist Abdul Qadeer Khan. The North once admitted to the existence of the program, American officials say, but has since denied it.

DOJ_NMG_0130435

The working groups outlined by the proposed agreement would discuss denuclearization, economic and energy cooperation, normalization of diplomatic relations, and a peace treaty formally ending the Korean War. The North's commitments, the document says, "are to all five other parties, including China," and it says that "conventional energy assistance will be determined by the working group and will be commensurate with the steps" North Korea takes to fulfill its commitments.

The huge annual energy package North Korea is demanding would eclipse the aid provided under the 1994 deal, when the North was promised light-water nuclear reactors with a generating capacity of two million kilowatts of electricity, as well as a temporary fix of 500,000 tons of heavy fuel oil.

The chief Japanese envoy, Kenichiro Sasae, told Kyodo, "The problem is that North Korea has excessive expectations about this, and unless it reconsiders this issue, an agreement will be difficult."

North Korea's insistence on the package deflated the optimism that had infused the early days of this round of talks and spread to senior officials in the White House, who said they expected a deal this weekend. By Sunday afternoon, diplomats had decided that Monday would be the final day of talks, agreement or no. According to [a news agency], South Korea's representative, Chun Yung-woo, blamed the size of the energy package "and the scope, pace and range of the North's actions to denuclearize" for the stalemate.

The Russian envoy, Aleksandr Losyukov, suggested that the best outcome might be a "chairman's statement" by China that summarized the negotiations.

"It seems the chances to reach a joint statement are slim," Mr. Losyukov said, according to Xinhua, China's official news agency.

North Korea Snarls Efforts To End Nuclear Standoff (WSJ)

By Evan Ramstad

The Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

BEIJING -- The latest effort by the U.S., China and three other countries to talk North Korea into giving up its pursuit of nuclear weapons is at risk of failure because of disagreement over one major point: the energy incentives they will provide Pyongyang.

The snag spoiled what was expected to be quick approval of a sweeping deal that was largely arranged by the U.S. in a two-way discussion with North Korea last month. Negotiators last night said they will continue working on the problem for just one more day, then will end the current round of talks with or without an agreement.

"There is a point in which you set a deadline and lay out your position and hope the other side is interested in trying to cut a deal," said Christopher Hill, the U.S. envoy to the talks.

The problem emerged on the first day of the talks on Thursday, as North Korea insisted the energy assistance it is being offered in stages occur all at once, Mr. Hill said, rather than in phases. Delegates from other countries in the talks said over the weekend that North Korea's request was excessive. North Korea envoy Kim Kye Gwan doesn't usually talk to reporters until the end of a round of talks.

The U.S. and other participants in the talks want to phase in energy assistance, increasing it each time North Korea takes another step toward getting rid of nuclear weapons. "We're not interested in just stopping at initial steps," Mr. Hill said. "We're interested in completing the journey to denuclearization."

The stakes are high for the U.S., which, since the North's test of a nuclear device in October, has stepped up its diplomatic efforts to reverse Pyongyang's desire for such weapons. Success with North Korea might help the U.S. persuade another budding nuclear power, Iran, to give up its work, too.

A failure to reach a deal would again raise questions about North Korea's willingness to compromise, which has appeared low from the first round of talks in August 2003.

The viability of the six-party negotiating process also is in jeopardy. Japan, South Korea and Russia are other members of the six-party talks.

The six countries failed to reach a deal the last time they met, in mid-December. Diplomats entered that round with high hopes also, but North Korea's delegates said they weren't able to negotiate.

Mr. Hill subsequently held three days of meetings with the North's Mr. Kim in Berlin last month, resolved several disputes and formed the framework of a deal.

Under it, North Korea would shut down its sole nuclear plant, which provides spent fuel that can be reprocessed into weapons material, and begin to take other disarmament steps.

It also would take steps toward friendlier relations with the U.S., Japan and South Korea.

In return, the five countries would provide North Korea with economic assistance, chiefly in the form of free fuel oil and electricity. The U.S. would resolve a portion of a banking dispute with North Korea.

DOJ_NMG_0130436

The countries planned to set up five working groups to implement the various parts of the deal and schedule regular meetings, as often as every month.

Late last night, Mr. Hill said, "I think we have a real problem if we can't reach an agreement on this."

North Korea Talks Teeter On Brink Of Collapse (FT)

By Anna Fifield

Financial Times, February 12, 2007

Diplomatic efforts to halt North Korea's nuclear weapons programme are teetering on the brink of collapse because of a disagreement over the energy aid Pyongyang should receive in return for its first steps.

Pyongyang was making "excessive" demands for electricity and oil that, unless dropped, would see the talks end in deadlock on Monday, Japan's envoy said.

After two tortuous days discussing a single paragraph in a draft agreement that would pave the way for denuclearisation, diplomats agreed to conclude the latest round of six-party talks on the North Korean nuclear problem on Monday, regardless of whether they strike a deal.

Failure would come as a heavy blow for all parties, which have been meeting in the most optimistic atmosphere in 18 months.

"We have a real problem if we can't reach an agreement," Christopher Hill, the US negotiator, said on Sunday night. "The diplomatic process would certainly be dealt a significant setback but that does not mean that we are going to give up on this issue. We do not have the option of walking away."

The talks opened on Thursday amid hopes a deal could be struck that would pave the way for implementation of the September 2005 agreement under which North Korea pledged to abandon its nuclear weapons programme in return for economic and energy assistance.

Although all parties – China, Japan, Russia, the US and the two Koreas – agreed in principle on the first two days to work towards this goal, the talks came unstuck over the weekend over the rewards North Korea could expect for certain steps.

According to reports coming out from the delegations, North Korea has been insisting the other five countries provide it with 2m kilowatts of electricity, the amount that could have been generated by two light-water reactors that were supposed to be built under the 1994 nuclear agreement with the Clinton administration.

It was also demanding 2m tonnes of heavy fuel oil.

Kenichiro Sasae, the Japanese negotiator, said the "excessive" demands led to an "atmosphere of heightened tension" on Sunday. "This is the problem, and unless they change their thinking, an agreement will be difficult," Mr Sasae said.

Pyongyang has a record of trying to extract greater concessions by starting from an unrealistic bargaining position, so analysts said a deal was still possible.

Mr Hill said he had had a "very, very frank and honest" discussion with his North Korean counterpart on Sunday. "We were prepared to look at some energy assistance because the DPRK really needs energy assistance. But we are not looking at energy assistance that would somehow allow the DPRK to avoid denuclearisation," he said, referring to North Korea by its official name.

But a pro-Pyongyang newspaper said the talks had hit a snag because of a US "betrayal". The Chosun Shinbo said the US last month offered to lift financial sanctions in return for North Korea taking steps towards dismantling its nuclear weapons programme. "The obstacle is ... the US and some other countries never think of their [own] duties."

North Korean Nuclear Talks Proceed As Outlook Dims (WP)

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

North Korean Nuclear Talks Proceed as Outlook Dims

BEIJING -- Deadlocked on Sunday over energy aid to North Korea, envoys to six-nation talks on the Pyongyang government's nuclear weapons program gave themselves one more day to reach agreement on first steps toward eliminating the program.

The stalemate resulted from North Korea's demand for heavy fuel oil in exchange for closing its main nuclear facility, a reactor at Yongbyon, and readmitting international inspectors in a plan the Bush administration had hoped would lead to denuclearization.

The chief U.S. envoy, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill, suggested that if North Korea obtained such a large amount of fuel upfront, it might no longer feel obligated to continue denuclearization. Some reports quoting diplomats at the talks suggested that the initial commitment demanded by North Korea amounted to 2 million tons.

DOJ_NMG_0130437

"We're prepared to help . . . especially on economic and energy issues," Hill said. "But we're not prepared to help them in a way that would allow them to avoid the next steps in denuclearization."

The chief Russian negotiator, Deputy Foreign Minister Alexander Losyukov, predicted that the six envoys -- from North and South Korea, China, Russia, Japan and the United States -- would not be able to reach agreement at this round of talks despite what appeared to be favorable conditions when they began Thursday, according to the official New China News Agency.

-- Edward Cody

EUROPE

Â· LISBON -- Voters failed to overturn Portugal's strict abortion law because of low turnout at the polls, but the prime minister vowed to relax restrictions in the conservative Catholic country through legislation.

Â· PRISTINA, Serbia -- Kosovo Albanian leaders appealed for calm after two people died following clashes between police and ethnic Albanians protesting a U.N. plan they say falls short of full independence from Serbia.

Â· ASHKHABAD, Turkmenistan -- Turkmens voted in their country's first presidential election with more than one candidate.

All the candidates were from the only legal party, and there were no foreign monitors. Officials said turnout was nearly 99 percent.THE MIDDLE EAST

Â· RIYADH, Saudi Arabia -- Russian President Vladimir Putin held talks with Saudi King Abdullah on Iraq and the Palestinian-Israeli conflict in the first visit to the kingdom by a Russian leader.

Â· JERUSALEM -- Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said the emerging Palestinian cabinet must recognize Israel, renounce violence and accept past peace agreements.

Separately, Israel conducted its first nighttime test of its Arrow antimissile system, the country's main's bulwark against a possible attack by Iran's long-range weapons, Defense Minister Amir Peretz said.AFRICA

Â· MOGADISHU, Somalia -- Five mortar bombs exploded Monday in the capital, killing at least three people, witnesses said. A bomb exploded Sunday at a march in Kismaayo that drew thousands in support of peacekeepers. Troops fired into the crowd in response. At least five people were killed.

Let's Try To Make A Deal (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 12, 2007

THE LATEST INTERNATIONAL effort to get North Korea to end its nuclear programs enters its final day today on a discouraging note. After an 18-month stalemate and a North Korean nuclear weapon test, U.S. officials are once again struggling to reach a deal with Pyongyang. Yet even if they did, the erratic regime's history would require that any deal be treated with skepticism. And whatever its details, one thing that a deal most assuredly will not be is a solution.

That's because any solution to the North Korean nuclear problem must include an agreement by Pyongyang to place its plutonium — whether two or 12 bombs' worth — under international safeguards. Once cameras are focused on the material, and inspectors are checking for hidden stockpiles of plutonium or uranium, real engagement with the North Koreans can begin.

The question, of course and as always, is how to get there from here. For all its bluster, the Bush administration got nowhere with Pyongyang until it froze some accounts in a previously obscure bank in Macao — accounts believed to be North Korean leader Kim Jong Il's private slush fund. It was the financial sleuths at the Treasury Department and in the intelligence community, not the hard-liners at the State Department and the Pentagon, who finally brought Kim back to the table.

Once there, the North Koreans appear to have reverted to their usual preposterous demands. Giving up the plutonium stockpiles they already have, or the enriched uranium program they once acknowledged but now deny, is not now up for negotiation. Instead, in exchange for freezing the Yongbyon nuclear reactor, they reportedly want 2 million tons of heavy fuel oil — four times the amount that the U.S. supplied under a deal during the Clinton administration.

This is an offer the U.S. must refuse — even at the cost of walking away from the talks empty-handed. On the other hand, it would be self-defeating for the U.S. to continue to insist that no concessions whatsoever can be made to Pyongyang until it unilaterally dismantles its nuclear program. Kim has every reason to doubt the Bush administration's declaration that it has "no hostile intent." And it's not just the president. There is bipartisan hostility in Washington to Kim's heinous regime. But it's hard to envision a scenario for overthrowing him that doesn't also involve the incineration of Seoul.

The United States, and the world, have lived with a dangerous North Korea for half a century and a dangerously unstable North Korea for more than a decade. What the world cannot live with is a dangerously unstable nuclear North Korea. So a true disarmament deal must be eventually struck. And if a taste of fuel oil, like a swig of Kim's favorite cognac, can begin the cycle of mutual concessions that will be required, then the wisest course may be to pour just enough — and not a drop more — to keep the North Koreans at the table.

DOJ_NMG_0130438

Latin America Wary Of New U.S. Attention (LAT)

By Patrick J. Mcdonnell

The Los Angeles Times, February 12, 2007

BUENOS AIRES — The Bush administration's self-proclaimed "year of engagement" with Latin America kicked off last week with broadsides against Venezuela and Iran, a diplomatic tiff with Argentina and analysts wondering whether it all wasn't a little late in the game.

"A veritable diplomatic offensive by a government that has only concentrated on Iraq," wrote veteran correspondent Gustavo Sierra in the Argentine newspaper Clarin after a visit here by R. Nicholas Burns, U.S. undersecretary of State for political affairs, and Thomas A. Shannon, the administration's top diplomat for Latin America.

The pair also visited Brazil, and U.S. Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales made a separate visit last week to Argentina and Brazil. The White House confirmed that President Bush would venture to Latin America in March, with stops scheduled in Brazil, Uruguay, Colombia, Guatemala and Mexico.

The moves are widely seen in South America as an effort to counter the influence of Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, who has wooed his fellow leaders with oil subsidies, foreign aid and a steady diet of invective targeting "the devil" Bush.

It has become conventional wisdom here, even among U.S. allies, that the Bush administration's fixation on Iraq and the Middle East has left Latin America, once the focus of Cold War conflicts, largely ignored, except for U.S. insistence on aggressive drug-interdiction and free-trade policies.

Chavez has gleefully exploited that void, which many think will widen as a politically debilitated Bush assumes lame-duck status.

The White House effort "is catch up and see what we can salvage," said David Fleischer, a political scientist at the University of Brasilia.

U.S. officials embraced the "year of engagement" theme after recent elections put leftists in charge in much of the region, including pro-Chavez presidents in Ecuador and Bolivia. Conservative and pro-U.S. administrations were elected in key allies Colombia and Mexico.

The Bush administration says it has an ability to work across the ideological spectrum.

"Coming out of 2006, we thought it was very important to start 2007 very quickly with as many trips into the region at as high a level as possible," Burns said in Washington before leaving for South America.

Although U.S. diplomats insisted that the initiative was not intended to counter Chavez's spreading influence, the subject has inevitably flared.

"Frankly, you have to wonder if Chavez's plan is to become president for life," Burns told reporters here.

Most analysts are skeptical that the anti-Chavez strategy will bear fruit in places such as Brazil and Argentina, where leftist presidents Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva and Nestor Kirchner, respectively, have eschewed Chavez's anti-Washington rhetoric but have welcomed Venezuela into the South American trade bloc known as Mercosur.

Chavez has used the platform to criticize U.S. policies, as he did at a hemispheric trade enclave in Argentina in 2005, when a flustered Bush was unable to craft a new free-trade zone, to Chavez's delight.

"In private, some leaders may express concern about Chavez, but publicly there is a sense of unity among South American countries in defending sovereignty and resisting efforts to divide the hemisphere," said Riordan Roett, director of the Latin American studies program at Johns Hopkins University.

The U.S. diplomats' trip to Argentina also provided an opportunity to lash out at another U.S. antagonist — Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, a Chavez ally whose Latin American tour last month clearly upset the White House. Ahmadinejad was pictured kissing babies while in Nicaragua for the inauguration of President Daniel Ortega, a Cold War adversary of the Reagan administration.

"There is a concern that if Iran, through Chavez, is making a presence in the U.S. backyard, then that needs to be dealt with," said Michael Shifter, an analyst at the Inter-American Dialogue, a Washington study group.

The U.S. diplomats visited the site of a Buenos Aires Jewish cultural center targeted in a 1994 bombing that Argentina and Israel say was linked to Iran. Tehran denies any involvement, but U.S. officials have voiced strong support for Argentina's efforts to extradite former Iranian officials, including ex-President Hashemi Rafsanjani, in connection with the blast, which killed 85 people and wounded 200.

Jewish leaders in Argentina, home to the region's largest Jewish population, applauded the U.S. effort. Luis Grynwald, who heads the rebuilt Jewish center here, called it "a symbol of the action we all have to take against international terrorism."

DOJ_NMG_0130439

Critics were quick to assail Washington's human rights record, citing abuses at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq and at the U.S. detention center in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq. All have fanned anti-U.S. sentiment in a region where Washington's previous interventions and alliances with military dictatorships remain fresh in the collective memory.

The left-leaning Argentine newspaper Pagina 12 mocked Burns' assertion that the Bush administration was "a champion of human rights" and that it supported the Argentine government's efforts to try abusers from past military regimes.

"If Burns' lack of memory of the proved responsibility of the United States in the successive military coups that devastated Latin America in the decade of the 1970s was notorious, worse was his omission of the situation in Guantanamo," the newspaper said, referring to the detention of terrorism suspects on the base.

Also marring the diplomats' visits were hard feelings about pressure from the U.S. ambassador on behalf of an investment fund's push for a share of a major power transmission company. Argentina rejected the U.S. firm's bid, and Burns termed the whole issue a misunderstanding.

Kirchner, Argentina's president, posed for photos with the U.S. envoys but generally distanced himself. It was not lost on the political class here that Bush will skip Argentina next month, but visit tiny Uruguay, just across the Rio de la Plata. Kirchner is weighing a reelection bid this year, and analysts say that being seen as too cozy with Washington is not smart politics.

Opportunity For Turks And Kurds? (WP)

By Richard Holbrooke

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

IRBIL, Iraqi Kurdistan -- Whatever happens in Iraq, we must try to limit the terrible fallout from the war. The place to start should be with our indispensable NATO ally Turkey, the front-line state of the post-Cold War era, whose relations with the United States have deteriorated dramatically in the past six years.

The immediate issue is raids by Kurdish terrorists across Turkey's border with Iraq, which divides an area inhabited on both sides by Kurds who have long felt that they deserve their own country. Despite centuries of enmity, rapprochement is in the long-term interests of both Turkey and the Kurds of northern Iraq. But such an effort would be controversial and could be undertaken only with strong American encouragement.

First, some essential background from Irbil, the capital of Iraqi Kurdistan, which I am visiting after talks with Turkish leaders in Ankara. This peaceful city is disorienting: Am I in war-torn Iraq or booming Kurdistan? Will Irbil eventually become the capital (or part) of an independent Kurdistan? Or will this region become a battleground for another war, this one between Kurds and Turks?

You can call this place Kurdistan, as its citizens do, or northern Iraq, as the Turks do. But either way, the overwhelming majority (98 percent in a 2005 referendum) of its 4 million people do not want to remain part of Iraq. Who can blame them? Nothing here feels like the Middle East. The Iraqi national flag is banned; only the Kurdistan flag flies. And although the Kurds are sending some of their famously fierce warriors to Baghdad to support the Americans, they fear that Gen. David Petraeus's plan to turn the tide in Baghdad will not succeed.

Ever since a nation called Iraq was carved out of the debris of the Ottoman Empire by Winston Churchill and Gertrude Bell at the Cairo Conference of 1921, Turkey and Iran have opposed independence for the Kurds of northern Iraq because both fear that an independent Kurdistan on their borders would encourage existing separatist movements among their large Kurdish populations.

This symmetry of fears has led to semi-secret discussions and even some cooperation between our NATO ally and that charter member of the "axis of evil" on dealing with the PKK, a terrorist group that has conducted raids against both Turkey and Iran from bases just inside northern Iraq for many years. I would not rule out limited Turkish military action against some of those bases -- especially since Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan is under enormous political pressure to show strong nationalist credentials against hawkish rivals in an election year.

After years of mishandling relations with Turkey, last year the administration appointed retired Gen. Joe Ralston, the universally respected former NATO commander, as special envoy for the PKK problem. Ralston's intervention helped avoid a Turkish attack in Iraq last summer, and he is accelerating his efforts to get Irbil to rein in the PKK.

But there is a larger issue: the final status of Kirkuk, the multiethnic city that sits in the middle of a huge oil field and lies just outside the official boundaries of Iraqi Kurdistan. The new Iraqi constitution calls for a referendum this year on whether Kirkuk is to be incorporated into the Kurdistan region. The Turks -- who refer repeatedly to the dangers to the Turkmen, their ethnic cousins who live in Kirkuk -- have said that they will not accept such an event. Avoiding a full-blown crisis will require intense mediation by the United States; unfortunately, Ralston's current mandate does not include Kirkuk.

Despite their history, Turkey and Iraqi Kurdistan need each other. Kurdistan could become a buffer between Turkey and the chaos to the south, while Turkey could become the protector of a Kurdistan that, though still technically part of Iraq, is effectively cut loose from a Baghdad government that may no longer function. In addition, Turkey has a major economic opportunity in northern Iraq; already, more than 300 Turkish companies and substantial investment are a primary engine of Kurdish growth.

DOJ_NMG_0130440

Rapprochement would require major undertakings by both sides. The legendary Kurdish leader who is now president of the Kurdish regional government, Massoud Barzani, needs to rein in the PKK and pledge not to interfere in Turkey's internal affairs. A compromise that took into account legitimate Turkish concerns would be necessary on Kirkuk; while this would be difficult, especially for the Turkish military, I believe it needs to be attempted, with strong American encouragement.

History and myth make a Turkish-Kurdish deal extremely difficult. It takes visionary leaders to alter the stream of history. Charles de Gaulle and Konrad Adenauer did it for France and Germany. Nelson Mandela did it in South Africa. But such people are very, very rare. Still, the crisis in Iraq requires Turks and Kurds to think of their common interest. Having just talked to the impressive leaders of both sides, I believe they understand that they face not just a crisis but an opportunity.

G-7 Seeks To Shed Overlapping Regulations (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

ESSEN, Germany -- Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson said he and other finance ministers in the Group of Seven leading industrial nations are exploring ways to reduce "duplicative" financial regulations and standards that burden companies doing business globally.

Mr. Paulson said the aim is to "break down artificial barriers" and harmonize regulations and standards so costs and other constraints on multinational companies are reduced.

"One of the biggest costs to business globally is duplicative regulation," Mr. Paulson said in a briefing with reporters during the G-7 meeting here during the weekend.

Mr. Paulson, the former head of Goldman Sachs Group Inc., said when he ran the investment bank, "I can't tell you how many hundreds of millions of dollars we paid dealing with regulations that were similar but different inside the U.S. and outside the U.S." He said many countries have strong regulatory regimes and it should be possible for nations to recognize one another's rules and standards.

In their official statement, the finance ministers said they "agreed to explore within the G-7 free trade in securities based on mutual recognition of regulatory regimes."

Mr. Paulson noted, though, that it is "something that will take a long time" given that many countries, including the U.S., have multiple regulators and overseers. He has planned a conference next month to discuss that overlap, along with other rules he believes may be handicapping U.S. companies.

The G-7, in its communiqué, agreed vigilance was needed on the potential risks that hedge funds and credit derivatives pose to financial stability. The group acknowledged hedge funds and derivatives "have contributed significantly to the efficiency of the financial system." The statement added that the growth of hedge funds and the instruments they invest in have made the assessment of risks to financial stability "more complex and challenging."

Mr. Paulson dismissed questions about the weakness of the yen, saying it is "market determined" and not being manipulated. While Germany and other European countries have complained that the yen is being manipulated, the G-7's final communiqué made no reference to the currency.

Mr. Paulson's comments could put him at odds with several top Democrats on Capitol Hill, who wrote Mr. Paulson last week saying they "believe a weak yen is a reflection of Japanese government policy." The Democrats, including Michigan Reps. John Dingell and Sander Levin, said the weak yen is assisting Japanese car imports and hurting U.S. auto makers. Mr. Paulson is scheduled to travel to Japan next month.

While the communiqué didn't single out the yen, it said Japan's recovery is "on track and is expected to continue" and that G-7 members "are confident that the implications of these developments will be recognized by market participants and will be incorporated in their assessment of risks." According to G-7 officials, those statements were intended to draw attention to the possibility the yen and Japanese interest rates will rise as the recovery continues.

Notoriety Of President Morales Roils Area's Bolivian Community (WP)

By Pamela Constable And Karin Brulliard

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

On weekend nights, the dance floor at Cecilia's Club in Arlington County pulsates with strobe lights and salsa dancers. But one recent Saturday afternoon, this social hub of the region's large Bolivian population became a sober forum for debate on the political storm that has convulsed the immigrants' native country and sent shock waves through their quiet, prosperous community.

DOJ_NMG_0130441

The storm has a name: Evo Morales. He is the charismatic indigenous leader whose election as Bolivia's president just over a year ago brought new pride to the impoverished South American nation. Now, his radical rhetoric and friendships with foreign leftist leaders such as Venezuela's Hugo Chavez are causing consternation in both Bolivia and the United States.

"People are always asking me about Morales. No one ever asked me about any Bolivian president before," said Miriam Rodriguez of Fairfax, who helped organize the forum. "But now we see him making mistakes, following in the steps of Chavez, being pushed to hate America. We want to make sure he does the right thing, because everyone is watching us now."

Greater Washington is home to the largest population of Bolivian immigrants in the United States, with 37 percent of the total. Census figures show that more than 20,000 Bolivian-born immigrants live in the area, but activists and diplomats say the community is more than three times that size. Although smaller and less visible than the area's Central American populace, Bolivians and Peruvians constitute its largest South American immigrant groups.

Bolivians are also one of the oldest and most successful Hispanic communities in the area. Most came here for economic reasons rather than fleeing conflict, and on average they have higher income and education levels than U.S.-born Americans. Although some Bolivians toil at menial jobs, many are professionals or own small businesses.

Bolivians here have clung tightly to their roots, establishing dozens of folklore groups, three soccer leagues in Northern Virginia and a weekend school in Arlington where children study Bolivian traditions. Many fly to Bolivia often to visit relatives or have invested in binational ventures.

Yet surprisingly, they have never formed an ethnic enclave or become politically active as a group. Although many are eligible to vote, almost none has run for local office, and most have avoided becoming involved in the public debate about immigrant rights.

"Bolivians here have been unperceived for many reasons," said Ruddy Orellana, editor of Los Tiempos, a Bolivian-owned newspaper in Falls Church. "They have been peaceful and their kids have not gotten involved in gangs. They have been ambitious in business but have not reached for political influence. . . . They have been scattered and dispersed."

In the past year, however, Morales's election has plunged this quiet community into a political maelstrom. Morales, 47, rose to prominence as a leader of coca-leaf growers, whose crop produces cocaine but also has traditional uses such as tea. He led peasants in highway blockades and opposed U.S. drug eradication policies, saying they unfairly punished poor farmers.

Most Bolivians here say they initially welcomed Morales's presidency as a change from elitist and military governments, but many say they became indignant and alarmed as he has antagonized domestic opponents and befriended Chavez and Cuba's Fidel Castro.

"We were all tired of corrupt governments, and we were all excited when Morales won," said Monica Williams, president of the Washington-based Bolivian-American Chamber of Commerce. "But he is making mistakes and putting too much emphasis on native issues. We are beginning to see a clash of races and regions. It is polarizing the country."

In recent months, violent demonstrations have broken out in Bolivia, spurred by Morales's promises of an agrarian revolution, with large landowners pitted against landless peasants. Critics say his government has become increasingly confrontational, and opposition leaders have accused him of seeking to impose a totalitarian regime.

Wherever Bolivians gather here, the mention of Morales provokes animated debate. Last Sunday at the Iglesia Santa Maria in Falls Church, whose Episcopal congregation is 90 percent Bolivian, some worshipers expressed fears that his government would seize their family land. But one man counseled patience, adding, "The important thing is that people are participating."

At an indoor gym nearby, men watched two teams of sweaty indoor soccer players chase a blue soccer ball. Gustavo Chalco, a house painter who lives in Burke, said everyone had hoped Morales was going to change things. "But now we are at the edge of a civil war," he said.

Jose Martinez, a gray-haired construction worker, said he dreams of returning home but is no longer sure what awaits him. "Bad image for my country, Evo. Bad image," he said.

In a glassy, modern office in Rosslyn, Oscar Bazoberry, a high-tech developer and venture capitalist, said he admires Morales's concern for the poor but worries that his administration will alienate rather than attract the foreign investment Bolivia needs to develop. So far, his economic policies have stressed nationalizing resources such as natural gas and mining.

"For the first time, Bolivia has a government that cares about the needs of the indigenous poor, but they have no understanding of capital markets and how to make a real dent in development," Bazoberry said. "Morales has put Bolivia on the map, but now that it is a player, let's play."

Some indigenous Bolivians in the area remain enthusiastic about Morales, who has promoted indigenous activists to senior positions and elevated their status in a society long stratified among white, mixed-race and indigenous inhabitants.

DOJ_NMG_0130442

Julia Garcia, 58, principal of Escuela Boliva, the weekend school in Arlington, said she still remembers childhood taunts from classmates back home about her Indian-style braids and Quechuan accent.

"I think the high elites never thought we would educate ourselves . . . and be at a level to speak with them," Garcia said. She acknowledged that Morales had made mistakes but said he should not abandon his agenda. "There is a new dawn" in Bolivia, she said.

But others express conflicted feelings about the man who is championing their cause. Elmer Herrera, a stonemason from Annandale and founder of an indigenous organization called Jach'a Uru, said Morales had proved that a Bolivian without pale skin and a foreign degree could rise to power. Yet Morales's refusal to compromise has led to increasingly sharp divisions, Herrera said.

"Evo is ruining the country," Herrera said. "We would like that in Bolivia, the rich and poor, the indigenous and non-indigenous, would sit at a table together."

Morales's emphasis on indigenous rights has hit a sensitive nerve in the area. Although many Bolivian immigrants speak Quechua and join folkloric groups, they are also anxious to blend into American life and not be singled out as an ethnic or racial minority.

"There is a lot of racism," said Alicia Ruiz, who organizes day laborers in Falls Church. Many Bolivians here don't want to acknowledge that they are part Indian, she said. "They ask how a peasant can govern us."

Immigrant leaders are especially concerned about U.S.-Bolivian relations, which have been tested by Morales's role as a champion of coca growers and by his high-profile friendships with Chavez and Castro. Proud of their pro-American values, some Bolivians fear being tarred with the Morales brush.

The Bolivian Embassy in Washington has done little to win them over. For much of last year there was no ambassador, and the new one arrived just as his government proposed that Bolivian residents in the United States obtain costly visas to travel to their homeland.

"We want to have an open door," Ambassador Gustavo Guzman asserted. "People here want us to maintain very good relations with the USA. They worry how close we are becoming to Cuba and Venezuela. They tell us, 'Please be careful. If relations are hurt, we will be the ones who suffer.' "

Yet even immigrants strongly opposed to Morales's views say they want to avert a political crisis in their homeland, which has a long history of instability and military coups.

"We are all Bolivians, and none of us wants to see a divided Bolivia," Williams said. "I am not crazy about Morales, but we have to give him the benefit of the doubt. All we ask is that he bring the country together, that he speak for all Bolivians, not just some of us."

French Contender Makes Her Presidential Case (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

PARIS, Feb. 11 — France's Socialist presidential candidate, Ségolène Royal, presented her long-awaited presidential program in a two-hour speech on Sunday, hoping to dispel criticism that she is a pretty face without fundamental policies and to reverse a slide in opinion polls.

Dressed in a bright red blazer and speaking to a hall of 15,000 cheering, flag-waving party loyalists, Ms. Royal promised a new kind of French politics based on closer attention to the will of the people through American-style town hall meetings, Internet-based dialogue and national referendums.

Her program was studded with promises and proposals meant to address desires filtered from the more than 700,000 people who attended what her campaign organization puts at 6,500 public meetings since November, together with tens of thousands of ideas left by visitors to her Web site.

"Today I offer you the presidential pact," Ms. Royal told the rally, held northeast of the capital in the industrial suburb of Villepinte. "One hundred proposals for France to rediscover a shared ambition, pride and fraternity."

It remains to be seen whether the speech will give her the momentum to recover her lead over her center-right opponent, Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy. But it failed to impress her harshest critics.

"In the end, she gave a nice speech for a minister of social affairs," said Alain Duhamel, a leading political analyst and the author of "The 2007 Pretenders," a book published in 2006 about France's presidential candidates whose first edition failed to include Ms. Royal at all because Mr. Duhamel did not take her seriously.

Ms. Royal, 53, the daughter of an Army colonel, graduated from the elite École Nationale d'Administration and was appointed as an adviser to François Mitterrand after working on his successful 1981 presidential campaign. She served as minister of the environment and later as deputy minister of school education and as deputy minister of family and childhood. She has also served in Parliament for the Deux-Sèvres department in western France; she was elected president of its regional council in 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0130443

But her most visible position has been as photogenic partner to François Hollande, the head of the Socialist Party, with whom she has four children. She appeared early last year as a potential presidential candidate for the party, which was riven by rivalries among its aging bosses.

By the time she won the nomination last fall, Ms. Royal was polling far ahead of other potential candidates. But a series of blunders, particularly in foreign affairs, have added to criticism that she would be out of her depth as France's senior stateswoman.

During a Middle East trip last year, she met a Lebanese Parliament member from Hezbollah who compared Israel to Nazi Germany and criticized American "insanity." She responded, "I agree with a lot of the things you have said, notably your analysis of the U.S."

During a visit to China, where the time between arrest and execution can be a matter of weeks, she appeared to compliment her hosts in saying, "Sometimes the justice is swifter than in France."

Following a meeting in Paris with André Boisclair, head of Canada's pro-independence Parti Québécois, she spoke to Canadian journalists of "common values, namely the freedom and sovereignty of Quebec," infuriating Canada's prime minister.

She has also run into problems at home. When asked on a radio talk show last month about the hotly debated merger of two French utility giants, Suez and Gaz de France, she turned to an aide and asked, "Where do we stand on that?"

When the interviewer asked her how many nuclear-armed submarines France had, she said one. The interviewer shot back, "No, seven," and Ms. Royal corrected herself, only to be told that it was four.

She has even appeared out of step with her partner, Mr. Hollande, who harbored presidential ambitions himself before she swept him aside. She was reportedly furious after he suggested, without consulting her, that a Socialist government would raise taxes on people earning more than about $5,200 a month. He was forced to retract the statement.

Hounded by bad press, she has slipped by as much as nine percentage points in polls since last month, when the Union for a Popular Movement party endorsed Mr. Sarkozy as its candidate. He has since edged ahead. Sunday's speech was meant to help Ms. Royal regain the field.

Before she appeared on stage, the lights dimmed and techno music filled the hall, including a rendition of the rap hit "Don't Phunk With My Heart." But what followed was a fairly typical, though very long, Socialist Party stump speech, embellished with Ms. Royal's pet proposals.

The proposals are often seen as innovative (giving people who have rented state-subsidized housing for 15 years or more a chance to buy their apartments), impractical (allowing citizens who collect a million or more signatures to propose legislation) or simplistic (paying retirement pensions monthly instead of quarterly and offering free birth control to women under 25).

As with most politicians making promises on the campaign trail, she did not say how she would finance her plans.

She accused the current government of doing "nearly nothing" to address the problems of disenfranchised second-generation immigrant youth, who were responsible for a wave of urban violence in 2005. She warned that without action, there would be even more "extreme violence" that would not be limited to poor neighborhoods.

She avoided delving too deeply into foreign policy.

Of the United States, with which President Jacques Chirac has been at odds over the Iraq war, she said: "We will live with them, as a solid partner, trustworthy, but without complexes either. Size has nothing to do with principles. An imbalance of power is not a reason to stay silent, and we have seen it, indeed, with Iraq. The voice of France, as it was, unfortunately wasn't heard. But it didn't ring any less true.

"And I would like, in the future, for it to continue to ring true and I would like that, by speaking louder and stronger, our voice will carry further."

France's Royal Introduces Platform Ahead Of Election (WSJ)

By Alessandra Galloni And David Gauthier-villars

The Wall Street Journal, February 12, 2007

PARIS -- French presidential hopeful Ségolène Royal sought to recover from her recent decline in election polls by unveiling a long-awaited platform focused on social programs, including higher minimum wage, pensions and unemployment payouts.

But a lack of specifics on key economic policies, such as how to finance new social spending and concrete proposals on how to tackle the country's high unemployment rate, are likely to leave France's business community cold.

"She avoided talking in depth about sticky issues," says Marc Touati, chairman of ACDE, an association promoting the study of France's economy. Over the past 18 months, Ms. Royal's simple proposition of listening to the people has transformed her from a minor politician in France's Socialist Party to one of the two front-runners in the race to succeed current President Jacques Chirac. Over the past few weeks, however, her popularity has waned vis-à-vis her main rival, conservative candidate Nicolas Sarkozy, in part because of a series of foreign-policy gaffes, but also because she waited until 10 weeks before the election to unveil her official platform. Mr. Sarkozy unveiled his in mid-January.

DOJ_NMG_0130444

Ms. Royal has justified her schedule by saying she needed enough time to gather the ideas of French people around the country by holding 6,100 town-hall meetings and sifting through suggestions of 2.8 million visitors to her Web site.

In her two-hour speech before 20,000 supporters in an auditorium near Paris yesterday, Ms. Royal stuck to her trademark crowd-pleasing tactics, including distancing herself from the official Socialist Party platform and promising to give people a greater role in government. For example, in presenting her 100-point "presidential pact," she stuck to her idea of introducing so-called citizen juries, or ordinary people chosen randomly to oversee elected officials, a proposal that has rankled many in her own party.

"You have suggested many things that are simple and true," she said, referring to the town-hall meetings that she says formed the basis of her platform. During the speech, she pledged that, if elected, workers who lose their jobs would receive 90% of their salaries during their first year without a job and promised to increase pensions by 5%. She also promised to build 120,000 units of state-subsidized housing and offer young people a €10,000 ($13,000) loan to finance business projects and get started in life.

"The speech is likely to stop her decline in the polls and is in line with her approach so far," says Zaki Laïdi, a professor at the Institute d'Études Politiques in Paris. What remains unclear, however, is how she plans to finance the measures. "The most astounding thing is that she didn't say anything about tax policy," adds Mr. Laïdi.

Business leaders have been concerned with Ms. Royal's economic rhetoric so far, including promises to give more power to unions -- a pledge she confirmed yesterday, adding that unions should receive state aid to "promote a mass unionization."

Yesterday, Ms. Royal said she wanted to "reconcile people and their companies," promising to give tax breaks to companies that invest in research and development and raising the overall state budget in research initiatives. But in her speech, she also pledged that, if elected, she would raise the minimum wage to €1,500 per month from €1,254 per month -- something unlikely to please the business community, which was instead hoping to have more details on Ms. Royal's view regarding France's 35-hour workweek and overall job-creation measures.

Ms. Royal also said she wanted to placate public "wrath" over France's 22% unemployment rate among young people, but she gave few details on how to overhaul the job market to make it easier for employers to hire young people.

Early in the speech, Ms. Royal said she wanted to tackle France's public debt, which has soared to 66% of gross domestic product, compared with about 20% 25 years ago, because of high public spending and a chronic budget deficit.

"It's a good thing that she started her speech with the issue of debt, it shows she's aware of the problem," says Mr. Touati, adding, "But it's a pity she didn't say more."

Falling In Polls, French Socialist Offers Platform (WP)

By Molly Moore

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

PARIS, Feb. 11 -- French Socialist Party candidate SÃ©golÃ¨ne Royal, attempting to rejuvenate a faltering bid to become the country's first female president, announced a 100-point platform Sunday that includes sending juvenile delinquents to military-style boot camps and providing free contraceptives to women younger than 25.

Royal billed the two-hour speech, delivered before an estimated 15,000 party members but aimed at a national television audience, as a response to critics who say she has articulated few substantive proposals and has leaned too heavily on her femininity and personality.

"The time of imagination and daring has arrived," Royal, clad in a red dress suit and frequently flashing her trademark photogenic smile, told a cheering, placard-waving crowd. "I will forget no one, because France, in order to recover, needs every man and woman."

Royal, who was leading opinion polls in the presidential race just a few weeks ago, has slipped eight points behind her main rival, Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy of the ruling Union for a Popular Movement party, or UMP. Her campaign has been plagued by blunders, gaffes and internal party disputes that included a public spat over taxes between Royal and the party's head -- who is also her longtime partner and the father of her four children.

In the past week, French newspapers and magazines have switched from publishing pictures of a smiling Royal to showing a frowning or scowling Royal.

She was criticized by party members and political commentators for waiting until Sunday, just 10 weeks before election day, to announce her party platform. Royal justified the delay by saying she was unwilling to draft the platform until she and the party had conducted hundreds of public meetings and interviews across France and on the Internet to allow the French people to have input in shaping the platform.

DOJ_NMG_0130445

Her proposals, many of which reflect mainstays of the Socialist Party, include increases in retirement benefits for the lowest wage earners, raising the minimum wage, a guarantee of affordable and safe housing for life for the country's poorest citizens, and loans of up to $13,000 to every young person to help give them a start in life.

"As a mother, I want all the children who are born and grow up in France to have the same as my own children," said Royal, 53, who sprinkled the speech with references to motherhood.

In a statement, the opposing UMP party said Royal had proposed "large public expenditures, an omnipresent state, but the candidate abstained from details of how to finance her program."

Royal's platform also contains several controversial ideas she floated earlier in the campaign, including the use of military-style training for juvenile delinquents and the creation of "citizen juries" to critique the performance of elected officials.

She suggested reforming the government bureaucracy by eliminating some ministerial posts.

Royal accused the United States of making mistakes in Iraq "because of its power," adding that France should be a solid partner with the United States but should not be intimidated by it.

Low Turnout Undercuts Portugal Vote On Abortion (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, February 12, 2007

LISBON, Feb. 11 — Portugal voted decisively in a referendum on Sunday to liberalize its restrictive abortion law, but the result was not considered valid because of low voter turnout.

Still, Prime Minister José Sócrates, a Socialist who supported the liberalization, declared victory and said he would ask Parliament, where his party enjoys a comfortable majority, to change the law.

“The people spoke with a clear voice,” Mr. Sócrates said in televised remarks after the polls closed. He added: “The law now will be discussed and approved in Parliament. Our interest is to fight clandestine abortion and we have to produce a law that respects the result of the referendum.”

The vote was 59.25 percent in favor and 40.75 percent opposed, with a turnout of slightly less than 44 percent of the 8.8 million eligible voters.

At least 50 percent of eligible voters needed to cast ballots for the results to be legally binding.

In many urban centers, the margin in favor of changing the law was much higher than at the national level. In Lisbon, for example, 71.5 percent voted in favor, 28.5 percent opposed; in Faro, in the Algarve region of southern Portugal, 73.6 percent were in favor, 26.4 percent opposed.

Supporters and opponents of abortion, political commentators and pollsters attributed the lack of voter participation to the episodically rainy weather, voter apathy and even ignorance.

“Referendums, unlike regular elections, often deal with complicated issues, and people who are not politically motivated or informed have a problem making the decision to vote,” Pedro Magalhães, a pollster at Catholic University of Lisbon, said on state-run RTP1 television.

Other commentators explained that the political elite misread popular opinion in assuming that a broad range of people would declare their position at the polls.

“There are two Portugals, the Portugal of the elite — politicians, newspapers and television — and the Portugal of the people,” said João Marcelino, director of the mass-circulation daily tabloid Correio da Manhã. “The people are more concerned about unemployment, their salaries, the health system. The real country doesn’t consider the issue of abortion important.”

Despite the low turnout, supporters of abortion rights were jubilant.

“Finally after thirty years of democracy in Portugal we now can pass a law that will not treat women as criminals,” said Maria Antónia Santos, a Socialist deputy. “This is the first step toward eliminating the reality of backstreet abortions. Now it’s our responsibility to pass a good law.”

Opponents of a change in the law said that the referendum’s failure to attract at least half the electorate meant that Mr. Sócrates was wrong to call for a change in the law.

“Sócrates will be responsible for this sad chapter in Portugal’s history for insisting on a political move that has split Portuguese society,” José Ribeiro e Castro, head of the center-right Partido Popular, said in televised remarks. He added that the low voter turnout confirmed that for the Portuguese, abortion “was not a critical issue.”

A similar referendum in 1998 took place on a sunny Sunday in June, when many Portuguese were at the beach. Only 32 percent of the electorate turned up at the polls, voting by a razor-thin margin to retain the existing law. That result was declared invalid and the restrictive 1984 law remained unchanged.

DOJ_NMG_0130446

In the latest referendum, both supporters and opponents of abortion, including the Catholic Church, had urged voters to cast ballots. The referendum asked voters whether they approved legalizing abortion in the first 10 weeks of pregnancy and would have allowed women to openly seek medical support from the state-run health system.

During the day, clerics used their sermons at Sunday Mass in many parishes throughout this overwhelmingly Catholic country to remind parishioners of their duty to vote — and to vote no.

"Before baptism a life already exists that must be appreciated divinely as a gift from the creator," said Rev. Lourenço Sebastião Dias during his sermon in a Lisbon church that was broadcast on state-run RDP radio.

Mr. Sócrates had campaigned in favor of a change in the law, one of the most restrictive in the 25-nation European Union.

He had said the country's identity was at stake in the referendum. "The choice placed before Portugal is whether it resigns itself to staying in the group of the most conservative countries or if it embraces modernity," he said Thursday.

Portugal is also the only European Union member that has put on trial women who undergo illegal abortions, the health care providers who perform them and even "accomplices" like husbands or family members who might accompany them to backstreet abortionists.

The current law in Portugal allows abortion until the 12th week of pregnancy in case of "mental and physical risk," until 16 weeks in case of rape, until 24 weeks in case of a malformed fetus and at any time if the woman's life is in danger. It imposes prison sentences of up to three years for a woman who undergoes an illegal abortion and up to eight years for the person who illegally performs it.

No More Pneumonia (WP)

The Washington Post, February 12, 2007

IN ROME LAST week, a group of leading industrialized nations backed one of those rare ideas that is popular, cost-effective and highly consequential for the world's poor. The United States was not among them -- a mistake we hope U.S. policymakers will correct as the initiative proceeds.

Currently, drug companies do not have a strong incentive to develop new medications or to increase production capacity to serve low-income countries. There's demand in developing nations for everything from better anti-retrovirals to new malaria medication, but the money isn't there, especially given the fickleness of foreign aid. So manufacturers face the unappealing prospect of investing hundreds of millions into drug development and production plants only to see the money available to buy their product disappear.

The solution Italy, Britain, Russia and a few other countries endorsed is in essence a promise to buy medication from any company willing to develop it according to World Health Organization standards and sell it at a certain price. Purchases would continue for at least 10 years, a commitment that would make the market more predictable, and the product would be delivered to poor countries.

Ultimately, donor nations hope to spur development of new drugs against malaria, HIV-AIDS and tuberculosis. But they selected pneumococcus, which causes pneumonia, meningitis and other deadly illnesses, as a test case for the scheme, and committed to buy about $1.5 billion worth of new vaccine for use in poorer countries.

Backers of the plan say that pneumococcus is a natural place to start. It is an unheralded killer, responsible for the deaths of 2 million children a year -- much larger than the annual AIDS toll. Yet the amount of money devoted to developing and producing new drugs to treat pneumococcus infections is tiny compared with that for other high-profile diseases. And, because there are drugs on the market in rich countries that effectively protect humans from the bacterium, the $1.5 billion carrot could have an effect quickly. Drug companies will rapidly decide whether or not to invest in new production capacity.

Notably absent from the agreement so far is America's contribution, even though the plan is a relatively cheap, market-based approach that could eliminate a major killer in the developing world. If the pneumococcus test case produces results, the United States should join similar ventures.

DOJ_NMG_0130447

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, February 12, 2007 8:11 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Sunday, February 11, 2007
Attachments:	dojclips070211.pdf; dojclips070211.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Homeland Response:

More Airline Pilots Toting Guns After 9/11 Attacks (LAT) 3

War News:

Path In Iraq Hard But Not Hopeless, U.S. General Says (WP)...3
New Boss Takes Reins Of U.S. Forces In Iraq (NYT) 4
New U.S. Commander In Iraq Says "Barbarians" Must Be Defeated (LAT) 6
Third U.S. Commander Takes Over In Iraq, Vows Support (WT/AP) 7
Iraq Resolution Typifies Rift In Senate (WP) 8
Victory Is Not An Option (WP) 10
A Road Map Out Of Iraq (LAT) 12
Legitimacy Was Step One (WP) 14
The Diplomats On Capitol Hill (WP) 15
At This Point, It's Kamikaze Strategy In Iraq (LAT) 16
Blame (Blank) For Iraq (NYT) 17
U.S. Keeps Pressure On Iran But Decreases Saber Rattling (WP) 19
Iran Reformists Want U.S. To Tone It Down (LAT) 21
U.S. To Reveal Tehran's Link To Iraq Insurgency (WT/AP) ...23
Merkel: Must Stop Iran Getting Nuclear Weapons (AP) 23
Suicide Bomber Kills 30 Near Tikrit (AP) 24
KBR Driver Killed By U.S. Forces In Iraq (HC) 25
Iowa Guardsmen Are Proud But Disappointed (WP) 25
To Protest War, Councilman Forgoes The Pledge (NYT/AP) 27
Taliban Stepping Up Attacks In Afghanistan (NYT) 27
NATO: Afghanistan On Road To Stability (AP) 28
Attack In Pakistan On Red Cross Office (NYT) 28
Defense, Not Pork (LAT) 28

DOJ:

Lam Shows Her Personal Side During School Forum (SDUT) 29
Prosecutor Roulette As More U.S. Attorneys Are Fired, The Specter Of A Political Spoils System Is Unmistakable (ALBANYTU) 30
Editorial Tampering With Justice (SEATIMES) 31
Editorial: Wanted: A U.S. Attorney (BVND) 31
U.S. Attorney Garcia On Public Corruption Cases: We're Not Done (NYJN) 32
Robins Lawyer Fighting Removal As Sexual Assault Prosecutor (MACT) 33

Criminal Law:

Pay-to-play Ticket To Power In Lake County? (NWT) 36
WiFi Turns Internet Into Hideout For Criminals (WP) 37
The Dying Death Penalty? (WP) 39

Civil Law:

Editorial: Pay Up: Maybe We Could Help People If Feds Could Collect (LONGNJ) 40

Civil Rights:

In Search Of Justice (JCL) 41
Local Inmate Claims Guards Beat Him To Near Death (WILNJ) 42
Noxubee's Bill For Voting Right Trial Tops $25,000 So Far (MEMCD) 45
Human Trafficking Legislation Is Pushed (LCJ) 45
Justice Dept. Major Player In Every Step Schools Make (MEMCD) 46
Leaders See A Black America Sailing Off Course (WP/AP) 48
States Fund Anti-abortion Efforts (LAT) 48
Slavery And Remorse (WP) 50

Environment:

Updating Bush's Spin On Climate Change (LAT) 51
T.R.? He's No T.R. (NYT) 53
Wash Your Hands! (WP) 53

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Will L.A.'s Strategy To Battle Gangs Work? (LAT) 54

Immigration:

A Town That Wants Illegal Immigrants (LAT) 56

Congress-Administration:

Bush Seeks Teacher Merit-pay Funds (WT) 58
Broad Voucher Plan Is Approved In Utah (NYT/AP) 59
Critics Question Education Department's Screening (NYT) .. 59
Bush's Proposed Health-Care Cuts Get Mixed Reviews (WP) 61
Happy Talk In Bush's Budget (WP) 62
Stem-cell Researchers Look Beyond The Embryo (WT) 63
Congress Finds Ways To Avoid Lobbyist Limits (NYT) 66
S.D. Senator Starts Working From Hospital (LAT/AP) 68
Questions For Dr. Andrew C. Von Eschenbach: Put To The Test (NYT) 69

Other News:

Obama Joins Race With Goals Set High (WP) 70
Obama Invokes Lincoln For Run (WT) 71
Obama Launches Campaign With Emphasis On Grassroots (HILL) 72
It's Official: Obama Is Running For President (LAT) 73
Obama Formally Enters Presidential Race (NYT) 75
The Audacity Of Barack Obama (POL) 77
Frigid Weather Tests Crowd's Fortitude (WP) 78
Obama: I'm Running For President (CHIT) 78
Obama Urges Iowans To Join Him Against Cynicism (DMR) 80
Obama Announces Presidential Bid In Illinois (AP) 81
Obama Declares He's Running For President (CNN) 82
Obama Formally Joins '08 Presidential Race (GAN) 84
Recalling A Natural (WP) 85
Australian Leader: Al-Qaeda Wants Obama (AP) 88
Decoding The Debate Over The Blackness Of Barack Obama (NYT) 88
Stop Him Before He Gets More Experience (NYT) 89
Clinton Cheered In N.H.; Some War Foes Skeptical (POL) ... 91
Clinton Campaigns In New Hampshire (WP) 92
In New Hampshire, Clinton Owns Up To Her Vote On Iraq War (NYT) 93
Clinton Draws Crowds In First NH Stops (NHUL) 94
People Had Points To Make To Hillary (NHUL) 96
Hillary Deflects Pressure To Repudiate Iraq Vote (WT/AP) 97
Hillary Faces Tough Questions On Iraq (NSDY) 98
Spielberg For Hillary (NOVAK) 99
Campaign Bloggers Caught In Web (LAT) 100
Searching For Mr. Right (NYT) 101
The Limits Of Sunniness (WP) 102
McCain Taps Cash He Sought To Limit (WP) 104
A Conversation With Sen. John McCain (STPETE) 106
Giuliani Praises Bush's Iraq Policy, Foresight (LAT) 108
"America's Mayor" Praises Bush In State GOP Speech (SFC) 109
Giuliani Announces Candidacy, Or Then Again, Maybe Not (NYT) 110
Giuliani Strikes A Note With California GOP (WP) 111
Romney, Brownback Makes Pitches To Michigan Republicans (AP) 112
Romney Courts State GOP (SLPD) 112
A Massachusetts Conservative (BOS) 114
Profit And Public Health (WP) 116
Who's Afraid Of The New Economy? (NYT) 117
Unmasking Our Pain In New Orleans (WP) 118
Putin Hits U.S. Over Unilateral Practices (WP) 120
Putin Says U.S. Is Undermining Global Stability (NYT) 122
Putin Says U.S. Militarism Fosters Global Instability (LAT) ... 124
Putin Accuses U.S. Of Sparking Arms Race (AP) 126
Putin Hits U.S. Use Of Force (WT/AP) 127
Putin Stuns With Attack On US (AFP) 128
Putin's Speech: Back To Cold War? (BBC) 129
Putin In First Saudi State Visit (BBC) 130
Talks With N. Korea Extended To 4th Day (WP) 131
New Setback In North Korean Nuclear Talks (NYT) 131
US Envoy Says Time To 'Wrap Up' NKorea Talks (AFP) 132
Analysis: N. Korea Debating Nuke Future (AP) 133
Palestinian Tout Unity Deal To World (AP) 134
A Very Partial Palestinian Peace (NYT) 135
Calm Prevails In Jerusalem On Day After Excavation Clashes (NYT) 135
Clashes By Jerusalem Holy Site Continue (AP) 137
Protest Targets Tourists, Police (WT/AP) 138
Jewish Inroads In Muslim Quarter (WP) 138
Portugal To Vote On Putting End To Abortion Ban (NYT) 142
Bosnia Defies U.N. Over Dismissals In Police (NYT) 144
After Castro Dies, Will There Be Chaos Or Calm? (LAT) 145
Inflation, Food Scarcity Roil Venezuela (LAT) 147
After So Many Deaths, Too Many Births (NYT) 148
Death By Dollars (NYT) 149

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

More Airline Pilots Toting Guns After 9/11 Attacks (LAT)

By Ken Kaye

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2007

FORT LAUDERDALE, FLA. — Five years after the Sept. 11 attacks, a growing number of U.S. airline pilots are armed, prepared to use lethal force to protect the cockpit. Soon, they will carry badges, bringing them even closer to being bona fide law enforcement officers.

"Every cop has that metal badge to flash," said John Mazor, spokesman for the Air Line Pilots Assn. "It is a valid recognition signal between law enforcement officers."

About 8,000 pilots carry government-issued guns on a voluntary basis, or about 8% of the nation's 100,000 pilots, according to the Airline Pilots Security Alliance, a volunteer organization that advocates increased cockpit security. Two years ago, about 3,000 pilots were armed.

These pilots, officially known as federal flight deck officers, keep sidearms handy to provide one more layer of security and a last line of defense against hijackers.

Although there have been no reports of pilots drawing their weapons since the Sept. 11 attacks, the federal government has granted pilots slightly more leeway in how they take guns on board planes.

Notably, pilots now can lock their guns into holsters, which are then placed in a discreet bag. After pilots are in the cockpit, the holsters are removed from the bag and latched onto their belts. Previously, the guns had to be transported onto planes in a heavy steel box.

To further fold pilots into the police community, the federal flight deck officer program has been placed under the Federal Air Marshal Service, an arm of the Transportation Security Administration. Last month, the marshal service approved issuing badges to pilots so they are more easily identifiable.

"We're a law enforcement agency, so we understand the culture they're trying to develop as federal flight deck officers," said Federal Air Marshal Service spokesman Conan Bruce.

To become flight deck officers, pilots undergo six days of intense training at a federal complex in Artesia, N.M., including weapons handling and close-combat techniques.

Most important, Bruce said, they learn "how to use the appropriate level of force."

About 50 pilots are trained each week. After graduation, the TSA issues the pilots a Heckler & Koch .40 caliber semiautomatic revolver.

WAR NEWS:

Path In Iraq Hard But Not Hopeless, U.S. General Says (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 10 -- Gen. David H. Petraeus, assuming his position as the new U.S. military commander in Iraq, said Saturday that the "rucksack of responsibility" was too heavy to carry alone there and that without cooperation between Iraqi and U.S. forces, "Iraq will be doomed to continued violence and civil strife."

During a handover ceremony below the crystal chandelier and marble columns in one of Saddam Hussein's former palaces, Petraeus characterized the challenges facing Iraq as daunting but said that "these tasks are achievable, this mission is doable." Promoted to the rank of four-star general, Petraeus will lead a growing U.S. force of more than 130,000 troops in Iraq in an attempt to contain the sectarian killing, especially in violence-racked Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0130451

"The situation in Iraq is exceedingly challenging, the stakes are very high, the way ahead will be hard and undoubtedly there will be many tough days," Petraeus said in a 5 1/2 -minute address to a gathering of Iraqi and U.S. generals, ambassadors and other officers and dignitaries at Camp Victory on the western outskirts of Baghdad.

"However, hard is not hopeless," he said.

Petraeus, 54, a Princeton-educated military man who previously served as the commander of the 101st Airborne Division in the northern city of Mosul, and also led the U.S. military effort to train Iraqi soldiers, takes over from Gen. George W. Casey Jr., who will return to Washington as U.S. Army chief of staff after serving 2 1/2 years in the top position. Casey has been criticized for riding the inchoate Iraqi security forces too hard toward self-sufficiency. Petraeus, an expert in counterinsurgency tactics, is expected to rely on a more visible U.S. presence, sending his troops to live on smaller outposts within embattled Iraqi neighborhoods.

Casey said it was "too close in time" to judge the mistakes made on his watch.

"But I think the main point that people will debate for some time to come was whether I relied too much on Iraqi security forces to carry the security load and too little on coalition forces," he said. "But I'm certainly not ready to say that's a mistake, I'll let history judge that."

During the brief but formal handover ceremony, an Army band with the 1st Cavalry Division played the Iraqi and U.S. national anthems, and Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, the outgoing Central Command chief, passed a military flag to Petraeus. In the front row sat U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, along with the Iraqi general leading the Baghdad security plan, Lt. Gen. Abboud Gambar; Iraq's interior minister, Jawad al-Bolani; and the national security adviser, Mowaffak al-Rubaie.

Three more U.S. soldiers died on Friday, when explosives detonated inside a building in Diyala province north of Baghdad, the U.S. military said in a statement issued Saturday. The three soldiers, from Task Force Lightning, were hunting for a weapons cache in the building at the time of the blast, the military statement said. Four other soldiers were wounded in the explosion. A shop owner working nearby, Hussein al-Shimmari, 35, said the U.S. troops raided the house after coming under gunfire from the area. What appeared to be American helmets and parts of uniforms were strung up from a utility pole near the building after the explosion, Shimmari said.

At least two car bombs exploded Saturday in Baghdad, killing at least 14 people, Iraqi police said. The first bomb struck outside a bakery in the central Baghdad neighborhood of Karrada, killing seven people and wounding 13, said Brig. Abdulla Hassoun of the Interior Ministry. A second bomb in a parked car exploded outside a government communication center in Khamliyah, in eastern Baghdad, killing seven people and injuring nine, said Maj. Abdul Aziz Abdul Kareem of the Interior Ministry. Some believe members of the Mahdi Army, a powerful Shiite militia, operate there.

The Associated Press reported that the military confirmed that U.S. forces shot and killed a civilian contract truck driver Monday at Camp Anaconda, a huge air base north of Baghdad. The driver, who has not been identified, worked for KBR, a contracting subsidiary of Halliburton formerly known as Kellogg, Brown & Root.

In a letter to U.S. service members, Petraeus said: "The enemies of Iraq will shrink at no act, however barbaric. They will do all that they can to shake the confidence of the people and to convince the world that this effort is doomed. We must not underestimate them."

Before the ceremony, Casey stood outside overlooking a manmade lake and said his departure after 2 1/2 years left him feeling proud but "a little numb."

"Everything's not as I would have expected it to be or wanted it to be on my way out, but that's kind of the way things are," he said.

Casey said his greatest fear for the country is that "Iraqis can't put the past behind them."

"We liberated them from 35 years of tyranny; we can't liberate them from the fears and the prejudices that grew up in that 35 years. They have to do that themselves," he said. "I think they'll get past it, but if they don't, it'll be difficult."

New Boss Takes Reins Of U.S. Forces In Iraq (NYT)

By Damien Cave

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 10 — Gen. David H. Petraeus formally took command of American troops in Iraq on Saturday, declaring that the mission here is hard but not hopeless.

General Petraeus, who wore the fourth star of a full general for the first time during the transfer ceremony, succeeds Gen. George W. Casey Jr., who is returning to Washington to become the Army's chief of staff. The new commander will oversee 132,000 American troops currently in Iraq and thousands more on their way as part of a so-called surge that is widely considered the last, best effort to bring peace to a country increasingly riven by sectarian violence, crime and corruption.

General Petraeus, 54, and General Casey, 58, spoke at a formal ceremony on a military base outside Baghdad, striking tones of optimism and caution, while hinting at their different approaches to Iraq.

For the past two and a half years, General Casey has pushed for a speedy transfer of control to Iraqi security forces so that American troops could withdraw; General Petraeus, an expert in counterinsurgency, has instead supported a more active American role, in line with new White House demands.

"The rucksack of responsibility is very heavy," General Petraeus said, after beginning his speech with the Muslim greeting "salaam aleikum," or "peace be upon you."

"In truth, it is too heavy for any one person to bear, and we will all have to share the burdens and move forward together," he said.

"If we can do that and if we can help the people of Iraq do likewise, then the prospects for success are good," he said. "Failing that, Iraq will be doomed to continuing violence and civil strife and surely that is a prospect all must strive to a void. The stakes are very high."

General Casey, whose tactics have come under blistering attack recently in Congress, emphasized that Iraq would need to take responsibility for its own troubles if it was to ever move forward. Before the ceremony, he told reporters: "Everything is not as I would have expected it to be or wanted it to be on my way out. But that's kind of the way things are."

Asked about whether he had made any mistakes in his tenure, he said, "The main point that people will debate for some time to come is whether I relied too much on Iraqi security forces to carry the security load and too little on coalition forces."

"But I'm certainly not ready to say that's a mistake," he said. "I'll let history judge that."

He later added: "My greatest fear is that Iraqis can't put the past behind them. We liberated them from 35 years of tyranny. We can't liberate them from the fears and prejudices that grew up in that 35 years. They have to do that themselves."

A few hours later, the United States military announced in a statement that three American soldiers were killed Friday and four others wounded in an explosion at a building in Diyala Province, northeast of Baghdad. The statement said the explosion took place as the soldiers searched the building for weapons.

Residents of the area, just west of Baquba, said a gun battle between American troops and unidentified men followed the explosion, with American helicopters hovering overhead. It was just the latest sign of trouble in the area, a stronghold of Sunni Arab insurgents who recently have stepped up attacks on Shiite families and American forces. On Jan. 20, insurgents in the area shot down a Black Hawk helicopter, killing all 13 Americans aboard.

In the central Baghdad neighborhood of Karrada, a suicide car bomber killed five people and wounded 10 outside a bakery on Saturday. It was the latest in a recent series of bombings in the mostly Shiite area, and residents said that violence had become a numbing reality for them.

Mayson Umran, a bookstore owner, said she had been on her way to pick up sandwiches from a Kurdish kebab seller and friend when the explosion hit, shattering glass, destroying shops and scorching cars. She returned to discover her friend was killed, cut into pieces.

"It's become something normal," she said. "Even children have lost the sense of fear now because everyone is expecting an explosion at any minute."

"All of those who died today were simple people looking for their daily living," she said. "The terrorists want nothing but to keep Iraq unstable."

DOJ_NMG_0130453

Iraqi officials, faced with such relentless violence, seemed unsure of whether a new American commander — and the new plan — could stop the bloodshed. Among American military officers, General Petraeus is considered an imaginative leader with a deep understanding of Iraq's problems, culled from two tours here. But for some in Baghdad, his assumption of control looked routine.

"The commanders change every now and then," said Naseer al-Ani, a Sunni member of Parliament. "I don't think that changing the commander will have a significant impact on the American policy."

Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki did not attend the ceremony, though Iraq's security adviser and other officials were present. Sami al-Askari, an aide to the prime minister, said the Iraqi government supported General Petraeus and had high hopes for his tenure.

"The character of the commander affects the performance of the military command," he said. "General Casey had a certain perspective in fighting terrorism, but we hope that General Petraeus will be more cooperative with the Iraqi command based on his past experience in Iraq, and the relationship will be smoother and more positive."

New U.S. Commander In Iraq Says "Barbarians" Must Be Defeated (LAT)

By Tina Susman

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2007

BAGHDAD — Army Gen. David Petraeus took command of U.S. forces in Iraq today with a sober assessment of the job he faces and a warning that Iraq will be doomed if "barbarians" fueling violence across the country are not defeated.

As Petraeus took over the reigns from Gen. George Casey, who is leaving to become the new Army chief of staff, new reports of U.S. and Iraqi deaths illustrated the challenges cited by both men during the handover ceremony. U.S. military officials announced that at least three American troops had died in Diyala province, northeast of Baghdad, when a blast went off in a building they were scouring for weapons. In Baghdad, two car bombs went off, killing at least seven civilians.

The U.S. deaths brought to 36 the number of American troops killed in the first 10 days of February, representing one of the highest daily death rates since the war's start in March 2003. A brief military statement said in addition to the three killed, four soldiers from Task Force Lightning were killed in the Diyala incident, which occurred Friday.

U.S. and Iraqi forces mounted an offensive last month in Diyala, which hugs the Iranian border northeast of Baghdad. The military says it is a hotbed of Sunni Muslim extremists with ties to Al Qaeda. The leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq, Abu Musab Zarqawi, was killed in a U.S. air strike in June in Diyala, a region so notorious for insurgent attacks that Iraqi forces have refused to venture into much of it without U.S. backing.

At least 3,121 U.S. troops have died since the invasion of Iraq, according to the web site icasualties.org, which tracks civilian and military casualties in the war.

In comments made before he handed control to Petraeus, Casey said no obvious mistakes on his part sprang to mind.

"It might seem a little trite, but for me, it's too close in time to judge the mistakes, because if I thought I was making a mistake I would have changed it," said Casey, speaking to journalists before the ceremony.

Instead, Casey said he went away "with a great feeling of pride, because I really feel we've laid the foundation for Iraq's success."

Casey predicted that Iraqi forces would be ready to take control of the country's security by the end of summer or early fall, a seemingly optimistic view given what appears to be the sluggish start to a much-vaunted, U.S.-Iraqi security plan aimed at bringing violence under control. The plan was announced in January and is to put an additional 21,500 U.S. troops, as well as thousands more Iraqi soldiers and national police, in Baghdad and in Al Anbar province.

So far, only 3,000 more Americans and 2,000 Iraqis have been put in place, a schedule that U.S. military officials say is on target at least for the Americans. They have said all the new U.S. troops should be in place by May.

Petraeus appeared to take a more tempered note in his first comments as commander, calling the situation he had inherited "extremely challenging."

"However, hard is not hopeless," he said in speech to coalition forces and Iraqi and U.S. political leaders. "The prospects for success are good. Failing that, Iraq will be doomed to continuing violence and civil strife."

DOJ_NMG_0130454

There was no letup in that strife as the handover unfolded in the mosaic and marble rotunda of one of Saddam Hussein's former palaces.

In Baghdad's mainly Shiite Karrada neighborhood, a suicide bomber parked his car near a bakery and crowded market shortly after noon. The explosion killed at least four civilians and injured 10, Iraqi police said. In Kamaliya, another mainly Shiite district in eastern Baghdad, a car bomb tore through a street lined with auto parts and repair shops, killing at least three civilians and injuring six.

A 15-year-old girl died in a cross-fire between rival groups in a street battle typical of Baghdad's neighborhoods. Across Baghdad, at least six other people were found dead, apparent victims of sectarian violence.

Twenty-four additional bodies were reported in the area around Kut, south of Baghdad. In Mussayib, also to the south of Baghdad, mortars slammed into civilian homes overnight, killing two women and a man, and a man died when a roadside bomb exploded.

Third U.S. Commander Takes Over In Iraq, Vows Support (WT/AP)

By Lauren Frayer

The Washington Times, February 11, 2007

BAGHDAD - Gen. David Petraeus took charge of U.S. forces in Iraq yesterday, becoming the third commander in the war and declaring the American task now was to help Iraqis "gain the time they need to save their country."

Gen. Petraeus took command under a glistening crystal chandelier that decorated a one-time palace of ousted dictator Saddam Hussein at Camp Victory.

The media-savvy, Princeton-educated Gen. Petraeus, 54, spoke bluntly of the task before him that coincides with President Bush's decision to send an additional 21,500 troops to clamp off violence in Baghdad and nearby regions.

"We will have to share the burdens and move forward together. If we can do that and if we can help the people of Iraq, the prospects of success are good," he said. "Failing that, Iraq will be doomed to continued violence and civil strife."

The U.S. military reported the deaths of three more American soldiers, killed in an explosion Friday in Diyala province northeast of Baghdad. U.S. and Iraqi forces have battled Sunni insurgents and Shi'ite militias in Diyala for months.

The deaths raised to 36 the number of Americans killed in Iraq so far this month. At least 3,120 service members have died since the Iraq war started in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

At least 51 Iraqis were killed or found dead Saturday across the country.

In central Baghdad, a car bomb exploded in a shopping district, killing six civilians and wounding 14.

"The driver said, 'I have to buy some fruit and vegetables. I'll be right back.' About five minutes later, the car exploded and killed three of my best friends," said Ismail Mohammed, a fishmonger in the Karradah district.

Gen. Petraeus, whose appointment was announced in early January, takes command of the roughly 135,000-strong American force in Iraq after two previous tours: what was seen as a highly successful stint in the north at the head of the 101st Airborne Division in Mosul, and a second tour in charge of training Iraqi forces.

Gen. Petraeus, who was confirmed by the Senate on Jan. 26, assumed four-star general status in conjunction with taking over command.

"The stakes are very high. The way ahead will be hard, and there undoubtedly will be many tough days. But as I recently told members of the U.S. Senate, hard is not hopeless," said Gen. Petraeus, as he took command from 58-year-old Gen. George Casey.

Lt. Gen. Ricardo Sanchez was Gen. Casey's predecessor and his tenure was marred by the Abu Ghraib prisoner-abuse scandal. He has since retired.

The Sunni insurgency broke out during Gen. Sanchez's command, and the conflict in Iraq took on many of the aspects of a civil war during Gen. Casey's tenure.

In a letter to U.S. troops, Gen. Petraeus wrote: "The enemies of Iraq will shrink at no act, however barbaric. They will do all that they can to shake the confidence of the people and to convince the world that this effort is doomed. We must not underestimate them."

DOJ_NMG_0130455

While Gen. Petraeus spoke of "barbaric enemies who brag of inhuman acts in the name of religion," outgoing commander Gen. Casey, who will become Army chief of staff, spoke frankly about religious infighting that is tearing Iraq apart.

"It's no secret that sectarian violence has changed the dynamics of what Iraqis must face here on the ground," he said. A new U.S. National Intelligence Estimate issued in Washington last week cited sectarian violence as the biggest security problem in Iraq.

An adviser to Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said the Iraqi government hoped Gen. Petraeus' command would help a new joint U.S.-Iraqi security plan.

"It reflects the change in U.S. policy in Iraq. We have so much hope that the security plan will succeed and that Gen. Petraeus will be part of that success," said the adviser, Bassam al-Husseini.

Neither Mr. al-Maliki nor Iraqi President Jalal Talabani attended yesterday's ceremony, though Mr. Talabani and his two deputies met Gen. Petraeus on Friday and discussed the security plan and "appropriate ways to reach security and stability and annihilate terrorism," a government statement said.

The new U.S. military commander in Iraq, Gen. David Petraeus (right), and outgoing Gen. George Casey prayed during the handover ceremony yesterday in Baghdad.

Iraq Resolution Typifies Rift In Senate (WP)

By Shailagh Murray, Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

Since the new Congress convened, Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) and Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) have emerged as the Senate's odd couple, the even-tempered McConnell hurling parliamentary brickbats at the quirky Reid with an even smile and a "Who, me?" shrug.

But though McConnell may be winning procedural battles -- on ethics legislation and a minimum-wage increase and by stopping a high-profile Iraq debate -- Reid, at least this past week, may have played the stronger hand on the war issue, on which public opinion is clearly on his side.

The drama started Monday evening, when McConnell rallied GOP senators to block from the Senate floor a nonbinding resolution opposing President Bush's plan to increase troops in Iraq. But since then, the headlines have been withering, blaming Republicans for sidetracking the debate. Rank-and-file Republican senators are grumbling and threatening to break with McConnell, as the much ballyhooed war debate has morphed into a procedural spat with the GOP playing defense.

"I'm very surprised how they handled this," Reid said of McConnell and his Republican leadership team. "It was so obvious. I just think they miscalculated. And it keeps getting worse."

Julian E. Zelizer, a congressional expert at Boston University, said the Republicans may be "on top" in the short term, but they must be careful how their tactics play with the public in the long term. "They can't look like obstructionists, especially on this war resolution," he said. "This is wartime lawmaking, not peacetime lawmaking."

McConnell asserts that the conflict is less about political tactics than about ensuring "fair treatment" for the Senate GOP, which is barely in the minority.

"This is not about keeping score," the Republican leader told reporters on Thursday, his monotone voice bristling slightly. "This is about an extraordinarily important issue. The American people are not happy with the current status of the Iraq war. Republican senators are not happy about it."

Looking back, did he have any regrets?

"The only thing we could have done differently would have been to capitulate," McConnell shot back. "That didn't happen Monday and won't happen in the future."

Reid and McConnell began the year vowing to cooperate, but so far they have clashed over practically every important issue to come before the Senate. Democrats control the Senate by the slimmest majority, 51 to 49, presenting formidable challenges to both party leaders and suggesting that procedural one-upmanship could become a permanent part of the narrative. "That's just how you have to do things here," Reid said, expressing the relatively sanguine view that he and McConnell are forced by circumstances to take.

DOJ_NMG_0130456

As a tactician, McConnell, 64, a four-term veteran, has shown in recent weeks that he is one tough competitor. Both he and Reid, 67, are former party whips, jobs that require a deep knowledge of Senate rules and an instinctive feel for political and ideological idiosyncrasies. They both also sit on the Appropriations Committee, the chief spigot for federal spending, where Republicans and Democrats traditionally have supported each other's pet programs.

The pair share low-key temperaments, although Reid has the more colorful personality. The son of a Nevada miner, Reid became a successful Las Vegas trial lawyer before entering politics, and he views himself as an outsider among the Washington elite. McConnell, who is married to Labor Secretary Elaine L. Chao, is a staunch conservative who is regarded as one of President Bush's closest allies in Congress. He has vowed to do whatever he can to prevent Congress from passing a resolution criticizing Bush's war policies.

In an editorial titled "A Minority to be Reckoned With," the conservative magazine National Review strongly praised the GOP leader. "Under Sen. Mitch McConnell, Republicans have quickly gotten the hang of serving in a minority that can successfully frustrate Harry Reid's partisan maneuvering on the war in Iraq," the editorial declared.

The war debate now shifts to the House, where Democratic leaders will offer their own formal protest next week against Bush's plan to deploy an additional 21,500 combat troops in Iraq. In the meantime, the Senate battle is expected to remain suspended.

Reid and the Democrats had been prepared for a week-long debate on a nonbinding bipartisan resolution criticizing Bush's troop buildup and calling for a political solution to the war, but it ran into a procedural roadblock Monday evening after McConnell complained that the Democrats were denying Republicans a vote on alternative resolutions supportive of the war effort.

McConnell lined up all but two Republicans -- Sens. Susan Collins (Maine) and Norm Coleman (Minn.) -- to vote in favor of blocking the debate until Reid agrees to GOP terms. But that Republican alliance quickly frayed. On Wednesday night, five Republicans who had voted with McConnell joined Collins and Coleman in signing a letter to the Senate Democratic and Republican leaders, vowing to "explore all our options" to ensure that the bipartisan nonbinding resolution reaches the floor.

Sen. Olympia J. Snowe, a moderate Maine Republican, fumed that she had been assured by GOP leaders that the Monday setback would be temporary. Her support for the McConnell position, she said, "was always predicated on the expectation that we would move forward," adding: "No one ever entertained the possibility that it would be a dead end."

Snowe called McConnell and Reid's inability to come to terms "inexcusable," adding that "the House of Representatives is preparing to debate and our Senate is deadlocked. It sort of marginalizes the U.S. Senate as an institution. We can't even determine how to go forward procedurally with a nonbinding resolution."

McConnell and Reid have clashed on other big issues. Early in January, McConnell nearly brought down a major ethics and lobbying bill over GOP demands for a vote on granting the president virtual line-item veto authority. Later, he and other Republicans forced Democrats to accept tax breaks for small businesses as a condition for passing the minimum-wage bill.

But with polls showing that Americans overwhelmingly oppose the war in Iraq and believe that it was a mistake for Bush to commit U.S. troops, the president's decision to boost troop levels and seek billions of dollars more in spending clearly constitutes the most important issue facing Congress this year.

Every Monday, Reid and McConnell meet one on one, and last Monday at 3 p.m., the huddle took place in McConnell's office. The two leaders quickly established that neither side was budging on the procedural dispute surrounding the war resolutions, and a showdown vote was set for 5:30 p.m.

The next morning, newspaper headlines around the country blared that Republicans were to blame for the gridlock, and Democrats pummeled GOP lawmakers for allowing partisan considerations to get in the way of a vital debate.

By week's end, Republicans were breaking ranks.

On the floor of the Senate and before television cameras, McConnell maintained a reassuring and conciliatory air. Almost apologetically, he explained that the impasse over the Iraq war resolution was a minor bump in the road and would surely be worked out. He expressed faith in his relationship with Reid, and looked genuinely taken aback by Democratic charges of obstructionism and nefarious intent.

DOJ_NMG_0130457

Reid, for his part, also seemed on shaky ground in the immediate aftermath, appearing to protect Democrats from political controversy at the expense of a war debate. The letter from the seven Republicans vowing to do whatever it takes to get the debate back on track helped to reverse this impression by suggesting buyer's remorse on the Republican side.

"Everything Harry Reid has done this week, and I know some of you had some tough questions, has been vindicated by that letter," Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) told reporters.

But it did not appear to faze McConnell. "I think 40 to 42 of our members are comfortable with where we are," he said. "They all understand that we'll get back to this debate and, at whatever point we get back to this debate, the [funding] amendment or other amendments will be in the mix."

Victory Is Not An Option (WP)

By William E. Odom

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

The new National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq starkly delineates the gulf that separates President Bush's illusions from the realities of the war. Victory, as the president sees it, requires a stable liberal democracy in Iraq that is pro-American. The NIE describes a war that has no chance of producing that result. In this critical respect, the NIE, the consensus judgment of all the U.S. intelligence agencies, is a declaration of defeat.

Its gloomy implications -- hedged, as intelligence agencies prefer, in rubbery language that cannot soften its impact -- put the intelligence community and the American public on the same page. The public awakened to the reality of failure in Iraq last year and turned the Republicans out of control of Congress to wake it up. But a majority of its members are still asleep, or only half-awake to their new writ to end the war soon.

Perhaps this is not surprising. Americans do not warm to defeat or failure, and our politicians are famously reluctant to admit their own responsibility for anything resembling those un-American outcomes. So they beat around the bush, wringing hands and debating "nonbinding resolutions" that oppose the president's plan to increase the number of U.S. troops in Iraq.

For the moment, the collision of the public's clarity of mind, the president's relentless pursuit of defeat and Congress's anxiety has paralyzed us. We may be doomed to two more years of chasing the mirage of democracy in Iraq and possibly widening the war to Iran. But this is not inevitable. A Congress, or a president, prepared to quit the game of "who gets the blame" could begin to alter American strategy in ways that will vastly improve the prospects of a more stable Middle East.

No task is more important to the well-being of the United States. We face great peril in that troubled region, and improving our prospects will be difficult. First of all, it will require, from Congress at least, public acknowledgment that the president's policy is based on illusions, not realities. There never has been any right way to invade and transform Iraq. Most Americans need no further convincing, but two truths ought to put the matter beyond question:

First, the assumption that the United States could create a liberal, constitutional democracy in Iraq defies just about everything known by professional students of the topic. Of the more than 40 democracies created since World War II, fewer than 10 can be considered truly "constitutional" -- meaning that their domestic order is protected by a broadly accepted rule of law, and has survived for at least a generation. None is a country with Arabic and Muslim political cultures. None has deep sectarian and ethnic fissures like those in Iraq.

Strangely, American political scientists whose business it is to know these things have been irresponsibly quiet. In the lead-up to the March 2003 invasion, neoconservative agitators shouted insults at anyone who dared to mention the many findings of academic research on how democracies evolve. They also ignored our own struggles over two centuries to create the democracy Americans enjoy today. Somehow Iraqis are now expected to create a constitutional order in a country with no conditions favoring it.

This is not to say that Arabs cannot become liberal democrats. When they immigrate to the United States, many do so quickly. But it is to say that Arab countries, as well as a large majority of all countries, find creating a stable constitutional democracy beyond their capacities.

Second, to expect any Iraqi leader who can hold his country together to be pro-American, or to share American goals, is to abandon common sense. It took the United States more than a century to get over its hostility toward British occupation. (In 1914, a majority of the public favored supporting Germany against Britain.) Every month of the U.S. occupation, polls have recorded Iraqis' rising animosity toward the United States. Even supporters of an American military presence say that it is acceptable temporarily and only to prevent either of the warring sides in Iraq from winning. Today the Iraqi government survives only because its senior members and their families live within the heavily guarded Green Zone, which houses the U.S. Embassy and military command.

DOJ_NMG_0130458

As Congress awakens to these realities -- and a few members have bravely pointed them out -- will it act on them? Not necessarily. Too many lawmakers have fallen for the myths that are invoked to try to sell the president's new war aims. Let us consider the most pernicious of them.

1) We must continue the war to prevent the terrible aftermath that will occur if our forces are withdrawn soon. Reflect on the double-think of this formulation. We are now fighting to prevent what our invasion made inevitable! Undoubtedly we will leave a mess -- the mess we created, which has become worse each year we have remained. Lawmakers gravely proclaim their opposition to the war, but in the next breath express fear that quitting it will leave a blood bath, a civil war, a terrorist haven, a "failed state," or some other horror. But this "aftermath" is already upon us; a prolonged U.S. occupation cannot prevent what already exists.

2) We must continue the war to prevent Iran's influence from growing in Iraq. This is another absurd notion. One of the president's initial war aims, the creation of a democracy in Iraq, ensured increased Iranian influence, both in Iraq and the region. Electoral democracy, predictably, would put Shiite groups in power -- groups supported by Iran since Saddam Hussein repressed them in 1991. Why are so many members of Congress swallowing the claim that prolonging the war is now supposed to prevent precisely what starting the war inexorably and predictably caused? Fear that Congress will confront this contradiction helps explain the administration and neocon drumbeat we now hear for expanding the war to Iran.

Here we see shades of the Nixon-Kissinger strategy in Vietnam: widen the war into Cambodia and Laos. Only this time, the adverse consequences would be far greater. Iran's ability to hurt U.S. forces in Iraq are not trivial. And the anti-American backlash in the region would be larger, and have more lasting consequences.

3) We must prevent the emergence of a new haven for al-Qaeda in Iraq. But it was the U.S. invasion that opened Iraq's doors to al-Qaeda. The longer U.S. forces have remained there, the stronger al-Qaeda has become. Yet its strength within the Kurdish and Shiite areas is trivial. After a U.S. withdrawal, it will probably play a continuing role in helping the Sunni groups against the Shiites and the Kurds. Whether such foreign elements could remain or thrive in Iraq after the resolution of civil war is open to question. Meanwhile, continuing the war will not push al-Qaeda outside Iraq. On the contrary, the American presence is the glue that holds al-Qaeda there now.

4) We must continue to fight in order to "support the troops." This argument effectively paralyzes almost all members of Congress. Lawmakers proclaim in grave tones a litany of problems in Iraq sufficient to justify a rapid pullout. Then they reject that logical conclusion, insisting we cannot do so because we must support the troops. Has anybody asked the troops?

During their first tours, most may well have favored "staying the course" -- whatever that meant to them -- but now in their second, third and fourth tours, many are changing their minds. We see evidence of that in the many news stories about unhappy troops being sent back to Iraq. Veterans groups are beginning to make public the case for bringing them home. Soldiers and officers in Iraq are speaking out critically to reporters on the ground.

But the strangest aspect of this rationale for continuing the war is the implication that the troops are somehow responsible for deciding to continue the president's course. That political and moral responsibility belongs to the president, not the troops. Did not President Harry S. Truman make it clear that "the buck stops" in the Oval Office? If the president keeps dodging it, where does it stop? With Congress?

Embracing the four myths gives Congress excuses not to exercise its power of the purse to end the war and open the way for a strategy that might actually bear fruit.

The first and most critical step is to recognize that fighting on now simply prolongs our losses and blocks the way to a new strategy. Getting out of Iraq is the pre-condition for creating new strategic options. Withdrawal will take away the conditions that allow our enemies in the region to enjoy our pain. It will awaken those European states reluctant to collaborate with us in Iraq and the region.

DOJ_NMG_0130459

Second, we must recognize that the United States alone cannot stabilize the Middle East.

Third, we must acknowledge that most of our policies are actually destabilizing the region. Spreading democracy, using sticks to try to prevent nuclear proliferation, threatening "regime change," using the hysterical rhetoric of the "global war on terrorism" -- all undermine the stability we so desperately need in the Middle East.

Fourth, we must redefine our purpose. It must be a stable region, not primarily a democratic Iraq. We must redirect our military operations so they enhance rather than undermine stability. We can write off the war as a "tactical draw" and make "regional stability" our measure of "victory." That single step would dramatically realign the opposing forces in the region, where most states want stability. Even many in the angry mobs of young Arabs shouting profanities against the United States want predictable order, albeit on better social and economic terms than they now have.

Realigning our diplomacy and military capabilities to achieve order will hugely reduce the numbers of our enemies and gain us new and important allies. This cannot happen, however, until our forces are moving out of Iraq. Why should Iran negotiate to relieve our pain as long as we are increasing its influence in Iraq and beyond? Withdrawal will awaken most leaders in the region to their own need for U.S.-led diplomacy to stabilize their neighborhood.

If Bush truly wanted to rescue something of his historical legacy, he would seize the initiative to implement this kind of strategy. He would eventually be held up as a leader capable of reversing direction by turning an imminent, tragic defeat into strategic recovery.

If he stays on his present course, he will leave Congress the opportunity to earn the credit for such a turnaround. It is already too late to wait for some presidential candidate for 2008 to retrieve the situation. If Congress cannot act, it, too, will live in infamy.

William E. Odom, a retired Army lieutenant general, was head of Army intelligence and director of the National Security Agency under Ronald Reagan. He served on the National Security Council staff under Jimmy Carter. A West Point graduate with a PhD from Columbia, Odom teaches at Yale and is a fellow of the Hudson Institute.

A Road Map Out Of Iraq (LAT)

By Zbigniew Brzezinski

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2007

THE WAR IN IRAQ is a historic strategic and moral calamity undertaken under false assumptions. It is undermining America's global legitimacy. Its collateral civilian casualties, as well as some abuses, are tarnishing America's moral credentials. Driven by Manichean impulses and imperial hubris, it is intensifying regional instability.

Yet major strategic decisions in the Bush administration continue to be made within a very narrow circle of individuals — perhaps not more than the fingers on one hand. With the exception of the new Defense secretary, Robert M. Gates, these are the same individuals who have been involved from the start of this misadventure, who made the original decision to go to war in Iraq and who used the original false justifications for going to war. It is human nature to be reluctant to undertake actions that would imply a significant reversal of policy.

From the standpoint of U.S. national interest, this is particularly ominous. If the United States continues to be bogged down in protracted, bloody involvement in Iraq, the final destination on this downhill track is likely to be a head-on conflict with Iran and much of the Islamic world.

Here, for instance, is a plausible scenario for a military collision with Iran: Iraq fails to meet the benchmarks for progress toward stability set by the Bush administration. This is followed by U.S. accusations of Iranian responsibility for the failure, then by some provocation in Iraq or a terrorist act in the United States blamed on Iran, culminating in a "defensive" U.S. military action against Iran. This plunges a lonely United States into a spreading and deepening quagmire lasting 20 years or more and eventually ranging across Iraq, Iran, Afghanistan and Pakistan.

Indeed, a mythical historical narrative to justify the case for such a protracted and potential expanding war is already being articulated. Initially justified by false claims about weapons of mass destruction in Iraq, the war is now being redefined as the decisive ideological struggle of our time, reminiscent of the earlier collisions with Nazism and Stalinism. In that context, Islamist extremism and Al Qaeda are presented as the equivalents of the threat posed by Nazi Germany and then Soviet Russia, and 9/11 as the equivalent of the Pearl Harbor attack that precipitated U.S. involvement in World War II.

DOJ_NMG_0130460

This simplistic and demagogic narrative, however, overlooks that the Nazi threat was based on the military power of the most industrially advanced European state and that Stalinism was not only able to mobilize the resources of the victorious and militarily powerful Soviet Union but had worldwide appeal through its Marxist doctrine.

In contrast, most Muslims are not embracing Islamic fundamentalism. Al Qaeda is an isolated, fundamentalist aberration. Most Iraqis are engaged in strife not on behalf of an Islamist ideology but because of the U.S. occupation, which destroyed the Iraqi state. Iran, meanwhile, though gaining in regional influence, is hardly a global threat; rather, it is politically divided, economically and militarily weak. To argue that the United States must respond militarily to a wide Islamic threat with Iran at its epicenter is to promote a self-fulfilling prophecy.

No other country shares the Manichean delusions that the Bush administration so passionately articulates. And the result, sad to say, is growing political isolation of and pervasive popular antagonism toward the United States.

Our international interest calls for a significant change in direction. We need a strategy to end the occupation of Iraq and to shape a regional security dialogue. Both goals will take time and require genuinely serious U.S. commitment. The quest to achieve these goals should involve four steps.

First, the United States should reaffirm explicitly and unambiguously its determination to leave Iraq in a reasonably short period of time. Right now, the U.S. occupation, even though resented by most Iraqis, is serving as an umbrella for internal intransigence. Nobody inside or outside the Iraqi government feels any real incentive to compromise while the U.S. is keeping the situation more or less afloat.

A public declaration that the U.S. intends to leave is needed to allay fears in the Middle East of a new and enduring American imperial hegemony. Right or wrong, many view the establishment of such a hegemony as the primary reason for the U.S. intervention in a region only recently free of colonial domination. That perception must be discredited. If the president is unwilling to do so, perhaps Congress could by passing a joint resolution.

Second, the United States should announce that it is undertaking talks with Iraqi leaders to jointly set a date by which U.S. military disengagement should be completed. Roughly a year might be a good goal — but the date must be agreed on with the Iraqis and announced as a joint decision. In the meantime, the U.S. should avoid military escalation, including the troop "surge," which can, at best, have only a passing tactical benefit.

Only by holding serious talks with Iraqi politicians about an exit date can we identify the authentic Iraqi leaders with the self-confidence and capacity to stand on their own legs, without U.S. military protection. The painful reality is that the current Iraqi regime, characterized by the Bush administration as representative of the Iraqi people, largely defines itself by its physical location: the 4-square-mile U.S. fortress within Baghdad — protected by a wall 15 feet thick in places and manned by heavily armed U.S. military — popularly known as the Green Zone. Only Iraqi leaders who can exercise real power beyond the Green Zone can eventually reach a genuine Iraqi accommodation.

Third, the United States should encourage Iraqi leaders to issue an invitation to all neighbors of Iraq and perhaps some other Muslim countries, such as Egypt, Morocco, Algeria and Pakistan, to discuss how best to enhance stability in Iraq in conjunction with U.S. military disengagement and to participate eventually in a conference regarding regional stability.

Such a serious discussion about regional security cannot be undertaken with Iraq or its neighbors while the U.S. is perceived as an occupier for an indefinite duration. Iraq's neighbors don't fear any real explosion in Iraq because we're there, and the volatile status quo comes at our expense and does not require them to make any real choices.

But an agreed-on departure date would have the effect of forcing all of the governments around Iraq to ask themselves: "How do we deal with the problem of stability in Iraq? Do we really want to have a regional war among ourselves?" Would a war that might, for example, pit the Saudis and the Jordanians against the Iranians, with the Syrians in between, be worth risking? Most of the regimes in the region know that that kind of a war could spread and destroy them.

That is why the effort to engage the neighbors is desirable; it could help prevent an escalating civil war in Iraq that also poses a mounting threat to their own stability. But it can only take place provided the United States is in the process of leaving. An announcement of our willingness to leave and to convene a conference to discuss the next steps would be a powerful trigger for change.

DOJ_NMG_0130461

Fourth, the U.S. should activate a credible and energetic effort to finally reach an Israeli-Palestinian peace. The record shows that the Israelis and the Palestinians will never do so on their own. Without such a settlement, nationalist and fundamentalist passions in the region will in the longer run doom any Arab regime that is perceived as supportive of U.S. regional hegemony.

After World War II, the U.S. prevailed in the defense of democracy in Europe because it successfully pursued a long-term political strategy of uniting its friends and dividing its enemies. It soberly deterred aggression without initiating hostilities, and all the while, it explored the possibility of negotiating arrangements.

Today, American global leadership is being tested in the Middle East. A similarly wise strategy of genuinely constructive political engagement is urgently needed.

Zbigniew Brzezinski was National Security Advisor to President Carter.

Legitimacy Was Step One (WP)

By Gian P. Gentile

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

I learned as a tactical battalion commander in Baghdad's Amiriyah district last year that government legitimacy was exponentially more important than the number of coalition and Iraqi army forces patrolling the streets, the number of coalition advisers with Iraqi army and police units, or money spent improving services. Indeed, legitimacy of the government of Iraq as seen through the eyes of all Iraqis -- Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds -- is the necessary condition for peace based on reconciliation.

In Amiriyah we were neither winning nor losing; we were in stasis. Between August and November last year, I substantially increased the number of combined American and Iraqi army patrols there and the capacity of the American adviser team that worked with a local Iraqi army battalion. Still, the deadlock did not break.

Amiriyah is one of the few districts in Baghdad that is almost completely Sunni. It was built in the early 1970s as a residential area for lawyers, doctors, engineers and members of the Baathist elite. When Saddam Hussein's regime fell in 2003, Amiriyah's affluent residents had the most to lose, and partly because of its long-standing tribal ties to Anbar province, Amiriyah gradually became Baghdad's Sunni insurgent headquarters.

In the spring of 2003 Sunnis made up about 85 percent of Amiriyah's population. But sectarian killings have made Sunnis nearly the entire population, and the district has become lethal for the few remaining Shiites.

The enemy of peace in Amiriyah, much like in the rest of Baghdad, was and is a hybrid. The enemy is still an undefeated Sunni insurgency that attacks coalition and Iraqi forces. The enemy is also a vicious and brutal sectarian war carried out not only by Sunni and Shiite extremists but sometimes also by neighbors against neighbors.

As violence mounted significantly in Baghdad over the summer, we confronted this hybrid enemy head-on for a week in early August with an almost fourfold increase of American and Iraqi troops. We also shut down all vehicular traffic in the district, among other things.

The stated purpose for our efforts was to provide breathing room for the government, to allow a break in the violence so it could demonstrate that it was a government of unity. In this sense we "cleared" Amiriyah, and there were no violent acts during that week. Yet the increase in troops was not sustainable.

In the weeks and months after our weeklong operation, American forces did not leave or abandon Amiriyah. We held it with nearly double the number of American and Iraqi troops that had long operated there.

My basic and most fundamental mission was to protect the people. As models of how to proceed, I used Col. H.R. McMaster's brilliant operations in Tall Afar and the successful actions of my brigade commander, Col. Mike Beech, in the nearby Sunni district of Doura. I also used the Army's new counterinsurgency doctrine as my operational guide. We spent millions of dollars rebuilding schools and cleaning garbage from the streets. We continued to capture and kill Sunni insurgents and Shiite militia members who attempted to attack Amiriyah from outlying areas. We established trust between the Sunni population and our forces and improved their views of the local Iraqi army battalion. For its Sunni residents, Amiriyah became one of the most secure districts in Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0130462

But the violence continued. Sunnis killed and continue to kill Shiites and government forces because of sectarian hatred, to retaliate for what they view as unfair acts by the Shiite government and because they fear that any Shiites remaining in their district would provoke more oppressive government actions against them.

Could more American troops have eliminated the Sunni insurgency in Amiriyah? Probably not, because the people were not willing to separate themselves from the insurgents. Residents saw the Sunni insurgents as their final hope for protection from an illegitimate government out to crush them.

Could more American troops have stopped the sectarian violence? Possibly, if this war was still being carried out only by Shiite and Sunni extremist groups. But it is now a sectarian war of the people. When I spoke to shopkeepers, professionals, imams and others in Amiriyah, I was told that the solution to ending the violence -- both insurgent attacks and sectarian killings -- was an Iraqi government they saw as legitimate.

More American troops, more Iraqi troops and more American advisers cannot produce a legitimate government; only the Iraqis can do that. To be sure, a minimum amount of military power is needed in a place such as Amiriyah to maintain order. Those forces are in place and should remain there to provide a baseline of security for the Iraqi government and to demonstrate to all Iraqis that the government is a force for reconciliation and fairness, not division.

The writer, a lieutenant colonel in the 4th Infantry Division, operated in West Baghdad last year.

The Diplomats On Capitol Hill (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

Foreign ministers usually try to avoid commenting on election results in other countries. But their appointment schedules are not so discreet. An increasingly well-beaten path to Capitol Hill by special envoys and other visiting officials attests to the new power that Congress holds in foreign policy.

That result -- like so many others it has produced -- is exactly the reverse of what the Bush administration hoped to achieve. As it empowered its critics on Iraq by focusing so relentlessly on them (see the trial of Scooter Libby) and made civil liberties a salient issue by adopting extreme positions (see the Bill of Rights), the dismissive attitude President Bush has displayed toward the legislative branch helped push Congress into taking on policymaking duties it is ill-equipped to handle.

The confusion and bickering over competing Senate resolutions to support, oppose or split the difference on Bush's proposed "surge" of five additional brigades into Iraq illustrate how Washington is rolling rapidly toward the worst of all policy worlds: one in which 535 would-be secretaries of state try to micromanage battlefield tactics on the basis of November's election returns.

In public and in private comments to foreign visitors, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi has suggested that Democratic victories in those elections have settled any lingering debate over Iraq for the American public. It is the job of the Democratic Party and Congress to bring the troops home as quickly as possible, Pelosi asserts, or Congress will not be complying with the public will.

The push for rapid U.S. withdrawal understandably alarms Turkey and Arab states in the region, which are already traumatized by the violence and chaotic conditions of neighboring Iraq. Among the diplomats headed to Capitol Hill last week to assess the new balance of power and to urge Washington to exercise strategic patience in Iraq were the foreign ministers of Turkey and Egypt.

While noting that their countries had opposed the 2003 invasion, both urged lawmakers to consider the disastrous consequences of hasty American withdrawal. "We support President Bush's new strategy and think it should be given a chance," Turkey's Abdullah Gul told me during a session with journalists here Monday night. A similar message was carried to Capitol Hill by Egypt's Ahmed Aboul Gheit, who devoted 90 percent of his official meetings on a two-day trip to talking with members of Congress, according to aides.

Predictably, bilateral concerns dominated the exchanges on Capitol Hill. Gul made a spirited case that U.S.-Turkish relations would be wrecked by congressional passage of a bill that would condemn as "genocide" the mass killing of Ottoman Armenians a century ago. Gheit showed concern that Democratic majorities in the House and Senate might exert new pressures on Egypt over human rights and democracy issues.

DOJ_NMG_0130463

But they also sought to inject foreign policy considerations into an American debate that is now above all about domestic U.S. political strategies and fortunes and only nominally about Iraq. "We now understand better the problem of taxation without representation," says a diplomat based in Washington. "You make decisions that profoundly and increasingly affect our survival and prosperity, while our ability to influence those decisions shrinks to next to nil."

This emerging foreign lobby is not a monolith. Most European governments "more or less secretly cheer the Democratic efforts to rein in Bush," says a European diplomat. "But they will be very careful about taking a public position for or against the surge."

The White House has contributed significantly to the debasing of the public debate by its secrecy and political manipulation of national security issues and by walling out the congressional leadership of both parties from serious consultation and coordination while undertaking a historic high-risk, high-reward gamble to conquer and then remake Iraq. That kind of close-minded, dogmatic approach is not one that Democrats in Congress should aspire to emulate by tuning out the genuine concerns of Iraq's neighbors and other nations.

Bush is reported to be preparing to shake up his unsuccessful congressional liaison office as chief of staff Josh Bolten completes his overhaul of the White House staff. But all of the evidence argues that it is Bush's own view of cooperation with Congress that most urgently needs to be shaken up.

The White House hunkered down behind procedural gimmicks to block Senate passage of a resolution opposing Bush's surge. That was shortsighted. But Democrats will fare no better if they use domestic election results as the main criterion for shaping what will increasingly be a congressionally influenced U.S. foreign policy.

At This Point, It's Kamikaze Strategy In Iraq (LAT)

By Jonathan Chait

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2007

THERE IS something genuinely bizarre about those remaining supporters of President Bush's strategy in Iraq. It is not just that they are wrong — being wrong happens to all of us from time to time. It's that they are completely detached from reality.

Their arguments have nothing to do with what is actually happening in Iraq. They aren't claiming that Bush's critics have a wrong impression of what's happening in Iraq. They just seem to have no interest in the subject themselves. Their arguments take place almost entirely at the level of abstraction.

If you follow the news in Iraq, the story has become depressingly familiar. Prime Minister Nouri Maliki is a creature of hard-line Shiite sectarians, and his government has been deeply infiltrated by Shiite militias. Everything he has done in his job has been toward the end of giving the Shiites an upper hand over the Sunnis.

Shiite militias have infiltrated the Iraqi army. We're equipping and training the bad guys. The Shiite militia members who haven't joined the army lay low when our troops patrol Baghdad, so that we fight the Sunnis and leave them standing. As Tom Lasseter of McClatchy Newspapers reported a week and a half ago, "The U.S. military drive to train and equip Iraq's security forces has unwittingly strengthened anti-American Shiite Muslim cleric Muqtada Sadr's Mahdi Army militia."

That's why Maliki supports the surge. To the extent it succeeds, the surge will do a faster and better job of driving Sunnis out of Baghdad. But why should we want to help him do that?

The critiques of Bush's strategy all flow from this interpretation of events. The administration's critics say that our current role has the unintended but unavoidable effect of furthering sectarian warfare. If we stop cooperating with one party to a civil war, we can't make things much worse. We might possibly make them better: If we're no longer doing the Shiites' fighting for them, perhaps they'll have to bargain with the Sunnis.

What do the administration's supporters say to this? Let's look at a brief survey. Sen. Joe Lieberman (I-Conn.), one of the most vocal supporters of Bush's strategy, has made two major statements on the war in 2007. In the first, a letter in January, he wrote that "withdrawing from the fight is not a sound, long-term policy for the national security of the United States. Withdrawing from the fight is a recipe for defeat." How did Lieberman envision us winning? What about the reports that our actions are simply fueling the civil war? His letter had nothing to say.

DOJ_NMG_0130464

Since then, Lieberman delivered a speech on the war, and that was even worse. The entire point of it was that a Senate vote of no confidence in Bush would demoralize our allies and embolden the enemy. Nothing at all about how the Bush strategy could work.

OK, you say, so maybe Lieberman has nothing of substance. But he's a politician, and they craft their words for sound bites. So surely the intellectuals who support Bush must have something deeper, right?

Sadly, no. The Weekly Standard — Bush's strongest bastion of remaining support — has editorialized about the war for three consecutive issues. The first editorial asserted that "abandoning American efforts to control the violence in Iraq would lead to an increase in violence" but offered no evidence to support this claim. It did not mention Maliki's clear lack of interest in making peace with the Sunnis nor the infiltration of the Iraqi armed forces.

The next editorial, by Executive Editor Fred Barnes, consisted of an extended analogy to Vietnam. The closest Barnes came to a substantive point was pointing out that war opponents had denigrated the Vietnamese government too. Did this mean we're wrong to denigrate the Iraqi government today? Barnes did not say.

And the next editorial consisted entirely of attacking proponents of the anti-surge resolution as cowards. It didn't even bother to make a claim that we're winning, or we could still win, or withdrawing would make things worse.

So, there you have it, the case for supporting Bush: Trust the commander in chief, don't undermine the troops, withdrawal equals defeat. These aren't arguments to support Bush's strategy, they're generic pro-war arguments. Change a few details and these lines could support Napoleon's invasion of Russia or the Crusader occupation of Jerusalem or almost any war. Generic pro-war arguments may be trite, but that's what you turn to when you've given up on reality.

Blame (Blank) For Iraq (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

WASHINGTON

THE blame game on Iraq seems to be reaching a peak. The surest sign is that people inside the Beltway have started to proclaim loudly that they're not looking to assign any blame.

"This is not at all a finger-pointing exercise," Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, helpfully told a Senate panel on Tuesday as he explained that other federal agencies weren't shouldering their responsibility for sending civilians to help out in Iraq.

"Self-righteous finger-wagging will not make Iraq any more secure," lectured Representative Tom Davis, a Virginia Republican, during a House hearing in which his colleagues tore apart L. Paul Bremer III, the former United States point man in Baghdad after the war.

No one can say with certainty that Iraq is lost; it is too early to say whether President Bush's new strategy to increase the number of American troops in Baghdad and Anbar by 21,500 won't work. But, a continent and an ocean away, Washington is already positioning to lay blame if the worst happens. After all, history books are being written right now.

So, in a decidedly gloomy Capitol, a steady succession of administration officials, military types and yesterday's dignitaries have trooped through various Senate and House hearing rooms to lash out — and be lashed.

Blame the Democrats.

Back when the Republicans were in control of the House and the Senate, they didn't venture far toward an examination of President Bush's Iraq strategy. Newly empowered, the Democrats have hauled in everyone but the kitchen sink: from Henry Kissinger to President Jimmy Carter's national security adviser, Zbigniew Brzezinski.

A whole lot of blame has been spread around. The Pentagon took a swing at the State Department, with Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates publicly griping to a Senate panel about a State memo asking the military to temporarily fill some Iraq jobs that State is supposed to be responsible for. "If you were troubled by the memo, that was mild compared to my reaction when I saw it," Mr. Gates said.

The next day, in a telephone interview, Adm. Edmund P. Giambastiani Jr., vice chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who was asked by State officials to defend them to a reporter, showed that when the chips are down and blame is being assigned, his first priority is not the diplomatic corps. "The military won't lose this war," he said, then added, pointedly, "but we won't win it by ourselves either."

DOJ_NMG_0130465

The State Department shot back, but not with much gusto. David Satterfield, the senior adviser on Iraq, took the high road during a conference call with reporters, eschewing direct criticism of the Pentagon and saying only that "the skill sets needed for the additional staff are not skill sets in which any foreign service in the world, including our own," are proficient.

Beyond that, State left its blame-mongering to smaller guns, relying on unnamed career employees to point out that if the Pentagon had bothered to include State in the initial postwar planning, Iraq might not be the mess it is today.

Robert K. Brigham, a historian of American foreign relations at Vassar, argues that the finger-pointing is a natural outcome for bureaucrats who are secretly frustrated by American policy in Iraq but unable to change it.

"These different departments are all stuck with the same playbook," Mr. Brigham says. "In the absence of any kind of movement to change the geometry, this is what you get. You didn't have this dissension during the Nixon years, you had it in Johnson's."

Mr. Brigham said that Lyndon B. Johnson got more flak for Vietnam than Richard M. Nixon did because Mr. Johnson did not make significant changes to Vietnam policy, while Mr. Nixon did, by going to China, among other things. Unless President Bush makes an about-face in American foreign policy, Mr. Brigham argues, by, say, beginning a pullback of troops, the blame game will continue.

Or increase. "This game has got a lot more plays before it plays out," says Joseph Cirincione, senior vice president for national security and international policy at the Center for American Progress, a liberal research group. "Are we reaching a crescendo? Heck no."

Well, even if the blame game hasn't reached its zenith, now seems a good time to look at the latest culprits, scapegoats and whipping boys who have become fashionable in Washington. It's a disparate group.

Whipping Boy: Iran.

Whip: President Bush.

The president upped his rhetoric in January when he unveiled his new troop surge plan, announcing that "Iran is providing material support for attacks on American troops" in Iraq. Expect more in the coming weeks, as administration officials say they will disclose new intelligence that shows Iran meddling in Iraq.

Whipping Boy: L. Paul Bremer III.

Whip: Henry A. Waxman.

The last time Mr. Bremer, the American civilian administrator in Iraq in 2003-2004, testified before Congress, he was hailed by Republicans and Democrats alike. But that was in the past, before de-Baathification became the dirty word it is now, before the Michael Gordon book and the Tom Ricks book and the Bob Woodward book.

At a House hearing on Wednesday, Representative Mr. Waxman, the California Democrat, upbraided Mr. Bremer for a Bush administration decision to send billions of dollars in cash into Iraq quickly after the United States had occupied the country. "Who in their right mind would send 360 tons of cash into a war zone?" demanded Mr. Waxman. He suggested that some of that money may have ended up financing the insurgency.

Mr. Bremer acknowledged that he made mistakes, but said, "I think we made great progress under some of the most difficult conditions imaginable."

Whipping Boy: Gen. George W. Casey Jr.

Whip: John McCain.

General Casey, responsible for the Army's Iraq war strategy for the past two years, appeared before a Senate panel weighing whether to approve his promotion to be the Army's next chief of staff, and quickly came under attack.

"I question seriously the judgment that was employed in your execution of your responsibilities in Iraq," Senator McCain informed him. "And we have paid a very, very heavy price in American blood and treasure because of what is now agreed to by literally everyone as a failed policy."

Mr. McCain then went on to vote against General Casey's promotion. But the general got the last laugh; the full Senate confirmed him on Thursday by a vote of 83 to 14.

DOJ_NMG_0130466

Whipping Boy: Presidents Bill Clinton and Jimmy Carter.

Whip: Dinesh D'Souza.

The conservative author argues in his recent book, "The Enemy at Home," that President Carter's withdrawal of support for the shah of Iran helped Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini's regime gain power in Iran, thus giving radical Islamists control. Mr. D'Souza also says that President Clinton failed to respond to Islamic attacks and thus emboldened Osama bin Laden into thinking he could get away with the Sept. 11 attacks. Therefore, Mr. D'Souza says, American liberals are to blame for the rise of radical Islam and Muslim anger at America.

O.K., this isn't technically an Iraq finger-point, but it seemed to capture the moment.

U.S. Keeps Pressure On Iran But Decreases Saber Rattling (WP)

By Karen DeYoung

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates insisted again Friday that, despite persistent reports to the contrary circulating in Washington and around the world, the United States is not planning military action against Iran.

"I don't know how many times the president, Secretary Rice and I have had to repeat that we have no intention of attacking Iran," an exasperated Gates told reporters at a NATO meeting in Spain. In fact, he said, the administration has consciously tried to "tone down" its rhetoric on the subject.

Similar statements in recent weeks by President Bush, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and others follow a high-level policy assessment in January that U.S. and multilateral pressure on Tehran, to the surprise of many in the administration, might be showing signs of progress.

Officials highlighted growing internal public and political criticism of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, as well as the reemergence, after months of public silence, of Tehran's chief nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani. Larijani arrived in Munich yesterday for talks with European Union officials.

As a result, new talking points distributed to senior policymakers in the administration directed them to actively play down any suggestion of war planning.

Such demurrals are not meant to suggest that the administration will stop pressing Iran on several fronts or that it expects Iranian behavior to change soon. Warnings of new sanctions if Tehran does not suspend its nuclear enrichment program, the dispatch of a second carrier battle group to the Persian Gulf, presidential authorization to treat Iranian intelligence and paramilitary operatives in Iraq as "enemy combatants," and encouragement of Sunni Arab states to take a united stand against Iranian aggression are all designed to convince Tehran that "we have options" and are prepared to use them, a senior administration official said.

"We're a power, too," is the message to Tehran, the official said. "Your power is not unlimited. You can't go anywhere and do anything you want."

The changed rhetoric also stems from a growing foreign policy "maturity" within the administration, according to foreign diplomats and senior officials who agreed to discuss the issue on the condition of anonymity. They described a new attitude, born of the administration's awareness that the Iraq war has left it with a wide credibility gap at home and abroad and the realization that military action against Iran would strain U.S. capabilities, undercut other goals and possibly explode into a regional conflagration. Internal discussion has also focused on the likelihood that an attack could destroy whatever political plurality exists in Iran by uniting even those opposed to Ahmadinejad in a wave of anti-U.S. nationalism.

"It's very important that we proceed carefully, patiently and with some skill," said Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns, who by all accounts is playing a lead role in formulating Iran policy. "We believe that diplomacy can succeed. We're focused on that. We're not focused on a military conflict with Iran."

Some senior administration officials still relish the notion of a direct confrontation. One ambassador in Washington said he was taken aback when John Hannah, Vice President Cheney's national security adviser, said during a recent meeting that the administration considers 2007 "the year of Iran" and indicated that a U.S. attack was a real possibility. Hannah declined to be interviewed for this article.

DOJ_NMG_0130467

However, sources described agreement among the Bush administration and leading governments in Europe and the Middle East -- including those in Britain, France, Germany and Saudi Arabia -- over consistent but measured pressure on Tehran. They said close consultations, a stark contrast to deep divisions over the U.S. invasion of Iraq, have become self-reinforcing for Washington and its allies.

Upcoming events are likely to test U.S. patience. The Tehran government has promised a "significant" nuclear announcement today, following a 10-day celebration of the anniversary of the 1979 Islamic revolution. Among the possibilities, U.S. officials and experts believe, is a declaration that Iran has moved from experimental to industrial-scale enrichment. Iran has insisted that its nuclear program is purely for peaceful energy purposes, while the West has accused Tehran of secretly trying to build an atomic weapon.

Later this month, the U.N. Security Council will convene to judge Iranian compliance with a unanimous December resolution giving the nation until Feb. 21 to suspend all enrichment and reprocessing activities. Anticipating a negative finding, the administration is readying a new resolution to increase Iran's isolation. Among other measures, officials are considering charging Iran with violating U.N. resolutions that prohibit member countries from harboring or assisting known terrorists. Tehran has refused to hand over a number of senior al-Qaeda operatives it has claimed to be holding under "house arrest" for years.

This week, the administration plans to publicly present evidence of an Iranian role in supplying lethal weaponry to Shiite militias in Iraq. The weapons, including a sophisticated, armor-piercing explosive device, have been used almost exclusively against U.S. forces in Iraq and are considered responsible for numerous military deaths over the past two years. Gates said on Friday that Iran has been conclusively linked to the weapons through serial numbers and other markings on the bombs.

But initial plans to lay out a broad case of Iranian involvement in Iraq were shelved two weeks ago. Sources said policymakers acknowledged that they risked a repeat of the now-discredited weapons of mass destruction charges used to justify the Iraq invasion and wanted to avoid any embellishing. "We're not saying the Iranians pulled the trigger," one administration official said. "They provided the technology."

That expanded presentation would have appeared to contradict a new National Intelligence Estimate concluding that Iran, despite the attacks against U.S. forces, is not a significant factor in the sectarian violence in Baghdad.

Over the past two years, the administration has pursued different tracks to stymie increasingly bold Iranian activities. In March 2005, the United States signed on to an unsuccessful effort by Britain, France and Germany to begin negotiations with Iran over its nuclear enrichment activities. Although the administration offered early last year to open bilateral talks on Iraq between the United States and Iranian ambassadors in Baghdad, it subsequently "pulled the plug" on the initiative, one official said, after the Iraqi government objected and Iran tried to expand a planned session to include all outstanding issues between the two countries.

The administration warned Iran against efforts to block oil-shipment lanes in the Persian Gulf. It publicly accused Iran of helping to instigate last summer's war between Israel and Lebanese Hezbollah and of trying, through its support for Hezbollah, to overthrow the elected government in Beirut. It also escalated its allegations of Iranian interference in Iraq.

It was not until a series of high-level policy meetings last fall, which included the president, that the various tracks began to meld into a coordinated effort. "There was not a presidential directive," said a senior official who participated in the process, "but there was a very active interagency discussion. We talked about measures to take, and sequencing."

U.S. officials decided to push for a new U.N. Security Council resolution imposing a 60-day deadline for Iran to suspend nuclear activities or risk sanctions, and imposed unilateral restrictions on Iranian banks. They repeated the U.S. refusal to hold bilateral talks on the nuclear issue until Iran's program was ended.

Bush authorized U.S. military forces to capture and kill, if necessary, identified Iranian intelligence and paramilitary operatives in Iraq, and increased covert intelligence activities against Iranian-backed forces in Lebanon. A second carrier battle group was sent to the Persian Gulf region, while officials emphasized that it had no "offensive" mission against Iran. Cheney flew to Riyadh to consult with Saudi King Abdullah.

At the same time, the administration tried to increase its appeal to an Iranian public that it determined was increasingly disenchanted with Ahmadinejad. The State Department launched, for the first time since relations were severed in 1979, a series of educational and professional exchanges with Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0130468

In December, a group of Iranian physicians and medical academics came to the United States for a three-week public health program. Last month, 20 American athletes and coaches from USA Wrestling were greeted with a standing ovation when they competed in the Takhti Cup in Bandar Abbas, Iran. A reciprocal trip by Iranian wrestlers is planned for spring, along with a visit by Iranian disaster-relief professionals.

As different elements of the policy were pulled together, the administration found that its European and Arab partners thought it had adopted the right approach and appeared to strengthen their own resolve to pressure Iran. Last month's decision to dial back the war rhetoric came in response to concerns at home and abroad that the administration's saber rattling was drowning out its more finely calibrated strategy.

"We truly believe this combination can succeed," a senior official said. "We're not saying that it will."

Iran Reformists Want U.S. To Tone It Down (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2007

TEHRAN — It is a few weeks before the Iranian new year, and already the narrow market streets in south Tehran are boiling with extra shoppers. Houses must be cleaned, new curtains hung on the windows, the table laid with fresh linens. No child should leave home without new clothes and a few crisp bills in his pocket.

These neighborhoods of tight-clustered houses, dingy auto parts shops, cheap shoe stores and endless ribbons of honking, fuming cars were the bosom of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's sweep to the presidency in 2005.

"Most people voted for Ahmadinejad because he promised they would never have to feel sad again on New Year's Eve in front of their children," said Farshid Bakhtieri, a 21-year-old computer salesman. "Everyone right now, they feel nothing but regret.

"One person says he voted for Ahmadinejad because he would create jobs. And there are no jobs. Another person says it was because he would build houses. No one can afford these houses," Bakhtieri said. "He is like all the other politicians in the history of Iran, all of them coming with lots of promises, but no one follows these promises. He is exactly like the others."

Tens of thousands of Iranians will gather in the streets today for what is supposed to be a ringing public endorsement of Iran's 28-year-old Islamic Revolution and its embattled drive for nuclear power.

But many Iranians say the international dispute over Iran's nuclear program has become a rallying point for a president who otherwise would be facing substantial public dissatisfaction over soaring inflation, rising unemployment and widespread censorship.

This has been a source of frustration to Iran's reformists, who dealt the president's party a blow at the polls in local elections in December but complain that the Bush administration's threatening rhetoric has pulled the rug out from under them.

"You are harmful for us. We try to tell politicians in Washington, D.C., please don't do anything in favor of reform or to promote democracy in Iran. Because in 100% of the cases, it benefits the right wing," said Saeed Leylaz, a business consultant and advocate of economic reform and greater dialogue with the West.

"Mr. Ahmadinejad tries to make the international situation worse and worse. And now with the U.N. Security Council resolution, he can say, 'Look, we are in a dangerous position, and nobody can say anything against us, because the enemy is coming into the country.' Exactly like George W. Bush in Washington, D.C. They are helping each other. They need each other, I believe."

The government and clerical establishment have gone to great pains in recent weeks to stress to Iranians that the nation's independence is under threat. More than anything else, a strong sense of national pride has pushed Iran toward developing a nuclear power program, which the U.S. and other nations believe is aimed at building a nuclear weapon.

"Our revolution was a gift from God. If we don't say 'Thank God' every day, we will lose this gift and all we have," Ahmad Khatami, a hard-line cleric from Qom, reminded hundreds gathered for Friday prayers at Tehran University last week. "Attacking the government and the parliament and the judiciary is fanning the flames of the enemy."

Ahmadinejad's approach has been broadly popular in the provinces and among many in Tehran fed up with the wealth and corruption of those in power. The slight president, who typically wears a tan jacket, lives in a simple house and drives a normal car.

DOJ_NMG_0130469

He has tried to give the lower classes a bigger share of Iran's oil wealth and has been known to respond to constituents who write to him about problems with a handwritten note, directing them to take it to the nearest bank for a loan.

But the state's share of the economy has swollen, and the Tehran stock exchange has lost more than a quarter of its value over the last 18 months. Unemployment stands at an official 11.5%, and little new foreign investment is coming in.

Meanwhile, prices are increasing at a dizzying rate. Tomatoes have risen threefold in the last year, while housing prices in more prosperous north Tehran appear to have doubled.

Bakhtieri said his mother, a university librarian, was one of several public employees who got a raise shortly after Ahmadinejad was elected, only to see it taken back when the government couldn't afford it. Some employees even had to repay the extra money they received, he said.

Bakhtieri said many Iranians blame their troubles on Ahmadinejad's generous aid programs to Afghanistan, Central Asia, the Palestinian territories and Latin America.

"I don't know why, when our people need lots of things, they have to be spending all this money in other countries," he said.

Economists say the inflation can be traced to the amount of money in circulation doubling over the last 18 months.

The government ordered banks to grant millions of dollars in new loans to small and medium-sized businesses. Bad loans put the banks at risk.

New roads, wastewater treatment plants and sports centers were launched, paid for by the government, and when the government couldn't afford it, from yet more bank loans. Banks are facing a reported $8.8 billion in bad loans.

Meanwhile, imports have doubled, to $50 billion a year. And the oil stabilization fund, which had accumulated $9 billion in unanticipated oil revenue as a hedge for the future, is forecast by some to be tapped out by the end of next month.

Voter response has been swift: When Iranians went to the polls for December's municipal council elections, Ahmadinejad's party took a beating.

"That is a devastating defeat for the president. And this is unprecedented in Iran, that after a year and a half in office a president's party is defeated like this," said a former government official, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "This voice has to be heard now by the government."

The international conflict over the country's nuclear program has only compounded the economic problems.

U.N. sanctions targeting Iran's nuclear and missile programs will probably have little effect on the public. But a separate banking embargo being pushed by the Bush administration means Iranian businessmen must pay much more to import goods.

"The only solution we have now is to deal with Chinese companies, because the Chinese are more flexible," said Amir Saqaei, an engineer in the oil and gas industry who is developing an oil project in the western region of Cheshmakhosh. However, he said, the Chinese goods are of poor quality.

Not all of the government's troubles have been economic. Writers have complained of a near-halt to the publishing of novels. Foreign books such as William Faulkner's "As I Lay Dying" have been banned, and several newspapers have been closed.

In December, crackdowns on student associations and repression of activists prompted students at Tehran's Amir Kabir University to heckle the president during an appearance there. Chanting "Death to the dictator" and carrying a banner reading "Fascist Ahmadinejad," the crowd sent a shoe sailing toward the president as he stood at the podium.

A large number of parliamentary deputies signed letters this year demanding answers from the president on the nuclear issue and the economy. But new, strong language from Washington starting in January that hinted at the possibility of a military strike quickly took the wind out of their sails.

Independent legislator Akbar Alami, who had circulated a letter, said he stopped getting signatures almost immediately.

If Iranians perceive a foreign threat, he said, "they don't pay attention anymore to differences, and the problem they have between parties and governments doesn't matter anymore."

To the contrary, said former central bank governor Mohammad Hossain Adeli, it mobilizes the Iranians and ratchets up the conflict.

"The foreign pressure is counterproductive and radicalizes the domestic environment," he said. "And then this radicalization results in more confrontational positions on the part of Iran."

DOJ_NMG_0130470

U.S. To Reveal Tehran's Link To Iraq Insurgency (WT/AP)

By Katherine Shrader

The Washington Times, February 11, 2007

The Bush administration is haunted by the history of intelligence blunders about Saddam Hussein's supposed weapons of mass destruction as the United States tries to document that Iran is providing lethal help to Iraqi fighters.

After weeks of preparation and revisions, U.S. officials are preparing to detail evidence supporting administration claims of Iran's meddlesome and deadly activities. A briefing was scheduled today in Baghdad.

The Iran dossier, some 200 pages thick in its classified form, was revised heavily after officials decided it was not ready for release as planned last month. What is made public probably will be short, and shorter on details than the administration recently had suggested.

No one who has seen the files has suggested the evidence is thin. But senior officials -- gun-shy after the drubbing the administration took for the faulty intelligence leading to the 2003 Iraq invasion -- said they were underwhelmed by the packaging.

Officials from several intelligence agencies scrutinized the presentation to make sure it was clear and that "we don't in any way jeopardize our sources and methods in making the presentation," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Friday.

National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley recently said some Iran material was overstated. Privately, officials say they want to avoid the kind of gaffe akin to former Secretary of State Colin Powell's case for war before the United Nations in 2003.

"My colleagues, every statement I make today is backed up by sources, solid sources. These are not assertions," Mr. Powell said as he laid out unproven claims of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction. "What we're giving you are facts and conclusions based on solid intelligence." It later turned out that Iraq did not have such weapons.

The evidence on Iran is intended to give backbone to the administration's claim that an emboldened Iran is playing a dangerous game across the Middle East, meddling in conflicts and seeding terrorism beyond its borders while rushing to acquire nuclear know-how that could produce an atomic bomb.

Government officials familiar with the dossier's documents and slides, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the materials still were classified, said they make a compelling case about Iranian actions in Iraq.

Among the evidence the administration planned to present are weapons that were seized over time in U.S.-led raids on caches around Iraq, said one military official.

Other evidence includes documents captured when U.S.-led forces raided an Iranian office Jan. 11 in Irbil, a city in Kurdish-controlled northern Iraq about 220 miles north of Baghdad, this official said.

In that raid, the U.S. captured five Iranians. They included the operations chief and other members of Iran's elite Quds Force, which is accused of arming and training Iraqi militants. Tehran said it was a government liaison office and called for the release of the five, along with compensation for damages.

The dossier also details Iran's role in providing Iraqi fighters with the "explosively formed penetrator" devices that can pierce the armor of Abrams tanks with nearly molten-hot charges. One intelligence official said the U.S. is "fairly comfortable" that it knows with some precision the origin of those Iranian-made explosives.

While traveling in Europe on Friday, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said that serial numbers and markings on explosives used in Iraq provide "pretty good" evidence that Iran is providing either weapons or technology for militants there. Mr. Gates did not say how the United States knows that.

A senior U.S. government official said yesterday that members of Congress were shown proof in December. "I'm convinced from what I've seen that the Iranians are supplying and are giving assistance to the people in Iraq who are killing American soldiers," said Sen. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut independent.

Merkel: Must Stop Iran Getting Nuclear Weapons (AP)

AP, February 10, 2007

MUNICH, Germany (AP) -- German Chancellor Angela Merkel said Saturday that the international community is determined to prevent Iran from developing a nuclear weapon.

DOJ_NMG_0130471

Speaking at a weekend gathering of the world's top security officials, expected to include Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani, Merkel said Tehran needed to accept demands made by the U.N. and the International Atomic Energy Agency.

"There is no way around this," she told the 250 officials, including more than 40 defense and foreign ministers. "What we are talking about here is a very, very sensitive technology, and for that reason we need a high degree of transparency, which Iran has failed to provide, and if Iran does not do so then the alternative for Iran is to slip further into isolation."

Merkel, whose country holds the rotating European Union presidency, emphasized the international community's support for Israel and said there was a unified resolve to prevent Iran from developing nuclear weapons.

"We are determined to prevent the threat posed by an Iranian military nuclear program," she said.

The annual Munich Conference on Security Policy, now in its 43rd year, is often used as an opportunity for officials to conduct diplomacy in an informal setting.

Key figures attending also include Russian President Vladimir Putin, new Defense Secretary Robert Gates and other top officials.

Some 3,500 police were on hand to provide tight security for the conference and kept the usual throng of demonstrators away. This year, several thousand protesters were expected, protest organizers said.

Heading in to the conference, Larijani, who is scheduled to speak on Sunday, said he planned to use the conference as an opportunity to talk about Iran's nuclear program. Those would be the first talks with Western officials since limited U.N. sanctions were imposed on the country in December, which fell short of harsher measures sought by the United States.

Larijani was expected to meet with German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier and Javier Solana, the EU's chief foreign policy envoy.International solidarity

At the opening dinner on Friday, Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni urged international solidarity in putting pressure on Iran to prevent it from producing a nuclear weapon.

"It is a regime that mocks the Holocaust while threatening the world with a new one, while trying to develop a weapon to do so," she said. "Iran is a threat not only to Israel ... but to the world. The international community cannot show any hesitation ... Any hesitation on our part is being perceived as weakness."

The conference this year focuses on "Global Crises -- Global Responsibilities," looking at NATO's changing role, the Middle East peace process, the West's relations with Russia and the fight against terrorism.

Merkel opened the conference telling the delegates that one of the major threats facing the world today is global warming, urging a combined effort to combat it.

"Global warming is one of the major medium- to long-term threats that could have a dramatic effect," Merkel said.

Gates, who planned to talk Sunday on trans-Atlantic relations, was expected to press allies for more troops and aid for a spring offensive in Afghanistan.

He delivered the message Friday to a NATO defense minister's meeting in Seville, Spain, but got a lukewarm response.

France and Germany are questioning the wisdom of sending more soldiers, while Spain, Italy and Turkey have also been wary of providing more troops.

Suicide Bomber Kills 30 Near Tikrit (AP)

AP, February 11, 2007

A suicide truck bomber slammed into a crowd of police lining up for duty Sunday near Tikrit, killing at least 30 people and wounding 50, police said.

Minutes later, a roadside bomb struck a car on a highway on the western outskirts of Tikrit, 80 miles north of Baghdad, killing two civilians and wounding two others, police said.

The first blast occurred about 8 a.m. as police were arriving for work at the Adwar police station, provincial police Capt. Abdel-Samad Mohammed said, giving the casualty toll. He said 21 of the 30 killed were policemen.

The bomber drove a small truck that was packed with explosives covered by hay and the force of the blast caused the building to collapse. Three houses close to the station, along with municipal offices and the post office, also were heavily damaged.

DOJ_NMG_0130472

Local residents who rushed to the scene tried to help with rescue efforts before civil defense squads arrived with shovels to remove the debris and pull out the dead and those injured. U.S. and Iraqi forces later surrounded the area while recovery efforts continued.

Adwar, about 12 miles southeast of Tikrit, is where former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein was captured on Dec. 13, 2003.

Insurgents frequently target Iraqi security forces, accusing them of collaborating with the U.S.

KBR Driver Killed By U.S. Forces In Iraq (HC)

Houston Chronicle, February 11, 2007

Military, firm team to investigate the Monday death of contractor

The shooting Monday of a civilian contract truck driver for KBR, a subsidiary of Halliburton, is under investigation by the company and by the U.S. Army.

The U.S. military confirmed on Saturday that American forces shot and killed the truck driver at Camp Anaconda, an air base about 42 miles north of Baghdad.

A spokeswoman for KBR, a subsidiary of Halliburton formerly known as Kellogg, Brown & Root, said the shooting was under investigation.

Melissa Norcross, the KBR spokeswoman, said the company was not releasing the name of the dead driver or a second truck driver who was wounded "to protect the individuals' privacy."

"A KBR truck driver was fatally shot, and another wounded, by U.S. military personnel on the evening of February 5, 2007, at an entry control point just outside of Camp Anaconda in Balad, Iraq. Our thoughts and prayers are with the family of the truck driver who was killed," Norcross wrote in an e-mail.

"The wounded truck driver was transported to the Air Force Theater Hospital (AFTH) and has since been treated and released."

The Walker-Martin Funeral Home in Chesaning, Mich., posted an obituary on its Web site Saturday saying that a man named Donald Tolfree of nearby Owosso, Mich., had been killed Monday in Balad, Iraq, where he was employed as a civilian contractor.

Norcross did not respond to e-mail queries about why the news about the contract worker's death, and the second worker's injury, was not made public until Saturday.

"As this matter is presently under investigation, it would be inappropriate to comment further at this time," Norcross said.

The company and the Defense Department on Friday honored 28 contractors who were killed or wounded in the Middle East with the agency's civilian version of the Purple Heart, at a private ceremony at the Hilton Houston Post Oak hotel.

'An escalation of force'Ninety-eight KBR employees and subcontractors have been killed in Iraq, Kuwait and Afghanistan since the two U.S.-led invasions began.

Another 450 have been wounded in hostile action, Norcross said.

The House Oversight and Government Reform Committee held a public hearing Wednesday on the Pentagon's reliance on military contractors for the war effort in Iraq.

George Seagle, director of security for KBR's government and infrastructure division, testified. He made no mention of the truck driver's death.

In Baghdad, Lt. Cmdr. Bill Speaks told the Associated Press that: "There was an escalation of force incident at Camp Anaconda on Feb. 5 (Monday) that resulted in the death of a civilian contractor. The incident is under investigation by the Army Criminal Investigation Division and KBR."

The Associated Press contributed to this report.

Iowa Guardsmen Are Proud But Disappointed (WP)

By Christian Davenport

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0130473

AL ASAD, Iraq -- Army Spec. Jesse Espinosa figured he was down to just six more missions off this base west of Baghdad. Six more missions in the turret of his armored vehicle, fingertip at the trigger, performing duty so dangerous soldiers here liken it to Russian roulette: providing convoy security along supply routes in deadly Anbar province.

Six more missions, then home to his wife, three children and civilian job as a cook in Bricelyn, Minn.

But all that has to wait.

The deployment of his unit, the Iowa National Guard's 1st Battalion, 133rd Infantry Regiment, was recently extended for up to 125 days because of President Bush's decision to temporarily increase troop levels in Iraq. Like many of his fellow soldiers, Espinosa, 24, was upset because "almost every mission we see at least one" roadside bomb, he said. Although most times, the soldiers are able to spot them before they blow up, he said.

Now, instead of getting back by March, his homecoming will likely be July or August. And instead of six, Espinosa, has about 40 more missions to go.

The Iowa guardsmen have accepted the extended duty, while absorbing the anxieties of their families, said Lt. Col. Benjamin J. Corell, the battalion commander. "You won't find anyone ready to throw in the towel and walk away from what they're doing," he said. "They're proud of their sacrifice."

But that sacrifice is being acutely felt -- here and at home, he acknowledged. "There's a balance there that somehow we have to keep. Because we're crossing the line of what they're willing to sacrifice. And that's a concern. I'm not saying the sky is falling. But families have a big say in whether our soldiers continue their membership in the Guard."

The extension comes as military officials are adjusting the way Guard and reserve units are used. Since the Sept.11, 2001, attacks, some have been called up for multiple tours, and military officials have worried that they are being stretched too thin. Recently, the Pentagon announced that the reserve components would be called on more often to support their active-duty counterparts, but for shorter tours.

For the Iowa Guard soldiers, many of whom are on their second tour since the Iraq war began, the extension means another four months at this base west of Baghdad. It's a world away from home despite comforts that have earned it the nickname "Camp Cupcake": a recreation center with pool tables, all-you-can-eat chow halls and relatively few mortar attacks.

But it also means more trips escorting supplies along desert roads dotted with improvised explosive devices, the roadside bombs known as IEDs.

"Every time they go out, they're going to find an IED," Lt. Randy Hartley said.

Two of the battalion's soldiers were killed when their convoy came under attack in September. Their photos hang in the battalion headquarters, along with those of 11 others from the brigade who have been killed across Iraq. Five of the battalion's soldiers were wounded and flown home for treatment, said Lt. Matthew Parrino.

"We're not happy about" the extension, said Spec. Joel Pleggenkuhle. "But we weren't forced to sign the [enlistment] papers. Throughout the battalion it's, 'Okay, let's get it done.' "

As a member of the Army's Individual Ready Reserve, Sgt. Timothy Stamper, 27, was deployed last year. His contract with the Army is supposed to end in April, he said.

But he knows he won't be going home to his 2-year-old son until at least summer. And he worries that when he does finally get home, his child "won't know who I am."

Although there had been rumors of an extension for weeks, the news caught some by surprise: About 10 soldiers who were flying home because they had reached the end of their contracts with the Army were turned around and flown back to the unit, soldiers here said.

News of the extension hit many soldiers hard at first. For a few, it has even led to divorce, Hartley said. Many soldiers were furious about how they found out about the extended duty: The news came from families back home -- and not the chain of command -- which "kills morale," Hartley said.

When Hartley's fiancee, Jill Kiehl, learned of the extension from news reports, "I just started crying," she said in a telephone interview from her home in Des Moines. Her late husband, James M. Kiehl, was killed close to the beginning of the war when his convoy came under attack.

Now, Hartley too is out on convoys, where, he admits, "the odds aren't very good at all."

DOJ_NMG_0130474

Shortly after Hartley, 36, and Kiehl started dating a couple of years ago, he broke it off. He knew he was going to be coming back to Iraq for a second tour, and he didn't want to put her through the pain of the deployment.

"People look at me like I'm crazy," said Kiehl, 25. "They say, 'Why are you with someone in the military?' And I tell them you can't determine who you love. You just have to hope and pray that it's all going to work out."

To Protest War, Councilman Forgoes The Pledge (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

MESA, Ariz., Feb. 10 (AP) — A city councilman has been receiving threats since he started refusing to recite the Pledge of Allegiance or stand during it at council meetings to protest the war in Iraq.

The councilman, Tom Rawles, has angered fellow council members and constituents in this conservative Phoenix suburb of about 400,000. The police briefly provided him with protection before deciding the threats were no reason for alarm.

"You have disrespected our country and the symbol of it and the men and women who fought for it," Mike Thelan, a resident, told Mr. Rawles through tears at a council meeting last Monday. "You have acted like a spoiled little child that has not received what he wants from his parents."

Mr. Rawles, a 57-year-old lawyer who long ago decided not to run for re-election when his term is up in June 2008, said he would continue his protest "until the troops come home." He said he did not mind that his stand was angering people.

"That's what political speech is supposed to do," Mr. Rawles said. "It's supposed to infuriate and irritate and challenge and make people think. They apparently would prefer me just to walk lockstep and mouth ritualistic words to a mandatory ceremony."

Councilman Kyle Jones said it was not Mr. Rawles's opinion about the war that offended him, but his refusal to stand during the pledge.

"The privilege of reciting the pledge is just that — it's a privilege," Mr. Jones said.

Another resident, Joann Stewart, said she was not offended by Mr. Rawles's protest.

"I personally would never have picked that way to protest, because that's the flag of the United States of America and I honor that," Ms. Stewart said. "But the main concern is what's going on with the war."

Taliban Stepping Up Attacks In Afghanistan (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan, Feb. 10 — Taliban insurgents have stepped up attacks in southern Afghanistan in recent days, killing four Afghan policemen in an ambush on Friday night and aiming at NATO troops with the second suicide bombing in a week in what seems to be the opening of the fighting season, officials said Saturday.

The suicide bomber smashed his car into a NATO military convoy north of Kandahar on Saturday morning, killing himself but not hurting anyone else, said the province police chief, Asmatullah Alizay. Another bomber attacked a military convoy in the same place on Feb. 4.

Taliban insurgents have also appeared again in the troubled southern district of Panjwai, ambushing a police patrol on Friday night and killing four policemen and wounding two more. NATO troops mounted two heavy combat operations last year to clear insurgents from the area and have tried to establish security by boosting the local police forces.

NATO forces also fought Taliban forces for several hours in the next-door province of Helmand, where they have been trying to clear the area around the Kajaki dam to allow engineers in for a renovation project, one of the United States government's largest development efforts in the country.

Taliban forces who overran the town of Musa Qala last week were also preparing for a fight if government or NATO troops moved against them, a resident from the town said in a telephone interview. The resident, Amir Jan, 32, who has a clothes shop in the town but has fled along with other townspeople who feared renewed fighting, said that the Taliban were promising more heavy fighting this year against foreign forces in Afghanistan and were vowing to seize control of more towns.

The fighters said they were loyal to the fugitive Taliban leader, Mullah Muhammad Omar, and were under his orders to fight, Mr. Jan said. Although their local leader, Mullah Abdul Ghafoor, was killed in a NATO airstrike on Feb. 4, his deputy, whom Mr. Jan did not name, was in charge and vowing to take revenge for Mullah Ghafoor's death.

DOJ_NMG_0130475

NATO: Afghanistan On Road To Stability (AP)

By Slobodan Lekic, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 11, 2007

NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer said Saturday he thinks the back of the insurgency in Afghanistan will be "broken" and that the country will be on the road to a long-term peace by 2009.

There have been warnings by commanders of the NATO-led International Security Assistance Force in Afghanistan that Taliban guerrillas may mount a spring offensive from their winter-safe havens in neighboring Pakistan.

But De Hoop Scheffer said the tide of the fight will turn.

"In 2009 I think we should see Afghanistan on the road to long-term peace and stability with the back of the resistance broken," he told a gathering the world's top security officials.

Afghanistan's neighbor Pakistan is of key importance to the fight, he said.

"Pakistan is vital to our success in Afghanistan," De Hoop Scheffer said. "A military dialogue with Pakistan should now be teamed up with a political dialogue."

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz, noted that fighting in 2006 was bloodier than ever.

"If NATO does not prevail in Afghanistan, it is difficult to imagine the alliance undertaking another 'hard security' operation ... Its credibility would suffer a grievous blow," McCain said at the conference.

German Chancellor Angela Merkel urged NATO and the European Union to work together in Afghanistan, saying this was "crucial for success" of efforts to defeat Taliban guerrillas and bring stability to the nation.

"In Afghanistan our alliance is being particularly tested," Merkel said. "It is indisputable that the Taliban are testing our determination."

The NATO-led force has about 35,000 soldiers in Afghanistan, and commanders have expressed confidence they are able to defeat any Taliban military effort in the coming months. But they have complained that, in the past, battlefield successes were not followed up by reconstruction aid to help rebuild regions devastated by the fighting.

Earlier this month, the EU Commission proposed a new $780 million package for Afghanistan to focus on health, justice and rural development over the next four years.

Merkel said that military stabilizing measures have to be coordinated with civilian measures. But she acknowledged the mission "is more difficult than we originally thought" when NATO forces were first deployed to Afghanistan three years ago.

Attack In Pakistan On Red Cross Office (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, Feb.10 — An explosion in the parking compound of the International Committee of the Red Cross headquarters in Peshawar, a northwestern city, damaged four vehicles but hurt no one early Saturday, officials said.

A spokeswoman for the Red Cross, Layla Berlemont, confirmed the attack and lack of casualties in a telephone interview. She said the office had not received any threats before the attack and would continue its activities in the North-Western Frontier Province, where Peshawar is.

Some news reports said that a gas cylinder had been thrown over the wall of the complex, but the police could not confirm that and were still investigating, said Iftikhar Khan, of the Peshawar police force.

Foreign aid agencies in the province have been attacked or threatened by Islamic militants at times. On Monday, a grenade was lobbed at a compound of the American aid group Save the Children in Battagram, wounding two Pakistani employees.

Defense, Not Pork (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2007

VOLTAIRE WAS No accountant, but the 18th century philosopher's observation that "the best is the enemy of the good" applies when analyzing the Bush administration's $725-billion defense request for next year.

DOJ_NMG_0130476

Congress needs to be far more rigorous in scrutinizing the Pentagon's wish lists than it has been since 9/11. Because we cannot mount perfect defenses against terrorist attack — only good ones — and because taxes and deficits aren't limitless, choices must be made.

Wartime has proved too much of a temptation for wasteful military spending that goes unquestioned. Why, for instance, is the administration insisting that hundreds of millions of dollars be poured into the Marine Corps' glitch-plagued, tilt-wing V-22 Osprey program? It's also cheeky of the Pentagon to request funds for two F-35 Joint Strike Fighters under the "reconstituting the force" ledger that's meant to catalog the costs of replacing equipment lost in war, considering the planes won't be ready for combat until 2010.

The overarching question isn't whether the country is spending too much on defense but whether it is spending its resources on the right priorities. By modern historical standards, military leaders are quick to note, the 4% of gross domestic product currently devoted to defense spending is still on the low side. And Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates may have been right in his congressional testimony last week when he said that the nation ought to be devoting at least 5% of its GDP to defense, given U.S. commitments.

But no national wealth should be diverted to defense contractor fantasies with little value in today's world. Billions are being requested for Cold War relics of questionable use, such as Virginia-class submarines for about $2.5 billion a pop. On a more positive note, President Bush's budget request does include much-needed sums for the expansion of the Army and Marine Corps as well as the National Guard.

The U.S. remains the world's indispensable power, and until the rest of the democratic world takes more responsibility for collective security, it will be an unfortunate fact of life that defense spending soaks up about one-fifth of the federal budget. It makes no sense to deny this reality, nor to dispute the nation's need to be prepared to confront any number of potential threats ranging from Al Qaeda to a more conventional regional aggressor. The nation could hardly afford to spend less on defense; but when it comes to national security, it also can't afford to spend unwisely.

DOJ:

Lam Shows Her Personal Side During School Forum (SDUT)

By Kelly Thornton, Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, February 11, 2007

NORTH PARK – San Diego U.S. Attorney Carol Lam joked yesterday about the travails of juggling family and a high-powered career, confiding the reaction of her four children when she told them she may "stay home and take care of you for a while" after she leaves her post this week.

"It was clear from their faces this was their version of hell," Lam said, getting a big laugh from an audience of mothers and their teenage daughters at a leadership forum at The Academy of Our Lady of Peace in North Park.

Lam, 47, is reluctantly leaving her job of 4½ years after being forced out by the Justice Department, which asked for her resignation because of what one official described as "performance-related" issues. The official said members of Congress complained that Lam didn't prosecute enough immigration cases.

But Lam, best known for going after corrupt politicians such as former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Rancho Santa Fe, has become a national hero of sorts to critics of the Bush administration. They say her dismissal and those of six other top federal prosecutors in recent weeks are politically motivated.

The normally guarded Lam, known for a tough exterior in public, gave a rare glimpse of her personality and sense of humor at the leadership forum, where a key topic was managing demanding careers and motherhood.

Lam said her husband has been the primary caregiver for their four children and that the arrangement has worked well for their family. Still, she shared funny stories of her maternal missteps.

Like how her house is a mess. How her children have left home many times in mismatched clothes. And the time she brought out the birthday cake with the wrong number of candles.

"I had misjudged the age of my child!" Lam said. "It was clear to us my husband would be the better caretaker and not harm the children."

More laughs.

Her husband, Mark Burnett, is a geophysicist.

When she told the crowd the ages of her children – 17, 15, 11 and 9 – she paused to reconsider if those ages were correct. More laughs. She said she makes sure to appear in videos of family events to prove she was there.

Lam, a political independent, recalled for the audience some of the milestones in her career, such as becoming one of few women in a position of leadership in law enforcement and walking into rooms filled with male FBI and Internal Revenue Service agents.

She imagined that they wondered how she would "make a fool" of herself. "I thought this was kind of cool," she said. "I thought, 'I'll be fine.' And I really was."

Lam told the crowd she also was ambivalent over being labeled the first Asian-American and the first woman to become U.S. attorney in San Diego.

On one hand, she was proud to be a trailblazer. But she said she had lived a childhood of privilege and opportunity, and didn't feel she should benefit from affirmative action.

"I'm a Chinese-American woman, and when I first became U.S. attorney, there was a lot of talk about me being the first Asian-American and first female. A lot of reporters asked, 'Do you see yourself as a role model?'

"I was very conflicted. It probably helped me get the job in the first place," she said. But because Lam did not lack for opportunities the way some minorities do, she wondered, "Why should I benefit from affirmative action?"

Lam said she discussed the matter with a trusted colleague who had expertise in civil rights. He said there is another reason for affirmative action that does apply to her: to demonstrate that there is no glass ceiling for minorities.

That thought resonated with Lam.

She said that as she prepares to leave office Thursday, she has been gratified by comments from younger male attorneys who thanked her for being a role model. "That was a nice benchmark for me. We've sort of transcended the demarcations."

Lam said she is hard on herself and others.

"I set very high standards for myself and I constantly disappoint myself, and that's a tough way to live my life," she said. "And, I set high standards for people around me and I'm often disappointed. But I'm also forgiving. If you set low standards, you'll get there."

Her advice to high school girls as they pursue their careers? Define success as being happy and comfortable with yourself. Set high goals and "forgive yourself if you don't make it."

There will be missteps, dead ends, things that don't go as planned, Lam said, adding, "Just deal with it and move on."

Kelly Thornton: (619) 542-4571; kelly.thornton@uniontrib.com

Prosecutor Roulette As More U.S. Attorneys Are Fired, The Specter Of A Political Spoils System Is Unmistakable (ALBANYTU)

Albany Times Union, February 11, 2007

By tradition, U.S. attorneys are confirmed by the Senate and serve throughout the term of the sitting president. But under a change in the law, they can now be appointed by the attorney general -- indefinitely -- without Senate approval, and without showing serious cause for removing the incumbent.

This shocking change in the appointment process has come to light thanks to hearings called by Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., who suspects the Bush administration has been firing U.S. attorneys either for patronage reasons or because they have pursued politically sensitive investigations.

So far, seven federal prosecutors have been removed or told to step aside. In the most recent firing, U.S. Attorney Ed Cummins of Little Rock, Ark., says he was asked to step aside to make room for an appointee who had once worked for presidential adviser Karl Rove.

DOJ_NMG_0130478

In testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee on Tuesday, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty denied that politics played any role in Mr. Cummins' removal, claiming that his successor had more prosecutorial experience. Sen. Schumer wisely warned Mr. McNulty that the Judiciary Committee will subpoena job evaluations of the fired prosecutors if the Justice Department refuses to turn them over voluntarily.

In another case, U.S. Attorney Carol Lam was removed from her post in San Diego in what some critics believe was White House retaliation for her aggressive pursuit, and conviction, of former Republican Rep. Randy Cunningham of California. Mr. McNulty denied there was any payback involved, but without far more detail, including records of job performance appraisals, senators should remain skeptical.

Until now, the Justice Department had to prove real cause for removal, to ensure that the process was based on merit and not politics. Federal prosecutors, after all, have broad powers to investigate, or not, and those decisions should be based on the facts, regardless of political affiliations. But now it turns out that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales can replace federal prosecutors at will, under powers given to his office in a little noticed section of the USA Patriot Act. And from all appearances, Mr. Gonzales is taking full advantage of that provision.

Some Democrats in the Senate and the House are now proposing to change the law and replace it with a requirement that district courts, not the Justice Department, appoint interim prosecutors. That's the least Congress should do. Had it done its job in the first place, and carefully scrutinized the Patriot Act, there's a good chance this prosecutorial power grab would never have succeeded.

Editorial Tampering With Justice (SEATIMES)

The Seattle Times, February 11, 2007

The imbroglio surrounding the forced resignations of at least seven U.S. attorneys from across the country proves the U.S. Senate needs to reclaim its right to vet the president's appointments.

In a bipartisan vote Thursday, the Senate Judiciary Committee approved a measure to do just that, reversing an ill-advised provision inserted last year into the Patriot Act. John McKay, the former U.S. attorney based in Seattle, was among those kicked out. He was first-rate by all accounts, including a glowing Justice Department review seven months ago. That is, except for one: Last week, U.S. Deputy Attorney Paul McNulty testified to the Senate Judiciary Committee that McKay and five other U.S. attorneys were asked to resign for "performance-related" reasons.

In Seattle, disbelieving elected officials, law-enforcement leaders and judges denounced the insinuation as a load of blarney.

U.S. attorneys are appointed by the Bush administration and can be dismissed without cause. However, in the past, such appointments had to be confirmed by the U.S. Senate within 120 days. But the new Patriot Act provision permits appointees to serve indefinitely without the Senate's OK. Some speculate the administration, under siege and facing a newly empowered Democratic leadership with a chip on its shoulder, was taking advantage of the new latitude.

Then there's McNulty's admission that one U.S. attorney in Arkansas was removed solely to make room for a former aide to White House strategist Karl Rove.

Could the motives be that cynical? Disrupt crucial law-enforcement offices to give cronies a line for their résumés?

If political patronage rules this process, McKay might not have passed muster. Though he has impressive Republican and public-service credentials, McKay irked some in his party by deciding not to wade into the irregularities of the 2004 gubernatorial election that ultimately went to the Democrat. While basing such a decision on facts rather than politics might tick off partisans, the approach engenders trust in government for everybody else.

Whatever the White House's reasons for the firings, Justice Department officials need to get their stories straight and tell the truth about them.

More importantly, Congress must fix that unwise new Patriot Act provision. This episode proves the need for presidential accountability on U.S. attorney appointments.

Editorial: Wanted: A U.S. Attorney (BVND)

The Belleville News Democrat, February 11, 2007

When, oh when, will Southern Illinois get its new U.S. attorney?

When Belleville native Phillip J. Green was nominated for the job, we were told the confirmation process would take four to six weeks. That was in June, eight months ago.

The five other U.S. attorney candidates nominated by President Bush the same day won confirmation in the Senate months ago. Green's appointment has lingered so long now that a new session of Congress has begun, and the process has to start anew.

But Green has not yet been renominated by the Bush administration. Tasia Scolinos, a spokesman for the U.S. Department of Justice, said they are checking into a complaint against Green: "The review has not been completed and while we are working to address it as quickly as possible, there is no set timeline."

An anonymous writer tried to derail Green's appointment with allegations related to a sentencing in Michigan, where Green is an assistant U.S. attorney. But the review shouldn't take this long. The record is clear that Green is an ethical, principled attorney. The chief federal judge in West Michigan told The Grand Rapids Press that Green is "Mr. Integrity."

The Bush administration needs to quit dragging its feet.

Southern Illinois needs a permanent U.S. attorney who can aggressively take on crime and corruption. The Southern District has been without one since November 2005. Acting U.S. attorney Randy Massey is doing a fine job in the interim, but he's not likely to start controversial prosecutions. For instance, some people in the legal community think the office is waiting for a new leader to decide whether to prosecute powerful attorney Tom Lakin.

Once Green is renominated, Illinois Sen. Dick Durbin, a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, needs to get his confirmation on the fast track.

U.S. Attorney Garcia On Public Corruption Cases: We're Not Done (NYJN)

New York Journal News, February 11, 2007

Strange as it might seem, U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia has other fish to fry besides Jeanine Pirro, whose affairs are still being looked into by federal investigators. He said next to nothing about the former Westchester district attorney during his Editorial Board visit last week - we didn't expect otherwise. He had plenty to say about other matters pertinent to his territory, which includes Westchester, Rockland and Putnam. Excepts from our sit down:

On pursuing public corruption cases:

We have some of our local partners working on corruption. We are getting a lot of tips and referrals. We're looking at everything that comes in. If we believe there is a risk, we do the research that goes into taking a harder look at it. What I want to get out of public corruption cases is a comfort level where we have taken a hard look at areas of risk. For example, how much is a green card worth? Those are very valuable commodities and there is a risk for fraud. You also have the higher levels of corruption. We had indictments (involving Albany lawmakers); it exposed a funding process that had risk (for corruption) and people were taking advantage of it and committing crimes. You got to take a hard look there. You go up to a different plane and you look at the United Nations. A unique role for the feds and my office is fraud - that whole Oil for Food program. Obviously that case has progressed. I think those cases are important. I think those will be signature cases that people will look back on. Regarding Albany matters, what I say about it is, we're not done.

On the federal Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Person Act; the Justice Department has been criticized for siding with religious groups on controversial building projects, usurping local land-use law:

I'm not an expert on RLUIPA, but I understand and I've read some of the comments in the paper about it. All I can say on that is that it's not a hard and fast rule (in terms of how his office looks at cases). We're going to go in and look at a case, if there is something to look at. We look at what's going on, what's the (proposed land) use, what do they really want to do, what's the zoning, and at the end of the day we may find that there is a violation. I don't think there is any more going on than that.

On quelling local gun violence:

I think it's a great thing to get people off the street who have guns. We're starting to do some of this in Yonkers. By nature, it has to be a partnership, you have to work with local authorities who are the first responders.

On pursuing sex trafficking cases:

DOJ_NMG_0130480

It's a horrible thing. There are a couple of problems with going after traffickers. One, a lot of times you have to rely on the people who are through the door first - local officials with some kind of domestic violence report. The first responders will be local officials because they have to have some kind of tip-off of what's going on. Once you get in the door and determine there is forced prostitution or sex trafficking, getting witnesses is very difficult because there is tremendous distrust from people who have suffered horrible abuse over sometimes very substantial periods of time. It's hard to say how widespread it is because it's hard to get a firm read on it. People are willing to pay such a high price to get into a country, and it's a terrible crime. The good side is that it gets a lot of attention now. More people are looking for it now than they were in the past.

On enforcement of the Voting Rights Act - an action is pending in Port Chester - and whether more cases can be expected in the Lower Hudson Valley:

There is no initiative here; where we think there is a problem, we will take a hard look at it. In Port Chester we did. By the end of last year we filed a complaint. We believed that the at-large voting structure they had for the trustees was depriving the Hispanic voters of the rights they had under the Voting Rights Act. It wasn't resolved without litigation. That is really ongoing litigation. (He wouldn't comment further.)

On accusations by Pirro, during the fall election, about leaks in his office:

We keep our heads down and do what we do.

Robins Lawyer Fighting Removal As Sexual Assault Prosecutor (MACT)

By Gene Rector

The Macon Telegraph, February 11, 2007

ROBINS AIR FORCE BASE - A Robins Air Force Base lawyer, called a "guardian angel" by at least one base sexual assault victim, was removed Jan. 10 as special assistant to the U.S. attorney for reasons that she claims have little to do with allegations lodged against her.

Dee Dial contends Air Force officials are trying to destroy her career because she has been too aggressive in prosecuting sexual offenders and declined to testify in a Robins effort to discredit the case of a victim seeking a huge cash settlement.

Dial, who has successfully worked seven sex offender cases in the past three years, has in turn filed a complaint with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission against the Air Force, alleging reprisals and the creation of a hostile working environment.

The Georgia native said she is terrified of her employer and what could happen to her career. She remains a general attorney in the 78th Air Base Wing judge advocate's office, but is no longer assigned to prosecute Robins cases in U.S. District Court in Macon.

Dial said accusations raised by the base and U.S. Attorney Max Wood in Macon are being investigated by the Department of Justice - accusations of failing to correct an error in a court document and withholding DNA results from a defense attorney.

A representative from Air Force Materiel Command, the parent agency for Robins, is also investigating issues related to her EEO complaint, Dial said.

"I'm fighting a cultural battle," she emphasized, "and you can't win those. At least one person can't. I have almost 16 years of unblemished service and it doesn't seem to count for much."

The mother of two said she planned to fight the allegations and her removal as special assistant to the U.S. attorney.

"It's either fight or let them run over me, and I'm not going to let them run over me," Dial said. "They have the power and the people, but I'll be a lot meaner because my life is on the line. The ability to support my children and my reputation are on the line. I'm not perfect, but I don't work with perfect people. And I will make sure that everybody knows how not perfect they are."

Air Force officials will say very little about the Dial situation, claiming EEO complaints and personnel actions are privacy matters.

Col. Theresa Carter, the 78th Air Base Wing commander, declined to comment. So did Lt. Col. Nathan Berman, the 78th ABW staff judge advocate. Robert Ely, spokesman for AFMC, said the command could not discuss the "existence or status of investigations."

U.S. Attorney Wood declined to answer questions about the case.

DOJ_NMG_0130481

However, conversations with several sources and a review of documents filed in U.S. District Court reveal a series of events that led to the current dispute:

• October 2004: Sharon Peacock, a Robins procurement clerk, filed an equal employment opportunity complaint charging sexual harassment by her former supervisor, Mark Ferris. The Robins EEO office disallowed Peacock's complaint, saying it was not filed within 45 days of the alleged event and did not state a remedy. Peacock appealed the decision to the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

• January 2005: Ferris pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court to two counts of simple assault and was sentenced to six months in prison. Dial was the Air Force prosecutor in the case.

• April 2006: The EEOC upheld Peacock's appeal and ordered Robins to reopen her case.

• November 2006: Dial said she was asked by Robins officials to testify in the pending Peacock EEOC hearing. She refused, saying it was a conflict of interest.

• December 2006: Dial's co-workers reviewed a December 2004 pre-sentence report sent to Judge Claude Hicks Jr. in the Ferris case and accused Dial of missing a reference that erroneously specified testing of carpet samples taken from Ferris' office were positive for semen. In fact, two separate tests completed in December 2004 showed no DNA material. Dial said she did not compile the document and was not aware of the error until December 2006.

Ferris' attorney, Macon lawyer Hale Almand, subsequently accused Dial of having confirmed to him by telephone in December 2004 that DNA results were positive. Dial has denied that accusation. Almand said in a court filing last month that the presence or absence of Ferris' DNA "was a critical factor" and the absence of semen offers "a substantial defense to the defendant."

• Dec. 20, 2006: Dial's superiors told her that the Department of Justice would be investigating the accusations against her.

• Dec. 20, 2006: Sharon Ratley, criminal chief, assistant U.S. attorney, notified Almand by letter of the erroneous report and confirmed that DNA test results had not been turned over to the defense. Dial said Almand never requested the test results and the results were not a factor since they related to charges that were later dropped in the plea agreement.

• Jan. 4: Dial filed her EEO complaint.

• Jan. 9: Almand filed a motion in U.S. District Court for extraordinary relief in the Ferris case asking for a "full investigation" to determine "the course that (Ferris) will follow."

• Jan. 10: Lt. Col. Berman notified Dial that she would be relieved of her role as special assistant to the U.S. attorney.

• Jan. 18: U.S. Attorney Wood's letter informed the Justice Department that Dial's status as special assistant to the U.S. attorney would be terminated effective Feb. 10.

Dial declined to discuss the specifics of her case, authorizing her sister, Beth O'Connor, to provide additional details of the current battle and what Dial described as a "working environment that has grown increasingly hostile" over the past three years.

Asked about the legal distinction of O'Connor discussing her case, Dial said she was uncertain. "Maybe it's just more my comfort level," Dial responded in an e-mail.

O'Connor, an Alabama pharmacist, said her sister's objectives were simple. "She wants to work in an environment where her record counts for something when times get tough," O'Connor said by telephone. "She wants an environment where she doesn't have to defend herself and other women simply because women are presumed to be liars."

She said Dial has kept pages of notes over the past three years, documenting what O'Connor characterized as the Air Force's belief that men - particularly white men - are guilt-free and women who report sexual offenses are not telling the truth.

"They're doing everything they can to destroy her and possibly fire her," O'Connor said.

Dial insists that DNA results from carpet samples in Ferris' Robins office had no impact on the final plea agreement.

"If (the Air Force) can overturn Ferris' confession, that will destroy Sharon Peacock's case. The motive is to avoid a huge monetary settlement," O'Connor said.

Asked to respond specifically to questions raised about the telephone call with Ferris' attorney, Dial said in an e-mail last week:

DOJ_NMG_0130482

"He (Almand) now claims that I told him on the phone prior to the plea that the DNA lab results were positive. This is illogical and untrue. Every attorney I have ever dealt with except Mr. Almand has asked me for lab results and I always fax or mail them to the requesting attorney.

"I would assume that most defense attorneys take positive results - which these weren't - to analyze the results, see if the evidence was handled properly, discuss the results with their client, consider the reputation of the lab and possibly ask to have the evidence analyzed by their own lab. Without written results how can you do that?" she said.

Dial continued: "This would have been the stupidest lie in history since I could have been immediately called on it. In particular, I assume that if your client is denying the possibility that the evidence was from him, that you would want to scrutinize it very carefully.

"In addition, if I refused to provide written results, the plea could have been held up until the judge could order me to provide them," Dial said.

"I may have made a comment such as 'you may have the lab results to deal with,' but no attorney that I know would risk their reputation - and mine has been unblemished for 16 years - and their license on a lie which is so easily proven," Dial concluded in her e-mail to The Telegraph.

Almand, who did not return phone calls from The Telegraph to his Macon office, insisted in court documents that DNA results were a key factor in the outcome of the case. He wrote in documents filed with the federal court Jan. 9 that without Dial's alleged telephone message regarding the DNA test results, "defendant Ferris would not have pleaded guilty."

Bowers, Peacock's Atlanta attorney, called the Air Force's action against Dial the "most extraordinary development" he can recall in his 20-year practice of employment law.

He said he has never been involved in a situation where a prosecuting attorney "charges sexual harassment against a federal agency related to (a) client's case."

Bowers said an EEOC administrative judge would hear the Peacock evidence beginning April 2. "That will just be on the issue of liability," the attorney said. "There will be a second hearing to determine what compensation she's due. If she's not satisfied with the decision, she can then take the case to federal court."

His client is prepared to reach an out-of-court settlement, Bowers insists. He confirmed the submission of an offer to the Air Force last week but would not discuss the details. "I'm not prepared to do settlement discussions in the press," Bowers said.

The Dial case is causing ripples across the massive military installation where more than 4,000 women report to work each day.

Knowledge of The Telegraph's inquiries prompted two women victimized by individuals prosecuted by Dial to come forward, providing their identities were protected by the newspaper.

One sexual assault victim who asked not to be identified said a number of women on base are terrified at the prospect of losing Dial as their champion.

She described Dial as her "guardian angel" and a check against how the Air Force usually handles sexual offense cases.

"Most of the time they try to cover it up, try to mediate, try to get the girl to calm down and be quiet," she said. "If Dee found out about it, she would throw a fit. And when you don't have someone in the JAG office doing that, it's pretty scary. Those are the people we depend on."

She described what she called the continuing trauma she feels when a man does or says something offensive to her at work.

"You try to smile and brush it off," she said. "You're thinking inside: 'My God, I can't go through this again. Maybe if I smile, walk out of here, act like I'm dumb, maybe he'll go away. Maybe he'll think I didn't get it.' That's how you play the game."

The harassment has been more blatant in the past, she concedes. "One of my supervisors would sleep with his girlfriend, put a tape recorder under the bed, come to work and play it on the loud speaker," she said. "We would have to work to that every night."

The veteran employee said that would not happen today. She said conditions have improved following the Air Force's reaction to the sexual assault scandal at the Air Force Academy in 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0130483

Awareness training has become mandatory. Sexual assault response coordinators along with victim advocates have been established. The position of special assistant to the U.S. attorney - the job Dial no longer occupies - was created to focus on prosecution of sexual offenders.

But the Dial case could change that, the employee suggests. "If we don't have a watchdog, what's going to happen?" she asked. "Are they just going to shove it all under the carpet the way they used to?"

Cindy Graver, sexual assault response coordinator at Robins since June 2005, said she was unfamiliar with the Dial case, but stressed that the base's prevention program is doing its job.

"People are more aware of things they can and can't do," she said. "Education is the key. Some people have never heard that it's inappropriate to touch someone on their back or rub their shoulders. Now they're informed and aware of that."

Graver said 15 sexual assaults were reported to her in 2006. She was not sure how that compared to previous years.

"Not all the reports were valid," she said, "and we know there were assaults that were not reported."

But it's a brand new program, she emphasized. "People feel comfortable to come forward. I'm on call 24/7 and we treat each case individually," Graver said. "One of the most important things I've seen is that people are getting help. It's not that we've had hundreds of calls. But one sexual assault is too many."

A 2006 assault victim who asked that her name not be used took issue with Graver's assessment. She claims conditions in the workplace haven't changed very much.

"They say there's zero tolerance," she said, "but they don't follow through. They preach it, but it's not that way. The base looks like a laughingstock."

O'Connor said her sister also has lost faith in the system. "She would never report any sexual assault if it happened to her," the Alabama pharmacist said. "It would be like the Polish cavalry when Hitler launched his blitzkrieg during World War II."

The Air Force wants half-hearted prosecuting attorneys, O'Connor suggests. "And that's not how my sister saw her job. Her job was to defend these women to the best of her ability. And it's been a battle. Every case has been a battle."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Pay-to-play Ticket To Power In Lake County? (NWT)

By Joe Carlson

Northwest (IN) Times, February 11, 2007

LAKE COUNTY -- One fed likens purchase of fund-raising tickets to bribery

The long-standing political tradition of pay-to-play in Lake County is something federal authorities say remains a political force today and in some cases equates to bribery.

"Here's how it works," said one source, a contractor who has done business with governments in cities and towns around the county and knows the importance of buying political fund-raising tickets.

"If you do business with the city, and it's campaign time, certain department heads will tell you to purchase tickets," the source said. "If you don't, you won't be doing business."

The discussion about when buying political fund-raising tickets becomes a form of bribery comes at a timely junction, as municipal leaders around the county and state are holding their regular political fundraisers for the 2007 election cycle.

Agents from the FBI thought they would discover evidence of just such a scheme going on in Gary in December 2003, when they raided three business offices owned by politically connected businessman Jewell Harris Sr.

Secret affidavits by federal agents used to justify the warrants came into public scrutiny last week after Harris' defense attorney, Thomas Durkin, took issue with the sweeping generalizations contained in them.

One longtime FBI agent, Fred Graessele, stated that the "sale of tickets" by corrupt officials has become a term "synonymous with bribe, kickback, and payoff" in Lake County.

For his part, Harris denies participating in anything of the sort and argues that Graessele's characterization are so overboard that the search warrant should be thrown out of court.

DOJ_NMG_0130484

To a person, numerous political insiders and contractors interviewed by The Times last week bemoaned the unfortunate but necessary role money plays in region political races, particularly in modern times when it can cost $50,000 or $100,000 to run for mayor of a city or town.

Two local consultants, Tom Dabertin and James Bennet, said they often buy tickets from the governments that employ them but have never felt compelled to do anything illegal or unethical.

"I support people who basically I think are decent people, and if they're going to get elected, they're going to need money," Bennet said. "I've had people send me 10 tickets, and I've bought two. I try to keep it within what's reasonable."

Tom Collins Jr., vice president of Luke Oil Co., said he's never had qualms writing $20,000 checks to the campaign to support Hammond Mayor Thomas McDermott Jr.

Collins said he's heard the stories, and he was nervous about the possibility of putting money in the political game. But his apprehension was outweighed by his desire to see change in the leadership in Hammond, where former Mayor Duane Dedelow Jr. had tried to condemn land Collins' company owns near the lakefront casino.

"All we ever wanted from our support is to be treated fairly and not be harassed or pushed around," Collins said. "Do a good job and treat us fairly. We're not looking for anything in return."

But another government contractor recalled a municipal official handing over hefty stack of tickets, along with a reminder of how much business the company had gotten.

"It was just kind of part of the game," the contractor said. "But it was a two-way thing. We had to be fairly good, too, to keep the business."

WiFi Turns Internet Into Hideout For Criminals (WP)

By Jamie Stockwell, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

Authorities Struggling With Anonymity Provided By Unsecured Networks

Detectives arrived last summer at a high-rise apartment building in Arlington County, warrant in hand, to nab a suspected pedophile who had traded child pornography online. It was to be a routine, mostly effortless arrest.

But when they pounded on the door, detectives found an elderly woman who, they quickly concluded, had nothing to do with the crime. The real problem was her computer's wireless router, a device sending a signal through her 10-story building and allowing savvy neighbors a free path to the Internet from the privacy of their homes.

Perhaps one of those neighbors, authorities said, was stealthily uploading photographs of nude children. Doing so essentially rendered him or her untraceable.

With nearly 46,000 public access points across the country -- many of them free -- hundreds of thousands of computer users are logging on every day to wireless networks at cafes, hotels, airports and even while sitting on park benches. And although the majority of those people are simply checking their e-mail and surfing the Web, authorities said an increasing number of criminals are taking advantage of the anonymity offered by the wireless signals to commit a raft of serious crimes -- from identity theft to the sexual solicitation of children.

"We're not sure yet how to combat that," said Kevin R. West, a federal agent who oversees the computer crimes unit in North Carolina's State Bureau of Investigation. "Free wireless spots are everywhere, and it makes it easy for people . . . to sit there and do their nefarious acts. The fear is that if we talk about it, people will learn about it and say, 'I can go to a parking lot, and no one will catch me.' But we need to talk about it so that we can figure out how to solve it."

The way it works is simple: Anyone who has a wireless card installed in his or her computer -- and most new computers are equipped with one -- can access the Internet from any of the public WiFi "hotspots," as they're known. In an age of portability and instant gratification, getting online has never been easier -- for law-abiding folks and those with bad intentions.

And in especially dense areas such as the Washington region, some neighborhoods might offer users a dozen or more open wireless signals from which to choose.

DOJ_NMG_0130485

"Unsecured networks are a treasure trove for neighbors," said John Sheehan, program manager of the CyberTipline at the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children. "Those looking to access illegal content obviously feel they have anonymity" and can get away with it.

They most often do, authorities said.

"It's frustrating for officers," said Todd Shipley, director of training services at the National Consortium for Justice Information and Statistics. "If a suspect is going from coffee shop to coffee shop and using free signals to commit crimes, the police probably aren't going to catch him. That's the reality."

Open wireless signals are akin to leaving your front door wide open all day -- and returning home to find that someone has stolen your belongings and left a mess that needs cleaning.

One way to combat it is for people to secure their wireless networks by making them password-protected. But, authorities said, businesses and cities that offer free connections need some way to track the users, such as filtering measures that could scan to see who is accessing the network.

Locally, Alexandria recently announced plans to expand its wireless network. The Internet service provider EarthLink will build a citywide network for a 16-square-mile area, with free wireless connections available in more than two dozen public locations. The provider also has worked on municipal WiFi in cities including Philadelphia and New Orleans. Alexandria officials said EarthLink will decide whether to implement security measures on the network, which will be accessible to anyone passing through the city.

In one recent case, West said, a truck driver used free wireless signals at motels across the country to post and view pornographic images of children at a Web site. By pure luck, the man was caught, West said. When the suspect got online from his home computer, authorities were able to trace his computer's Internet Protocol address, or the unique set of numbers assigned to every computer that uses the Internet. That number, which serves as a virtual street address, often leads authorities to the offender's physical residence.

"Otherwise he would've slipped through the cracks," West said. "We wouldn't have been able to identify him."

These days, the Internet is as indispensable to an officer's arsenal as his gun and handcuffs. Indeed, a growing number of officers are being assigned to patrol cyberspace.

Across the nation, 46 multi-jurisdictional Internet Crimes Against Children task forces have been created to carry out online sting operations aimed at ensnaring sex offenders because a man tapping away on a computer in Rockville might very well be soliciting a child in California. Every week, federal and local authorities cast their nets.

And although most sex crimes against underage boys and girls involve victims and suspects who know each other, an increasing number involve online interactions between strangers. Online solicitations -- in which pedophiles cultivate relationships with children and then arrange to meet them in public places -- are becoming more common, federal authorities said.

And even in those cases in which the suspect is brought to police attention by a neighbor or friend or relative, computers are often rich sources of evidence, West said.

"Technology just makes the park no longer the only place where the pervert goes," West said.

The Northern Virginia-D.C. task force has officers from 23 local, state and federal agencies. It was established in November 2004 through a grant from the Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention at the Justice Department. Since its creation, dozens of cases have been opened and more than three dozen arrests have been made.

Those assigned to the task forces patrol the virtual streets for pedophiles and others who want to commit crimes against children. Using software and other tracking devices, the officers trace a suspect's IP address. But as technology improves, so too do the tactics of criminals. Closing cases is more difficult if the IP address originated from a wireless signal because it often leads back to the owner of the network instead of the criminal.

The problem is going to get worse, authorities said. Every day, more homes, businesses and entire jurisdictions are outfitted with wireless networks, creating an almost seamless patchwork of available Internet connections to anyone with a laptop and the desire to get online.

DOJ_NMG_0130486

"This is part of the future . . . and we're working to catch up and educate the public," said Capt. Tommy Turner of the Virginia State Police.

The Dying Death Penalty? (WP)

By Dahlia Lithwick

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

In a curious application of Newtonian physics, public and state support for capital punishment is steadily declining in America just as the resolve to maintain the death penalty seems to be hardening in the one arena where death-penalty policy once had seemed poised to change: the Supreme Court.

The trend is clear. According to the Death Penalty Information Center, which compiles statistics on capital punishment, two states have imposed formal moratoriums on the death penalty; executions in New York are on hold after the state's death penalty law was declared unconstitutional in 2004; 11 states (including, most recently, Florida and Tennessee) have effectively barred the practice because of concerns over lethal injection; and 11 more are considering moratoriums or repeals.

The raw numbers of executions and death sentences in the United States have plummeted: Information Center statistics show that in 1999 we executed 98 people, and in 2006 that number dropped to a 10-year low of 53. Whereas America steadily condemned about 300 prisoners a year to death through the 1990s, that number has declined by more than half and reached a low of 114 in 2006. Public support also seems to be faltering. A Gallup poll last year showed that two-thirds of the country still supports capital punishment for murderers, but when given the choice between the death penalty and a life sentence without parole, more people preferred the life prison term (48 percent) to capital punishment (47 percent) for the first time in 20 years.

The new uncertainty over capital punishment ranges from queasiness over the methods of execution to concern that we are executing innocents. Lethal injection, the preferred method of execution in 39 of the 40 states that permit capital punishment, is particularly fraught with problems.

In December, then-Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida ended executions following one in which it took the prisoner 34 minutes to die and he suffered chemical burns in the process. Recent scholarship, including a British medical journal report, indicates that the lethal-injection cocktail used may simply mask agonizing pain before death. And state courts are also increasingly bothered about the proper role of physicians -- often mandated by law to supervise the lethal-injection process over objections by medical associations and ethics boards.

There are numerous other reasons for our growing doubts about the death penalty. In a 2005 speech, Justice John Paul Stevens pointed to several, including DNA evidence that has shown that "a substantial number of death sentences have been imposed erroneously," the fact that elected judges face disproportionate pressure to impose capital punishment, and the problem of "death-qualified" jurors (those who oppose capital punishment are barred from sitting on capital cases). For these and other reasons, many Americans have begun to worry that the death penalty in this country is not reserved for the "worst of the worst," but for the poorest of the poor and those whose trial attorneys later prove to have been asleepest at the switch.

The Innocence Project, a nonprofit legal clinic associated with the Benjamin N. Cardozo School of Law at Yeshiva University in New York, says there have been 194 post-conviction DNA exonerations. A wrongful-executions study by Hugo Bedau and Michael Radelet of contends that from 1900 to 1991, 416 clearly innocent people were sentenced to die. And studies about the racism that taints the entire system are unequivocal.

In recent years the Supreme Court has also shown concern about the death penalty. In an article published last year, Duke University professor Erwin Chemerinsky observed that in the final years of the William H. Rehnquist Court, the justices showed a marked tendency to overturn death sentences. Chemerinsky speculated that "a majority of the Court was (and continues to be) deeply concerned about how the death penalty is administered in the United States" and that, as a result of the revelations by various investigators, "the reality of innocent people facing execution has had a profound effect on the Justices."

So in the early years of the new century, the court handed down surprising decisions outlawing executions of the mentally retarded and of those who were juveniles at the time of their crimes, and refining the tests for the ineffectiveness of counsel. Several justices also voiced concerns off the bench: Stevens, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Sandra Day O'Connor each spoke publicly and passionately about flaws in the capital system.

DOJ_NMG_0130487

But, largely as a result of a change in the court's composition, that trend may now be ending. Just as a few states are defiantly expanding their use of the death penalty. And there is some reason to fear that some justices don't share the burgeoning sense that the machinery of death in this country is broken. One is the new chief justice, John G. Roberts Jr., who, when he worked in the Reagan White House, wrote a memo suggesting that the high court could cut its caseload by "abdicating the role of fourth or fifth guesser in death penalty cases."

One case last term involved a man convicted of a rape and murder, who later produced DNA evidence raising serious doubt that he was the culprit. The court ruled 5 to 3 that this new evidence warranted a new hearing. But Roberts led the dissenters, who felt it wasn't enough for the new evidence to cast doubt on the defendant's conviction; to grant relief, the evidence had to prove he "was actually innocent."

In another death-penalty case from 2005, then-Justice O'Connor agreed with the court's liberals that trial counsel was ineffective. That decision reversed an opinion by Samuel A. Alito Jr., then a judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 3rd Circuit, that would have denied relief. The signals are still mixed. In a different case, the entire court allowed death-row inmates to pursue a civil claim against lethal injection.

But also last term, Justice Antonin Scalia wrote a separate opinion in a death-penalty case for the sole purpose of excoriating Justice David H. Souter, who had written in a dissent about exonerated innocents. Scalia's opinion was a full-bore attack on the notion of innocent exonerees "paraded by various professors" and claimed, in effect, that even if those exonerated were not guilty enough to warrant the death penalty, they were still far from "innocent." (How that made them candidates for the death penalty he did not explain.)

Oral argument this term has also revealed a subtle hardening on the part of some of the court's conservatives. In one case, Roberts questioned the need for a trial judge to specifically guide jurors regarding mitigating evidence.

Somehow, just as the American people are beginning to consider the grave injustices pervading the capital system, several justices seem to be staking out strong personal positions on this front in the culture wars.

In his article, Chemerinsky suggests that justices who change course on the death penalty often do so only after decades on the bench. That might suggest that the two new justices will only soften on capital punishment in the far distant future. These justices also would insist that if the death penalty in this country needs fixing, the state legislatures should do it, a process that's already beginning to happen. But if for most Americans the time for stubborn certainty about the death penalty, at least as it's currently practiced, seems to be over, a court that is more certain than ever of its fundamental fairness looks grievously out of step with an American public willing to recognize the dangers of injustice, error and doubt.

Dahlia Lithwick covers legal affairs for Slate, the online magazine at www.slate.com.

CIVIL LAW:

Editorial: Pay Up: Maybe We Could Help People If Feds Could Collect (LONGNJ)

LONGVIEW NEWS-JOURNAL

Longview (TX) News-Journal, February 11, 2007

Here's what is so frustrating when we hear excuses about why programs that help people — really help people — face cutbacks when times get tight:

A Cox News Service story reported Saturday that there is a backlog of cases in which pharmaceutical companies are suspected of defrauding federal and state health care programs of billions of dollars.

That's billions with a "B."

The U.S. Justice Department office in charge of pursuing these cases has already recovered $5.3 billion from major drug companies since 1999, but an associate deputy attorney general told a House Committee that there are billions more out there to be recovered. The problem is that his office lacks the manpower to do it in a timely manner.

With the math showing that it costs about $1 in Justice Department expenses to recover $15 in restitution and fines, one might expect higher ranking officials in the Justice Department and White House to figure out it would pay dividends to add to the staff.

DOJ_NMG_0130488

The first thing the feds might want to do, however, is send a few folks down to Austin to find out why Texas is so much more proficient at pursuing these cases.

Patrick J. O'Connell, chief of the Texas Attorney General's recently expanded Medicaid task force, pointed out that the state has collected more than $100 million in the same time frame, spending about $5 to $7 million to do so. That's a return even more impressive than the Justice Department's.

The scariest thing about this situation is that the federal Medicare program is only one year into its new "Part D" prescription drug benefit for seniors. With the estimated cost of that program running as high as $1 trillion over 10 years, its seems ripe for the plucking if the government can't stay on top of current fraud cases.

President Bush's proposed budget for the next fiscal year includes added funding for the feds pursuing fraud cases.

The bottom line is that for all of the concerns raised about individual patients or doctors who might be cheating federal health programs, the real money is in these big cases. Just ask O'Connell, who told congressmen that nearly two thirds of the $100 million collected by his team came from just four large drug companies.

Some people will find the feds' foot-dragging approach most frustrating because it's a waste of taxpayers' money. Although we find that frustrating as well, we are even more concerned about the fact that in the time the backlog has been building, we have frequently heard about needs to scale back public health programs because of budget difficulties.

Waste, fraud and misplaced priorities are all more serious problems than many of those that occupy our lawmakers' time.

People die when they don't get sufficient or timely health care. It's time to begin collecting the money that is due the government and using it to provide the services our neighbors need.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

In Search Of Justice (JCL)

By Jerry Mitchell

Jackson Clarion-Ledger, February 11, 2007

GREENWOOD — A Leflore County grand jury that will be impaneled in March is expected to take up the 1955 abduction and killing of Emmett Till.

The Emmett Till Justice Campaign is hoping to take out advertisements in a local newspaper before that happens, said president Alvin Sykes of Kansas City. "We want to encourage grand jurors to listen to the evidence and follow the law. If there is enough evidence, they should indict. If there is not enough evidence, they should not do it. We don't want them to do the same thing the jury did in 1955."

File photo/The Clarion-Ledger

Betty Pearson looks over the remnants of the old Wolf Grocery, formerly Bryant's Grocery and Meat Market in Money. The store is where Emmett Till reportedly wolf-whistled at Carolyn Bryant, leading to his murder.

That's when an all-white jury in Tallahatchie County acquitted Roy Bryant and J.W. Milam in the murder of Till, only to see the two men confess their involvement months later to Look magazine. They since have died of cancer.

This new grand jury could consider kidnapping charges against Bryant's ex-wife, Carolyn, who has told relatives and the FBI she is innocent.

Having the grand jury decide is "an idea whose time has come," said Till's cousin, Wheeler Parker of Chicago, who was with Till when he was abducted. "I'm not going to rejoice in somebody's downfall. I'm not aggressively trying to pursue someone, but you have to reap what you sow."

The pursuit of possible charges in the case comes at a time when there's been a renewed focus on crimes of the past. On Jan. 25, reputed Klansman James Seale of Roxie pleaded innocent to federal kidnapping and conspiracy charges in connection with the May 2, 1964, abduction and killings of Henry Hezekiah Dee and Charles Eddie Moore.

Seale's arrest is the 28th since 1989 in cases resurrected from the civil rights era. If convicted, he could face life in prison.

DOJ_NMG_0130489

A bill introduced in Congress last week would create a cold cases unit to track down unpunished killings from the civil rights era. The FBI already is examining 51 killings from that time period, and a Montgomery museum lists 127 racial killings between 1954 and 1968 - a number it concedes could be much higher.

In 2004, the Justice Department opened an investigation into Till's slaying. Less than two years later, the FBI turned over its findings to District Attorney Joyce Chiles of Greenville and recommended prosecutors take a closer look at Carolyn Bryant, the key suspect in the case.

On Aug. 28, 1955, Till, a 14-year-old African American from Chicago, was beaten and shot to death after he reportedly wolf-whistled at Bryant at a grocery store in Money.

During the wee hours of the morning, Bryant and Milam arrived with guns at the Leflore County home of Till's uncle, Mose Wright, and took Till away.

Wright testified that, as the pair left with Till, he heard someone in the pickup speak with "a lighter voice than men" identifying Till as "the one." Some have speculated that someone was Carolyn Bryant.

"He couldn't see who it was, but it may well have been her," said David Beito, a University of Alabama history professor who has researched the case exhaustively with his wife, Linda Royster Beito, a Stillman College professor.

The theory Carolyn Bryant was there appears to be supported, in part, by Bryant's and Milam's initial statement. They told Leflore County Sheriff George Smith they had abducted Till but released him unharmed after Carolyn Bryant, who was back at the store, told them Till wasn't the one.

Their claim they released Till unharmed was an obvious lie, but were they telling the truth when they said they showed Till to her?

Beito said it's difficult to say since no witness positively identified Carolyn Bryant outside Wright's house. She repeatedly has denied to the FBI she was there.

The biggest problem facing prosecutors is jurors might not hear some of these details.

Mississippi court rules permit testimony of dead or unavailable witnesses, but Mose Wright's 1955 testimony appears to be inadmissible since Carolyn Bryant wasn't on trial, said Aaron Condon, professor emeritus for the University of Mississippi School of Law.

It's unknown what additional evidence, if any, the FBI has uncovered in its investigation.

If the FBI found a witness who could put Carolyn Bryant at Wright's house that night, it might still be difficult to conclude she committed a crime because it remains unknown whether she objected to what was taking place or encouraged it, Condon said. "To get beyond reasonable doubt will be one hellacious trip."

One other possibility, legal experts say, would be if the FBI found someone whom Carolyn Bryant had confided in regarding her role, if any.

Some details in the case could assist her defense. The Look article says Roy Bryant learned of the wolf-whistle days later from a black customer, not his ex-wife.

Among defense lawyers, a common expression is a district attorney wields so much influence among grand jurors he could get them to indict a ham sandwich.

"My experience is grand juries are not as pliable as people think they are," said Condon, a former prosecutor in Attala County.

In one case, grand jurors indicted when he didn't want them to, he said. "The result was an immediate acquittal. They didn't take time to smoke a cigarette."

Chiles rejects talk that prosecutors exert that kind of influence on a grand jury.

That's not what she likes to use grand juries for anyway, she said. "If the evidence is there, we expect a grand jury to return an indictment. If it isn't, we wouldn't encourage a grand jury to indict."

She plans to share all the information gathered in the Till investigation with grand jurors, she said. "We wouldn't hold anything back."

Local Inmate Claims Guards Beat Him To Near Death (WILNJ)

DOJ_NMG_0130490

By Lee Williams, The News Journal

Wilmington (DE) News Journal, February 11, 2007

David Kalm, a 56-year-old disabled sailor, spent seven days in hospitals

David L. Kalm, a 56-year-old disabled Merchant Marine sailor, says he was nearly beaten to death by prison guards at the Sussex Correctional Institution near Georgetown last October.

Kalm, who was serving a 60-day sentence for DUI, said two guards wearing black gloves took turns pounding his head into a cinder-block wall until he passed out.

"They really seemed to enjoy smashing my head and my face into the wall," he said. "My ears looked like elephant ears when I came out of the hospital."

In written reports, the guards said Kalm's injuries were self-inflicted, and Kalm acknowledges an earlier physical confrontation with guards after he refused to be moved to a cellblock where he feared being harmed by other inmates. However, Christiana Hospital medical staff members who examined Kalm concluded that the injuries were suffered during an "assault."

"Anatomically, it could not have been possible" for the injuries to be self-inflicted, said Dr. Irwin Lifrak, a physician who has been an expert witness in several wrongful-death lawsuits. He was asked to review the medical records by an attorney working with Kalm.

The medical records, which Kalm provided to The News Journal, show that he suffered a concussion, a moderate coma, a broken nose, an eyeball that was oozing blood, two broken ribs, a punctured lung, bruising around an eye, extensive bruising to his face, head and ears, and two pharyngeal tears in his throat. Lifrak and another medical professional say the tears were caused by repeated blows to his neck or by an object such as a nightstick being shoved down his throat.

Last month, the FBI began collecting preliminary information on the incident, and the Department of Correction has begun an internal investigation.

After the last confrontation with guards, Kalm said, he was denied medical care for 13 hours by a prison system that was found by the U.S. Justice Department late last year to have committed numerous civil rights violations because of inadequate medical care going back years.

Kalm spent seven days recovering in hospitals.

"There are telephone numbers I've known my whole life that I can't remember anymore," he said.

Correction Commissioner Carl Danberg, who learned of the incident this month on his second day as commissioner, ordered his Internal Affairs unit to investigate Kalm's allegations and asked prison health director James Welch to review the inmate's medical records, along with assistance from "outside physicians."

Attorney General Beau Biden III declined to comment because of the internal investigation.

Kalm was released from Sussex Correctional Institution in November. In early January, he contacted Dover attorney Steve Hampton, who represented the family of Anthony Pierce, who became known as "the brother with two heads" as an inmate at Sussex Correctional Institution. Pierce died of a brain tumor while his condition was mishandled by the prison medical staff. In October 2005, the state settled the wrongful death lawsuit in a confidential agreement.

Kalm, who is legally disabled, has a heart condition, high blood pressure, stomach problems and arthritis in his spine that aggravates his sciatic nerve, causing intense, shooting pain down his leg, according to his medical records. Kalm's lungs were damaged while serving in the Merchant Marine, so he uses a "breathing machine" daily to treat a condition similar to asthma.

He also has struggled with alcohol. In 2006, he was charged on three separate counts of driving under the influence, in addition to an offensive touching charge from 2004. He pleaded guilty to DUI in May, but two more DUI cases are pending.

When he reported to prison late last year, because of his health problems, he went to the prison infirmary. One night, he claims, a nurse gave him the wrong medication, which made him ill. The next day, Kalm complained to a doctor.

The next night, the nurse was outraged, Kalm said.

"That's how this all got started," he said.

At around 9:30 p.m. on Oct. 6, guards tried to move him to a cellblock where he feared being victimized because guards had spread a rumor that he was gay.

Kalm protested the transfer in a supervisor's office.

DOJ_NMG_0130491

"I was freaking. I was scared for my life," he said.

According to Sgt. Daniel R. Kobus' Oct. 26 disciplinary report, Kalm at the time was "acting funny, saying that someone was gonna hurt him, acting all crazy."

Kalm told a reporter that he grabbed the supervisor's desk to avoid being sent to a cell.

"Then the door flies open and a whole pile of guards run in, spray me with Mace and start punching me," he said. "I grabbed onto a computer and the wires. When they're dragging me out of there, the computer comes off the desk and hits a guard."

Kalm said he was taken to a dark cell where two guards punched him and slammed his head into the walls.

"It was a real strange room," he said. "There wasn't no window there, and they'd come through and spray Mace into the room. They'd make me stick my arms out the food slot and twist them, which really hurt. I still have arm pain today."

"The next thing I remember was a doc waking me up in Christiana, asking me if I know what day it is," he said. Medical records show Kalm was suffering a concussion and a moderate coma.

None of the seven guards named in department reports on the incidents chose to comment to The News Journal, according to correction officials.

Guards' version

In another document, dated 20 days after the assault, several guards report finding Kalm "banging his head and fist off of the wall." He was "still being very combative," the document says. Kalm denies harming himself.

"I never banged my head on the cell wall," he said. "They banged my head on the cell wall."

At the hospital, the guards told the staff Kalm had stuck a pencil down his throat, causing the pharyngeal tears, but the pencil was not mentioned in the guards' report.

Dr. Lifrak, who practices internal medicine in Wilmington and also is a lawyer, questioned whether Kalm could have damaged his own throat.

"The esophagus is behind the trachea -- the food pipe behind the air pipe," he said. "If a person were to hurt or stab themselves in the throat, they would have to go through the trachea before getting to the esophagus. It's just not possible."

Lifrak maintains that the pharyngeal tears were caused by blows or an object inserted through Kalm's mouth.

"I don't remember anything getting stuck in my mouth before I passed out," Kalm said. "But afterwards, they could have done anything to me."

A Christiana psychiatrist noted that Kalm was in "fear for his life, believes prison officials and other inmates plan him further harm, states he is being denied access to a phone to call family or an attorney, and prison officials have forbidden me to make a call on his behalf."

Kalm said he still suffers from the alleged assault.

"I get two different types of headaches. They're crippling," he said. "And I still wake up in the middle of the night in extreme fear, soaking wet." Staff reporter Esteban Parra contributed to this article.

Contact investigative reporter Lee Williams at 324-2362 or lwilliams@delawareonline.com.

TIMELINE

9:30 p.m. Oct. 6 -- Kalm struggles with prison guards, who use pepper spray and fists to subdue him while he is being moved to a new tier in the Sussex Correctional Institution near Georgetown.

9:55 p.m. Oct. 6 -- Prison guards report Kalm was "banging on the walls." He is cuffed and taken to an isolation cell, and left overnight, despite substantial injuries which include a concussion, a moderate coma, two pharyngeal tears in his throat, a broken nose, two broken ribs, a punctured lung, bruising around the orbit of the eye, and extensive bruising to his face, head and ears.

10:46 a.m. Oct. 7 -- Nearly 13 hours after the second incident, Kalm is taken to the prison infirmary, where staff members clean his bloody eye and broken nose, and put a bandage on his bruised cheek.

1:20 p.m. Oct. 7 -- Kalm is moved from the infirmary to Beebe Medical Center in Lewes.

8:10 p.m. Oct. 7 -- Kalm is transferred from Beebe Medical Center to Christiana Care in Stanton. Christiana medical staffers find he has difficulty breathing on his own. They determine his injuries were suffered during an "assault."

DOJ_NMG_0130492

Oct. 13 -- Seven days after the first struggle with prison guards, Kalm is discharged from Christiana and taken back to prison.

Noxubee's Bill For Voting Right Trial Tops $25,000 So Far (MEMCD)

By Jewel Miller, Dispatch Correspondent

Columbus (MS) Commercial Dispatch, February 11, 2007

MACON - More than half of the funds earmarked by the Noxubee County Board of Supervisors for their 2007 budget to cover legal expenses for the county's election commission has been spent.

And though the federal trial in which the Noxubee County Election Commission and Democratic Party Chairman Ike Brown were accused of discriminating against white voters wrapped up in Jackson on Jan. 31, officials said more fees for the case are imminent.

“We've spent over $25,000 already and we're not at the end of it,” said Janet Abrams, the county's comptroller at Friday's Noxubee County supervisors meeting.

The supervisors allotted $50,000 for the election commission's legal fees in 2007 to cover legal expenses for the precedent-setting voting rights trial. The commission is represented by Clinton attorney, Ellis Turnage. The county isn't however footing the bill to defend Brown, whose attorney is Wil Colom of Columbus.

The board avoided an additional $8,500 bill when Turnage opted not to use the testimony of political scientist Richard Engstrom. Engstrom had been expected to counter the testimony of the Justice Department's expert witness, political science professor Theodore Arrington.

Arrington testified last month Brown and his associates don't maintain practices to prevent “bias and fraud.” Engstrom has countered that Noxubee County whites lose elections simply because they're in the minority.

Noxubee's supervisors authorized payment of the $8,500 to Turnage for Engstrom's expert testimony at their regular Monday meeting. But hours later, Turnage informed Noxubee Board Attorney Chris Hemphill Engstrom won't be called to testify.

The federal trial pitted the U.S. Justice Department against the Noxubee County Election Commission and Brown, who stands accused of discriminating against and intimidating white voters during the past several elections. This trial marks the first time The Voting Rights Act of 1965 has been used to protect the rights of white voters.

During the non-juried trial, the Justice Department presented evidence of their allegations, including the testimony of more than 40 witnesses before U.S. District Judge Tom Lee.

But Hemphill said this doesn't mean the end to Turnage's charges for his representation.

“(Turnage) indicated in our conversation that other charges were coming,” Hemphill said.

Although the trial has been recessed, Lee set a March 26 deadline for the attorneys to submit final written briefs. He will make a ruling at a later date.

In other business, the board heard a request from Crayton Coleman, Extension agent, asking for their support of a 4-H agent for Noxubee County. No decisions will be made on the matter until further information is brought to the board.

Human Trafficking Legislation Is Pushed (LCJ)

By Deborah Yetter

Louisville (KY) Courier-Journal, February 11, 2007

Previous effort for bill fell short

FRANKFORT, Ky. — Cases of human trafficking have begun to surface in Kentucky, and advocates argue that the state should join 27 others that have enacted laws against exploiting people for forced labor, domestic work or the sex trade.

"It is happening here," said Cori Hash, a legal aid lawyer in Lexington. "We've seen it. We know the victims are out there."

A bill filed by Sen. David Boswell, D-Owensboro, would make it a criminal offense to bring people into the state for exploitation.

The measure, Senate Bill 43, also would provide services and help for the victims of human trafficking, often women or children.

"I think this issue is very important -- it's a human rights issue," Boswell said.

A human-trafficking bill passed the Senate last year, but it died after the House attached an unrelated amendment dealing with identity theft.

Boswell said he's discussing the bill -- which has been assigned to the Judiciary Committee -- with Senate leadership and thinks its chances are better.

"This bill is getting some traction," he said.

Groups backing the bill include the Catholic Conference of Kentucky, the Kentucky Office of Legal Services and the Kentucky Domestic Violence Association.

The Rev. Patrick Delahanty, who is working on the bill for the Catholic Conference, said it's difficult to know how significant the problem is in Kentucky.

"These people are coerced, intimidated and forced to work," he said. "They are very fearful of coming forward."

Trafficking victims often come from other counties -- enticed by purported offers of jobs or marriage. Many are laborers or migrant workers, but some are U.S. citizens, often children, forced into prostitution, Hash said.

Congress passed a law banning human trafficking in 2000 to combat what the State Department has said is a growing problem in the United States. It says that as many as 800,000 people a year are trafficked worldwide, with up to 17,500 of those coming to the United States, according to its 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report.

The Justice Department, which enforces the federal law, also is urging states to adopt their own laws, said Andrea Bertone, director of HumanTrafficking.org, a Washington resource and information center.

State laws provide more law enforcement resources to fight trafficking, as well as services for victims, Bertone said.

Indiana adopted a trafficking law last year, and Bertone said Kentucky should consider one as well.

"Victims of trafficking have been found in some pretty remote areas," Bertone said. "No state is immune to people at some point being exploited."

In Kentucky a handful of women believed to be victims of human trafficking have arrived at domestic violence shelters over the last few years, said Sherry Currens, director of the domestic violence association.

Domestic violence often is involved if the victim is forced to live with a male she thought she was coming to marry, Currens said. Some victims are forced into prostitution and have their passports and other documentation taken and freedom restricted, she said.

The victims, who may not speak English and may not be in the country legally, often are afraid to go to authorities. If they do get away, they may have nowhere to go, Currens said.

"I think it's a growing issue," she said. "There are homeless shelters, but in rural areas the services just aren't there.

Hash, who works at the Maxwell Street Legal Clinic in Lexington, specializes in immigration cases. She said she and other immigration lawyers have seen several cases where they believe human trafficking was involved.

In one case, a Western Kentucky family brought a foreign woman to live with them to work as a nanny and housekeeper. But when she arrived, they took her passport, restricted her to the house and made her work long hours for wages that amounted to less than $1 an hour.

The woman was afraid to press charges, but legal aid lawyers were able to work with her to recover some of the wages she said she was owed, Hash said.

Hash said she also is working with a woman who said she was sold to a Southern Kentucky man as a wife. And her office is tracking child prostitution prosecutions in Tennessee and Ohio where evidence shows the prostitution rings operated in Kentucky.

"I expect the numbers are actually much higher than are coming through our doors," she said.

More information is available at www.HumanTrafficking.org.

Reporter Deborah Yetter can be reached at (502) 582-4228.

Justice Dept. Major Player In Every Step Schools Make (MEMCD)

By Garthia Elena Halbert

Columbus (MS) Commercial Dispatch, February 11, 2007

For decades, every move in the public education arena within Lowndes County has been under the scrutiny of the U.S. Department of Justice.

From construction to teacher recruitment, the Columbus Municipal School District and Lowndes County School District have had to make decisions with a willingness to change course since a federal court must give its approval.

Administrators say the process is cumbersome and restrictive.

"The biggest impediment is that all planning and future plans must be approved, and we really don't always know what will happen in terms of population growth or population shifts," said Dr. Lester Beason, CMSD superintendent of education.

"For example, if we want to plan for a long-term building program, we can guess where the community will be in 10 to 12 years and plan and build accordingly, but if the population shifts or drops or accelerates, the plan has to be re-written and re-approved by the federal court," Beason said.

"The public doesn't like it," said Jeff Smith, who's been board attorney for the LCSD Board of Education for 16 years. "The public doesn't like the Justice Department having to approve construction."

Since a 1970 court judgment declared the two districts discriminatory on the basis of race, the DOJ can step in when desegregation of extracurricular activities, transportation, administrative staff assignment, relative quality of education, faculty assignment, facilities and resources or student assignment may be compromised.

In 1989, the county school board decided to present all new construction projects to the Justice Department for approval to avoid potential litigation.

"July 1, 1989, there was a completely new school board," said Smith. "... They replaced a much older, much more conservative school board. And they had just elected a new superintendent, and they had just hired a new lawyer, which was me.

"They decided ... that all construction needed to be approved by the Justice Department."

That process caused the most friction for the county - until the more recent DOJ decision to keep Caledonia and New Hope students and teachers out of their new classrooms until West Lowndes improvements are complete - in the early '90's when planning began for a new high school in New Hope.

"The superintendent, board and architect planned it in 1990. It was built in '91-'92," said Smith.

But the submission of the proposed project was tedious. Drawings and detailed specifications had to be submitted along with revisions from a bi-racial committee. Two such committees were formed in 1970 - one in each the county and city school districts - as a part of the original desegregation decree, but the county's had lapsed until the new board members were elected.

In addition, the DOJ called members of the community who weren't on the school board and weren't bi-racial committee members to get their input.

"Construction is real controversial," commented Smith. "It's planned months in advance before it's ever submitted to the Justice Department."

Since the construction of New Hope High School, there have been two additional expansions, and the Justice Department has had its say-so in those projects as well.

"They always have suggestions," said Smith, who noted the project proposals are almost never accepted as presented.

CMSD faced similar issues during its efforts to build a new Stokes-Beard Elementary School after a tornado ripped through the old facility in 2001.

"Probably, the most stressful situation we've found ourselves in was completing the new Stokes-Beard school with the expectation that we would simply reassign those students to that school and finding out that we had to consider a new assignment plan because we had four racially isolated schools," said Beason.

The students previously assigned to Stokes-Beard temporarily met in classes at Hunt Intermediate. When the Stokes-Beard building was complete in 2005, the school board had a small window to come up with some sort of student assignment plan so as not to undermine the original 1970 court order. Students had been previously assigned by school zone; that was changed to the parental choice and lottery plan now in effect.

During Beason's three-year tenure with CMSD, he has envisioned the district with less elementary schools, - the district currently has seven elementary schools, some of which have very few students - separate pre-kindergarten programs and a new high school and middle school.

DOJ_NMG_0130495

Beason will retire in June, and with all projects at the mercy of the DOJ, the redesigned district may remain just a vision.

Not until the two districts are declared unitary will their leaders be able to make decisions without being under the constant scrutiny of the Justice Department.

Once construction efforts are complete at West Lowndes campuses, the county could be declared a unitary school district.

"When the district has complied (with the terms of the settlement) it shall file its motion for a declaration of unitariness and dismissal of this lawsuit with prejudice," court documents from a February 2006 settlement read.

Renovations at West Lowndes include baseball field developments at the high school and gymnasium improvements and sewage correction at the middle school.

Those improvements were slated for completion this month, but inclement weather has delayed them until spring break in mid-March (please see related story on page 1A.)

Leaders See A Black America Sailing Off Course (WP/AP)

By Dionne Walker

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

HAMPTON, Feb. 10 -- Beneath an oak tree on the campus of what is now Hampton University, historians say, Virginia blacks heard a reading of the Emancipation Proclamation and began to dream of a better life.

On Saturday, more than 8,000 people returned to the historically black Virginia university to chart how far they have come. They gathered for the State of the Black Union, an annual traveling town hall that is considered a barometer for black America's ills.

This year's conference, the eighth, coincides with the 400th anniversary of the nation's first permanent English settlement, Jamestown. Africans arriving in Virginia in the years after that milestone in American history faced enslavement and entrenched racism.

Today's black Americans grapple with political apathy, limited business strength and a lack of motivation, a panel of black leaders said Saturday.

"We need a big idea that unifies us all," said Rep. Keith Ellison (D-Minn.), the nation's first Muslim congressman. Ellison was on a panel that included Al Sharpton and former Virginia governor L. Douglas Wilder (D), the nation's first elected black governor.

They spoke of a black America adrift. Black males are more common in prisons than on college campuses, they said. Black children, meanwhile, are increasingly born into single-parent homes.

"A lot of us have lost the dignity that our community has shown from Jamestown to now," Sharpton said.

Others pointed to a lack of personal responsibility among blacks who, they said, are waiting for leaders to make changes.

"I didn't have to wait for people to tell me it was my time to run for governor -- it was my time," Wilder said, encouraging other blacks to take similar personal initiative. "We can't stop here."

Hampton's Convocation Center was packed with people, many waving their arms and clapping as the speakers tackled tough topics.

Some, such as Renita Seabrook, a professor at the University of Maryland Eastern Shore, considered the forum an important planning session for addressing issues such as education.

"So many of our black boys have been expelled" from schools, Seabrook said. "We've got to get a handle on the reason."

Jamichael Heathington, 17, of Chattanooga, said he wants to create a youth program to dissuade teenagers from drugs and violence after he finishes college.

He came to the conference for some pointers, calling the event "a lifetime experience to gain perspective [and] to listen to some of the brightest leaders of America."

States Fund Anti-abortion Efforts (LAT)

By Stephanie Simon

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0130496

In an experiment that's opening a new front in the culture wars, a growing number of states are paying anti-abortion activists to counsel women with unplanned pregnancies.

At least eight states — including Florida, Missouri and Pennsylvania — use public funds to subsidize crisis pregnancy centers, Christian homes for unwed mothers and other programs explicitly designed to steer women away from abortion. As a condition of the grants, counselors are often barred from referring women to any clinic that provides abortions; in some cases, they may not discuss contraception either.

Most states still spend far more money subsidizing comprehensive family planning, but the flow of tax dollars to anti-abortion groups has surged in recent months, as programs took effect in Texas and Minnesota.

The trend alarms abortion-rights supporters, who assert that the funds would be better spent — and would prevent more abortions — if used to expand access to birth control. But to anti-abortion activists such as Nancy McDonald, the funding is both practical and symbolic, a way of putting the state's stamp of approval on their work.

"It's a subtle thing," said McDonald, who runs five crisis pregnancy centers in South Florida. "But people seem to think if you're affiliated with the state, you must be good."

Here in Texas, the state reduced grants to a Planned Parenthood clinic in downtown Austin — and began sending some of the money to the Catholic diocese a block away.

There, in a cozy office adorned with paintings of Jesus and Mary, counselors can collect $1.05 in public funds for every minute they spend encouraging women and teens not to abort. They show clients photos of a translucent fetus; they give away maternity clothes and baby blankets. Later this month, they will begin offering a state-subsidized one-hour class on infant care.

Tax dollars cannot be used for religious purposes, but federal law permits faith-based groups to participate in government programs and protects displays of religious symbols, such as the basket of plastic rosaries at the diocese's Gabriel Project Life Center.

Amy Chestnut coordinates Gabriel Project, but she was once a client, pregnant at 16. The lessons she got on abstinence — she was told to commit to a "secondary virginity" — didn't stick; she got pregnant again at 19.

But she said the emotional support she received from the counselors — simple acts such as rubbing her belly and talking about the baby with delight, not dismay — persuaded her to carry both pregnancies. Chestnut, 25, has since married the man who fathered both children; she keeps a family photo with her to show clients that even unwanted pregnancies can bring joy.

"People were always assuming that I'd have an abortion. To hear just one person say 'You can do this' made such a difference," Chestnut said.

Crisis pregnancy centers have received tens of millions of dollars from the federal government over the last six years, mostly for abstinence education.

On the state level, Florida, Minnesota, Nebraska, North Dakota and Texas approved funding in 2005. Louisiana, Missouri and Pennsylvania have longer-running programs. Arizona and Kansas have offered one-time grants to anti-abortion groups; several other states fund abortion alternatives from sales of "Choose Life" license plates.

All told, states will spend at least $13 million this year — much of it from welfare or family-planning budgets — to dissuade women from abortion.

In a related campaign, conservatives in several states are pushing to restrict or eliminate public funding for groups that support abortion rights, especially Planned Parenthood. They've had some success, notably in Missouri; six other legislatures will take up the issue this year.

But the vast majority of states still send grants to Planned Parenthood, in amounts that dwarf the anti-abortion funding. Last year, Planned Parenthood received $80 million from states and $200 million from the federal government.

Tax dollars going to Planned Parenthood do not pay for abortions; they cover birth control, gynecological exams, cancer screening and treatment for sexually transmitted diseases. When clients come in with unwanted pregnancies, they hear about all of their options, including keeping the baby and giving it up for adoption. But critics say there can be a presumption that abortion is the easier solution.

DOJ_NMG_0130497

"You have a choice ... do what's right for you," a brochure available in the Austin clinic advises pregnant teens. The bright-red flier urges them to consider how raising a child would hurt their social lives and crimp their freedom. The cartoon on the cover shows a howling infant.

Anti-abortion activists say it's only fair for states to also fund an alternative view. Their pamphlets feature photos of adorable babies and beaming teenage moms; their counselors promise to help pregnant women find apartments, get jobs and finish their degrees — anything to make it easier for them to carry to term.

"I have heard many pro-choice people say, 'There ought to be fewer abortions.' [Funding] this is one way we can do that," said Pennsylvania state Rep. Tom Tangretti, a Democrat who opposes abortion. "I just can't imagine why anyone would be afraid of it."

Critics offer several reasons.

U.S. Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif), an abortion rights supporter, last year asked undercover investigators to contact 23 crisis pregnancy centers; 20 gave misleading information, such as exaggerating the risk of abortion, he reported. In Austin, the diocese hands out a booklet — approved by the state — that suggests a link between abortion and breast cancer, though the National Cancer Institute has found no such connection.

"It's reprehensible that taxpayer dollars are going to organizations that regularly and deliberately deceive women," said Vicki Saporta, president of the National Abortion Federation, which represents abortion providers.

Critics also claim that the emphasis on abortion alternatives drains money from basic healthcare. As evidence, they point to Texas.

In 2005, Texas lawmakers redirected $25 million that was to have gone to Planned Parenthood over two years. Most went instead to primary-care health clinics (which provide contraception but not abortion). But $5 million of the money was set aside for anti-abortion centers that do not provide medical care and will not refer clients to clinics that prescribe birth control.

To deal with its 62% budget cut, the Planned Parenthood clinic in downtown Austin began charging for services long offered free to low-income women. Since the fees took effect, the clinic has distributed 40% fewer birth-control pills and done 50% fewer Pap smears to screen for cervical cancer. Several thousand patients have stopped coming.

Among them is Christina Moore, a 22-year-old mother of two who said she and her husband can't afford $23 a month for birth-control pills she used to get free. "But we can't afford to have more kids, either," she said. Last week, Moore tried to make an appointment with a county clinic; even though she said she had urgent health questions, the earliest they can see her is April.

"I'm already out of pills. I'm worried," Moore said. Her year-old son began howling in the background, and her voice rose: "I do not want to get pregnant now."

Through January, Texas anti-abortion groups had counseled 660 women and teens with the tax dollars made available by the shift in resources. Some lawmakers question the cost: Not counting more than $400,000 in start-up expenses, the counseling has run an average of $450 per client. (By comparison, a year of exams and contraception costs $180.)

But activists remain passionate about the trend. Last week, the Texas Catholic Conference sent volunteers in turquoise shirts to the Capitol to give lawmakers angel food cakes — and a long list of legislative priorities.

At the top of the list: Abolish abortion in Texas. Just a few notches below: Fund alternatives.

Slavery And Remorse (WP)

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

THAT SLAVERY was a shameful episode in American history is beyond debate; not so the issue of whether or how states where it flourished for more than two centuries should apologize or express remorse for it. In recent weeks the legislatures of Virginia and Maryland, former slave states whose last slaves were freed more than 140 years ago, have grappled with that quandary and more broadly with the question of what symbolic or practical value attaches to an act of public contrition.

Virginia, whose state anthem with its references to "darkies" and "old massa" was retired (but not repudiated) just a decade ago, took up the question first. There, the House of Delegates approved a resolution stating its "profound regret" for the state's role in sanctioning slavery, as well as in "the historic wrongs visited upon native peoples." The resolution was approved without opposition, though not before an initial draft was rewritten and stripped of the word "atonement," which, some feared, might have opened the door to monetary reparations. Maryland may now follow suit with a similar if somewhat less elegantly worded resolution that also expresses the state's "profound regret."

DOJ_NMG_0130498

Both documents seek to redress an enduring sense of grievance among some African Americans (and, in the case of Virginia's resolution, American Indians). Each rightly makes reference to slavery's lasting, poisonous legacy of discrimination, enforced segregation and racism. And each pays tribute to the high ideal of equal, inalienable rights that are the birthright of every citizen regardless of race, creed or color.

Some may ask what purpose is served in making such a gesture so many years after the fact and with so many generations separating today's Virginians, black and white, from forebears who may have owned or been slaves. After all, as the Virginia resolution states, "even the most abject apology for past wrongs cannot right them, nor can it justly impute fault or responsibility to succeeding generations or justify the imposition of new benefits or burdens."

True enough. But it is equally true that expressions of repentance and remorse in public life, as in interpersonal relations, can be helpful, healing emollients. It is not just that they do no harm; they may also, as the Virginia document states, serve to "recall and remind so that past wrongs may never be repeated and manifest injustice may not again be overlooked." In that, surely, there is value.

There is value, too, in the debate itself, no matter how toxic its manifestations in the blogosphere and beyond. Evidence for that may be found in the person of Frank D. Hargrove, a white member of Virginia's House. His first public reaction to the idea of expressing remorse for slavery was to suggest that black citizens "should get over it." That remark made Mr. Hargrove, an 80-year-old Republican, the lightning rod for a brief storm of invective. But when the resolution's wording was tweaked, the House ultimately approved it by a vote of 91 to 0. And Mr. Hargrove, to his credit, voted "yea."

ENVIRONMENT:

Updating Bush's Spin On Climate Change (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds, James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush is widely considered one of the world's most prominent skeptics of global warming. But to hear White House officials tell it, the world's view of him is wrong.

In recent days, White House officials have made a special effort to argue that Bush has always been concerned about climate change. Moreover, they say, he has long acknowledged that human activity may be a significant factor.

"Perhaps folks have not taken notice of the fact that this is an administration that's been keenly committed both to environmentalism and conservationism from the start," White House spokesman Tony Snow said last week.

Indeed, the climate around global warming in Washington is getting hotter. Members of both parties are scrambling to get ahead of each other — and ahead of public demands — to take measures against the threat.

Apparently concerned that Bush was not perceived as being on the global warming bandwagon, White House officials released an unusual open letter Wednesday contending that "climate change has been a top priority since the president's first year in office."

"Beginning in June 2001, President Bush has consistently acknowledged climate change is occurring and humans are contributing to the problem," said the letter, signed by John Marburger, director of the White House Office of Science and Technology Policy, and James Connaughton, chairman of the White House Council on Environmental Quality.

But the record isn't quite so clear.

The letter cites a June 2001 speech by Bush, quoting him as saying that "we know the surface temperature of the Earth is warming…. There is a natural greenhouse effect that contributes to warming…. And the National Academy of Sciences indicates that the increase is due in large part to human activity."

But the parts of the speech excised or ignored by the letter give a somewhat different impression. For instance, the citation deletes a sentence that asserts that "concentration of greenhouse gases, especially CO2, have increased substantially since the beginning of the Industrial Revolution" — a time frame suggesting that the contemporary world may have played only a small role.

DOJ_NMG_0130499

Moreover, Bush's mention of the National Academy of Sciences was quickly followed by a sentence that cast doubt on the notion of human contribution to climate change. "Yet the academy's report tells us that we do not know how much effect natural fluctuations in climate may have had on warming," Bush said at the time.

"We do not know how fast change will occur or even how some of our actions could impact it," he added.

Critics see such discrepancies as evidence that the White House is trying to take positions on both sides of the debate. "The president is all over the map," said Daniel Becker, a global warming expert with the Sierra Club, an environmental group.

The critics argue that Bush soft-pedaled the issue early in his presidency because of pressure from corporate interests, such as oil companies and operators of coal-fired power plants, that oppose regulation of greenhouse gas emissions. They note his frequent statements that technology is the answer to the problem.

"America is on the verge of technological breakthroughs that will enable us to live our lives less dependent on oil," Bush said last month in his State of the Union address. "And these technologies will help us be better stewards of the environment, and they will help us to confront the serious challenge of global climate change."

Last week's release of a United Nations commission report proclaiming that global warming is incontrovertible has put additional pressure on Bush to appear responsive.

However, despite his pledge to devote new funds to research and to support efforts to curb the use of gasoline, critics remain unconvinced that Bush truly intends to confront longtime business allies.

Bush's latest pronouncements suggest that he is no longer ignoring the problem, Becker said, but also that he is still not committed to acting.

Critics say that Bush has repeatedly pledged to take action on climate change, only to backtrack.

The pattern began, they say, in Saginaw, Mich., on Sept. 29, 2000, during Bush's first presidential campaign. While calling for greater production of oil and natural gas, and more coal mining to reduce the reliance on foreign oil, he also said that "with the help of Congress, environmental groups and industry, we will require all power plants to meet clean-air standards in order to reduce emissions of sulfur dioxide, nitrogen oxide, mercury and carbon dioxide within a reasonable period of time."

Six months later, as president, Bush stepped away from that pledge, saying he had decided not to regulate carbon dioxide emissions from power plants out of concern that doing so could increase already high energy prices.

But perhaps the defining moment came in June 2001, when he declared the Kyoto Protocol — the United Nations' consensus document on climate change — "fatally flawed in fundamental ways" and announced that the United States was withdrawing from the pact. That is the speech his aides are now citing as evidence of his commitment to tackling the problem of global warming.

Kyoto "would have been economically ruinous and would have thrown a lot of people out of work," Snow said last week. "The president instead has aggressively pursued ways of trying to clean the environment that don't have to make people lose their jobs, and … at the same time, proceed on all the major areas where pollution is concerned."

The Kyoto agreement, completed in 1997, proposed carbon dioxide emission caps for the 35 richest countries. President Clinton signed it but never submitted it to the Senate, where it would have faced certain defeat from lawmakers concerned about the protocol's impact on the U.S. economy and irked that it did little to curb emissions from such large developing nations as China and India.

Bush in effect erased Clinton's signature, removing the United States from any obligation to meet the pact's emissions-reduction goals even without Senate ratification.

At the same time, Bush sought to blame global warming on "a natural greenhouse effect," suggesting it wasn't primarily caused by human activity. And, though acknowledging that limiting emissions was one way to stabilize concentrations of greenhouse gases, he immediately raised issues with such an approach, saying, "A growing population requires more energy to heat and cool our homes, more gas to drive our cars."

Whether White House officials succeed in their campaign to paint the president as a leader in battling global warming may, at this point, make little difference. The energy on the issue has moved to Congress, where the Democrats — now the majority in both chambers — and prominent Republicans are pressing ahead with an agenda that may depend little on Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0130500

"For years we have been frustrated by the lack of recognition, much less cooperation, on the part of the administration in addressing this issue," said Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a potential presidential candidate in 2008. "Hopefully, we have now turned the corner, in that there is finally recognition that the debate is over."

T.R.? He's No T.R. (NYT)

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

Whenever President Bush is being hammered for his environmental policies, as he has been recently for his timid approach to global warming, he heads for a national park to reveal a hidden kinship with nature and, in effect, to promise a new day.

He did so again last week, visiting Shenandoah National Park to announce a sizable increase in the National Park Service's budget. The photo op elicited suggestions from Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne that Mr. Bush was somehow channeling Teddy Roosevelt. From Tony Snow, the White House spokesman and resident fantasist, it prompted the incredible claim that Mr. Bush had in fact been "keenly committed both to environmentalism and conservationism from the start."

From the start? The choice Mr. Bush faced on the day he took office was between two competing Republican approaches to environmental matters — the callous disregard for the country's natural resources displayed during the Reagan years and the responsible stewardship of those same resources associated with Theodore Roosevelt. Mr. Bush unhesitatingly chose the former.

The result was an across-the-board antiregulatory crusade aimed not only at undoing Bill Clinton's environmental legacy but also at weakening bedrock economic law stretching back to Richard Nixon. It was orchestrated by the ideologues and industry lobbyists whom Mr. Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney installed in nearly every important position where environmental policy is made. The one exception was Christie Whitman, who finally tired of being told to do industry's bidding and retired to private life after two uncomfortable years as boss of the Environmental Protection Agency.

It is impossible to find Teddy Roosevelt's ghost in any of this. One suspects, for instance, that Roosevelt would have tried much harder to protect fragile landscapes than the Bush administration has in its frantic drive for more oil and gas resources in the Rocky Mountains. One suspects — knows, even — that Roosevelt, who started the national wildlife refuge system, would not have pushed for oil drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge.

Similarly, Roosevelt would not have declared — as Gale Norton, Mr. Kempthorne's immediate predecessor, did in 2003 — that America had already acquired enough protected wilderness; he would have demanded more. He would not have rolled back, as Ms. Norton did, environmental rules governing mining for gold, copper and lead. He would not have countenanced the demolition job that Mr. Bush's Forest Service has done on the web of forest protections it inherited from previous administrations. He would not have tried to scuttle one of the most important acts of environmental stewardship in many years, Mr. Clinton's roadless rule, which made 58.5 million acres of the national forests off limits to new road building and development.

And Roosevelt would certainly have kept his word. Mr. Bush made three big promises in this area in the 2000 campaign. One was to regulate emissions of carbon dioxide, the main global warming gas. He reneged on that one almost immediately. The second was to finance the federal government's core open space program, the Land and Water Conservation Fund, at its annual authorized level of $900 million. He has shortchanged it badly every year and this year he is asking for $85 million.

The third promise was to put more money into the national parks. Here history may give Mr. Bush higher marks, thanks largely to the entreaties of Mr. Kempthorne, who pressed for and received a commitment of $258 million in new spending this year and a guarantee of $1 billion over 10 years. The parks have been starved for years (and not just by this administration), and people who care about them have every reason to be pleased by the prospect of a substantial increase in the budget.

We can also hope, of course, that this represents a turnaround in Mr. Bush's thinking, and that in the next two years he will offer up an energy policy focused more on new technologies and conservation and less on the old extractive industries; a public lands policy that spares our last wild places; a meaningful strategy for global warming; and on and on into a Rooseveltian future. But neither gratitude for a few extra dollars for the parks nor our stubborn belief in the possibility of redemption should blind us to six years of bad policies.

Wash Your Hands! (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0130501

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

THE RECENT discovery that turkeys on a British farm were infected with the H5N1 "bird flu" virus was, as bad news goes, auspiciously timed. Just before the turkeys once again focused attention on the fast-moving virus, the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention released interim guidelines detailing what states and localities could do to cope with a pandemic of a dangerous form of influenza -- the sort of outbreak that a mutated form of H5N1 could spark.

The CDC's guidelines instruct American communities on how they might slow the spread of a bad flu in the absence of viable drugs or vaccines. Such rules are desperately needed. Last September, a group of international experts on pandemic preparedness concluded that it was likely that vaccines would prove ineffective against mutated forms of the virus. Tamiflu can lessen the severity of flu symptoms but does not eliminate the virus. Meanwhile, efforts to shorten the time required to formulate new vaccines when a virus mutates still face years of research. So if a pandemic strain arrived in the United States tomorrow, the country's best tools might turn out to be old-fashioned technologies and techniques of the sort listed in the CDC report, such as quarantines and public information campaigns promoting proper hygiene.

Not everyone in the public health world welcomed some of the more extreme guidelines. The CDC's proposal to shut down schools for three months in the case of a severe outbreak is generating resistance from scientists who claim that the tactic is not as effective as the CDC says it is. Others point out that the guidelines, which advise people to avoid crowded spaces such as train cars or offices, do not address the needs of poorer Americans (among others) who must take public transportation or who can't telecommute. As the CDC gathers comment and updates its interim guidelines, it must consider how state and local governments might deal with the potentially massive social costs of school closures and work stoppages.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Will L.A.'s Strategy To Battle Gangs Work? (LAT)

By Richard Winton And Patrick Mcgreevy, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2007

Experts suggest police crackdowns do only half the job. One plan calls for a mix of programs designed to 'hold and build' neighborhoods.

Every few years, an act of gang violence rises above the rest, sparking outrage across Los Angeles and vows to finally conquer the gang problem.

When Karen Toshima was killed by gang crossfire in Westwood Village in 1988, then-Police Chief Daryl F. Gates intensified Operation Hammer. The gang sweeps yielded thousands of arrests but also generated much criticism about mistreatment by officers.

The 1995 killing of 3-year-old Stephanie Kuhen when her family drove onto a dead-end street in Cypress Park resulted in another gang crackdown.

When William J. Bratton became chief in 2002, he was faced with a string of 20 gang shootings — including the death of 14-year-old Clive Jackson. He declared war on gangs, referring to them as domestic terrorists.

Last week, he and Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa declared war again — the inspiration this time the racially motivated killing of Cheryl Green, a 14-year-old African American, by members of a Latino gang in the Harbor Gateway neighborhood.

The new crackdown — targeting 11 gangs — might suggest that the Los Angeles Police Department is trying again where it has failed before.

But it's more complex than that. Though gang crimes jumped 14% in 2006, they are down significantly from the early 1990s and even more compared with the mid-1980s. According to LAPD statistics, there were 7,714 gang crimes last year, compared with 10,945 in 1995.

"What we are doing is no different than what we have been doing. As a Police Department we have always been assertive, very aggressive in going at gangs," Bratton said. "What we are doing with this effort — it's more comprehensive."

But what some critics of the crackdown find familiar is the race to respond to a killing that garners news media attention and public outrage — an approach they say is not always comprehensive or effective.

"It is the same prescription every time they have a major event," said Malcolm Klein, a veteran gang sociologist and USC professor emeritus. "Gangs are defined as a crime problem and not a community problem. This is old fashioned suppression in a new guise, and where is the proof that has worked?"

He noted that since 1980, when gang slayings topped 200 in Los Angeles, the city has focused most of its gang response on policing.

A month ago, Connie Rice, director of the Advancement Project in Los Angeles, produced a comprehensive plan for the city to overhaul gang intervention programs and try to use means other than law enforcement to address its 39,000 gang members.

Rice proposes what she calls a Marshall Plan of sorts that would mix law enforcement with gang intervention and job programs, community outreach and newly created community oversight groups.

It would focus initially on 12 so-called hot zones around the city. Gang prevention efforts now cost the city $82 million a year, but the report called for as much as $1 billion to be spent over the first 18 months.

Rice said past LAPD gang suppression efforts have worked in some neighborhoods, but only for a short time. The city, she said, has always failed to follow up with programs to keep the gangs out.

"The surges of police activity work, and they may even work for months or years," Rice said. "But eventually, three years later, another [gang] set comes in."

She likened the situation to the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, where troops quickly routed the enemy, only to see a lack of proper planning lead to chaos.

"The LAPD knows how to surge and purge," Rice said. But "after the LAPD clears out a neighborhood, we don't know how to hold and build."

Rice and Klein said the city's response to the Stephanie Kuhen shooting in Cypress Park by the Avenues gang highlights the problem.

In the wake of the killing, the city created the L.A. Bridges after-school program, but it has not done what was required, Rice said. The program budgeted for $26 million last year reaches only 5% of gang members and 2% of children in neighborhoods with high gang activity, and is not keeping enough young people out of gangs, she said.

Cheryl Maxson, a UC Irvine criminologist and gang expert, said the problem is that the LAPD can move much faster than gang intervention groups.

"The program community, the interventionists, are not able to mobilize as quickly as LAPD, so law enforcement has taken the lead on gangs for decades," she said. "So the city goes with strategic suppression."

Bratton, however, is quick to point out that LAPD efforts over the last four years have yielded results.

"In 2002, 2003 we had a similar initiative. [Before then] we had had three straight years of growing crime in the city. Gang violence in particular," he said. "We put in new resources. That year, we had a 23% decline in homicides throughout the city. About 20% of that decline, over 100 fewer murders, were in the South Bureau."

The latest plan calls for 200 extra officers to target the 11 gangs, a new South L.A. gang homicide bureau and an LAPD gang coordinator.

Villaraigosa said the plan, which identifies gangs by name, represents a more direct approach to the problem, learning from past mistakes.

"Part of what dynamic leadership is all about … is you are constantly evaluating what works and what doesn't," he said, adding that he also wants to boost gang-intervention programs.

The police crackdown has met with general support from community activists in some gang-plagued neighborhoods, who say they have been begging the city for years to make their areas safer.

But aggressive gang crackdowns have generated criticism in the past over heavy-handed tactics.

Efforts in the 1980s were widely seen as excessive, symbolized by police use of a tank-like battering ram to smash into suspected gang houses. In 1988, police ripped apart apartments on Dalton Street looking for gangs and drugs — but later admitted they had the wrong places.

DOJ_NMG_0130503

A decade later, gang enforcement efforts were further tarnished by the Rampart scandal. Caught in a dope-stealing allegation, then-Officer Rafael Perez revealed that dozens of officers, many in the elite area gang unit, were making false arrests, giving perjured testimony and framing suspects.

Then-Chief Bernard C. Parks, now a city councilman, disbanded the anti-gang units. Subsequently, the U.S. Justice Department forced the LAPD and city into a consent decree with oversight of the department continuing today. Tough rules govern the gang units now in use, and there are audits and constant monitoring.

*

richard.winton@latimes.com

patrick.mcgreevy@latimes.com

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

Anti-gang efforts

Here are some defining moments in the Los Angeles Police Department's long — and at times controversial — fight against street gangs.

• 1985: The LAPD started using a tank-like battering ram to enter suspected gang and drug houses. The Times reported: "Police Chief Daryl F. Gates was so proud of the event that he personally christened the new tank and then rode inside it, while cameras rolled, as it did its dirty work."

• 1988: Eighty-eight LAPD officers stormed two apartment houses at Dalton Avenue and 39th Street, near the Coliseum. The officers broke windows, smashed walls, ceilings and furniture with sledgehammers and battering rams and ripped out sinks and toilets. Apparently, they had the wrong apartments. The city paid more than $4 million in settlements.

• 1988: The LAPD launched Operation Hammer, anti-gang sweeps that resulted in tens of thousands of arrests. Many blacks and Latinos said the effort amounted to racial harassment. On one night, officers in Operation Hammer arrested 1,453 people — 1,350 of whom were released with no charges filed.

• 1994: In the wake of riots in 1992, several major gangs agreed to truces, which appeared to reduce killings in some neighborhoods, but in many cases the results were short-lived.

• 1995: The LAPD and other agencies launched what was described as the "largest street gang crackdown of its kind in Los Angeles history." In two weeks, only 69 people had been arrested by the 800-member task force.

• 1997: Law enforcement agencies won a sweeping, first-of-its-kind injunction aimed at the heart of the notorious 18th Street gang's domain, a crowded and crime-plagued square-mile area west of downtown where the group had emerged more than 30 years ago.

• 1998: Crime in Los Angeles dropped to the lowest level in more than two decades.

• 1999: The Rampart scandal erupted, with accusations of criminal behavior by members of the LAPD's anti-gang detail.

• 2002: Mayor James K. Hahn and Los Angeles Police Chief William J. Bratton announced an "all-out assault" on the city's street gangs, with plans to use the same tactics that crippled organized crime to pursue gang members.

IMMIGRATION:

A Town That Wants Illegal Immigrants (LAT)

By Gregory Rodriguez

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2007

Lindsay, Calif. — THE IMMIGRATION debate can get pretty sloppy and emotional in the abstract, but not here in this Central Valley town that can't afford to let simplistic rhetoric overshadow facts. Last month's devastating citrus freeze has put Lindsay, population 11,185, in dire economic straits; but its pragmatic response to the crisis sets an example for the rest of the nation.

The packing houses here in the heart of California's citrus belt are generally hopping the first week of February. In a normal year, the two LoBue Bros. plants would be open 50 to 60 hours a week, employing 230 workers and processing up to 7,000 bins of oranges. But after last month's freeze, the third since 1990, LoBue is operating at quarter speed. One plant is shut down, and the other is running just 20 hours a week. About 60% of the employees are off work.

DOJ_NMG_0130504

After the first of March, there will be a brief spurt of activity, when agricultural officials determine which remaining oranges are frost-free and good enough to go to market. But by mid-April, when the good fruit runs out, all activity, from picking to trucking, will stop, and there will be no more work until late October. If workers leave town — and if those who stay are jobless — the city's economy will collapse.

Seeking to avert an economic meltdown, officials have come up with an innovative plan to not only address joblessness but to keep the workforce from abandoning the town. Invoking the memory of Franklin D. Roosevelt's Depression-era Works Projects Administration, the city's elected officials — all of whom are Republicans — are seeking federal aid to put the idle labor force to work on local improvement efforts.

The fact that a large-yet-undetermined percentage of farm laborers — particularly pickers — are illegal immigrants does not deter local officials from seeking aid for them. Unlike other parts of the U.S. where undocumented immigration is a divisive issue, in Lindsay it is a matter of economic survival.

In a city-owned youth club on Sweetbriar Avenue, officials and local nonprofits have set up the Lindsay Freeze Relief Center, where displaced workers can apply for food, clothing, rental and utility assistance, as well as for temporary employment. In its first week of operation, more than 1,200 workers applied. Last Tuesday afternoon, I watched a stream of Mexican immigrants stroll into the center, some with children in tow, looking for assistance.

Longtime Lindsay residents who have raised children here were likely to say that they would weather the hardship no matter what. But recent immigrants said they would leave if they didn't find work soon. "I'm thinking of leaving," said 27-year old Maria Cisneros from the Mexican state of Michoacan. Where to? "Wherever there's work," she replied.

Growers and labor contractors will tell you that the area can't afford to lose more workers. Some say that the current farm labor shortage — of as much as 50% — made the effects of last month's freeze worse than it otherwise would have been. The recent crackdown on the border is being felt in this corner of the Central Valley.

"If we had more workers, we could have picked up to 75% of the crop," said Lindsay-born labor contractor Alice Gutierrez. Growers had a week's notice that the freeze, which caused an estimated $418 million in damage in Tulare County alone, was imminent.

Lindsay Mayor Ed Murray says the worst-case scenario is that the town could lose up to 30% of its labor force. "Regardless of whether they're legal or illegal, it's imperative that we have workers here for next year's harvest," he said. Murray hopes that the federal government will find a way to not only aid his town's residents in the short term but to legalize the undocumented.

Given the divisiveness of the national debate, it is remarkable how many people here recognize the need for the workers who have come to this country illegally. Perhaps not surprisingly, business people, who already are feeling the pain of the freeze, are most likely to make the case.

"It helps all of us," said 71-year-old Bill Martin, who owns a tire shop in town. "I don't particularly care for illegal people in the U.S., but if they come in and want to buy a tire, I'll accommodate them. If you don't have people come, you won't get the fruit picked. And if the fruit doesn't get picked, nobody will have money to buy anything."

Of course, Lindsay is not the only town to try to soften the blow to farmworkers. But what makes its response extraordinary is that city officials are not just looking to solve residents' or employers' immediate needs. They have identified seven public works projects that could benefit from temporary labor — from building a new soccer field to clearing alleyways and constructing a library.

"We're trying to be farsighted about this and improve the community in the long term," said Kindon Meik, the city's personnel director. "When people invest their labor, they are more vested in the town."

I suspect that much of Lindsay's innovative spirit comes from the knowledge that it has survived much worse. In 1992 — two years after a catastrophic freeze — residents gathered in a local park to bury a coffin containing symbols of the town's financial troubles.

That decade, Lindsay saw its share of white flight and the complete ethnic transformation of the population, which is now 78% Latino. But today, it is clear that the town has thus far survived the transition, and three of five City Council members are

DOJ_NMG_0130505

Mexican American. Consequently, race doesn't appear to play a big role in the city's approach to issues, including immigration. And so, stripped of the racial and broader ideological implications of the problem before them, Lindsay officials are free to do what they think is right for their little town. Or as citrus grower and Tulare County Supervisor Allen Ishida put it, "We don't have the luxury of not being practical."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Seeks Teacher Merit-pay Funds (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, February 11, 2007

President Bush wants more money in the 2008 budget for a fund that encourages performance-based pay systems for teachers -- a request that will no doubt feed into the larger debate on Capitol Hill about how best to attract, create and retain effective teachers.

The administration is asking for $199 million for its Teacher Incentive Fund, which was created in 2006. The fund provides financial incentives for teachers and principals who improve student achievement in high-poverty schools and helps to recruit top teachers to these schools. Rewards are left up to the states to decide and can include bonuses or raises.

The fund received $99 million in 2006. In November, the administration awarded the first 16 grants -- totaling a little more than $40 million -- to school districts across the country, including Washington, D.C.; Chicago; Memphis, Tenn.; and Philadelphia.

The administration requested an additional $99 million for the program for 2007, but in the interest of belt-tightening, the House essentially zeroed out funding for it in the recently passed fiscal 2007 funding package. That measure has yet to pass in the Senate, so the White House and some Republicans are working hard to get the money.

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said last week that there is a consensus about using compensation "to make sure our best teachers are in our most challenging" schools nationwide.

"We think that is a sound principle," she said, adding, "I think we'll have a lot of discussion about how our teachers are rewarded for doing the best work."

The top teachers union has criticized the fund.

Reg Weaver, president of the National Education Association, recently said the setup "is nothing more than a merit-pay system, and merit pay hasn't worked wherever it has been tried, for the most part."

Far from spurring teachers on to greater effectiveness, extra bonuses for some and not others simply "creates tension" between teachers and kills any teamwork, he said.

"It doesn't work and it's not going to do anything to attract and retain quality teachers," Mr. Weaver said. What will work is getting teachers involved in the decision-making process, giving them a safe and orderly school and a decent salary, he said.

The issue will be front and center as lawmakers work this year to renew the No Child Left Behind Act and pass the Higher Education Act.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, and Rep. George Miller, California Democrat, have crafted a comprehensive bill to improve teacher quality. Included in it is a grant initiative to encourage high-needs schools to implement teacher-incentive programs.

However, their plan would require the financial rewards to be based not just on student test scores, but on broad criteria, including whether the teacher takes on a leadership or mentorship role with other teachers. Each performance-based setup would have to be approved by the local teachers union as well.

Most public school teachers are paid based on years of experience. Merit-based pay systems for teachers are scattered throughout the country, and are more common in private and charter schools than in public schools.

Some recent studies have indicated positive results.

The University of Arkansas examined a Little Rock elementary school that gave bonuses to teachers based on their students' test scores. The study found that math scores rose more in that school than in similar schools in Little Rock that didn't implement such merit systems. Students in the school where teachers received bonuses made gains over the other students equivalent to a 6 percentile or 7 percentile jump for a student who started at the 50th percentile.

DOJ_NMG_0130506

"It's a pretty substantial gain," said Marcus Winters, a senior research associate at the Manhattan Institute, which was involved with the study.

A broader study released recently by University of Florida economics professors examined about 500 public and private high schools and found that having any salary incentive was associated with a 1.3 point to 2.1 point rise in test scores. It also found merit-pay programs were more effective if they targeted just a few teachers for rewards.

But researchers say more studies must be done to fully determine the effectiveness of such programs.

"I know we're not done evaluating nationwide," Mr. Winters said.

Broad Voucher Plan Is Approved In Utah (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

SALT LAKE CITY, Feb. 10 (AP) — The Utah State Legislature approved one of the broadest school voucher programs in the nation on Friday, allotting up to $3,000 for any public school student to put toward private school tuition.

Voucher programs in the handful of other states that have them are generally intended for poor families or students attending schools that have poor academic records. There will be no such restrictions in Utah, which has the largest class sizes in the country and until now has spent less per student than any other state.

The Senate approved the bill 19 to 10 on Friday, a week after the House endorsed it by a single vote, 38 to 37. Both chambers are controlled by Republicans. Gov. Jon Huntsman Jr., a Republican whose children attend public schools, has said he will sign the bill into law.

The vouchers will be open to all of the state's 512,000 public school students. The amount will depend on family income, but even wealthy families would be eligible for at least $500 per child. Students already in private schools would not be eligible.

The plan, which will go into effect this fall, is expected to cost $9.3 million in its first year and $327 million over 12 years. Utah has a $1.6 billion budget surplus. Public schools that lose enrollment because of the program will still get a portion of state financing for five years after each student departs.

The bill's sponsor, Representative Stephen H. Urquhart, a Republican, said public schools would not be shortchanged. In Utah, income taxes must pay for public education. The money for vouchers would come from the state's general fund, which pays for all other state programs.

Nearly every education organization in the state, especially the teachers union, opposes the program, saying tax money should not be spent at private schools.

"This has nothing to do about educating children," said Senator Gene Davis, a Democrat. "It's about taking taxpayer dollars and giving them to private industry."

Critics Question Education Department's Screening (NYT)

By Jonathan D. Glater

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

As a condition of his work for the federal government, Andrew A. Zucker was willing to be fingerprinted and provide an employment history. But then he was asked to let federal investigators examine his financial and medical records, and interview his doctors.

Dr. Zucker was not tracking terrorists or even emptying the trash at the Pentagon. He was studying how to best teach science to middle school students. He was stunned at the breadth of the request for information.

"To me, personally, it's shocking," said Dr. Zucker, who worked for a contractor doing research for the Education Department. He withdrew from the job.

For about a year, contractors say, the department has been requiring employees of the thousands of contractors it hires — many of them academic researchers like Dr. Zucker — to go through a level of security screening usually reserved for those working with very sensitive information.

DOJ_NMG_0130507

Katherine McLane, a department spokeswoman, said the scrutiny was warranted because her agency had access to databases with financial data and other information, including names and social security numbers of students or of applicants to colleges or other programs. "We want to make sure that the people who handle and have access to this information are responsible, reliable and trustworthy," Ms. McLane said.

The policy is prompting critics to question when a prudent background investigation becomes an invasion of privacy. About 100 researchers, including Dr. Zucker, have signed an open letter of protest to Margaret Spellings, the secretary of education, calling the quest for information "far beyond bounds of reason, necessity, and decency."

Others echo the protests.

"These requirements have very little connection with the work that we do," said Michael Knapp, director of the Center for Study of Teaching and Policy at the University of Washington.

Mr. Knapp, a former Education Department contractor, called the policy "an example of going overboard."

Gerald Sroufe, director of government relations for the American Educational Research Association, which represents about 25,000 people, most at universities or research organizations and companies, said, "Our concern is really whether or not all the measures that have been introduced are necessary."

But Ed Elmendorf, senior vice president for government relations at the American Association of State Colleges and Universities, said criminal record checks, which are considerably less invasive than the screening required by the Education Department, are becoming "pretty much a standard operating procedure" at many public academic institutions.

Still, efforts to put criminal record checks in place have met with resistance. Some faculty members protested when the chancellor of the University of Georgia said recently that new hires would be required to undergo a criminal record check.

Although some federal agencies like the Departments of Defense and Homeland Security routinely seek detailed personal information from contractors considered for classified work, others generally do not, unless the contractors are expected to work in federal buildings or have access to federal databases.

At the Agriculture Department, Boyd Rutherford, the assistant secretary for administration, said that if contractors were not in a position of public trust, the department was not asking for a detailed screening. He said that positions of public trust would include those that allowed a contractor access to areas like government information technology.

At the Department of Health and Human Services, which includes the National Institutes of Health, the intensity of background screening also turns on access, said Bill Hall, a spokesman. The lowest-level screening requires running fingerprints through the Federal Bureau of Investigation, performing a criminal records check and determining whether someone had undergone a background check with another government agency.

Ms. McLane, the Education Department spokeswoman, acknowledged that her agency's policy may be stricter than others, but she defended it, saying the department "takes very seriously its responsibility to safeguard information and maintains strong systems that protect confidential data."

Dr. Zucker, a Harvard-trained educator, was a consultant for a subcontractor on a Pennsylvania State University contract with the Education Department. He was developing a procedure to study methods of teaching middle-school science. "I was just designing a study, so I had no access to data because there was no data," he said.

Kyle L. Peck, associate dean at the College of Education at Penn State, said Dr. Zucker would have been comparing test scores of students taught using one method with scores of those taught using another. The data would not necessarily have identified individual students.

Dr. Zucker said he would not have had access to any databases that would identify individual students. He also did not work in a federal building.

"On the one hand, it makes sense," Dr. Peck said of the screening. "On the other hand, we have institutional review processes that govern educational research that protect the confidentiality, and, I think, make this additional level of security clearance unnecessary."

Many employees asked for information by the Education Department were academics like Dr. Zucker. In some instances, the agency has backed down when its policy was challenged. When Dr. Zucker protested, he said the department excused him from providing access to his medical and financial records.

DOJ_NMG_0130508

But Dr. Zucker still had reservations about other information the agency required and stopped work on the project.

"I had worked on many Department of Education contracts before," he said, "and other federal contracts from other agencies, and I have 20 years of experience or more in the business, and I had never seen or heard of anything like this."

Bush's Proposed Health-Care Cuts Get Mixed Reviews (WP)

By Christopher Lee, Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

Depending on whom you ask, the budget that President Bush proposed last week will save or sink Medicare and Medicaid, two popular programs that, along with Social Security, threaten to swamp the federal budget as the baby-boom generation retires.

Bush, citing the need for fiscal responsibility, proposed reducing by $101 billion over five years the spending growth of the two health programs, which serve 93 million people and will cost the government $564 billion this year. One of his most controversial ideas is to charge wealthier seniors higher Medicare premiums for the second time in the program's 41-year history.

Budget experts call the plan one of the most significant efforts in years to rein in federal spending on entitlement programs. But health-care providers and advocates for beneficiaries call the proposed cuts arbitrary and say they would exact an unaffordable toll on a big part of the nation's health-care system.

"It is very, very significant that they're willing to put on the table some specific proposals," said Comptroller General David M. Walker, who frequently warns of the government's troubled long-term fiscal outlook.

Stuart M. Butler, a budget expert at the conservative Heritage Foundation, said, "It's the only way forward in dealing with a huge unfunded obligation that right now is being left in the lap of our children and grandchildren."

Others see the proposals as likely to do more harm than good, and many congressional Democrats have accused Bush of trying to pay for the Iraq war and his signature tax cuts by reducing health care for elderly and poor Americans.

"There are problems in terms of future financing of Medicare, and those need to be dealt with in a comprehensive way," said Charles N. Kahn III, president of the Federation of American Hospitals. "To think we're going to solve all those problems by simply saying, 'We're not going to pay those who provide service what we need to pay them' is more than problematic. . . . This has more to do with the balanced budget and other things than it does with the preservation of Medicare."

Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.) said the Bush plan does nothing to address the underlying causes of the financial woes of Medicare and Medicaid -- rising health-care costs.

"I know it's difficult, but the administration would be doing this country a much greater service by finding ways to lower the underlying costs of Medicare and Medicaid, rather than just lopping off the top," Baucus said. "These costs will just get transferred somewhere else -- emergency rooms or uncompensated care."

Some of the institutions affected most would be hospitals, nursing homes, home health agencies and other providers, whose Medicare payments would be more than $61 billion lower than anticipated over five years (although still higher overall). Bush also proposes automatic across-the-board cuts in provider payments if Medicare spending reaches certain levels for two consecutive years. His budget would not forestall a planned 10 percent cut in Medicare payments to doctors next year.

Bruce Yarwood, president of the American Health Care Association, said the 9,000 nursing homes he represents would receive about $10 billion less than anticipated over five years.

"We'll squeeze, cut and trim administrative costs," he said. "You take a look at your staffing patterns, and rather than four people on the night shift you have three. And rather than seven or eight on the day shift you have six. You take a look at your maintenance crew; you say, 'Rather than mow the lawn every week, I'll mow it every two weeks,' so you lay off a maintenance guy."

David L. Elliott, 74, a retired professor who relies on Medicare, said he worries that Bush's cuts eventually will drive more health-care providers out of the program.

"Medicare currently is underpaying doctors and hospitals, and it's not clear how long they can stand it," the College Park resident said. "Some doctors already are refusing Medicare patients. And this is going to continue."

DOJ_NMG_0130509

Since Medicare's inception, beneficiaries have generally paid the same amount for coverage regardless of income, but some experts say that is now unsustainable. The problem was made worse when the GOP-controlled Congress added a prescription drug benefit in 2003, which is expected to cost $38 billion this year.

A little-noticed section of that law, however, for the first time required the more affluent to pay higher premiums. Starting this year, about 1.5 million beneficiaries with incomes of more than $80,000 annually ($160,000 for couples) pay monthly premiums of $106 to $162.10 for Medicare Part B coverage for physician services, up from the standard premium of $93.50.

The Bush budget would no longer adjust the income thresholds annually by inflation. And it would tie drug benefit premiums to income starting next year, a move that would affect 1.1 million beneficiaries, the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services calculates. The changes would save more than $10 billion over five years.

Budget hawks say Democrats should swallow hard and sign on.

"I know Democrats are reluctant and resistant and don't like the concept, but they have to scale back the federal commitment in some way," said Robert L. Bixby, executive director of the nonprofit Concord Coalition, which advocates reducing the federal deficit. "This does so in a progressive way, which is a principle the Democrats should be able to support."

But many seniors and their advocates, including the AARP, say an income test is unfair and threatens to make Medicare a welfare program instead of a broadly supported social insurance effort. Some point out that higher-income seniors already paid more in the form of higher Medicare payroll taxes during their working lives.

"I look at it as a tax increase," said Melville, N.Y., resident Sam Gross, 79, a retired accounting firm partner who pays the higher premiums.

Democrats have said they are not willing to accept cuts to Medicare and other entitlement programs unless the administration shows a willingness to raise revenues as well. Ultimately, however, treating beneficiaries differently based on income "does have to be part of the solution," Senate Budget Committee Chairman Kent Conrad (D-N.D.) said in an interview taped for C-SPAN and scheduled to air this weekend.

In Medicaid, which serves the poor and disabled, Bush proposes to trim spending growth by nearly $26 billion over five years through measures such as altering how the program pays for drugs and eliminating funding for graduate medical education in teaching hospitals. That would be a big blow for the nation's 800 teaching hospitals, said Richard M. Knapp, executive vice president of the Association of American Medical Colleges.

"We already struggle with our payments from Medicaid," Knapp said. "Major teaching hospitals have the lowest operating margins of all the hospitals in the country, and this would just add to that problem."

The White House argues that the proposals are not draconian. Medicare and Medicaid would account for about $596 billion in federal spending next year, up 5.7 percent. Medicare's average annual spending growth rate over the next five years would slow from 6.5 to 5.6 percent, while Medicaid's would be above 7 percent.

Happy Talk In Bush's Budget (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

Experience has taught us that the Bush administration's budget cannot be judged by its cover -- or by the cover letter the president puts at the start of each year's volume.

The message he released last week was headlined by the Page 1 declaration that "the Budget I am presenting achieves balance by 2012."

It would be wonderful were deficits to disappear -- if only it were true. But on the final page of the document, in Table S-10 on Page 172, one learns the disturbing truth. In fiscal 2012, the president's target year, the gross federal debt will -- by his own estimate -- grow by $372 billion.

How can this be? Well, the Page 1 claim is achieved by ignoring or minimizing a bunch of real-world challenges. For example, the president proposes just a one-year patch for the growing problem of the alternative minimum tax, which is whacking more and more middle-class families who thought they were beneficiaries of the Bush tax cuts. The one-year fix would cost the Treasury $47.9 billion, but no revenue is lost in the next four years -- because Bush just ignores the problem.

DOJ_NMG_0130510

Similarly, he assumes that the cost of the Iraq and Afghanistan wars will drop dramatically from $142 billion next year to $50 billion the following year.

And he takes advantage of all the arcane bookkeeping rules that exclude major costs and embrace more helpful numbers.

Rep. Jim Cooper of Tennessee, a Democratic crusader for honestly balanced budgets, pointed me to another back-of-the-book table that illustrates the point.

As he noted, Table S-7 shows that the $61 billion surplus Bush claims for 2012 -- using all the gimmicks he can find -- is achieved only by counting on the $248 billion in anticipated Social Security surpluses that year to wipe out the $187 billion deficit rolled up by all the other activities of the federal government.

In other words, Bush is borrowing from Social Security to achieve his budget surplus -- and that money will have to be repaid out of future taxes, or beneficiaries will suffer.

What's sad about this chicanery is that, in some other respects, this budget is an improvement over its predecessors from Bush. Responding to a congressional mandate, he has put the short-term costs of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan into the regular budget, rather than withholding them until months later and then sending the big bill to Capitol Hill.

Bush also has described, in blunt terms, the dismal financial prospects for Medicare -- premiums will have to increase fivefold to sustain the program unless some way is found to curb health-care inflation. As a start on alleviating that crisis, Bush has proposed $66 billion in savings over the next five years, achieved mainly by trimming payments to providers and boosting premiums for the well-to-do.

Congressional Democrats are screaming even about these modest changes, but the problem is real. Bush would be in a stronger position to secure these savings if he were not pretending that he can balance the budget by 2012 while preserving all his tax cuts.

As Cooper says, "The happy talk from the White House will sap Congress's will to tackle the entitlement issues." The figures in Table S-10 are stark -- and they underline Cooper's warning.

In fiscal 2006, the past year, the total federal debt was $8.45 trillion. In 2012, by Bush's optimistic estimate, it will reach $11.49 trillion. That is $3 trillion of added debt in just six years.

More and more of that debt is held by foreign countries. Another table, buried back on Page 234 of a supplemental volume, shows that the foreign holdings of U.S. government securities have more than doubled in the past five years, going from just over $1 trillion to $2.1 trillion. Japan and China are our largest creditors, increasing their leverage over our economy. And Uncle Sam has become the world's biggest borrower.

That's another fact you won't find anywhere in this budget.

Stem-cell Researchers Look Beyond The Embryo (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, February 11, 2007

The medical, moral and political debate over the need for embryonic stem-cell research remains fierce, with multiple medical reports in the past 18 months describing ways to produce disease-treating stem cells without destroying human embryos.

Stem cells are the body's master cells, the basic building blocks from which a person's tissue and organs develop. Scientists say the cells hold promise for treating -- and perhaps curing -- diseases such as Parkinson's, diabetes and cancer.

Proponents of embryonic stem-cell research think these types of cells hold the greatest potential for medical breakthroughs because they have the ability to grow into any type of cell in the body if scientists learn how to direct their development.

But critics of embryonic stem-cell research, including President Bush, say destroying or tampering with a human embryo is immoral.

"We recoil at the idea of growing human beings for spare body parts or creating life for our own convenience," Mr. Bush has said.

DOJ_NMG_0130511

The president and others favor research that involves stem cells from adults and children, which can be obtained without harming the donor. Examples include stem cells taken from bone marrow and other organs and tissue, and from placentas left over from live births.

Some stem-cell researchers and others who closely observe the field think scientists will find viable alternatives to embryonic stem cells that are not morally objectionable.

"I believe we could get the equivalent of embryonic stem cells through technological solutions that do not require the creation and destruction of embryos," said Dr. William B. Hurlbut, a consulting professor at Stanford University's Neuroscience Institute.

"Had we acknowledged this possibility early and put our energies to the task, we would probably have found an answer by now," said Dr. Hurlbut, also a member of the President's Council on Bioethics.

"An alternative is going to happen," said Dr. Markus Grompe, head of the Stem Cell Research Center at Oregon Health and Science University in Portland. He says he uses "mouse embryo stem cells all the time" in his lab work but never human embryonic stem cells because of moral concerns.

B.D. Colen, spokesman for the Harvard Stem Cell Research Institute, is disturbed by the attention being given to those with moral concerns about embryonic stem cells.

"When did we start basing science policy in this country on what are fundamentally religious beliefs?" he asked.

Finding alternatives

A White House report on stem-cell research, released Jan. 9 by the Domestic Policy Council, stated that there should be a way "to create human pluripotent cells," meaning flexible cells such as embryonic stem cells, that "can transform into many or perhaps all of the different cell types in the body in cells derived without embryos."

The report, "Advancing Stem Cell Science Without Destroying Human Life," highlighted "tremendous scientific progress of late in exploring methods of deriving pluripotent stem cells without destroying embryos."

Research developments cited by the White House and other critics of embryonic stem-cell research include:

• On Jan. 7, scientists at Wake Forest University School of Medicine reported that a type of cell found in amniotic fluid has significant versatility in terms of the type of body tissue it can become and could be used to treat a variety of diseases.

The cells, discarded by the developing fetus and retrieved easily during prenatal testing, are easier to control in the laboratory than embryonic stem cells, according to authors of the report, published online in the journal Nature Biotechnology.

• In August 2006, researchers at Advanced Cell Technology (ACT), a California-based firm, reported that they had devised a method to create human embryonic stem cells without harming embryos, They said their technique involved taking a single cell, or blastomere, from a 2-day-old embryo after the fertilized egg divided into eight cells. The researchers said the rest of the embryo could be allowed to grow into a healthy human.

But the White House report charged that the technology ACT deployed "did in fact destroy every one of the human embryos used."

Dr. Robert Lanza, director of research and development at ACT, disagreed.

"The embryo was not harmed or destroyed and remains frozen just like the embryos at in-vitro clinics," he said.

• In March 2006, German researchers disclosed that they had isolated stem cells from the testicles of adult mice that appeared similar to embryonic stem cells. They were optimistic the same type of cells could be extracted from human testicles.

• In October 2005, Dr. Rudolf Jaenisch of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology reported he had produced stem cells with the same capabilities as traditional embryonic stem cells through a process that has come to be known as altered nuclear transfer without cloning.

The technique used in mice relies on deactivating a gene essential for formation of an embryo.

Dr. Jaenisch modified mouse DNA and inserted it into an egg whose own genetic material had been removed. After the altered DNA was inserted, cells began to divide and formed an unorganized clump of cells from which stem cells were then retrieved.

Dr. Hurlbut said the method has been recommended for further exploration in animal studies by the presidential advisory panel on bioethics on which he serves and has been endorsed by 35 religious leaders or groups

DOJ_NMG_0130512

• In August 2005, British scientists announced they had found a way to derive embryoniclike stem cells in umbilical-cord blood.

'An ongoing problem'

But some of the scientists whose work was cited in the White House report complained of misrepresentation by the council, saying they were unhappy that their findings were being used to support arguments that embryonic stem-cell research is unnecessary.

"Our work directly involves the use of human embryonic stem cells," the researchers said in a letter to members of Congress. The scientists urged passage of expanded federal funding for embryonic stem-cell research, which the Bush administration opposes.

"Science works best when scientists can pursue all avenues of research," Story Landis, acting chairwoman of the National Institutes of Health's stem-cell task force, told a Senate committee last month.

"If the cure for Parkinson's disease or juvenile diabetes lay behind one of four doors, wouldn't you want the option to open all four doors at once, instead of just one door?" Miss Landis asked.

"The rhetoric for embryonic stem-cell research is more shrill today than ever, but this research is not panning out," said David Prentice, a senior fellow for life sciences at the Family Research Council, which opposes embryonic stem-cell research.

The development of tumors has been "an ongoing problem" in animal research using embryonic stem cells, according to the White House report and other researchers.

Neurologists at the University of Rochester and Cornell reported in November that brain cells derived from embryonic stem cells dramatically improved the condition of rats with severe Parkinson's-like symptoms. But they said the treatment also caused a significant problem -- the appearance of brain tumors in the rodents.

"In fact, 100 percent of the rats got tumors," said Mr. Prentice, who is familiar with the research. He added that there have been "at least a dozen" cases of animal studies using embryonic stem cells in which 25 percent to 50 percent of the animals developed tumors.

The White House report does support clinical trials using adult stem cells, which it says "have produced encouraging improvements in patients with a range of disorders and diseases, including leukemia, lymphoma, diabetes, advanced kidney cancer and several genetic blood disorders."

Mr. Prentice agrees.

"More than 3,000 patients are better today as a result of heart treatments that relied on the patients' own bone-marrow stem cells," he said.

What's more, about 6,000 patients with conditions such as leukemia and sickle cell anemia have been successfully treated with stem cells from umbilical cord blood, Mr. Prentice said.

Funding the research

In 2001, Mr. Bush announced that federal funds could be awarded for embryonic stem-cell research but using only about 70 cell lines that were in existence at the time.

Since that time, $130 million in federal funding has been used for such research, including $40 million last year alone, Dr. Hurlbut said. Nearly $3 billion in federal funds have been used for all forms of stem-cell research, according to the White House report.

Nothing in the federal policy constrains either private or state funding of embryonic stem-cell research. To date, at least six states -- California, Connecticut, Illinois, Massachusetts, New Jersey and Wisconsin -- have encouraged embryonic stem-cell research or set aside money for it.

In November, voters in Missouri narrowly approved a constitutional amendment that prohibits state officials from banning embryonic stem-cell research. And New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, a 2008 Democratic presidential candidate, said he would ask the state legislature to approve a $10 million stem-cell research center at the University of New Mexico. The center would feature research using both embryonic and adult stem cells.

In 2004, California voters approved a ballot measure to allow that state to raise as much as $3 billion through bond sales to fund embryonic stem-cell research.

DOJ_NMG_0130513

"But that $3 billion has been locked up in lawsuits" brought by opponents of embryonic stem-cell research, Dr. Hurlbut said.

Even so, he said, "preliminary grants" for the research "are being distributed," as a result of $150 million Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has provided to start the research program and another $40 million in private donations.

The White House Domestic Policy Council report says that "funding [for embryonic stem-cell research] by individual states is expected to add up to several billion dollars in the next few years."

Meanwhile, some in Congress are seeking to end the restrictions on federal funding for embryonic stem-cell research.

The House voted last month to allow federal funding for new stem-cell lines derived from fertility clinic embryos that otherwise would be discarded. The Senate is likely to pass the measure next month. However, Mr. Bush vetoed an identical bill in July and says he will veto it again.

In another development, New York-based NeoStem, a leader in adult stem-cell technology, has opened the nation's first walk-in stem-cell center. It provides patients with adult stem-cell collection and banking services for their use in future medical crises.

Congress Finds Ways To Avoid Lobbyist Limits (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 10 — The 110th Congress opened with the passage of new rules intended to curb the influence of lobbyists by prohibiting them from treating lawmakers to meals, trips, stadium box seats or the discounted use of private jets.

But it did not take long for lawmakers to find ways to keep having lobbyist-financed fun.

In just the last two months, lawmakers invited lobbyists to help pay for a catalog of outings: lavish birthday parties in a lawmaker's honor ($1,000 a lobbyist), martinis and margaritas at Washington restaurants (at least $1,000), a California wine-tasting tour (all donors welcome), hunting and fishing trips (typically $5,000), weekend golf tournaments ($2,500 and up), a Presidents' Day weekend at Disney World ($5,000), parties in South Beach in Miami ($5,000), concerts by the Who or Bob Seger ($2,500 for two seats), and even Broadway shows like "Mary Poppins" and "The Drowsy Chaperone" (also $2,500 for two).

The lobbyists and their employers typically end up paying for the events, but within the new rules.

Instead of picking up the lawmaker's tab, lobbyists pay a political fund-raising committee set up by the lawmaker. In turn, the committee pays the legislator's way.

Lobbyists and fund-raisers say such trips are becoming increasingly popular, partly as a quirky consequence of the new ethics rules.

By barring lobbyists from mingling with a lawmaker or his staff for the cost of a steak dinner, the restrictions have stirred new demand for pricier tickets to social fund-raising events.

Lobbyists say that the rules might even increase the volume of contributions flowing to Congress from K Street, where many lobbying firms have their offices.

Some lawmakers acknowledge that some fund-raising trips resemble the lobbyist-paid junkets that Congress voted to prohibit.

Jennifer Crider, a spokeswoman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said its leaders had decided to stop holding fund-raising events for lobbyists with political action committees because of the seeming inconsistency.

So the committee canceled its annual Colorado ski weekend for lobbyists and lawmakers to raise money for the next campaign. Gone, too, is its Maryland hunting trip with Representative John D. Dingell of Michigan, the avid hunter who is chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee.

But other Congressional party campaign committees have not stopped their events, including the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee's annual Nantucket weekend for donors who contribute $25,000. And individual lawmakers are still playing host to plenty of events themselves.

Senator Lindsey Graham, a South Carolina Republican who sometimes invites lobbyists to join him for fund-raising hunting trips, called such events an innocuous fact of life.

DOJ_NMG_0130514

"If you are not going to have publicly financed elections and you are getting your support from private individuals — which I believe in — I don't see any problem with having events where private individuals who give you money can talk to you," said Mr. Graham, who like the other senators quoted in this article voted for the ethics reform. He added, "Hunting is a very popular attraction in South Carolina."

Representatives John R. Kuhl Jr. of New York and Greg Walden of Oregon, both Republicans, each recently invited lobbyists to a rock concert by Bob Seger and the Silver Bullet Band. And three Republican lawmakers, Mr. Walden and Representatives Darrell Issa and Mary Bono of California, have invited lobbyists to join them next month at a Who concert in Washington.

"They're her favorite rock 'n' roll band," said Frank Cullen, Ms. Bono's chief of staff.

Among Democrats, Senator Thomas R. Carper of Delaware recently returned from his annual ski trip to the Ritz-Carlton Bachelor Gulch in Beaver Creek, Colo. Senator Max Baucus, a Montana Democrat, just got back from a skiing and snowmobiling trip to his state and has planned two golfing and fly-fishing weekends as well. Expeditions of lobbyists attend each trip. The top prices for the events are meant for lobbyists with political action committees.

Meredith McGehee, policy director of the Campaign Legal Center, which advocates for tighter campaign finance rules, said that organizing a fund-raising trip was not the same as accepting a free vacation. But she added: "At the end of the day, it is the same thing."

Representative Eric Cantor, a Virginia Republican famous on K Street for his annual fund-raising weekends in Beverly Hills and South Beach, has recently invited lobbyists to join him for some expensive cups of coffee. A $2,500 contribution from a lobbyist's political action committee entitles the company's lobbyist to join Mr. Cantor at a Starbucks near his Capitol Hill office four times this spring.

"What's next? Come help me pick up my dry cleaning?" said Massie Ritsch, spokesman for the Center for Responsive Politics, a group that tracks political fund-raising.

The excursions would be illegal under the new ethics rules if lobbyists or their employers paid for them directly. (The rules, passed by both houses in early January, have already taken effect in the House and are expected to take effect in the Senate later this spring.) And some outings involving personal entertainment or recreation for lawmakers could also run afoul of legal restrictions on the personal use of campaign money if they were paid for by a lawmaker's re-election campaign.

But they are allowed, and increasingly common, because of a combination of loopholes. First, the ethics rules restrict personal gifts but not political contributions, so paying to attend a fund-raiser is still legitimate. Second, the "personal use" restrictions apply to lawmakers' re-election campaigns but not to their personal political action committees, which can spend money on almost anything. Lawmakers use their personal PACs to sponsor most of the events. (Lawyers disagree about whether Congressional ethics rules restrict personal use of members' PACs.)

The lawmakers' so-called leadership PACs began proliferating about two decades ago, initially as vehicles for senior members of Congress to build loyalty among their colleagues by funneling money to their campaigns.

These days, however, even the newest members of Congress usually start them. Two newly elected Democratic senators, Claire McCaskill of Missouri and Jim Webb of Virginia, already have. And many use them mainly to pay for travel or miscellaneous other costs.

Over the last two years, the roughly 300 PACs controlled by lawmakers raised a total of about $156 million and used only about a third of that on federal campaign contributions, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, a group that tracks political fund-raising.

Vacationlike fund-raising events with lobbyists are not new. Former Representative Tom DeLay's trips to Puerto Rico were legendary on K Street, for example. But the new ethics rules barring lobbyists from treating lawmakers to less-expensive amusements have given new importance to such getaways.

"I have to have some personal contacts to be a lobbyist," said James Dyer, a lobbyist at the firm of Clark & Weinstock. "If the only ticket in terms of contact is these fund-raising events, it is going to be costly," Mr. Dyer said. "The fund-raising part of our lives is a very expensive tool."

DOJ_NMG_0130515

Thomas Susman, a lawyer who was an editor of the American Bar Association lobbying manual, said that at a recent presentation about the new rules to the lobbyists trade group, "the biggest question was, Is this going to drive everything to the fund-raising side? Is that going to be the way to have social contact with members?"

Some members of Congress said it would not bother them if the upshot of the new rules turned out to be more contributions.

"I am not going to hide from the fact that we have to raise money," said Representative Devin Nunes, a California Republican who has invited donors to his political action committee on a wine-tasting tour in June, modeled after the movie "Sideways." "Only a moron would sell a vote for a $2,000 contribution," Mr. Nunes said.

Fund-raising consultants for both parties said they saw a golden opportunity. "We are definitely seeing an increase in the number of events across the board," said Dana Harris of Bellwether Consulting, a Republican firm that specializes in courting lobbyists' political action committees. "Fund-raising events will provide a safe haven for lobbyists to talk to members."

Among the coming events Ms. Harris's firm helped organize: a trip this month to the Yacht and Beach Club Resort at Disney World for Senator Mel Martinez of Florida, for a $5,000 PAC contribution, and a May trip to the Robert Trent Jones Golf Club in Virginia for Senator Richard M. Burr of North Carolina, for $2,500 a head.

Some private jet companies are trying to capitalize on the rules as well. Lawmakers can no longer fly on a company's corporate jet and then reimburse the owner at a discount. But lawmakers can still use their PACs to pay the actual cost for the use of jets, as Mr. Cantor and others have done.

Marco Larsen, vice president for publicity at Blue Star Jets, a broker that sells single flights on private planes, said his company planned to hold an event in Washington to promote its services to members of Congress. Because of concerns about appearances, Mr. Larsen said, "We wanted to stay away right after the rules were passed, but I think it is a better time now."

Lawmakers are usually reluctant to talk about their fund-raising events. Asked in an interview in the Capitol why he was taking lobbyists on a Montana hunting trip, Mr. Baucus said only, "To show off the beauty of our state," then retreated behind a guarded door.

Mr. Martinez, who will be spending next weekend with lobbyists at Disney World, said, "I've heard from many other members that they have had very successful weekend events." He added, "People can bring their families to it and bring their children, and it's going to be fun."

S.D. Senator Starts Working From Hospital (LAT/AP)

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2007

WASHINGTON — Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) is reading news clippings and starting to do some office work from the hospital, almost two months after suffering a life-threatening brain hemorrhage.

"He has requested more contact with office and is looking for updates from staff," his office said in a statement.

Spokeswoman Julianne Fisher said he was starting slowly. "We do not anticipate him back [in the Senate] for several weeks," Fisher said. "We are bringing work to him rather than him coming to us. His first priority still is rehabilitation."

Johnson has been undergoing physical, occupational and speech therapy since his transfer to rehabilitation from intensive care at George Washington University Hospital last month. He recently began to read and speak in full sentences, according to doctors' statements.

Part of Johnson's therapy has been to deal with weakness on his right side.

He was rushed to the hospital and had emergency surgery Dec. 13 after becoming disoriented during a phone call with reporters. He was diagnosed with arteriovenous malformation, which makes arteries and veins grow abnormally large, become tangled and sometimes burst.

Johnson was sedated and on a ventilator for several weeks because of fluid in his lungs. He was upgraded from critical to fair condition Jan. 9.

The senator is making decisions about his care and expressing opinions on his daily activities, the hospital's chief of rehabilitation, Dr. Philip Marion, said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0130516

"He continues to initiate more conversations and questions," Marion said. "His therapy now includes computer exercises and problem-solving activities."

Johnson's wife, Barbara, said the family was impressed with his progress: "Even though there is a long road ahead to complete recovery, we feel that we have gotten 'our Tim' back."

Questions For Dr. Andrew C. Von Eschenbach: Put To The Test (NYT)

By Deborah Solomon

The New York Times Magazine, February 11, 2007

Q: As the newly confirmed head of the F.D.A., you are presiding over an agency that is probably better known for its failures than for its achievements. For starters, the department lacked a Senate-confirmed commissioner for most of the Bush administration. I actually came here in the fall of 2005 as "acting" commissioner. I don't know what an acting surgeon is. You go into the operating room and you take charge of what needs to get done.

You've just announced a program that tries to ratchet up drug safety by studying the side effects of drugs 18 months after they hit the market, presumably to avoid another calamity like the Vioxx recall. It's not just postmarketing surveillance. It's a whole host of things. One of the important things in this initiative is this concept of the new science of safety. We can use the tools of genomics and proteomics and apply them in ways that can be much more predictive.

In the meantime, your predecessor, Lester Crawford, who resigned without explanation, is scheduled to be sentenced on Feb. 27 for failing to disclose that he and his wife owned stocks in several F.D.A.-regulated companies. Were you surprised by that news? I am just like everyone else. It's very sad that these circumstances have occurred and that he and his family are facing this.

Did you sell any stock before you took this job? I really didn't have much of anything. All I have are my retirement holdings, and they are fully disclosed. They are mutual funds, essentially, and a 529 for my grandchildren. It's been completely vetted by teams of lawyers.

You are a former director of the National Cancer Institute. Do you think nicotine should be regulated as a drug? As cancer doctors, we have looked at the consequences of tobacco, of which nicotine is one component, but in which there are many other components.

In addition to drug safety, you oversee food safety. Might you consider a national initiative similar to the trans-fat ban conceived by Mayor Bloomberg in New York City? Fast-food chains, of course, are the biggest trans-fat users. What I've seen is a significant effort on their part to find alternatives to trans fats.

You seem pretty laissez-faire in your approach to regulation. I wouldn't call it laissez-faire. I would call it incremental.

You were appointed by President Bush, and I hear you are a friend of his parents, whom I assume you met during your many years at the M.D. Anderson Cancer Center in Houston. They had been supporters of M.D. Anderson long before he ever became president, and when they returned to Houston, he had an ongoing relationship with M.D. Anderson. That was part of our evolving friendship, because he was on my prostate-cancer research program advisory board.

How is your own health? I'm fine. I've been through a couple of cancers. Melanoma and prostate cancer were the two serious ones, and basal cell on my nose. My health is great, and fortunately, I exemplify what we hope will be the case for everyone — early detection and adequate and appropriate therapy, and we are cancer survivors.

You're famous in the medical community for your oft-stated plan to eliminate cancer by 2015. I didn't say that! What I said was we have it within our grasp to eliminate the outcome of that disease process — to eliminate the suffering and death due to cancer — and I believe we can bring that about as early as 2015.

How do you think you're doing with that promise? Superbly well.

Some oncologists say that your plan falsely elevates the hopes of patients. Then I would ask them why they got into medicine in the first place.

OTHER NEWS:

DOJ_NMG_0130517

Obama Joins Race With Goals Set High (WP)

By Dan Balz, Anne E. Kornblut

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

SPRINGFIELD, Ill., Feb. 10 -- Illinois Sen. Barack Obama formally opened his campaign for president here Saturday, invoking memories of Abraham Lincoln and challenging a new generation to help him transform the nation.

Standing on the grounds of the Old State Capitol, where Lincoln delivered his famous "House Divided" speech against slavery in 1858, the Democratic first-term senator began a bid for the White House that barely seemed possible just a few months ago but could make him the first black president. "I recognize there is a certain presumptuousness -- a certain audacity -- to this announcement," he said. "I know I haven't spent a lot of time learning the ways of Washington. But I've been there long enough to know that the ways of Washington must change."

Thousands of supporters, some of whom had driven long distances to be here, braved freezing temperatures to join Obama at an event described by many as history in the making. Long before the candidate arrived with his wife, Michelle, and two young daughters shortly after 10 a.m. Central time, the Old Capitol grounds and surrounding areas were packed to capacity.

Against the morning cold, Obama wore an overcoat and a scarf, but no hat or gloves. In his speech, he presented an ambitious agenda that includes bringing an end to the Iraq war, eliminating poverty, ensuring universal health care and creating energy independence. But he seemed to be trying to transcend traditional political debate by arguing that what the country lacks is not good ideas.

"What's stopped us from meeting these challenges is not the absence of sound policies and sensible plans," he said. "What's stopped us is the failure of leadership, the smallness of our politics -- the ease with which we're distracted by the petty and trivial, our chronic avoidance of tough decisions, our preference for scoring cheap political points instead of rolling up our sleeves and building a working consensus to tackle big problems."

Recalling past periods of economic or political crisis, he said, "Each and every time, a new generation has risen up and done what's needed to be done. Today we are called once more -- and it is time for our generation to answer that call."

The story of Obama's rise has captivated political insiders and ordinary Americans alike. The months ahead will test whether he now can transform himself from political phenomenon into the kind of candidate who can withstand the rigors of the marathon ahead.

Obama will be asked to demonstrate that his dearth of experience is not the liability that some of his rivals suggest, and he will be challenged to fill in the blanks of a policy agenda that is longer on goals than details.

He begins as one of the principal challengers to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), the early favorite for the Democratic nomination. But he must also contend with former North Carolina senator John Edwards, whose progressive agenda and grass-roots campaign threatens to occupy some of the same space Obama aims to seize for his own candidacy. Other more experienced candidates hope to profit if he falters.

For all the enthusiasm that surrounds his candidacy, Obama still faces the reality that Clinton begins with a political machine that is far deeper and broader than his. Obama advisers said their campaign for the nomination may be more unconventional than hers.

"I think that the path to get there has to do with our ability to inspire a lot of people to get involved in this process who have not been involved, or who may have been involved once but lost heart," said David Axelrod, the campaign's chief strategist. "We have to give people a real sense of investment so that the electorate will maybe look a little different."

Obama's sharpest difference with both Clinton and Edwards is his early opposition to the Iraq war; they voted for the 2002 resolution authorizing President Bush to invade Iraq. Edwards has since apologized for his vote, and Clinton has said she would not have voted that way had she known then what she knows now.

But Obama can point to remarks he made in the fall of 2002 in which he not only called the war "dumb" but also predicted the dangers of the long occupation that followed the successful invasion. In his announcement speech, he described the war as a "tragic mistake."

"It's time to admit that no amount of American lives can resolve the political disagreement that lies at the heart of someone else's civil war," he said Saturday. "That's why I have a plan that will bring our combat troops home by March of 2008. Letting the Iraqis know that we will not be there forever is our last, best hope to pressure the Sunni and Shia to come to the table and find peace."

DOJ_NMG_0130518

Beyond the setting itself, Obama invoked Lincoln throughout the speech, even to the point where the tall, thin Obama recalled a "tall, gangly, self-made Springfield lawyer" who ended slavery and led the nation though one of its darkest moments.

"He had his doubts," Obama said of Lincoln. "He had his defeats. He had his setbacks. But through his will and his words, he moved a nation and helped free a people."

But in issuing a call for a new generation to take its place at the center of public life, Obama summoned up memories of President John F. Kennedy and his 1960 campaign.

Obama, 45 and the son of a black Kenyan man and a white Kansas woman, worked as a community organizer in Chicago before graduating from Harvard Law School and returning to the city to become a civil rights lawyer. He ran for the state Senate in 1996 and served four terms there before launching what seemed a long-shot campaign for the U.S. Senate. Even before he won the seat and became the only African American in the Senate, Obama was seen as a rising star in his party because of the keynote speech he gave at the 2004 Democratic National Convention. His two best-selling books -- and his appearances on "Oprah," on ESPN's "Monday Night Football" and in the pages of People magazine -- have spread his appeal widely over the past few months, even as his name recognition across the electorate remains relatively low.

In his announcement speech Saturday and in interviews leading up to it, Obama began the process of both laying out his professional experience and arguing that experience in Washington is not a requirement for becoming president.

Critical of Bush's presidency and what he said are the nation's unmet challenges, Obama decried the cynicism that he said pervades the political process and called on those disillusioned by a culture of special interests and gridlocked politics to join him in his campaign.

"The time for that politics is over. It is through. It is time to turn the page, right here, right now," he said, and the crowd responded with chants of "Obama, Obama, Obama."

Although his campaign infrastructure is still being built -- his advisers moved into their Chicago headquarters only last week -- Obama's launch had the trappings of a campaign that has been building for months. That included a new Web site launched in conjunction with the announcement and a new campaign logo, a blue "O" that evokes a rising sun and that appeared on buttons, placards and T-shirts.

The crowd was filled with committed Obama supporters who lifted signs -- "Barack the Vote" was among the more creative -- and cheered in waves as the candidate spoke.

From Illinois, Obama flew to Cedar Rapids, Iowa, and a town hall meeting with more than 2,000 people. Obama spent an hour fielding questions about Iraq, North Korea, the No Child Left Behind Act and the cost of college tuition.

He said he believes many Americans feel that something has been lost since the promise of the Kennedy era.

"What's been lost is that our politics feels very much like an insider's game," he said. "People feel like you've got the two parties splitting the pot, and ordinary voters are left out of the process."

Opening the session, Obama talked about the challenges facing the country and his own ambitions to be president.

"I want to win," he said, "but I don't just want to win. I want to transform this country."

Obama Invokes Lincoln For Run (WT)

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, February 11, 2007

SPRINGFIELD, Ill. -- Sen. Barack Obama officially announced his presidential candidacy yesterday before thousands of supporters eager to become part of his "new leadership" movement.

"This campaign can't only be about me. It must be about us -- it must be about what we can do together," Mr. Obama said, standing in front of the building where Abraham Lincoln served in the state General Assembly before he became president.

"I know it's a little chilly, but I'm fired up," the Illinois Democrat said as he took the podium with his wife, Michelle, and daughters Malia, 8, and Sasha, 5.

DOJ_NMG_0130519

Like former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean, who sought the Democratic nomination in 2004, Mr. Obama envisions a campaign to be built from the ground up using the Internet -- a grass-roots coalition that will be controlled by voters.

"This campaign must be the occasion, the vehicle, of your hopes, and your dreams," Mr. Obama said. "It will take your time, your energy and your advice to push us forward when we're doing right, and to let us know when we're not."

In a speech that invoked the memories of both Lincoln and Martin Luther King, the junior senator from Illinois acknowledged a "certain audacity" in his selection of the historic backdrop for his announcement and said he recognizes that his campaign is as much about the voters as it is about himself.

"In my heart, I know you didn't come here just for me," Mr. Obama said, as some in the audience shouted: "Yes, we did!" Unfazed, the senator said, "You came here because you believe in what this country can be."

Mr. Obama played on the similarities between himself and Lincoln, whose work he said was the reason that Americans of every race can stand together to face the challenges of the 21st century.

Like Lincoln, Mr. Obama is viewed as a novice to national politics, having spent eight years in the Illinois state Senate and just two years in the U.S. Senate before running for president. Mr. Obama lost his first bid for Congress in 2000; Lincoln lost a Senate bid in 1858, two years before being elected president.

Mr. Obama laid out a broad vision for the country, in which he and voters will "together" tackle the tough issues of providing health care for all Americans, improving education and creating jobs that provide a living wage.

He also spoke of empowering unions, putting an end to the nation's addiction to foreign oil and maintaining a strong military to fight terrorism.

At 45, Mr. Obama is the youngest candidate among a Democratic field that is dominated by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, and he tried to use his youth to distance himself from the others in the race.

"Each and every time, a new generation has risen up and done what's needed to be done," Mr. Obama said. "Today, we are called once more -- and it is time for our generation to answer that call."

He also made clear his opposition to the Iraq war and highlighted his plan to begin bringing troops home by March 2008.

"Letting the Iraqis know that we will not be there forever is our last, best hope to pressure the Sunni and Shia to come to the table and find peace," Mr. Obama said.

David Axelrod, the campaign's media adviser, said there was no attempt to tear down or disparage other Democrats in the campaign.

"We don't have a strategy to tear people down," he said. "Our premise is, if you can give people something to aspire to, then you don't have to do that, and if it works, we will have changed politics in America."

With his announcement, Mr. Obama's campaign shifted into high gear. A once-barren exploratory committee Web site was teeming with content, including speeches dating back as far as 2002 and highlighting Mr. Obama's opposition to the war in Iraq.

Many in the audience yesterday had traveled from as far away as California and Arizona for Mr. Obama's announcement, while others drove from nearby Peoria and Decatur.

"This is really amazing. He's amazing," said Paul Jeffords, 37, a sales representative from Peoria. "He is the most dynamic, the most humble. I just feel like he's the one who can bring all of us together."

After his announcement yesterday, Mr. Obama traveled to Cedar Rapids, Iowa, where he addressed voters in a packed high school gym. The senator will travel to New Hampshire tomorrow before returning to Washington.

Obama Launches Campaign With Emphasis On Grassroots (HILL)

By Klaus Marre

The Hill, February 10, 2007

Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) officially announced his candidacy for the White House Saturday, saying he wants to lead a new generation of Americans in tackling the country's challenges.

"Each and every time, a new generation has risen up and has done what needed to be done," when America has faced challenges in the past, Obama said in an appeal to younger voters.

DOJ_NMG_0130520

Speaking from outside of the Old State Capitol in Springfield, Ill., and joined by his family, Obama addressed hundreds of bundled up supporters, who cheered on the candidate despite having to stand outside in temperatures just above 10 degrees.

"You didn't just come here for me," Obama said. "You came here because you believed in what this country can be. In the face of war, you believe there can be peace. In the face of despair, you believe there can be hope."

This campaign "must be about us," he told a cheering crowd. "It will take your time, your energy and your advice..." The candidate cited the example of Abraham Lincoln, who Obama said showed the country that it is possible to make a change.

Obama hopes to launch a broad grassroots campaign that can propel him past Democratic frontrunner Sen. Hillary Clinton (N.Y.).

Across the street from the historic building, from which Lincoln had delivered one of his most famous speeches, the campaign had placed a gigantic U.S. flag.

Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) announced Obama, telling the crow that it had gathered in "a place filled with memories" and praising Obama as a man who had inspired America and reminded people that "anything is possible" in this country.

"Here, many years ago, another son of Illinois began his journey to Washington," he told the crowd. "Today another son of Illinois will take his first step on his journey to Washington."

Following the announcement, Obama planned to travel to Iowa later on Saturday. He intends to visit New Hampshire Monday to participate in a town hall meeting.

While Obama is seen as the rising star in the Democratic Party, he faces an uphill battle for the nomination, as Clinton has been leading in the polls and is viewed as the candidate with the greatest fundraising potential.

"I recognize that there is a certain presumptuousness in this [announcement], a certain audacity" because he had not spend a lot of time in Washington, Obama said in a reference to more experienced rivals. "I have been there long enough to know that the ways in Washington must change."

Aware that Clinton's network of large donors is extensive, Obama is asking supporters to contribute in small ways.

"[My] website is going to be set up so that you can build your own profile, form your own groups, plan your own events, take campaign fundraising into your own hands, so that we can collect small donations instead of having to rely on large campaign contributions," he said Friday, adding that his quest for the presidency is "a great journey."

"I know I can't do it by myself. Ultimately, this has to be a vehicle for your hopes and your dreams," Obama said in a message to his supporters.

It's Official: Obama Is Running For President (LAT)

By Mark Z. Barabak

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2007

— Sen. Barack Obama formally launched his bid for president Saturday, his eyes on history and feet rooted in the frigid Midwest as he pledged a new generation of leadership to end the war in Iraq and banish "the smallness of our politics."

In a speech that recalled his soaring remarks to the 2004 Democratic National Convention — the speech that launched his political rocket flight — Obama sought to set himself apart from the large Democratic field of White House hopefuls, and from the Washington establishment he joined two years ago as a senator representing Illinois.

He cited a familiar litany of woes: poverty, underperforming schools, soaring healthcare costs, hard-pressed wage earners, reliance on foreign oil, and the Iraq war. But the larger problem, he suggested, was a rancid political system that perpetuated those ills instead of solving them.

"What's stopped us is the failure of leadership, the smallness of our politics, the ease with which we're distracted by the petty and trivial, our chronic avoidance of tough decisions, our preference for scoring cheap political points," Obama said.

"The time for that kind of politics is over," he added. "It's time to turn the page."

More than 15,000 people showed up for Obama's announcement, police said. The crowd formed a small sea of covered heads — temperatures were in the low teens — at the base of the old state Capitol, where Abraham Lincoln served, orated and, finally, lay in state.

DOJ_NMG_0130521

The 45-year-old senator's announcement — his breath visible in the cold — marked a fully committed candidacy that, if successful, would make him the nation's first black president.

Obama is generally regarded as one of the top three Democratic White House hopefuls — behind Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, ahead of former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina. But Obama is also among the least experienced of the more than a dozen candidates running on both sides, a political phenom whose success to date grows more out of style than accomplishment.

Conceding "a certain presumptuousness, a certain audacity" in his announcement, Obama suggested that the brevity of his stint in Washington should not be viewed as a demerit. "I've been there long enough to know that the ways of Washington must change," he said, offering his seven years as a state senator in Springfield as an exemplar of the politics he wished to practice.

"We learned to disagree without being disagreeable," he said, "that so long as we're willing to listen to each other, we can assume the best in people instead of the worst."

Addressing the war in Iraq, Obama offered one of the few policy specifics of his 20-minute speech, drawing an approving roar from the crowd. "It's time to admit that no amount of American lives can resolve the political disagreement that lies at the heart of someone else's civil war," he said, calling for U.S. combat troops to leave by March 2008.

He also drew a contrast with Edwards and Clinton, who both voted in 2002 to authorize the invasion of Iraq. Edwards has apologized for his vote; Clinton, campaigning Saturday in New Hampshire, reiterated that she would not have voted the same way knowing what she does today, but refused to say she was wrong.

Obama was blunt: "I opposed this war from the start. I thought it was a tragic mistake."

The site he chose for his announcement was steeped in symbolism. Lincoln not only served as a state representative in the old Capitol, but in 1858 delivered his famous antislavery speech that quoted from the Bible, "A house divided against itself cannot stand."

Obama invoked that speech in declaring his candidacy and returned to Lincoln and his legacy throughout his own speech — referring at one point to the inspirational "life of a tall, gangly, self-made Springfield lawyer" who showed the power of words and conviction to overcome political division. The description, plainly made to invite comparison, drew appreciative laughs from the crowd.

At another point, Obama echoed the words of a more recent president, John F. Kennedy, who also sought the White House as a relatively young man with a short political resume. Citing a succession of generations that achieved great things — settling the West, ending slavery, overcoming the Great Depression, sending a man to the moon — Obama said, "Today we are called once more — and it is time for our generation to answer that call."

Obama, the son of a black father from Kenya and a white mother from Kansas, made no mention of his upbringing, which was mainly in Hawaii. He spoke only briefly of his time as a community activist in Chicago before launching his political career a decade ago. He also made little mention of President Bush or his policies, beyond a paragraph condemning the last six years and Bush's penchant, as Obama described it, to distract people from the administration's failures and "blame the other party, or gay people, or immigrants."

The largely uplifting tone contributed to a feeling that, whatever the outcome in 2008, Obama's announcement deserved a place in history.

Foster Ware III drove about an hour from Bloomington, Ill., to attend Obama's speech with his wife, their three small children and a family friend. He doubted any of the youngsters would remember the occasion, Ware said, but as an African American he wanted to tell them someday that they had been at the event and to urge them "to always dream and never let anyone kill that dream."

"I hate hearing, 'Is the country ready for a black president?' " said Ware, a 31-year-old pharmaceutical salesman. "If not now, when? If not him, who? I think it's a perfect opportunity for the country to rally behind Obama."

From Illinois, the freshly declared candidate traveled next door to Iowa, which opens the presidential nominating process with its precinct caucuses scheduled for January.

In a Cedar Rapids gymnasium, he faced another enthusiastic crowd (which applauded him at one point for removing his suit jacket). He offered a condensed version of his Illinois announcement speech and fielded a handful of questions.

DOJ_NMG_0130522

One of them — how does he deal with so much adulation? — brought a smile and a quip. "I hope all the questions are like that," he said.

Turning serious, Obama acknowledged he was new to practicing politics at the presidential level and conceded, "We don't know how I will deal, my family will deal with the rigors of this campaign. Part of the reason to do town hall meetings like this one is for people to lift the hood and kick the tires and see what this guy is actually about."

Obama Formally Enters Presidential Race (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney, Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

SPRINGFIELD, Ill., Feb. 10 — Senator Barack Obama of Illinois, standing before the Old State Capitol where Abraham Lincoln began his political career, announced his candidacy for the White House on Saturday by presenting himself as an agent of generational change who could transform a government hobbled by cynicism, petty corruption and "a smallness of our politics."

"The time for that politics is over," Mr. Obama said. "It is through. It's time to turn the page."

Wearing an overcoat but gloveless on a frigid morning, Mr. Obama invoked a speech Lincoln gave here in 1858 condemning slavery — "a house divided against itself cannot stand" — as he started his campaign to become the nation's first black president.

Speaking smoothly and comfortably, Mr. Obama offered a generational call to arms, portraying his campaign less as a candidacy and more as a movement. "Each and every time, a new generation has risen up and done what's needed to be done," he said. "Today we are called once more, and it is time for our generation to answer that call."

It was the latest step in a journey rich with historic possibilities and symbolism. Thousands of people packed the town square to witness it, shivering in the single-digit frostiness until Mr. Obama appeared, trailed by his wife, Michelle, and two young daughters. ("I wasn't too cold," Mr. Obama said later, grinning as he acknowledged a heating device had been positioned at his feet, out of the audience's view.)

Still, for all the excitement on display, Mr. Obama's speech also marked the start of a tough new phase in what until now has been a charmed introduction to national politics. Democrats and Mr. Obama's aides said they were girding for questions about his experience in national politics, his command of policy, a past that has gone largely unexamined by rivals and the news media, and a public persona defined more by his biography and charisma than by how he would seek to use the powers of the presidency.

"He's done impressively so far, but at some point he's really going to have to move to the next stage," said Walter Mondale, the former Democratic vice president who made the phrase "where's the beef" famous in his 1984 challenge to the credentials of a rival, Gary Hart, the former senator from Colorado.

The formal entry to the race framed a challenge that would seem daunting to even the most talented politician: whether Mr. Obama, with all his strengths and limitations, can win in a field dominated by Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, who brings years of experience in presidential politics, a command of policy and political history, and an extraordinarily battle-tested network of fund-raisers and advisers.

Mr. Obama has told friends that he views Mrs. Clinton as his biggest obstacle, though his aides said they remained very wary as well of former Senator John Edwards, another rival for the Democratic nomination.

Video More Video »

Mr. Obama hit the question of experience in the opening bars of his speech on Saturday, suggesting that he would seek to use his limited time in government as an asset by casting himself as an agent of change who was free from the pull of special interests and politics as usual.

"I recognize there is a certain presumptuousness in this — a certain audacity — to this announcement," he said. "I know that I haven't spent a lot of time learning the ways of Washington. But I've been there long enough to know that the ways of Washington must change."

DOJ_NMG_0130523

For Mr. Obama's campaign, struggling to put this unlikely organization together in just three months, the first focus is Mrs. Clinton. Mr. Obama's aides said they had spent weeks discussing how to derail what David Plouffe, Mr. Obama's campaign manager, described as "the dominant political organization in the Democratic Party."

Mr. Obama's decision to spend the first two days of his presidential campaign in Iowa, where he headed after his announcement, reflected one of the first important strategic decisions in that regard. His organization sees Iowa as a place where he could surprise Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Edwards with an early victory. The eastern part of the state, a critical region for Democrats to win and where Mr. Obama spent the rest of Saturday, shares a media market with neighboring Illinois. Mr. Obama has been a fixture in local news since winning his Senate primary nearly three years ago.

In trying to undercut Mrs. Clinton's claims of experience, Mr. Obama's campaign has decided to borrow techniques that Bill Clinton used to defeat the first President Bush in 1992. Mr. Obama, reprising the role of Mr. Clinton, on Saturday presented himself as a candidate of generational change running to oust entrenched symbols of Washington, an allusion to Mrs. Clinton, as he tried to turn her experience into a burden. Mr. Obama is 45; Mrs. Clinton is 59.

But more than anything, Mr. Obama's aides said, they believe the biggest advantage he has over Mrs. Clinton is his difference in position on the Iraq war. Mrs. Clinton supported the war authorization four years ago. Mr. Obama has opposed the war from the start, and has introduced a bill to begin withdrawing United States troops no later than May 1, with the goal of removing all combat brigades by March 31, 2008, taking a far more explicit stance than Mrs. Clinton on ending the conflict.

"America, it's time to start bringing our troops home," he said Saturday. "It's time to admit that no amount of American lives can resolve the political disagreement that lies at the heart of someone else's civil war."

Yet even on a day that pointed to Mr. Obama's strengths — a big, excited crowd, a speech that in its composition and delivery demonstrated yet again why he is viewed as a singular talent in the Democratic Party — it seems evident that Mr. Obama's easier days as a candidate have passed. Unlike Mrs. Clinton, or to a lesser extent Mr. Edwards, Mr. Obama has not gone through a full-scale audit that will now come from Republicans, Democrats, journalists and advocacy groups, eager to define him before he defines himself.

Some Democrats, including Mr. Obama's opponents, seem increasingly game to challenge him, particularly when it comes to the substance of an Obama candidacy. Mr. Edwards offered a hint of what Mr. Obama faced in an interview the other day, as he discussed national health care, when he was asked his reaction to Mr. Obama's views on providing national coverage.

"I haven't seen a plan from him," Mr. Edwards said. "Have you all?"

Mr. Obama has glided to his position in his party with a demeanor and series of eloquent speeches that have won him comparisons to the Kennedy brothers and put him in a position where his status as a black man with a chance to win the White House is only part of the excitement generated by his candidacy.

But with perhaps one major exception, his plan to disengage forces in Iraq, he has avoided offering the kind of specific ideas that his own advisers acknowledge could open him up to attack by opponents or alienate supporters initially drawn by his more thematic appeals.

Mr. Obama went so far as to tell Democrats in Washington last week that voters were looking for a message of hope, and disparaged the notion that a presidential campaign should be built on a foundation of position papers or details.

"There are those who don't believe in talking about hope: they say, well, we want specifics, we want details, we want white papers, we want plans," he said then. "We've had a lot of plans, Democrats. What we've had is a shortage of hope."

But some Democrats were scornful. "That's nonsense," Mr. Hart said. "It posits that it's either-or. Who's saying you can't talk about hope? I'm not talking about white papers: I'm talking about one big speech about 'How I view the world.' "

In an interview before he left for Illinois, Mr. Obama said he realized his powerful appeal as a campaigner would take him only so far. Other campaigns that have relied extensively on the life story of the candidate have typically foundered.

"If a campaign is premised on personality, then no, I don't think you can stay fresh for a year," he said. "But if the campaign is built from the ground up and there is a sense of ownership among people who want to see significant change, then absolutely. It can build and grow."

DOJ_NMG_0130524

And in his speech here on Saturday, Mr. Obama, trying to offer himself as the grass-roots outsider in contrast to a member of a political family that has dominated Washington life for 15 years, presented his campaign as an effort "not just to hold an office, but to gather with you to transform a nation."

"That is why this campaign can't only be about me," Mr. Obama said. "It must be about us. It must be about what we can do together."

The Audacity Of Barack Obama (POL)

By Roger Simon

The Politico, February 10, 2007

SPRINGFIELD, Ill. - - The very audacity of it, the very unlikelihood of a black man becoming president of the United States is now the driving force of Barack Obama's campaign.

In an announcement speech Saturday of soaring rhetoric, on a bitterly cold day, to a large and shivering crowd, Barack Obama called what he was doing an "improbable quest."

"If you will join me in this improbable quest, if you feel destiny calling, and see as I see, a future of endless possibility stretching before us; if you sense, as I sense, that the time is now to shake off our slumber, and slough off our fear, and make good on the debt we owe past and future generations, then I'm ready to take up the cause, and march with you, and work with you," he said.

"Together, starting today, let us finish the work that needs to be done, and usher in a new birth of freedom on this Earth."

Which is pretty audacious talk. But it was also pretty audacious to announce in Springfield, home of Abraham Lincoln, and in the shadow of the Old State Capitol, where Lincoln gave his "House Divided" speech in opposition to slavery.

Obama addressed it directly, again stressing the difficulty of what he was attempting:

"For that is our unyielding faith -- that in the face of impossible odds, people who love their country can change it. That's what Abraham Lincoln understood," Obama said.

And what will it take for Obama actually to be elected?

Decency, he said. The decency that is America.

"It was here, in Springfield, where North, South, East and West come together that I was reminded of the essential decency of the American people, where I came to believe that through this decency, we can build a more hopeful America," he said. "And that is why, in the shadow of the Old State Capitol, where Lincoln once called on a divided house to stand together, where common hopes and common dreams still, I stand before you today to announce my candidacy for president of the United States."

Announcement speeches are designed not just to generate support, not just to allow the candidate to slap himself on the back with both hands but also to address critics.

Think Obama has not had enough national experience? Try this:

"I recognize there is a certain presumptuousness -- a certain audacity -- to this announcement," Obama said. "I know I haven't spent a lot of time learning the ways of Washington. But I've been there long enough to know that the ways of Washington must change."

Take that, Hillary Clinton! Take that, John Edwards! And Chris Dodd! And Joe Biden!

And to those who are spreading rumors that because his middle name is Hussein he is a Muslim, Obama carefully pointed out that when working in the poor neighborhoods of Chicago, "I learned the true meaning of my Christian faith."

The press came in for its comeuppance, too. Obama criticized "the smallness of our politics -- the ease with which we're distracted by the petty and trivial."

In his interview with me on Wednesday, Obama said the media's obsession with the trivial is one of his problems. People say he does not give specifics? he said. That is because the press does not concentrate on his specifics.

"We've given major speeches on just about every issue," he said. "So the key for us, I think, is just making sure that we are getting the press to focus attention on that agenda as opposed to, you know, obsessing on how I look in my swimming trunks."

There was no danger on anybody concentrating on swimming trunks Saturday. It was far too cold.

DOJ_NMG_0130525

Frigid Weather Tests Crowd's Fortitude (WP)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

SPRINGFIELD, Ill., Feb. 10 -- Raising questions about his judgment and risking the ire of the national press corps, Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) held fast on his first major campaign decision: to conduct his announcement speech in the frigid outdoors here on Saturday.

And so, as much as it was a political story, the Obama event became a weather story.

"I guess the Arctic Circle wasn't available this morning," said Chris Matthews, quivering during his live interview on NBC's "Weekend Today" as he ruefully noted that anchor Campbell Brown was usually the one outside doing cold-weather reporting.

Even by the standards of the wintry spells in New Hampshire and Iowa that political reporters and candidates ritually confront, it was a brutal morning in the Illinois capital -- sunny but subfreezing, especially in the shady corners where hundreds of supporters had to stand. Medical teams were on hand in case anyone collapsed. A local television station ran a report on preventing hypothermia, aimed at people planning to attend the Obama event.

Why not, some asked, just move the speech indoors?

Campaign officials pointed out that the backdrop of the old Illinois statehouse, where Abraham Lincoln gave his famous "House Divided" speech, was too symbolic and picturesque to be skipped, even on a morning when the temperature was 7 degrees. There were also suggestions that a pampered press corps might be more fragile than the candidate, who emerged in a simple suit and an overcoat, without head covering of any kind.

By contrast, columnist Joe Klein of Time magazine wore a large, fuzzy hat made of rabbit fur, procured in Amsterdam. A member of one of the camera crews -- which began assembling at 5 a.m. -- wore a full-body ski suit.

Though a trifling matter, the insistence on staying outside raised questions about the Obama message. Was he trying to prove his mettle? Distancing himself from his upbringing in Hawaii -- where he was recently photographed in his bathing suit? Subtly appealing to flinty Northerners who pride themselves on enduring the cold?

Obama dropped few clues, though he did acknowledge the temperature.

"I know it's a little chilly," he said as he walked onstage with his wife and two daughters (both covered, unlike their father, in hats).

"No, it's cold!" someone shouted from the crowd.

The weather did not stop more than a dozen people in wheelchairs, some elderly, from taking up positions in the front row. Tara Davlin, 29, hobbled through the site on crutches after recent hip surgery (though, as the daughter of Springfield Mayor Timothy J. Davlin, she might have had more obligation to attend than most). "I wouldn't have missed it for the world," she said.

Nonchalance -- about the climate, not the candidate -- abounded. "If we can survive the cold to go sledding, we can survive the cold to see history," said Shanna Shipman, 27, who bundled up her daughters -- Hope, 4, and Kai, 18 months -- in layers to see the speech.

"We're hearty Midwesterners," beamed Dan Hankiewicz of Springfield. "A little weather never stopped us."

Obama: I'm Running For President (CHIT)

By Christi Parsons

Chicago Tribune, February 11, 2007

SPRINGFIELD—Sen. Barack Obama officially entered the race for president Saturday in the Illinois capital, urging Americans who hear "destiny calling" to join him in "the unfinished business of perfecting our union," then headed out to start campaigning in earnest in the battleground state of Iowa.

Against the backdrop of the Old State Capitol where Abraham Lincoln once served in the state legislature, the Illinois Democrat launched his campaign surrounded by thousands of supporters who traveled from around the state and country and braved freezing temperatures to witness an event many of them described in historic terms.

Sounding themes of hope and common purpose, Obama invoked the memory of Lincoln in calling for an end to the cynicism he says cleaves the nation, so that a united America can confront its problems at home and abroad.

DOJ_NMG_0130526

"People who love their country can change it," said Obama, entering the race as the first African American candidate considered a leading contender for a major party nomination. "That's what Abraham Lincoln understood. He had his doubts. He had his defeats . . . But through his will and his words, he moved a nation and helped free a people."

But as Obama departed immediately for Iowa, the raucous crowd and frenzied applause of the morning quickly gave way to to difficult questions. Voters at a town hall meeting quizzed Obama about everything from the Iraq war and North Korea to education funding and race relations.

A seasoned electorate known for its careful vetting of candidates in the early presidential caucuses, voters in Cedar Rapids responded warmly but with much more restraint.

"A small percentage of people here are supporting Barack Obama," said Steve Sovern, a former state senator and local Democrat who moderated the meeting at the Kennedy High School gymnasium. "Voters here take the caucus seriously and they measure candidates carefully. They'll be back to hear Obama and other candidates many times before they make up their minds."

It was a dose of reality Obama said he was expecting would come as soon as he announced his candidacy. The competition for the Democratic nomination is heating up more each day, with Sen. Hillary Clinton of New York raising the bar for campaign fundraising and a host of candidates crowding into the field.

Voters will want to "check under the hood and kick the tires" now, Obama said Saturday afternoon.

"The novelty's going to wear off," Obama said. "People are going to be (thinking), 'Aw, it's Obama, he's coming through town again' . . . People are going to be able to ask me some questions you couldn't ask me this time out."

The heavy presence of security around Obama was also a silent reminder of the change that took place with the announcement. Michelle Obama, the candidate's wife, acknowledged it in an interview to air on CBS's "60 Minutes," in which she was asked if she fears for her husband's life as a black candidate.

"I don't lose sleep over it because the realities are that … as a black man … Barack can get shot going to the gas station," observed Michelle Obama in the interview, set to air Sunday night. "You can't make decisions based on fear and the possibility of what might happen."

In Springfield, a crowd police estimated at 15,000 or more began to gather in the early morning around the stage erected on the lawn of the old Capitol. Supporters crowded inside the fence around the building and spilled out onto surrounding streets, clutching hand-made signs and cups of coffee to brave a single-digit wind chill factor.

Obama took the stage with his wife and two young daughters, as strains of the U2 song "City of Blinding Lights" blared over loud speakers. Sharpshooters watched from the tops of several buildings overhead while Obama sounded a theme now familiar in its condemnation of political cynicism and its gauzy description of a better America.

Though acknowledging what he called the "presumptuousness" of running for office after only two years in the Senate, Obama spun his lack of experience in national politics as a good thing.

"I've been there long enough to know that the ways of Washington must change," he said. He extolled the benefits of his history as a community organizer in Chicago, a state lawmaker and civil rights lawyer, and called for quick action to end the Iraq war and bring home American troops, as well as to provide quality health care for all and to end America's dependence on foreign oil.

Repeatedly, Obama invoked the memory of Lincoln, who delivered his famous "House Divided" speech in the building that served as his backdrop.

"It was here, in Springfield, where North, South, East and West come together, that I was reminded of the essential decency of the American people," Obama said, referring to his time in the state legislature that now meets a few blocks away in the new state Capitol. "That is why, in the shadow of the Old State Capitol, where Lincoln once called on a divided house to stand together, where common hopes and common dreams still live, I stand before you today to announce my candidacy for president of the United States."

Listeners in one corner of the crowd had a hard time hearing Obama because of the loud chants of protesters objecting to Obama's support for abortion rights. Obama spoke in an even tone and didn't appear deterred by them, though their presence was a not-so-subtle reminder that his future as a presidential candidate won't be as easy as the months leading up to it.

DOJ_NMG_0130527

Republicans also injected a bit of skepticism to counter the months of celebrity that Obama has enjoyed since his 2004 address at the Democratic National Convention.

"His speech could have been given by any candidate, Republican or Democrat," Illinois GOP party chairman Andy McKenna said of the morning announcement. "He's very popular, but will he embrace some ideas that distinguish him? It remains to be seen."

The vast majority of the crowd received Obama warmly, chanting his name and cheering wildly at applause lines throughout his speech.

"The support is amazing," said Janet Williams of East St. Louis, noting the marked racial diversity of the crowd. "People seem ready to come together around him."

Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.), who traveled with Obama for the day, said he noticed the same thing about the crowd, assembled partially by invitation but also by word of mouth and caravans apparently organized by individuals not associated with the campaign.

"When you can turn out 15 or 20,000 people in 7 degrees, it's an indication of the excitement they feel about him," said Durbin. "They're from all over the United States, with a lot of young people. That's going to be Barack's strong suit. He really represents a generation of change."

Obama, who arrived in Springfield a decade ago as an obscure freshman lawmaker, left town Saturday afternoon with a police escort and an entourage of a dozen vehicles. As he made his way toward the airport, and the fight of his life, Springfield residents came out into their front yards and porches to wave goodbye.

"The country is ready for change, and I feel he is the one to bring it," said Juanita Johnson, also of East St. Louis. "I feel like this is a historic moment."

Obama Urges Iowans To Join Him Against Cynicism (DMR)

Des Moines Register, February 11, 2007

On a day that Iowans said felt historic, Barack Obama asked them to join him on his "improbable quest" for the presidency, stressing that when ordinary citizens join together, they can accomplish extraordinary things.

"I want to win," Obama, 45, told the crowd of about 2,500 people at John F. Kennedy High School in Cedar Rapids, the second stop on his announcement tour. "But I don't just want to win. I want to transform this country, and the only way I'm going to do it is if you make this a vehicle for your hopes and dreams."

If elected, Obama, a Democrat, would become the United States' first black president.

"This is so historic," said Harriette Cooper, a full-time volunteer who lives Cedar Rapids. "It's not just because he's black. The things he says are so believable."

With his wife, Michelle, and daughters Malia, 8, and Sasha, 5, and a substantial pack of reporters, Obama arrived in a chartered airplane from Illinois, a state he represents in the U.S. Senate. Earlier Saturday, he made his presidential bid official in a speech outside the Old Capitol in Springfield, evoking images of Abraham Lincoln, the president who abolished slavery and united "a house divided."

Most national polls show that among Democrats, Obama's popularity is second only to Hillary Clinton, the senator from New York.

Those at the rally in Cedar Rapids said they've heard that Obama is being called a fresh face, a rock star, a political rocket who has that mysterious political "X-factor" that makes him a charismatic candidate.

They acknowledged Obama is new and wildly popular, but said Iowans have sensitive antenna, and many aren't making up their minds yet. After all, they flirted with Howard Dean during the last caucus season but dumped him for battle-tested John Kerry.

"I don't want the screaming," said Rosemarie Conner, a factory worker from Oxford who said it wasn't Obama's star power that drew her to the rally, but his thoughtfulness. "He seems so soft-spoken."

Iowans want Obama's plan for Iraq

DOJ_NMG_0130528

"I don't want the screaming," said Rosemarie Conner, a factory worker from Oxford who said it wasn't Obama's star power that drew her to the rally, but his thoughtfulness. "He seems so soft-spoken."

Conner said she wanted to hear Obama's thoughts on basic issues such as health care and Iraq.

After shedding his suit jacket, Obama sat on a stool for a relaxed question-and-answer session, that touched on improving education, enlarging federal grants for college students, raising teacher pay, insuring those who have no health care, lowering health care costs for all Americans, ending poverty, dealing with global warming, and ending the country's dependence on foreign oil through the development of alternative fuels.

But, he said, those goals can't be achieved without an end to the "ill-conceived war in Iraq."

Obama has been unapologetically critical of the war from the start, a sharp contrast with Clinton, the Democratic forerunner, who voted in favor of the war resolution in 2002. Although Obama wasn't in U.S. Congress at that time, he spoke out about it while in the Illinois state legislature.

His plan is to bring combat troops home by March 2008, he said.

That impressed Adam Hoffman, 18, of Cedar Rapids, who said he trusts Obama to make good on that plan.

Obama urges voters to combat cynicism

Several Iowans at the event pointed out Obama is light on national political experience, with only two slim years in Washington. He spent seven years as a state senator in Illinois, representing a predominantly black community in southern Chicago. He led a failed bid for Congress in 2002, then won his U.S. Senate seat essentially unopposed.

None of the other top tier candidates, including New Mexico's governor Bill Richardson, who wants to become the first Hispanic president, Clinton, who is vying to become the first female president, and former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack, have lost a race, and most have beaten long odds.

Yet Obama said if someone asked who his most important rival is in this campaign, "I would say it's cynicism."

That was greeted with loud applause from the overflow crowd, some of whom clutched copies of Obama's "Dreams of My Father" and "The Audacity of Hope," both best-selling autobiographies.

"Making change in this country," Obama said, "is going to depend on your decision that the issues that we face now are so important, that the prospect of climate change is so urgent, that the need to free ourselves from foreign oil is so critical, that improving our school systems has to happen now and not later, that there's no reason we can't have health insurance for all Americans by the end of the next presidency. If you feel that same sense of urgency, then don't just wait for me to get it all done. I'm not going to be able to do this on my own."

He promises to meet Iowans in small groups

Some Iowans at the rally, including Jim McNeill, 46, owner of a Cedar Rapids floral supply company, said they'd never heard of Obama until the Illinois man's widely-heralded speech at the 2004 Democratic National Convention.

Figuring that was the case for other Iowans, Obama took time Saturday to tell some of his personal story. The product of a black father from Kenya and a white mother from Kansas, he grew up in Hawaii, where there's a strong Asian influence, he said. He is a Harvard Law School graduate, and is currently the sole African-American now holding office in the U.S. Senate.

When the crowd groaned when it was announced Obama's time was up, he promised many future visits — this was his fourth trip to Iowa as a senator — including some small group get-togethers.

"Let's face it, the novelty's going to wear off and you're going to be, 'Oh, it's Obama again. He's coming through town. Ballgame's on, I've got other things to do'."

Obama is scheduled to head to Iowa Falls this morning, then Ames, then Chicago.

The 2008 presidential election will be held on Nov. 4, 2008. The Iowa caucuses are tentatively scheduled for Monday, Jan. 14.

Obama Announces Presidential Bid In Illinois (AP)

AP, February 10, 2007

SPRINGFIELD, Ill. — U.S. Sen. Barack Obama embarked today on what he called "a great journey."

DOJ_NMG_0130529

His announcement here at the Old State Capitol that he is running for president is the start of a long weekend for the Chicago Democrat, who will travel to Iowa and Chicago before wrapping up Monday in New Hampshire.

"It was here, in Springfield, where north, south, east and west come together that I was reminded of the essential decency of the American people — where I came to believe that through this decency, we can build a more hopeful America," said Obama, who served eight years in the state Senate. "And that is why, in the shadow of the Old State Capitol, where Lincoln once called on a house divided to stand together, where common hopes and common dreams still live, I stand before you today to announce my candidacy for President of the United States of America."

The square in front of the Old State Capitol was crammed with screaming spectators, many holding blue and white Obama signs. They interrupted his speech throughout, chanting, "O-bam-a!"

"Look at all of you," Obama said as he began speaking. "Goodness."

While the building where Obama delivered his speech has deep ties to Abraham Lincoln, the scene around it bustled with the signs of a modern-day presidential campaign.

Satellite trucks lined the street, TV crews were there and cables snaked along a sidewalk where there is a statue of Lincoln.

It was excitement that Bethany and Tim Scates of Ridgway couldn't resist.

The married couple drove almost four hours from their home in southern Illinois to witness Obama's announcement.

"This is a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity for us," said Bethany Scates, who was bundled against the frigid weather along with thousands of others filing into the square on Saturday.

People sported homemade campaign buttons, including some from Dan Richards of Springfield, who made about 3,000 badges for the occasion. His asking price for the "Obama for President" buttons was $3 each or two for $5.

Tucker Copi, 17, is not old enough to vote yet, but went to the speech because he thinks Obama is "young and fresh."

"It's good that he doesn't have too much baggage in office. He's young, a great speaker and the right guy for the job," Copi said.

Obama's decision to make his presidential announcement in Illinois' capital city — instead of another location like Chicago, where he lives, or in Washington — earned him accolades.

It also continued to feed the comparisons between Obama and Lincoln, the nation's 16th president. Lincoln served eight years in the Illinois legislature and two years in Congress.

"It's going to be the greatest thing in Illinois since Abraham Lincoln ran for president," said state Senate President Emil Jones, a Chicago Democrat.

While Helen Bailie of Petersburg didn't plan to be at Obama's announcement, the self-described Republican with some Democrat views still is glad he's making the announcement in central Illinois, especially if Chicago was the other choice.

"Chicago is not Illinois," Bailie said.

The big city, she said, is just different from the rest of the state, which is made up of smaller locales. She sees Obama's choice to come to Springfield as a nod to that.

"He's being respectful about it," she said.

But Obama isn't forgetting about the country's third largest city and the money it can pump into a presidential campaign.

He has a rally planned for Sunday at the University of Illinois at Chicago and a fundraiser later that night at a downtown hotel.

Springfield resident Mack Alexander said he's glad about the attention Obama's announcement is bringing to his town.

"It'll put us on the map," Alexander said. "Some people say 'Springfield, where's Springfield?'"

Obama Declares He's Running For President (CNN)

CNN.com, February 10, 2007

SPRINGFIELD, Illinois (CNN) -- Sen. Barack Obama stood before a cheering crowd in his home state Saturday and announced he will seek the 2008 Democratic nomination for president.

DOJ_NMG_0130530

Invoking the memory of fellow Illinoisan and the 16th president of the United States, Abraham Lincoln, the first-term senator addressed thousands packed into the Springfield, Illinois, town square on a chilly day in America's heartland.

To chants of "Obama! Obama!," he told the crowd: "It was here, in Springfield, where North, South, East and West come together that I was reminded of the essential decency of the American people -- where I came to believe that through this decency, we can build a more hopeful America." (Watch as the crowd erupts when Obama officially declares his candidacy)

If the 45-year-old Obama were elected, he would become the nation's first African-American president.

"And that is why, in the shadow of the Old State Capitol, where Lincoln once called on a divided house to stand together, where common hopes and common dreams still live, I stand before you today to announce my candidacy for president of the United States of America."

Obama told the crowd he would tackle problems like poor schools, economic hardships and oil dependence, saying a "failure of leadership" is to blame for not meeting the nation's challenges. He also implored the crowd to demand that there be "universal health care in America by the end of the president's first term."

He called the Iraq war a "tragic mistake" and said, "It's time to admit that no amount of American lives can resolve the political disagreement that lies at the heart of someone else's civil war. That's why I have a plan that will bring our combat troops home by March of 2008.

"Letting the Iraqis know that we will not be there forever is our last, best hope to pressure the Sunni and Shia to come to the table and find peace," he said. (Watch the senator lay out his plan for Iraq)

He also lauded what he called the founding fathers' "genius" in creating a system of government that can be changed. He cited examples throughout history -- from the American Revolution to the Civil War to the Great Depression -- in which Americans have demanded, and effected, change.

"We've done this before. Each and every time, a new generation has risen up and done what's needed to be done. Today we are called once more, and it is time for our generation to answer that call," he said.

The absence of sound policy is not what's holding the country back, he said.

Rather, Obama said, "what's stopped us is the failure of leadership, the smallness of our politics -- the ease with which we're distracted by the petty and trivial, our chronic avoidance of tough decisions, our preference for scoring cheap political points instead of rolling up our sleeves and building a working consensus to tackle the big problems of America.'"Long enough ' to know better

The senator acknowledged that he hasn't been in Washington long, but said he is familiar enough with the city's political machinations to understand that change is in order.

"I recognize there is a certain presumptuousness in this -- a certain audacity -- to this announcement," Obama said. "I know that I haven't spent a lot of time learning the ways of Washington, but I've been there long enough to know that the ways of Washington must change. (Watch how name recognition may be Obama's best weapon)

He added, "People who love their country can change it."

Admitting the tactic is typical of aspiring candidates, Obama promised to overhaul a political system he says is dominated by lobbyists and special interest groups "who've turned our government into a game only they can afford to play."

"They write the checks and you get stuck with the bills, they get the access while you get to write a letter, they think they own this government, but we're here today to take it back. The time for that kind of politics is over," he said. "It's time to turn the page right here and right now."

Obama, the son of a black Kenyan father and white American mother, then invoked Lincoln again.

"He had his doubts. He had his defeats. He had his setbacks, but through his will and his words, he moved a nation and helped free a people."

Despite his brief tenure in the Senate, Obama has quickly gained popularity as he pondered his bid to break the Oval Office's color barrier.

According to a University of New Hampshire Survey Research Center conducted this month, Obama placed second, behind Sen. Hillary Clinton, among New Hampshire Democratic primary voters. Obama snared 21 percent of the vote in that popularity poll, trailing Clinton by 14 points. (Full story)

DOJ_NMG_0130531

Other Democrats seeking the office include Sen. Joe Biden of Delaware; Sen. Chris Dodd of Connecticut; former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina; Ohio Rep. Dennis Kucinich; New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson; Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack and Sen. Clinton of New York.

While speculation abounds over whether a black presidential candidate can be viable, Obama -- whose first name comes from the Swahili word for "one who is blessed" -- has not let the color of skin hinder his career.

He attended Harvard and Columbia universities and was the first black president of the Harvard Law Review. He entered politics in Illinois, where he practiced civil rights law and taught at the University of Chicago Law School.

His first foray into politics came in 1997, when he took his seat in the state Senate, where he served until 2005. He was sworn in as a U.S. senator in 2005.

Obama Formally Joins '08 Presidential Race (GAN)

By Judy Keen

Gannett, February 10, 2007

SPRINGFIELD, Ill. — With an appeal to his generation to "transform this nation," Illinois Sen. Barack Obama said Saturday that he's running for the Democratic presidential nomination.

Obama made his announcement outdoors in frigid temperatures to a cheering crowd at the Old State Capitol, where his hero Abraham Lincoln said in 1858 that "a house divided against itself cannot stand."

It was here during his tenure as a state senator, Obama said, "that I was reminded of the essential decency of the American people — where I came to believe that through this decency, we can build a more hopeful America."

Obama took the stage hatless to the U2 song City of Blinding Lights with his wife, Michelle, and daughters Malia, 8, and Sasha, 5. "I know it's a little chilly, but I'm fired up," he said.

Obama, 45, who has been a U.S. senator for two years and served seven years in the Illinois legislature, acknowledged his inexperience.

"I recognize there is a certain presumptuousness in this, a certain audacity to this announcement," he said. "I know I haven't spent a lot of time learning the ways of Washington. But I've been there long enough to know that the ways of Washington must change."

It is time, he said, to end "the failure of leadership, the smallness of our politics" and "take back" the government.

"The time for that politics is over. It is true. It's time to turn the page, right here and right now," he said.

Obama joins a growing roster of Democratic candidates that includes New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and John Edwards, the 2004 vice presidential nominee. Clinton made her first trip to New Hampshire in more than a decade Saturday. Obama will campaign in New Hampshire, host of the first primary election, on Monday.

From here, Obama heads to Iowa, where the nation's first caucuses will be held in less than a year. He is in third place there among Democratic voters, according to a Des Moines Register/American Research Group Poll taken last week (Jan. 29-Feb. 1). Clinton leads with 35%, followed by Edwards with 18%. Obama was the choice of 14%, up from 10% in December, the poll showed.

"Let us be the generation" to reshape the economy, end poverty, tackle the health care crisis and free America "from the tyranny of oil," Obama said. "Most of all, let's be the generation that never forgets what happened on that September day and confront the terrorists with everything we've got."

The campaign "can't only be about me," he said, but will succeed with "the power of millions of voices calling for change. By ourselves, this change will not happen. Divided, we are bound to fail."

The theme of Obama's speech reflected the title of his best-selling 2006 book, The Audacity of Hope. "It's humbling, but in my heart I know you didn't come here just for me," he said. "You came here because you believe in what this country can be.

"In the face of war, you believe there can be peace. In the face of despair, you believe there can be hope," he said. "In the face of a politics that's shut you out, that's told you to settle, that's divided us for too long, you believe we can be one people, reaching for what's possible, building that more perfect union."

DOJ_NMG_0130532

Obama, the Senate's only African-American, traced his personal history as a $13,000-a-year community organizer in Chicago's black neighborhoods, civil-rights lawyer and professor of constitutional law. It was among Chicago's poor, he said, "that I received the best education I ever had, and where I learned the meaning of my Christian faith."

Every time the nation has faced great challenges, Obama said, "A new generation has risen up and done what's needed to be done. Today we are called once more — and it is time for our generation to answer that call. For that is our unyielding faith — that in the face of impossible odds, people who love their country can change it."

That's what Lincoln understood, he said. "He had his doubts. He had his defeats. He had his skeptics, he had his setbacks. But through his will and his words, he moved a nation and helped free a people."

"All of us know what those challenges are today — a war with no end, a dependence on oil that threatens our future, schools where too many children aren't learning, and families struggling paycheck to paycheck despite working as hard as they can," he said.

The obstacles to solutions to those problems, he said, stem from "our chronic avoidance of tough decisions, our preference for scoring cheap political points instead of rolling up our sleeves and building a working consensus to tackle big problems."

Without naming President Bush, he said that for the last six years Americans have been told the nation's debts don't matter, rising health care costs and stagnant wages are an illusion, climate change is a hoax "and that tough talk and an ill-conceived war can replace diplomacy, and strategy, and foresight.

"And when all else fails, when Katrina happens, or the death toll in Iraq mounts, we've been told that our crises are somebody else's fault. We're distracted from our real failures, and told to blame the other party, or gay people, or immigrants," he said.

Obama has long opposed the war in Iraq and has proposed a phased withdrawal that would bring all U.S. troops home by March 31, 2008. "It's time to admit that no amount of American lives can resolve the political disagreement that lies at the heart of someone else's civil war," he said.

The temperatures were in the low teens as Obama spoke. That didn't matter to Lori Hammell, 45, a real estate agent from Springfield. "I said to my family, 'We live 20 minutes from history and we're going,' " she said as she gripped a rapidly cooling cup of coffee.

Her husband Howard, 51, a consultant and their 14-year-old twins, Ben and Emily, stood across the street from the historic capital. "I'm wearing two pairs of socks, four shirts, everything," she said.

Jeremy Smith, 29, a land surveyor from Springfield, thought about staying home and watching the announcement on TV, but decided he couldn't. "I'm here to watch history," he said.

Recalling A Natural (WP)

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

In law school, Barack drove an old mustard-yellow Toyota Tercel that was pockmarked with rust. It was the kind of car you would imagine a struggling community organizer driving. And while the car appeared to be on its last legs, it had a reliable engine that took him from Chicago to Cambridge without incident. Barack was attached to the car. Each time I saw the Tercel it reminded me of one of Barack's favorite songs growing up, William DeVaughn's "Be Thankful for What You Got," and I could hear him enthusiastically singing it:

Though you may not drive a great big Cadillac/ Gangsta whitewalls TV antennas in the back/ You may not have a car at all/ But remember , brothers and sisters/ You can still stand tall. . . .

One evening after dinner with a group of friends, those of us who rode with Barack came out of the restaurant to find his car missing. We immediately concluded that it had not been stolen, because who would want it other than Barack? After some scrutiny and the application of our finely honed analytical skills, we determined that the car had been towed. We used the handy phone number on the "No Parking" sign to find the impound lot. We arrived at the lot after midnight and found the car looking quite at home in a parking space bordering on the junkyard. A relieved Barack paid the fine -- $75, no joke for a poor law student -

DOJ_NMG_0130533

- and the car was recovered. We ribbed him that the fine was probably half the car's value, but he was content to have it back, flaws and all.

Barack's connection to the car symbolized in its own way his loyalty, his humility and, yes, his frugality. I've always believed that one of the appeals to him of joining the Harvard Law Review and becoming its first black president was that the position came with a parking space. I think the car finally gave out on him when he went back to Chicago after law school, but like any good community organizer, Barack had never given up on it.

-- Cassandra Butts, senior vice president for domestic policy at the Center for American Progress and Obama's Harvard Law School classmate

I was a basketball teammate of Barack's in high school. He was two grades ahead of me, the same class as my brother. I remember him as a charismatic guy who loved to play basketball. There were a number of courts on campus and if class schedules and time permitted, we would play pick-up ball when we could. He was a lefty with a great double pump shot in the lane. I remember him as a fierce competitor who could break intense situations (arguments over scores and fouls) with a flash of his smile and a voice of reason. Anyone who has ever played pick-up ball knows that such arguments are common. It's fair to say that Barack would never shy away from them but would somehow come out with his desired result. I did like to be on his team, even though he was not shy about shooting every time he touched the ball. I was a good rebounder. As a member of the varsity team, he was very encouraging to his fellow players and particularly to me. When we won the state tournament that year, all of us pick-up players felt justified, even though we were a little sweaty going to class.

-- Dan Hale was Obama's teammate on the championship 1979 basketball team at Punahou School in Hawaii. Hale is now the head coach of Punahou's Varsity I basketball team.

* * *

Barry (the name Barack used then) played a small forward, or "three man," in our system. I would define him as a "slasher," very good driving to the basket off the dribble. But with limited shooting range, although fairly accurate from 12 feet in. Very athletic, fast, good jumper. He had a long, lean body and was a very good defender. He was a starter who scored about 10 points and six or seven rebounds per game. We would put him on the best forward of the opposing team, regardless of their height. His athletic ability, jumping ability, etc., allowed him to guard bigger or smaller players. We pressed a lot and Barry was an integral part of the press with his quickness and speed.

Barry was the same in victory or defeat -- even-tempered. You could sense that the sport and competition were important, but once the season was over, it was time to focus again on academic issues.

-- Mike Zinn, a basketball coach at Occidental College in Los Angeles when Obama was a student there in 1980-81.

* * *

On St. Patrick's Day in Chicago there are two parades: the one downtown, for the tourists, and the one in the 19th Ward, in the southwest corner of the city. That's the home of the real St. Patrick's Day Parade. More than 200,000 people show up and in 2000, when he was running against Bobby Rush in the Democratic congressional primary, Barack Obama marched in that parade. I remember he passed out a surprising piece of literature touting the important civil rights litigation he handled. On St. Patrick's Day, you don't hand out campaign literature to solicit law business. Perhaps that wasn't his intention, but his brochures were littering the sidewalks of the entire parade route, from 103rd Street to 115th. He was either very brash or naive in the way he was introducing himself to paradegoers. Whether he meant it or not, it came off as an attempt to sell that litigation background to an Irish Catholic crowd on the South Side of Chicago.

-- Patrick O'Malley, a Republican who served as an Illinois state senator from 1993 to 2003

* * *

I'd like to say I knew in law school that Barack would be a presidential candidate. But I didn't. Like many of my colleagues, I knew he was different -- more mature, intellectually rigorous, politically adept and capable of demonstrating real leadership -- than your average law student.

And we all had our suspicions that he would do something interesting in politics, but few if any of us had the foresight to predict that he would become the sort of national figure he is today.

DOJ_NMG_0130534

Fast-forward to August 2004, sitting in one of the last rows, near the ceiling, of the Fleet Center in Boston, in the moments leading up to Barack's speech to the Democratic National Convention. The crowd was electric. We were surrounded by dozens of young volunteers, frantically waving Obama placards. He hadn't said a word yet, but the anticipation was palpable. By the time he was done, the crowd had exploded. My wife and I looked at each other, frankly amazed. This was the guy we ate doughnuts with at midnight?

And yet, in retrospect, one could see the seeds of his strengths today in his days at the Law Review: his ability to lead, to guide a group of politically diverse -- and divisive -- people toward a common goal, to wrestle intellectually with some of the most difficult and complex problems of the day, understand different perspectives and take a position based on principle but made all the more sound by his appreciation of alternative points of view.

-- Michael Froman, Obama's Harvard Law School classmate

* * *

I feel about Barack the way I do about my sons. He worked with us on Mayor Harold Washington's election, and on important issues such as job-training programs and getting asbestos out of the projects.

No matter what Barack did, he was thorough. When he brought plans to us, they were all laid out. He told us who we were supposed to see and who we were supposed to talk to. We had no expertise. We were just basically housewives and ministers. But when we had town hall meetings, Barack always stayed in the background. He would say: "It's not my community, you're the ones who have to be out there. The first thing people will say if they see me is, 'Who is he?' I have to empower you so that you will be able to express yourself well."

He kept us so energized. When we found a cause, he never said, "Well, you can't do that." He said, "I'll look into it, I'll bring you all the material you need." He has a way of making you want to follow him, and failing is not a part of anything you feel. Because if he said it was going to work, it was going to work.

It wasn't like he was bossing us around, though. If anything, we bossed him around. He was in Chicago without a family, so we made sure that he would eat right. He usually stuck to just sandwiches. We would go out to dinner with him sometimes and we would ask him, "Have you eaten today?" and he would laugh and say, "Yes, I did, I had breakfast."

He talked to everybody. He was right in the middle of us. The older people love a respectful young man, and he certainly was that. We hated to see him go. When he came to us and told us that he had decided to go to Harvard, it was very sad, but we knew he wanted to go.

Now when I look at him with his family, and I see him with those little girls, I think it's just fantastic. That's something I didn't know whether I'd live long enough to see, because when I first knew him he was just so into his work. We always had an idea that he was going into politics. One of the women in the organization said, "Well, when you make it to Washington. . . . " And he just started laughing and said, "Yes, of course you'll be at my inauguration."

-- Yvonne Lloyd, was on the board of the Developing Communities Project in Chicago when Obama became its director in 1985

* * *

The month after the 2004 Democratic convention, the Obamas visited my family in Martha's Vineyard for a much-needed vacation. Barack is an avid jogger, and one morning he went out for a run by himself in our secluded neighborhood. When he returned to the house an hour later, Michelle, our children and I were eating breakfast. As he entered the kitchen he had a look of complete disbelief on his face. "You aren't going to believe what happened to me," he said. "A guy took my picture as I jogged by!" He was completely mystified that somebody would be interested in a picture of him. Michelle just rolled her eyes and the girls ignored him completely. So now people take his picture all the time and he is still often surprised by the attention. As for the recent paparazzi shots of him on a beach, I called him the day I saw them and said teasingly, "I've seen you in a swimsuit and I don't remember you looking so buff." He was absolutely mortified.

-- Valerie Jarrett, former finance chair of Obama's Senate campaign

* * *

I was in my office in the church and he just walked up to the door. My church sits in the neighborhood, way off the main thoroughfare, so you had to be coming here to get here. And Barack just walked up and rang the bell. He said he was going through the neighborhood trying to talk to pastors about community organizing. My first impression was: Who is this skinny guy and what is he selling? But he wasn't selling anything. He just asked me what was important to me. I was really impressed with the fact that he spent more time listening to me and trying to hear what I thought was important in the neighborhood, rather than my experience of people coming in and telling me what I ought to do. He was more concerned about listening and hearing my ideas and asking: How can we get this done together?

DOJ_NMG_0130535

The biggest lasting thing that Barack brought to this neighborhood is that he got a bunch of African American Protestant pastors to sit down at a table with white Catholic priests to say all of us are in the community, let's find a way to work together and get it done.

-- The Rev. Alvin Love of Lilydale First Baptist Church in Chicago, who worked with Obama on the Developing Communities Project

Australian Leader: Al-Qaeda Wants Obama (AP)

AP, February 10, 2007

SYDNEY, Australia (AP) — Australia's conservative prime minister slammed Barack Obama on Sunday over his opposition to the Iraq war, a day after the first-term U.S. senator announced his intention to run for the White House in 2008.

Obama said Saturday at his campaign kickoff in Springfield, Ill., that one of the country's first priorities should be ending the war in Iraq. He has also introduced a bill in the Senate to prevent President Bush from increasing American troop levels in Iraq and to remove U.S. combat forces from the country by March 31, 2008.

Australian Prime Minister John Howard, a staunch Bush ally who has sent troops to Iraq and faces his own re-election bid later this year, said Obama's proposals would spell disaster for the Middle East.

"I think that will just encourage those who want to completely destabilize and destroy Iraq, and create chaos and a victory for the terrorists to hang on and hope for an Obama victory," Howard said on Nine Network television.

"If I were running al-Qaeda in Iraq, I would put a circle around March 2008 and be praying as many times as possible for a victory, not only for Obama but also for the Democrats."

Howard has defied widespread domestic opposition to the war, keeping about 1,400 Australian troops in and around Iraq, mostly in non-combat roles. He is seeking a fifth term later this year, and recent polls suggest voters are increasingly unhappy about his refusal to set a deadline for withdrawing Australian troops from the Middle East.

"You either rat on the ally or you stay with the ally," he said. "If it's all right for us to go, it's all right for the Americans and the British to go, and if everybody goes, Iraq will descend into total civil war and there'll be a lot of bloodshed."

Decoding The Debate Over The Blackness Of Barack Obama (NYT)

By Brent Staples

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

Those of us who were born black in the years just after World War II had front-row seats for the collapse of American apartheid. We started out confined to all-black communities and schools at a time when skin color was still destiny. But as segregation gave way, many of us were vaulted out of this sequestered world and into colleges, jobs and walks of life that had been closed to us pretty much since the nation's founding.

The rush of upward mobility produced the inevitable identity crisis, which led in turn to endless discussions about the meaning of blackness in a world where skin color was beginning to matter less and less.

At their best, these discussions, held in college dorm rooms at night, were probing, serious and heartfelt. At their worst, they turned into lectures by the race police — '60s-era ideologues who characterized blackness not as a matter of individual interpretation or choice, but as a narrow set of attitudes and experiences that were said to make up the authentic black identity.

Back then, black Americans who came from successful, suburban and upwardly mobile families were regularly dismissed as white or inauthentic. The authentic black experience, it was said at the time, was limited to the hard-core, impoverished upbringing that black people often chose to brag about, even when they had actually grown up with private prep schools in the lap of luxury.

DOJ_NMG_0130536

The race police ran rampant in the black community itself, but were rarely heard in the white world. But they have been parading up and down Main Street since Senator Barack Obama of Illinois — the son of a black African father and a white American mother — made clear that he intended to seek the Democratic presidential nomination.

The arguments being raised about Mr. Obama's blackness — or his lack of blackness — seem positively antique at a time when Americans are moving away from the view of ancestry as a central demographic fact and toward a view that dispenses with those traditional boundaries. Even so, the complaints about Mr. Obama provide an interesting opportunity to examine the passing of the old and the rise of the new.

The claim that the candidate isn't really black because his mother is white carries little weight under either system. It makes no sense at all to the young Americans who checked more than one box when identifying themselves by race in the last census. They subscribe to a fluid notion of race and seem perfectly willing to let people describe themselves racially any way they choose.

Nor does the charge make sense in the black community itself. That community has historically and eagerly embraced as black anyone and everyone with any African ancestry to speak of. That embrace often included interracial families, who lived in black communities long before they were accepted elsewhere. It included even blue-eyed, sandy-haired people like the civil rights leader Walter White, whose black ancestry was imperceptible to the naked eye.

The carpetbagging black Republican Alan Keyes opened up this racialist can of worms when he opposed Mr. Obama in the Illinois Senate race back in 2004. Badly outmatched and reaching for any brick he could find, Mr. Keyes blurted out that Mr. Obama was not black because he was not descended from slaves. The Daily News columnist Stanley Crouch later seemed to second that view, saying that Mr. Obama had not "lived the life of a black American."

The heritage of slavery is of course central to African-American life. But that is a fairly recent recognition for many of us who grew up black in the second half of the 20th century. Black families like mine dealt with the stigma and humiliation of slavery by simply suppressing it. My older uncles, for example, grew up in regular contact with relatives who had been born into slavery, but never mentioned it to me. Silence about slavery at home was matched by neglect of the topic at school. As a result, I was nearly 40 years old and writing a book about my family when I stumbled upon the news of my enslaved relatives in a newsletter from a small historical society.

The claim that Mr. Obama has not lived the typical African-American life is closer to the nub of what bothers his black traditionalist critics. Their complaint goes right back to the race police of the 1960s who decreed that the only authentic black experience was one that featured hardship and crushing encounters with racism, preferably with an urban American backdrop.

Mr. Obama missed out on that part while growing up an introspective child, longing for his missing father, in Hawaii and Indonesia. He stumbled onto the mysteries of race in his own good time and pursued them in his own way. His quest took him to an impoverished community on the South Side of Chicago, where he worked as an organizer in an infamous public housing project before discovering his vocation as a politician.

His critics are at least right when they describe his journey as a departure from the customary stereotype. But they are fundamentally wrong when they try to argue that the journey described in his affecting 1995 memoir, "Dreams From My Father," is somehow incompatible with blackness.

At bottom, the hue and cry over Barack Obama's identity stems from a failure by black traditionalists to recognize multiracial versions of themselves. Soon enough, perhaps by year's end, however, the Obama story, which seems so exotic to so many people now, will have found its place among all the other stories of the sprawling black diaspora.

Stop Him Before He Gets More Experience (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

AS the official Barack Obama rollout reaches its planned climax on "60 Minutes" tonight, we'll learn if he has the star power to upstage Anna Nicole Smith. But at least one rap against him can promptly be laid to rest: his lack of experience. If time in the United States Senate is what counts for presidential seasoning, maybe his two years' worth is already too much. Better he get out now, before there's another embarrassing nonvote on a nonbinding measure about what will soon be a four-year-old war.

DOJ_NMG_0130537

History is going to look back and laugh at last week's farce, with the Virginia Republican John Warner voting to kill a debate on his own anti-surge resolution and the West Virginia Democrat Robert Byrd seizing the occasion for an hourlong soliloquy on coal mining. As the Senate pleasured itself with parliamentary one-upmanship, the rate of American casualties in Iraq reached a new high.

The day after the resolution debacle, I spoke with Senator Obama about the war and about his candidacy. Since we talked by phone, I can't swear he was clean, but he was definitely articulate. He doesn't yet sound as completely scripted as his opponents — though some talking-point-itis is creeping in — and he isn't remotely defensive as he shrugs off the race contretemps du jour prompted by his White House run. Not that he's all sweetness and light. "If the criterion is how long you've been in Washington, then we should just go ahead and assign Joe Biden or Chris Dodd the nomination," he said. "What people are looking for is judgment."

What Mr. Obama did not have to say is that he had the judgment about Iraq that his rivals lacked. As an Illinois state senator with no access to intelligence reports, he recognized in October 2002 that administration claims of Saddam's "imminent and direct threat to the United States" were hype and foresaw that an American occupation of Iraq would be of "undetermined length, at undetermined cost, with undetermined consequences." Nor can he be pilloried as soft on terrorism by the Cheney-Lieberman axis of neo-McCarthyism. "I don't oppose all wars," he said in the same Chicago speech. "What I am opposed to is a dumb war."

Now that Mr. Obama has passed through Men's Vogue, among other stations of a best-selling author's cross of hype, he wants to move past the dumb phase of Obamamania. He has begun to realize "how difficult it is to break through the interest in me on the beach or that my wife's made me stop sneaking cigarettes." He doesn't expect to be elected the leader of the free world because he "can tell a good joke on Jay Leno." It is "an open question and a legitimate question," he says, whether he can channel his early boomlet into an electoral victory.

No one can answer that question at this absurdly early stage of an absurdly long presidential race. But Mr. Obama is well aware of the serious criticisms he engenders, including the charge that he is conciliatory to a fault. He argues that he is "not interested in just splitting the difference" when he habitually seeks a consensus on tough issues. "There are some times where we need to be less bipartisan," he says. "I'm not interested in cheap bipartisanship. We should have been less bipartisan in asking tough questions about entering into this Iraq war."

He has introduced his own end-the-war plan that goes beyond a split-the-difference condemnation of the current escalation. His bill sets a beginning (May) and an end (March 31, 2008) for the phased withdrawal of combat troops, along with certain caveats to allow American military flexibility as "a big, difficult, messy situation" plays out during the endgame. Unlike the more timid Senate war critics, including Hillary Clinton, Mr. Obama has no qualms about embracing a plan with what he unabashedly labels "a timeline."

But he has no messianic pretensions and is enough of a realist to own up to the fact that his proposal has no present chance of becoming law. Nor do any of the other end-the-war plans offered by Congressional Democrats — some overlapping his, some calling for a faster exit than his. If a nonbinding resolution expressing mild criticism of President Bush's policy can't even come to a vote in the Senate, legislation demanding actual action is a nonstarter. All the Democrats' parrying about troop caps, timelines, benchmarks, the cutting off of war funding, whatever, is academic except as an index to the postures being struck by the various presidential hopefuls as they compete for their party's base. There simply aren't 60 votes in the Senate to force the hand of a president who, in Mr. Obama's words, "is hellbent on doing what he's been doing for the last four years."

Unless, of course, Republicans join in. The real point of every Iraq proposal, Mr. Obama observes, is to crank up the political heat until "enough pressure builds within the Republican Party that they essentially revolt." He argues that last week's refusal to act on a nonbinding resolution revealed just how quickly that pressure is building. If the resolution didn't matter, he asks, "why were they going through so many hoops to avoid the vote?" He seconds Chuck Hagel's celebrated explosion before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, when "he pointed at folks" and demanded that all 100 senators be held accountable for their votes on what Senator Hagel called "the most divisive issue in this country since Vietnam."

That's why Mr. Obama is right when he says that the individual 2008 contests for the Senate and the House are at least as important as the presidential race when it comes to winding down the war: "Ultimately what's going to make the biggest difference is the American people, particularly in swing districts and in Republican districts, sending a message to their representatives: This is intolerable to us."

DOJ_NMG_0130538

That message was already sent by many American voters on Election Day in 2006. Rahm Emanuel, the Illinois congressman who, with his Senate counterpart, Chuck Schumer, oversaw that Democratic takeover, smells the blood of more Republicans in "marginal districts" in 2008. His party is now in the hunt for fresh candidates, including veterans of Iraq and Afghanistan. Such is the sense of impending doom among House Republicans that their leader, John Boehner, told CNN on Jan. 23 that he could render a verdict on whether the latest Bush Iraq strategy is "working" in a mere "60 to 90 days."

In the Senate, even the rumor of a tough opponent is proving enough to make some incumbents flip overnight from rubber-stamp support of the White House's war policy to criticism of the surge. Norm Coleman of Minnesota started running away from his own record the moment he saw the whites of Al Franken's eyes. Another endangered Republican up for re-election in 2008, John Sununu of New Hampshire, literally sprinted away from the press, The Washington Post reported, rather than field questions about his vote on the nonbinding resolution last week.

My own guess is that the Republican revolt will be hastened more by the harsh reality in Iraq than any pressure applied by Democratic maneuvers in Congress. Events are just moving too fast. While senators played their partisan games on Capitol Hill, they did so against the backdrop of chopper after chopper going down on the evening news. The juxtaposition made Washington's aura of unreality look obscene. Senator Warner looked like such a fool voting against his own principles ("No matter how strongly I feel about my resolution," he said, "I shall vote with my leader") that by week's end he abruptly released a letter asserting that he and six Republican colleagues did want a debate on an anti-surge resolution after all. (Of the seven signatories, five are up for re-election in 2008, Mr. Warner among them.)

What anyone in Congress with half a brain knows is that the surge was sabotaged before it began. The latest National Intelligence Estimate said as much when it posited that "even if violence is diminished," Iraq's "absence of unifying leaders" makes political reconciliation doubtful. Not enough capable Iraqi troops are showing up and, as Gen. Peter Pace told the Senate last week, not enough armored vehicles are available to protect the new American deployments. The State Department can't recruit enough civilian officials to manage the latest push to turn on Baghdad's electricity and is engaged in its own sectarian hostilities with the Pentagon. Revealingly enough, the surge's cheerleaders are already searching for post-Rumsfeld scapegoats. William Kristol attacked the new defense secretary, Robert Gates, for "letting the Joint Chiefs slow-walk the brigades in."

Washington's conventional wisdom has it that the worse things go in the war, the more voters will want to stick with the tried and true: Clinton, McCain, Giuliani. But as Mr. Obama reminds us, "Nobody had better Washington résumés than Dick Cheney or Donald Rumsfeld." In the wake of the catastrophe they and their enablers in both parties have made, the inexperienced should have a crack at inheriting the earth, especially if they're clean.

Clinton Cheered In N.H.; Some War Foes Skeptical (POL)

The Politico, February 11, 2007

BERLIN, N.H. – Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton returned to New Hampshire on Saturday for the first time in a decade, making two campaign stops that drew more than 2,500 supporters – but also skeptics who questioned her 2002 vote to authorize the invasion of Iraq.

Many came to see what they said might be history in the making, if the New York senator becomes the first female candidate to win her party's nomination for president.

Mothers brought daughters. Fathers towed along sons, who were urged to absorb the moment. Adult women tucked copies of Clinton's memoir under their arm, and yelled "You go, girl" from their seats.

"Come on, I'm a '60s girl," said Joan Chamberlain, the director of a local Berlin arts group. "She inspires me to hope again."

Clinton chose Berlin City Hall, the heart of an old paper mill town more than three hours north of Manchester, to debut her presidential campaign in the nation's first primary state. The setting seemed downright cozy compared to the packed bleachers of Concord High School's gymnasium, where she spoke later in the day to more than 2,000 people.

"There are people who think or say to others that it might be difficult to elect a woman president," Clinton told about 500 people in Berlin. "My response to that is we will never know until we try.

DOJ_NMG_0130539

"I am obviously very proud to be a woman," she continued. "But I am not asking you to vote for me because I am a woman. I am asking you to vote for me because I believe I am the most qualified person to hit the ground running in 2009."

Clinton delivered a similar 25-minute stump speech at both stops, promising to establish universal health care coverage, lower the cost of college tuition and bring U.S. troops home from Iraq.

She also repeated a line she started using two weeks ago in Davenport, Iowa, in response to critics about her stance on the Iraq war: "If I was president in 2003, this war never would have begun. If I am president in 2009, I will end it."

The line brought the crowd to its feet in Berlin and Concord but did not appease everyone.

Her top rivals for the Democratic nomination have gone further than Clinton. Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois has opposed the war from the start, and former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina has repeatedly called his war vote a mistake.

"Can you say the war authorization vote was a mistake?" Roger Tilton, a 46-year-old Nashua financial adviser, asked Clinton in Berlin. "I – and probably a lot of other Democratic primary voters – feel that until we hear you say that, we are not going to hear all these other great things you are saying."

Clinton responded with her usual talking points.

"Knowing what I know now, I would never have voted for it," she said. "I have taken responsibility for my vote. The mistakes were made by this president who misled this country and this Congress."

It was Clinton's shortest answer of the 90-minute town hall meeting – and it drew hearty applause – but it did not satisfy Tilton, who later said he wanted to hear her say that the vote was a mistake.

At both stops, Clinton paced slowly in front of the crowd, her hands clasped in front of her. Afterwards, she shook hands and signed autographs.

She fielded questions on the economy and the federal deficit, New Hampshire's status as the first primary state (she supports keeping it that way), and her position on egg donation for stem cell research ("I have to think about egg donation. I don't want to give a flip answer").

In Berlin, where a paper mill was shuttered in the last year, Clinton focused on job creation, highlighting her work assisting similar rural communities in upstate New York.

And Clinton occasionally dropped the name of the other Clinton – Bill, the former president who stayed home in Chappaqua, N.Y.

"It is great having a full-time political counselor," she said. "And he was pretty jealous this morning when I was leaving to come here."

She vowed to do one thing differently than her husband: "Not so many Dunkin' Donuts stops."

Clinton Campaigns In New Hampshire (WP)

By Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

BERLIN, N.H., Feb. 10 -- Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y) faced tough questions over her 2002 vote to authorize the war in Iraq during a town hall gathering Saturday in this small mill city tucked away in the far northeastern reaches of the state.

The response to Clinton's visit to New Hampshire, her first since 1996, was typified by Roger Tilton.

Tilton, a financial consultant from Nashua who had risen at 4 a.m. to make the drive north, asked Clinton to apologize for her vote. She refused -- reiterating her stance that "I have taken responsibility for my vote."

Tilton was unmoved. "Until she says it was a mistake, she won't get my vote," he said.

The exchange highlighted the challenge Clinton faces in her still-new candidacy for president. She must convince Democratic primary voters, who tend to be strongly opposed to the war in Iraq, that her pragmatic approach to ending the conflict is the right one.

Complicating that task is that her two main rivals for the Democratic nomination -- Sen. Barack Obama (Ill.) and former senator John Edwards (N.C.) -- have spoken out strongly against the war. In his formal announcement of his bid for president Saturday, Obama mentioned his proposal to withdraw U.S. combat troops from Iraq by March 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0130540

Despite the pointed questioning on Iraq, Clinton remained the poised front-runner that state and national polls make her out to be. She deftly answered questions on rising college tuition, immigration and the situation in Darfur. On health-care reform, which Clinton unsuccessfully tackled as first lady, she was unbowed about the need to expand coverage.

"I am going to be right back up on that horse of universal health-care coverage, and we are going to ride," she promised.

The crowds that gathered to hear Clinton were considerable. Hundreds packed the Berlin City Hall on a frigid morning for the chance to see and hear her; thousands more lined the wooden bleachers at Concord High School in the state capital later in the day.

For many it was their first in-person exposure to Clinton, and there was considerable curiosity about how she would handle the back-and-forth repartee on which New Hampshire voters pride themselves.

"I'd like to like her," said Nathaniel Gurien of North Conway. "Now that she is running, she has to show us what she's made of."

Much of Clinton's rhetoric was aimed doing just that -- she cast herself as an ordinary woman who has lived an extraordinary life. She described her upbringing in a "middle-class family in the middle of America in the middle of the last century" and asked the audience to help her avoid gaining weight while in the state and stopping too often at Dunkin' Donuts.

She invited two teenagers in the crowd to come to the stage to hand her a sticker supporting New Hampshire's bid to continue holding the first primary in the nation. She shook hands with both, drawing a roar from the crowd.

She headed off questions about whether a woman could be elected president in 2008 before they were even asked. "We'll never know until we try," Clinton said.

On issues, she was vague, choosing to focus on her accomplishments during her six years in the Senate rather than on specific proposals. Asked what she would do to reform the health-care system, Clinton was careful not to lay out a plan and instead turned the question back to the audience. On energy independence, Clinton advocated several modest measures but offered no broad proposal.

But it was Iraq and Clinton's position on the issue that served as the focal point of the day. Even those who were obvious supporters pressed for assurances that she believes the war was a mistake. One woman, who prefaced her remarks by telling Clinton, "You go, girl," asked her to better explain her 2002 vote.

Clinton said her vote did not give President Bush the authority to conduct a "preemptive war," and she cited comments she made to that effect at the time.

"He should not have been trusted with the authority we gave him," she said. Clinton also noted that she has advocated capping the number of troops in Iraq at the January 2007 level and supports proposals to cut off funding for Iraqi security forces if progress is not made in limiting the violence there.

Clinton refused to accept the view that the Senate's effort to pass a nonbinding resolution condemning the president's plan to send more U.S. troops to Iraq is a meaningless exercise.

"We are working to change the president's policy," she said. "Getting change in our system is difficult. I'm still in the arena. I'm still fighting."

Not everyone was convinced.

"She's very politically calculating and careful," said Chuck Henderson of North Conway. "I want someone who has courage and is fearless."

In New Hampshire, Clinton Owns Up To Her Vote On Iraq War (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

CONCORD, N.H., Feb. 10 — Campaigning in New Hampshire for the first time as a presidential candidate, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton came under criticism at two appearances on Saturday for voting in 2002 for military action in Iraq, and even refused one man's request that she say that her vote was a mistake.

While warmly received overall on this, her first visit to New Hampshire since 1996, Mrs. Clinton also sought to inoculate herself from the occasional Democratic antiwar anger. At a forum with 2,000 people in the state capital here, she first blamed

DOJ_NMG_0130541

President Bush for misusing her vote to go to war preemptively, and then obliquely questioned the Iraq positions of her two leading rivals for the Democratic nomination, Senator Barack Obama of Illinois and John Edwards, former senator of North Carolina.

While she did not refer to either by name, she said she could not solve Iraq by delivering a strong antiwar speech (like Mr. Obama gave on Saturday) or by calling for an immediate withdrawal of troops to end the war (as Mr. Edwards has done).

"It's very easy to go around saying, 'end the war now,' " she told about 2,000 people in a high school gymnasium here. "If we had a Democratic president, we would end the war."

"I know that there is a great deal of frustration and anger and outrage, but we can't just wave a magic wand and make things change," she said about Iraq at another point. "I wish we could. I wish I could give a speech and it would all be different, but that's not how our country works."

And in a nod to Mr. Edwards's fierce criticism of the war since leaving the Senate, she said, "I'm still in the arena — I'm still fighting to get those 60 votes," a reference to the number of voters that Senate Democrats are trying to muster for a nonbinding resolution opposing Mr. Bush's war plan.

Mrs. Clinton's 2002 vote poses political peril for her candidacy; she has not repudiated her vote, as Mr. Edwards has done of his, and she lacks the record of consistent criticism against the war of Mr. Obama, who was not in the Senate in 2002. During one forum early Saturday in the economically struggling city of Berlin in northern New Hampshire, Mrs. Clinton used tough language to blame President Bush and his advisers for Iraq, asserting that they came into power in 2001 with an "obsession" to oust Saddam Hussein and resolve the "unfinished business" of the first Persian Gulf war.

"From almost the first day they got into office," Mrs. Clinton said, "they were trying to figure out how to get rid of Saddam Hussein. I'm not a psychiatrist; I don't know all of the reasons behind their concern, some might say their obsession."

While she tried to keep the audience of 300 people in Berlin focused on Mr. Bush, she was forced at one point to account for her own history on Iraq. One audience member, Roger Tilton of Nashua, asked her "right here, right now, once and for all, without nuance" to call her 2002 vote "a mistake."

"Until we hear you say that, we're not going to hear all these other great things you've said," Mr. Tilton said.

In response, Mrs. Clinton repeated her standard talking points that she would never have cast it if she had had the intelligence information that she had now.

She also tailored some of her remarks to the economic struggles of Berlin, a city of about 8,000 people that has been shedding jobs from its pulp and paper mills.

"I think there is a great opportunity for using wood for a fuel of the future, just like it was a fuel of the past," Mrs. Clinton said. "If we can provide the right incentives, and we can give people the extra help we need by tax incentives and other ways of creating new jobs, we can begin to do this."

In Concord, Senator Clinton also criticized President Bush for not asking Americans to make sacrifices or commitments. When an audience member reminded her, sympathetically, that Mr. Bush had suggested that Americans go shopping after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, Mrs. Clinton picked up on that line.

"That's right, the only thing after 9/11 — 'go shopping,' " she said. "I was just appalled by that."

Although Mrs. Clinton did not bring former President Bill Clinton with her, she tried to turn his popularity in New Hampshire to her advantage at several points, though she joked she would not be following his political playbook entirely.

"Probably the only thing that I'll try to do differently from my husband is not so many Dunkin' Donuts stops," Mrs. Clinton said, evoking the lore of Mr. Clinton's snacking habits during the 1992 presidential campaign. "I honestly think Bill gained about 20 pounds in the New Hampshire primary, and I cannot afford that."

Clinton Draws Crowds In First NH Stops (NHUL)

By John DiStaso

New Hampshire Union Leader, February 11, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0130542

Hillary Clinton talked about issues ranging from health care to education and the environment yesterday, but the Democratic presidential front-runner was sent a clear message that a burning issue in the first-primary state is how to end American bloodshed in Iraq.

In her first visit to New Hampshire in more than a decade and her first as a presidential candidate, the New York senator was welcomed enthusiastically to town hall-style meetings attended by 350 in Berlin and more than 1,500 at the Concord High School gymnasium, where huge banners saying, "Let the Conversation Begin," were hung from the rafters.

Clinton called it a "nostalgic" visit, recalling the support her husband, former President Bill Clinton, received from state primary voters in 1992, when his second-place finish revived his struggling candidacy.

"We are forever in your debt," she said.

Most questioners Clinton faced yesterday were friendly, if not adoring. Only a handful pressed her hard and those who did focused on Iraq.

Roger Tilton of Nashua was in the Berlin audience calling on Clinton to recant her 2002 vote in favor of a resolution authorizing President George W. Bush to invade Iraq.

In Concord, third-year law student Monique Cesna first told Clinton, "You go, girl," but then questioned her "seeming contradiction" between the 2002 vote and her current strong call for an end to the war. David Tiffany of Hollis asked why she had not taken a stronger leadership role to stop funding for the war.

Clinton said that most congressmen who voted to authorize the invasion did not know that Bush "would so misuse the authority we gave him." She noted that when she voted in 2002, she said on the Senate floor "that it was not a vote for a pre-emptive war.

"Knowing what we know now," she said, "we would never have voted to give this President the authority at all because he should not have been trusted with the authority we gave him."

Tiffany asked her why, if she is truly opposed to the war, she has not used "the power of the purse" and advocated cutting funding for the military action. "You seem to want to have it both ways," he said.

Clinton answered that she and other Capitol Hill Democrats "are working to try to change the President's policy. I know there is a great deal of frustration and anger and outrage that we can't just wave a magic wand and make things change. I wish we could. I wish I could give a speech and it would all be different, but that's not the way the system works."

She said that in the Senate "you've got to get 60 votes to do anything," and any strong anti-war legislation would likely require two-thirds House and Senate super-majority majorities to override a presidential veto.

"I'm still fighting to try to get those 60 votes," she said, "It's easy to go around saying, 'End the war now."

Tiffany, a registered independent who said he almost always votes Democratic, said later, "I don't see her as one of the leaders in looking for a quick fix in Iraq. She is against using the power of the purse to bring the troops home, and I think our military families have done more than anyone has a right to ask them."

He said that while he has not decided who he will support, "I'd have to say that at this point I'd prefer almost any Democrat over her."

In Berlin, Tilton told Clinton he was not in the mood to listen to her other policy ideas.

"I want to know if right here, right now, once and for all and without nuance, you can say that war authorization was a mistake," Tilton said. "I, and I think a lot of other primary voters -- until we hear you say it, we're not going to hear all the other great things you are saying."

In response, Clinton repeated her assertion that "knowing what we know now," she would not have voted for the resolution.

Later, Tilton said was inclined to support either Democrat John Edwards or Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., who announced his candidacy Saturday.

In Concord, Clinton said that since Iran and Syria are apparently funding much of the insurgency in Iraq, the U.S. should have dialogues with those nations.

"I think one of the rules of warfare is to know your enemy and to know what makes them tick and how to influence them," she said. "It is not smart strategy to say that you will never talk to bad people."

DOJ_NMG_0130543

Clinton lost a battle as first lady to nationalize the U.S. health care system, but said yesterday, "I believe we can get to universal health care coverage. I know probably better than anyone that it's not going to be easy, but I believe that we're going to build a consensus in our country where it will be unstoppable."

Asked by Sarah Dustin, a long-time advocate for the underprivileged, what she would do to help single mothers give their children better lives, Clinton said that "everyone who works should get a level of income that lifts them out of poverty." She said that in addition to the earned income tax credit, "we need even new ways to help support particularly single parents."

Clinton criticized the Bush administration's "failed policies and misplaced priorities" on domestic spending, saying that one year of Bush tax cuts for those who earn $1 million or more cost $73 billion, or about $10 billion more than a low-income energy assistance program.

She voiced support for stem cell research and a woman's right to choose. She criticized Bush's "No Child Left Behind" law and called for more college aid and loan forgiveness programs for college students.

In Berlin, Clinton sought to focus on her plans to revive struggling small-town economies, universal health care and making college more affordable.

"I'm starting in the North Country for a simple reason -- I want to be a President who represents all of America," she said. "Our small towns, our rural areas, places that need some extra help and attention to be as prosperous in the 21st century as you were in 20th century.

Clinton entered the Concord gym to a loud, long ovation to the early 1990s song, "Right Here, Right Now," and was introduced by freshman U.S. Rep. Paul Hodes as a "great leader" with "fierce intelligence," "a passion for change" and an "enormous heart.

"I know New Hampshire will love her," said Hodes, who clarified later he was not endorsing any candidate for President.

Today, Clinton plans to attend house parties in Manchester and Nashua before a town hall meeting in Keene.

People Had Points To Make To Hillary (NHUL)

By Michael Cousineau

New Hampshire Union Leader, February 11, 2007

CONCORD – Dave Tiffany made it into the Concord High School gymnasium yesterday, wanting to make his point that now was the time to bring American troops home from Iraq.

He carried his feelings for all to see.

"Quit stalling. Bring our troops home," read his sign.

The Hollis man waved his message 45 minutes before New York Sen. Hillary Clinton was set to start a "conversation" with voters in the first presidential primary state.

Tiffany wanted to start the conversation early. The crowd cheered and applauded.

The senator's campaign staff, however, didn't like the message. A man wearing a "Hillary staff" badge took away his sign.

"They don't want it to be a real conversation," Tiffany said. "They want it to be a one-way conversation."

Tiffany was told he would be able to ask the Democratic presidential candidate a question during the town hall-style meeting and would get his sign back later that day.

The staffer who took away the sign said he couldn't talk to reporters. "I'm just the crowd guy."

Nearly two hours after losing his sign, Tiffany stood up in the bleachers and got the senator's attention.

"Welcome back to New Hampshire, where we believe in free and uncensored honest debate," he said.

"I do, too," she said.

He then pressed her on why she "won't use the power of the purse" to bring American troops home immediately.

Mrs. Clinton said she was working to change President Bush's policy.

"I know there is a great deal of frustration and anger and outrage that we can't just wave a magic wand and make things change," she said. "I wish we could. I wish I could give a speech and it would all be different, but that's not the way the system works."

DOJ_NMG_0130544

Signs and banners are commonplace in campaigns, but one receiving special attention at Concord High School had a non-partisan message.

English teacher Joanne McGlynn, an adviser to the Presidential Candidates Club, carried the 3-foot-long banner hoping to collect Clinton's signature to join those of two other potential White House hopefuls: Mark Warner of Virginia and Tom Vilsack of Iowa.

"A Required Stop on the Road to the White House?" the banner read. The question mark, she explained, was used because some candidates hadn't decided yet whether to run. Warner ultimately decided to take a pass for '08.

"We also didn't want to be too full of ourselves," she said.

Clinton staffers made the meeting happen, escorting the candidate to meet the students, pose for pictures and add her mark.

"Concord High -- Follow your dreams! Go Crimson Tide!" and signed it Hillary Rodham Clinton. She had to ask Sara Wilkinson, a Concord High junior, what the day's date was before adding that to the banner in black pen.

Meanwhile, Deb Crapo of Rye and Nancy Richards-Stower of Merrimack, early supporters of Bill Clinton's 1992 presidential run, held up their own homemade signs welcoming Sen. Clinton and gaining the attention of a gaggle of photographers.

Crapo said the pair had been hopeful Mrs. Clinton would run for President some day. "What Bill used to say to us is She's even smarter than me folks.'"

The only female presidential candidate experienced a microphone malfunction.

"Is there something I am supposed to switch?" she asked. "I'm not good at this technology stuff, guys."

When a staffer pulled up her jacket in the back to adjust her wireless microphone belt pack, she said, playfully: "Nobody look."

Then, she added, "I am wired, that's for sure."

After she reached full volume, Clinton called her first visit to New Hampshire since announcing for President "a really nostalgic trip for me in a lot of ways because in 1992, the people of New Hampshire were so kind to Bill and me."

Not quite four years later, Mrs. Clinton filed the required paperwork and $1,000 check at the State House in Concord for her husband's re-election bid. Now, she is the one that will have her name on the New Hampshire primary ballot.

"In fact, my husband is quite jealous that I'm here and he isn't," she said.

"I want to thank all the old friends who are here -- people who have been with us through good times and difficult ones," she said.

During the closing weeks of the 1992 primary campaign, Clinton faced allegations of having an extra-marital affair and draft dodging. He weathered the storm, finishing second here and declaring himself "The Comeback Kid."

She said she loved the personal campaigning required in New Hampshire, "but I'm going to make one change from my husband's campaign. And I want all of you to help me keep to this: not so many Dunkin Donuts stops."

For nearly an hour after her conversation, Clinton rewarded the crowd -- not with doughnuts but with plenty of autographs and photo opportunities.

Hillary Deflects Pressure To Repudiate Iraq Vote (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, February 11, 2007

BERLIN, N.H. (AP) -- Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton faced tough questions yesterday from New Hampshire voters skeptical about her stand on the Iraq war, including one who demanded that she repudiate her 2002 Senate vote to send U.S. troops into battle.

In her first presidential campaign visit to the early-primary state, the New York Democrat sought to focus on her plans to revive struggling small-town economies, universal health care and making college more affordable. But at a crowded town-hall meeting of about 350 people, Mrs. Clinton was peppered with questions about Iraq.

Her toughest questioner was Roger Tilton, 46, a financial adviser from Nashua, N.H. Mr. Tilton told Mrs. Clinton that unless she recanted her vote, he was not in the mood to listen to her other policy ideas.

DOJ_NMG_0130545

"I want to know if right here, right now, once and for all and without nuance, you can say that war authorization was a mistake," he said. "I, and I think a lot of other primary voters, until we hear you say it, we're not going to hear all the other great things you are saying."

In response, Mrs. Clinton repeated her assertion that "knowing what we know now, I would never have voted for it," and said voters would have to decide for themselves whether her position was acceptable.

"The mistakes were made by this president, who misled this country and this Congress," Mrs. Clinton said to loud applause.

Later, Mr. Tilton said he was not satisfied with her answer and was inclined to support either former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina or Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois. The latter announced his candidacy yesterday.

"I love what she says about health care; I love what she says about capping troop levels; I love what she says about the war now," he said, adding he would remain undecided until she offered a clearer answer.

Mrs. Clinton's refusal to recant her vote has been a sore point for many liberal Democratic activists, who tend to vote heavily in the party's primaries.

Mr. Edwards has said his vote was wrong. Mr. Obama was not in the Senate in 2002, but has opposed the war from the outset.

Mrs. Clinton, the front-runner for the Democratic nomination in 2008, has strongly criticized the Bush administration's conduct of the war, most recently in strong terms at a Democratic National Committee meeting. She promised to end the war if elected president. She also has proposed capping troop levels in Iraq.

For the most part, Mrs. Clinton was received warmly by the audience. People applauded enthusiastically several times throughout her 90-minute appearance.

Mrs. Clinton told the crowd she chose to open her visit in Berlin, a struggling paper-mill town in northern New Hampshire, because the area resembled upstate New York and faced many of the same economic challenges.

"I'm starting in the north country for a simple reason -- I want to be a president who represents all of America," she said. "Our small towns, our rural areas, places that need some extra help and attention to be as prosperous in the 21st century as you were in 20th century."

Hillary Faces Tough Questions On Iraq (NSDY)

By J. Jioni Palmer

Newsday, February 11, 2007

BERLIN, N.H. -- With the snowcapped, windswept peaks of the White Mountains nearby, Sen. Hillary Clinton talked to residents of this city in the northernmost reaches of the Granite State in her first New Hampshire appearance as a candidate for the White House.

She was generally well-received by the overflow crowds, although she had to face tough questions about her position on Iraq.

In this paper-mill town straddling the Androscoggin River, and later in Concord, the state capital, Clinton began what she called a "conversation" that sought to cast her as a political centrist with mainstream values who cares about Main Street.

"I grew up in a middle-class family, in the middle of country, in the middle of the last century," she said, describing her childhood in Illionis to the residents of the state where the first primary will take place.

Her upbringing, she said, instilled a conviction that any parent could provide a better future for their children through their own hard work and that the government would provide an infrastructure to make that happen.

"There was a basic bargain in America: If you did your part, if you worked hard and played by the rules, then you would be given the chance to go as far as your dreams and your ambition and your hard work would take you," Clinton said. "The other part of the bargain was that your government would be on your side ... I look now and it seems to me we are in danger of breaking that bargain because of the decisions being made by the leaders in our country."

DOJ_NMG_0130546

The sounds of Aerosmith and Bob Marley filled the auditorium at Berlin City Hall, and the crowd -- some of whom had driven more than four hours -- rustled with excitement as the time of Clinton's appearance drew near. Some clutched copies of her autobiography, others gripped former President Bill Clinton's. A few carried both.

A button vendor did a brisk business. At three for $10 or one for $5, buyers could choose from among a half-dozen, including one with a picture of Bill Clinton that said "First Gentleman."

Wearing a wireless microphone, Clinton walked around the two venues talking about the need to provide universal health care, pitching energy independence as national security issue and emphasizing her opposition to President George W. Bush's planned troop surge in Iraq.

Clinton fielded questions from the audience -- most dealing with topics she touched on during her opening remarks -- that were largely friendly. But she did take occasional heat for her stance on the war.

Perhaps to head off such queries, Clinton said that if she had been president in 2003 the United States never would have gone to war, and that should she be elected, if the troops are still there, she'd take them out.

That wasn't enough for some.

"I want to know if right here, right now, once and for all and without nuance, you can say that war authorization was a mistake," said Roger Tilton, 46, of Nashua. "I, and I think a lot of other primary voters -- until we hear you say it, we're not going to hear all the other great things you are saying."

Clinton responded that if she knew then what she knows now, "I never would have voted for the war."

But Tilton, a financial adviser, said he still wasn't satisfied.

"I can't listen to her until I hear her say it was a mistake," he said afterward. "You know what, there were a lot of the people in the Senate [23 members] at the time who didn't vote for it. There were a lot of people in the Senate at the time who voted for it and now say it was a mistake."

Spielberg For Hillary (NOVAK)

Robert Novak, February 10, 2007

Spielberg for Hillary

WASHINGTON – Democratic sources say Hollywood producer Steven Spielberg, previously listed as a probable supporter of Sen. Barack Obama for President, has agreed to host a major fund-raiser for Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton.

David Geffen and Jeffrey Katzenberg, Spielberg's colleagues at the DreamWorks film studio, are backing Obama. It was thought that Spielberg was too, but sources say Bill Clinton prevailed on him to help his wife. All three men were generous backers of the former President.

Geffen and Katzenberg are hosting a $2,300-a-ticket reception at the Beverly Hilton Hotel in Los Angeles Feb. 20. A pledge to raise or donate $46,000 is necessary to attend a private dinner with Obama at Geffen's Malibu residence that night.

GOP ETHICS

House Minority Leader John Boehner, addressing Tuesday's closed-door conference of Republican House members, gave a clean bill of health to two California colleagues under federal investigation: Reps. Jerry Lewis and Gary Miller.

If he were not convinced of Lewis's integrity, Boehner told the conference, he would not have approved his continuation as top Republican on the Appropriations Committee. Lewis is being investigated for helping a lobbyist direct millions of dollars in earmarks for clients.

Lewis did not address the conference, but Miller pleaded innocent of wrongdoing in California land transactions. That won Miller a standing ovation, but a few colleagues noted the resemblance to a similar speech to the conference last year by then Rep. Bob Ney of Ohio. On Jan. 19, Ney was sentenced to 30 months in federal prison after pleading guilty to conspiracy in the Jack Abramoff influence-peddling scandal.

BUCKS FOR MCCAIN

Sen. John McCain on Wednesday personally appealed to an invitation-only meeting of some 50 possible supporters to sell $2,300 tickets for a March 21 reception at Washington's Mandarin Hotel that he considers vital to his campaign for the Republican Presidential nomination.

DOJ_NMG_0130547

McCain said the money raised for the dinner would be credited to the March 31 Federal Election Commission report on contributions, which he called "the invisible primary" to show fund-raising prowess.

Wednesday's meeting, held in a non-government office building near the Capitol, was attended by both longtime McCain backers and new allies who supported George W. Bush against McCain in 2000.

RETIRING REPUBLICANS

The National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) staff is contacting GOP House members to get an idea of how many intend to retire and give the Democrats soft targets in 2008.

The NRCC survey follows a report in the Roll Call newspaper that the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) is monitoring more than two dozen House Republicans who are candidates for retirement.

No House Republican has yet announced retirement, and the only GOP senator so far to call it quits is Wayne Allard of Colorado. However, more retirements from both houses are expected as Republicans chafe under life in the minority. No Democratic resignations have been announced, and none are expected from the House. All Democratic senators up for re-election in 2008 have announced they are running again, with the exception of Sen. Tom Harkin of Iowa (who says he has not yet decided).

HELSINKI PURGE

Rep. Chris Smith of New Jersey and Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas, Republican members of the Helsinki Commission monitoring human rights, have written protests to illegal firing of four Republican commission staffers after the Democrats won control of Congress.

The commission's new chairman, Democratic Rep. Alcee Hastings of Florida, began the firings under oversight of Spencer Oliver, a longtime Democratic operative famed as a victim of the Watergate burglary. Oliver, secretary general of an international body dealing with human rights, was assisting the U.S. commission as an observer. Under the commission's founding laws, three of the committee's four lawmakers must concur in any staff firing.

Hastings is expected to change the commission's focus away from religious freedom in Belarus and European sex trafficking and concentrate on alleged U.S. abuses at Guantanamo.

Robert D. Novak is a syndicated columnist and a commentator for the FOX network.

Campaign Bloggers Caught In Web (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2007

THE 2008 PRESIDENTIAL campaign has its first official political-religious-technological controversy. Last week, Bill Donohue, president of the Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights, issued a broadside against Amanda Marcotte and Melissa McEwan, two relatively obscure bloggers recently hired by former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, calling them "anti-Catholic, vulgar, trash-talking bigots." The candidate's response — and the blogosphere's — show how both entities are changing each other.

Donohue's first attack landed on Tuesday. He dug up about 10 instances from the last year in which Marcotte and McEwan bluntly (and occasionally in hyperbolically profane style) criticized the Catholic Church, rebuked conservative Christians or simply used some of the seven words that one isn't allowed to say on TV. For Edwards, Donohue's call for Marcotte and McEwan to be ousted was a double-edged sword. If he refused, he'd invite the wrath of conservative Christians; if he complied, he'd alienate the liberal activists who are key to his campaign. The latter responded by highlighting the words and deeds of some of the people hired by Republican candidates, such as Patrick Hynes, a sharp-tongued conservative blogger who has been a consultant with Arizona Sen. John McCain's campaign.

Edwards — possibly distracted by the universal healthcare proposal he unveiled Monday — let the issue percolate for a couple of days before letting the two women off with a warning: "That kind of intolerant language will not be permitted from anyone on my campaign." The move mollified left-leaning bloggers but not Donohue, who pledged to escalate his publicity blitz against Edwards. At week's end, the battle for control of Edwards' agenda continued, healthcare policy battling blogger controversy for media attention.

DOJ_NMG_0130548

The conflict over the bloggers is likely to be just the opening salvo in a wave of guilt-by-association attacks. By trying to gin up support from the blogosphere, candidates are bringing lots of folks into the campaign who've left long trails of (often intemperate) commentary online. So not only do candidates have to worry about having their own gaffes preserved and promoted on YouTube, they may have to distance themselves from what their employees said before coming onboard. Expect this kind of nuttiness to continue until voters show that they care more about a candidate's thoughts than those of the hired hands.

Searching For Mr. Right (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

HAVING lost Congress and faith, at times, in President Bush, social conservatives are now holding out for a hero in the 2008 Republican presidential campaign.

But who? And what kind of hero?

Is it the hero of 9/11, Rudolph W. Giuliani, whose support of abortion rights is anything but heroic to social conservatives? Is it the hero against gay marriage in Massachusetts, Mitt Romney, who nevertheless once championed gay rights? Or is it a hero of wartime, John McCain, who has also betrayed them on issues like federal judicial appointments?

Eleven months before the first presidential caucuses, social conservatives are in no mood to compromise; many don't want to settle for Senator McCain, nor can they abide Mr. Giuliani. They want a true believer, reliably opposed to abortion rights, gay rights and gun control, tough on immigration and a supporter of conservative judicial appointments.

But are any second-tier contenders strong enough to carry the mantle of their idol, Ronald Reagan — and also, strong enough to win?

Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas strongly opposes abortion rights and gay marriage; former Gov. Mike Huckabee of Arkansas is a Southern Baptist minister who talks about religion and civic life; and Representative Duncan Hunter appears to have solid conservative credentials. Yet all three are largely unknown beyond their states and Capitol Hill. The same goes for Representative Tom Tancredo of Colorado, who appears to be a one-issue candidate, focused on fighting illegal immigration.

Gone is the sense that social conservatives are a unified bloc. The movement that rose with the candidacy of Ronald Reagan in the 1970s is now fractured over both its messengers and its message. The issues that social conservatives care about most are often overshadowed by Iraq and terrorism, energy and taxes. And if their vote splinters in 2008, their political potency could be sapped.

If these voters split into factions for different Republican candidates, either Mr. Giuliani or Mr. McCain could slip through the middle (while wriggling around the so-called values issues), uniting enough fiscal conservatives and national security conservatives — and moderate and liberal Republicans — to win the party's nomination next year. And Mr. Giuliani, for one, is starting to shade his support for abortion rights in hopes of assuaging opponents.

"A fractured movement is Rudy Giuliani's dream," said Paul M. Weyrich, chairman of the Free Congress Foundation, a conservative research group. "What I hear constantly is, 'We've got to beat Hillary; we can't allow her to be president.'

"What I'm hearing is, 'We hate him, we don't agree with his positions, we feel that his personal life is a travesty — but on the other hand, he probably could beat Hillary.' I hear this over and over again. I keep telling people, don't fall for that."

Yet Mr. Weyrich, a savvy political strategist, knows that if social conservatives are torn on Election Day, many may stay home, and the consequence might be another Clinton presidency. So a moment of political reckoning for social conservatives seems inevitable. Will they give ground on their issues in order to elect a Republican?

"I don't see social conservatives making compromises to win in 2008," said the Rev. Donald Wildmon, founder of the American Family Association, a conservative Christian broadcaster and advocacy group. "Social conservatives don't blindly follow the Pied Piper anymore. We've been disappointed and taken for granted by Republicans at times. I don't think there's any appetite for compromising core values."

Nor should there be, according to Governor Huckabee. In recent interviews, he has artfully tied his religious devotion to broader social concerns. For instance, on NPR last week, he said that reclaiming a nation for Christ was not a matter of proselytizing.

DOJ_NMG_0130549

"It means that we would reflect what he reflected, and that is compassion and love," Mr. Huckabee said.

Yet he was also critical of some opponents of abortion rights, suggesting that they focus too much on embryos. "I want to be concerned about making sure every child has music and art education," he said. "There are a lot of things that, to me, are a part of my being pro-life."

Senator Brownback, meanwhile, has told some allies that he will not allow Iraq or economic issues to distract him from talking about social issues. Indeed, in a speech last month, he listed reviving faith among Americans and opposing same-sex marriage as examples of his priorities.

Mr. Romney, the former governor of Massachusetts, has tried to explain his conversion on abortion rights, from support to opposition, with a made-for-television story: As he listened to a Harvard researcher discussing stem-cell science, and the destruction of embryos, he saw the antiabortion cause in a new light.

At some recent conferences for social conservatives, Mr. Romney has used a line that some conservatives find credible: "On abortion I was not always a Ronald Reagan conservative. Neither was Ronald Reagan."

This sort of language also resonates with other conservative wings of the party, like some members of the antitax faction who do not want to get bogged down over whether Mr. Romney is now sufficiently sincere in his opposition to abortion.

"Romney has a one-way, one-time migration on abortion to explain," said Grover Norquist, the head of Americans for Tax Reform. "Senator McCain, meanwhile, was a Reaganite on taxes and then drifted for six years and now wants to come back. Same on guns. Same on judges. He was a two-way migration on several issues, and a lot of conservatives will have a hard time with that."

Yet on a fundamental matter like the life of a fetus, some social conservatives say, the turnabout by Mr. Romney is worthy of skepticism.

"I know people can change, but sometimes when people want to be president, they speak of a change that has not occurred," Mr. Wildmon said. "I like to go with a person whose words match their actions."

Mr. McCain's campaign is counting on a sharp split among social conservatives in the 2008 primary. Mr. Brownback and Mr. Huckabee, his strategists believe, lack the money and organizational strength to mount serious bids that would galvanize social conservatives. Meanwhile, Mr. McCain and Mr. Giuliani are portraying themselves as conservatives on taxes and national security.

"If someone can make a credible case to the social conservatives and have a position on Iraq that appeals to the broad majority of Republicans, you may see an election where the social issues, the moral values issues, are not as central as they were in the past," said Matthew Dallek, the author of "The Right Moment: Ronald Reagan's First Victory and the Decisive Turning Point in American Politics."

Mr. Dallek notes that Mr. Reagan, as governor of California in the 1960s, took steps to support abortion rights and raise taxes. Yet he became a unifying figure for social conservatives because of his staunch anti-Communist credentials, and because he came to embrace their positions opposing abortion rights as well as tax cuts.

"Social conservatives may come to see one of the leading candidates as solid enough on their values issues, while keeping the national focus on the major issue of the day — defeating Communism for Reagan, and fixing Iraq and winning the war on terror for a McCain or a Romney," Mr. Dallek said.

Yet this outcome seems an unlikely prospect to some political analysts.

In a survey of voters in the 2006 elections, the Pew Forum found that so-called values issues like opposition to same-sex marriage and abortion rights mattered the most to white evangelical Protestant voters. Forty-five percent of them ranked values issues highest; 17 percent chose the war in Iraq; and 12 percent cited illegal immigration.

"White evangelical Protestants are not only still a real component of the Republican Party, but they are also concentrated in key primary states like South Carolina, Florida and Virginia," said John Green, a senior fellow in religion and American politics at the Pew Forum. "They are not going away, and it's too soon to say how fractured they will be."

The Limits Of Sunniness (WP)

By George F. Will

DOJ_NMG_0130550

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

In this winter of their discontents, nostalgia for Ronald Reagan has become for many conservatives a substitute for thinking. This mental paralysis -- gratitude decaying into idolatry -- is sterile: Neither the man nor his moment will recur. Conservatives should face the fact that Reaganism cannot define conservatism.

That is one lesson of John Patrick Diggins's new book, " Ronald Reagan: Fate, Freedom, and the Making of History." Diggins, a historian at the City University of New York, treats Reagan respectfully as an important subject in American intellectual history. The 1980s, he says, thoroughly joined politics to political theory. But he notes that Reagan's theory was radically unlike that of Edmund Burke, the founder of modern conservatism, and very like that of Burke's nemesis, Thomas Paine. Burke believed that the past is prescriptive because tradition is a repository of moral wisdom. Reagan frequently quoted Paine's preposterous cry that "we have it in our power to begin the world over again."

Diggins's thesis is that the 1980s were America's "Emersonian moment" because Reagan, a "political romantic" from the Midwest and West, echoed New England's Ralph Waldo Emerson. "Emerson was right," Reagan said several times of the man who wrote, "No law can be sacred to me but that of my nature." Hence Reagan's unique, and perhaps oxymoronic, doctrine -- conservatism without anxieties. Reagan's preternatural serenity derived from his conception of the supernatural.

Diggins says Reagan imbibed his mother's form of Christianity, a strand of 19th-century Unitarianism from which Reagan took a foundational belief that he expressed in a 1951 letter: "God couldn't create evil so the desires he planted in us are good." This logic -- God is good, therefore so are God-given desires -- leads to the Emersonian faith that we please God by pleasing ourselves. Therefore there is no need for the people to discipline their desires. So, no leader needs to suggest that the public has shortcomings and should engage in critical self-examination.

Diggins thinks that Reagan's religion "enables us to forget religion" because it banishes the idea of "a God of judgment and punishment." Reagan's popularity was largely the result of "his blaming government for problems that are inherent in democracy itself." To Reagan, the idea of problems inherent in democracy was unintelligible because it implied that there were inherent problems with the demos -- the people. There was nothing -- nothing-- in Reagan's thinking akin to Lincoln's melancholy fatalism, his belief (see his Second Inaugural) that the failings of the people on both sides of the Civil War were the reasons why "the war came."

As Diggins says, Reagan's "theory of government has little reference to the principles of the American founding." To the Founders, and especially to the wisest of them, James Madison, government's principal function is to resist, modulate and even frustrate the public's unruly passions, which arise from desires.

"The true conservatives, the founders," Diggins rightly says, constructed a government full of blocking mechanisms -- separations of powers, a bicameral legislature, and other checks and balances -- in order "to check the demands of the people." Madison's Constitution responds to the problem of human nature. "Reagan," says Diggins, "let human nature off the hook."

"An unmentionable irony," writes Diggins, is that big-government conservatism is an inevitable result of Reaganism. "Under Reagan, Americans could live off government and hate it at the same time. Americans blamed government for their dependence upon it." Unless people have a bad conscience about demanding big government -- a dispenser of unending entitlements -- they will get ever larger government. But how can people have a bad conscience after being told (in Reagan's First Inaugural) that they are all heroes? And after being assured that all their desires, which inevitably include desires for government-supplied entitlements, are good?

Similarly, Reagan said that the people never start wars, only governments do. But the Balkans reached a bloody boil because of the absence of effective government. Which describes Iraq today.

Because of Reagan's role in the dissolution of the Soviet Union, Diggins ranks him among the "three great liberators in American history" -- the others being Lincoln and Franklin Roosevelt -- and among America's three or four greatest presidents. But, says Diggins, an Emersonian president who tells us our desires are necessarily good leaves much to be desired.

If the defining doctrine of the Republican Party is limited government, the party must move up from nostalgia and leaven its reverence for Reagan with respect for Madison. As Diggins says, Reaganism tells people comforting and flattering things that they want to hear; the Madisonian persuasion tells them sobering truths that they need to know.

DOJ_NMG_0130551

McCain Taps Cash He Sought To Limit (WP)

By John Solomon

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

Just about a year and a half ago, Sen. John McCain went to court to try to curtail the influence of a group to which A. Jerrold Perenchio gave $9 million, saying it was trying to "evade and violate" new campaign laws with voter ads ahead of the midterm elections.

As McCain launches his own presidential campaign, however, he is counting on Perenchio, the founder of the Univision Spanish-language media empire, to raise millions of dollars as co-chairman of the Arizona Republican's national finance committee.

In his early efforts to secure the support of the Republican establishment he has frequently bucked, McCain has embraced some of the same political-money figures, forces and tactics he pilloried during a 15-year crusade to reduce the influence of big donors, fundraisers and lobbyists in elections. That includes enlisting the support of Washington lobbyists as well as key players in the fundraising machine that helped President Bush defeat McCain in the 2000 Republican primaries.

After enduring his own brush with scandal in the early 1990s, when he and four Senate colleagues pressured regulators on behalf of Charles Keating, chairman of a failed savings and loan association, while collecting donations and favors from him, McCain became a leader in the effort to eliminate "soft money" in elections -- large donations from corporations, labor unions and wealthy individuals. In 2002, McCain joined forces with Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) to finally push through legislation ending soft money and placing strict limits on donations.

But now the contrast between McCain the presidential candidate and McCain the reformer can be jarring. McCain's campaign says that he is still studying whether to forgo the public financing and spending limits he has long supported, but that he will not be handicapped by restrictions his competitors will not face in 2008.

McCain the reformer worked unsuccessfully through Congress and the courts to try to stop nonprofit political groups known as 527s from using unlimited donations to run political ads and fund other activities aimed at influencing voters in the run-up to elections. He reintroduced legislation last week to end 527 donations, but there appears to be little appetite in Congress to pass it.

McCain the candidate now expects Republicans to use the same big-money 527 groups in the 2008 elections to beat Democrats, if the groups remain legal. "The senator believes that both parties should be subjected to an even playing field. If Democratic organizations are allowed to take advantage of 527s, Republican organizations will, too," said Mark Salter, a senior McCain adviser. The senator declined to be interviewed.

McCain the reformer relentlessly argued that six- and seven-figure "soft money" checks that corporations, wealthy individuals and unions were giving to political parties to influence elections were corrupting American politics. "The voices of average Americans have been drowned out by the deafening racket of campaign cash," he warned just a few years ago.

McCain the candidate has enlisted some of the same GOP fundraising giants who created and flourished in the soft-money system, including Bush's fundraising "Pioneers" and "Rangers," who earned their designations by raising at least $100,000 or $200,000 for his campaigns.

At least six of McCain's first eight national finance co-chairmen have given or raised large donations for political parties or 527 groups, campaign and IRS records show. In all, the finance co-chairs have given at least $13.5 million in soft money and 527 donations since the 1998 election.

They include former Bush moneymen such as lobbyist Thomas G. Loeffler and financier Donald Bren, whose personal and corporate donations total in the hundreds of thousands of dollars each in recent elections.

In key states, McCain has enlisted the likes of New York financier Henry Kravis, one of the GOP's largest donors over the past two decades, and Texas energy executive Robert A. Mosbacher, the architect of the Republicans' "Team 100" fundraising machine that helped make soft money a staple of politics by raising $20 million in large donations to help Bush's father win the presidency in 1988.

DOJ_NMG_0130552

The big moneymen gravitating to McCain are politically pragmatic. They may not always agree with him, but they say they admire the Arizona senator for his work on campaign finance reform, his Vietnam War record, his support of Bush on Iraq and his recent campaigning for GOP candidates.

"He did things for our country that very few people I know would have had the courage to do," said Brian Ballard, a Florida lobbyist and longtime fundraiser for former Florida governor Jeb Bush who signed on this month to raise money for McCain.

Ballard said most of the big-money players he knows are not fazed by McCain's attacks on the political-money and lobbying systems, calling it more of an issue for consultants who make their living off big donations.

"I myself don't mind him calling out lobbyists when they've done something bad," Ballard said.

Lobbyists have been a favorite target of McCain the reformer, who proposed legislation requiring so-called grass-roots groups that organize average citizens into lobbying forces to disclose their financial backers.

But McCain the candidate switched positions and last month voted against that disclosure requirement after influential GOP groups such as Focus on the Family and National Right to Life strongly opposed the idea. McCain also hired as his campaign manager one of the grass-roots-lobbying industry's key consultants, Bush strategist Terry Nelson.

"When the senator heard from legitimate public-interest organizations in January of last year that a provision in the legislation would unfairly penalize them for Jack Abramoff's behavior, he agreed and withdrew his support for the provision at that time," Salter explained, referring to the lobbyist in prison for fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy.

In December, Sen. Trent Lott (Miss.), a darling of GOP conservatives and lobbyists, acted as a surrogate for McCain at a fundraising meeting with a group of lobbyists at a Capitol Hill hotel. McCain's political action committee has collected donations -- capped at $5,000 -- from several big-name lobbyists, including Loeffler and fellow Bush fundraiser Wayne Berman, whose blue-chip clients frequently have issues pending before Congress and the White House.

"Both Wayne Berman and Tom Loeffler are longtime supporters of the Republican Party, President Bush and Senator McCain," Salter said. "Senator McCain is pleased to have their support."

Ed Rogers, one of Washington's most influential GOP lobbyists and strategists, said the embrace of McCain is not surprising. "Lobbyists are the ultimate pragmatists, and they deal with the world as is," said Rogers, who last year gave $5,000 to McCain's political action committee, though he says he has not yet endorsed a candidate.

Perenchio, now a member of McCain's finance committee, funneled more than $1.4 million in soft money to Republican causes in the 1998, 2000 and 2002 election campaigns, often in amounts McCain used to criticize. For one GOP fundraising dinner in the spring of 2001, for example, he donated $250,000. Perenchio has also been a major donor to the 527 groups formed to exploit a loophole in the legislation sponsored by McCain and Feingold.

Taking their name from a little-known provision of the IRS tax code, the groups began raising large donations -- some in the millions of dollars -- and running ads and funding other activities designed to influence the 2004 presidential election. Federal election regulators have refused to rein in the groups and their donations in the past two elections.

Perenchio gave $4 million to a pro-Republican 527 group called Progress for America, which helped Bush in the 2004 campaign. In the 2006 congressional races, Perenchio gave $5 million more to the same group.

In the summer of 2005, McCain's allies in the reform movement went to court seeking to force the Federal Election Commission to regulate the 527 groups and make them abide by the same donation limits as other political committees.

In a friend-of-the-court brief, McCain and Feingold specifically cited Progress for America as an example of what was wrong with 527 groups. The court filing cited one of the group's pro-Bush commercials -- which starred a 16-year-old whose mother was killed in the Sept. 11 attacks -- to illustrate the impact large donations had on the election. Perenchio was not mentioned.

"The deployment of section 527 groups as the new vehicle for using soft money to conduct political activities to influence federal elections is simply the latest chapter in a long history of efforts to evade and violate the federal campaign finance laws," the McCain court filing stated. "Sadly, it is another chapter in the FEC's failure to enforce the campaign finance laws."

Perenchio declined to be interviewed. Salter said Perenchio's support of McCain "pre-dates the existence of 527s. Perenchio served on Senator McCain's fundraising committee in 2000, and the senator is pleased to have his continued support."

DOJ_NMG_0130553

That support has come in a number of ways. Tax records show that Perenchio's Chartwell Foundation donated $100,000 on March 1, 2002, to the Reform Institute, a nonprofit foundation of which McCain was co-chairman and which was advocating the end of big political donations.

At the time, McCain was chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee, which oversees the broadcast industry, and Univision had numerous issues pending before the government. Cablevision, another broadcaster, also donated $200,000 to the McCain foundation around the same time the senator took action in Congress favorable to that company.

McCain's allies in the campaign finance reform movement seem resigned to the fact that he will not abide by many of the principles he advocated for a decade as a reformer, including public financing and its associated spending and fundraising limits.

"Certainly we are disappointed that he has decided not to take the lead in fixing the presidential-financing system he is competing in," said Mary Boyle of Common Cause, the ethics watchdog that cheered McCain's reform efforts for years. "But it is understandable he is opting out.

"It is apparent to us that to run a competitive presidential campaign inside a system that is still broken, that is what he has to do," she said.

A Conversation With Sen. John McCain (STPETE)

By Bill Adair

St. Petersburg Times, February 11, 2007

Q: You've said the Pentagon mismanaged the war from the start, didn't have enough boots on the ground. What makes you think they can get it right now?

A: We've got a new strategy and new leaders and finally a recognition that the previous strategy was failed.

Q: You've been especially critical of Secretary Rumsfeld and Vice President Cheney and how they have handled the war. Why?

A: Particularly Rumsfeld. That latest thing about Cheney was vastly overblown. I said all the administration (is to blame). I've said for months and years, this business of inflating expectations of the American people was wrong. It was "Mission Accomplished," "Last throes" . . . there is a litany of statements (by the Bush administration) that did not comport with reality on the ground. So, for the last three and a half years, I and others have used every possible tool we could to try to get a different strategy. It wasn't just not enough troops. It was the firing of everybody in the Army, it was allowing the looting from the beginning, it was "de-Baathification." There was a failure to make a quick transition to an Iraqi government. Look, these failures have been well-chronicled in Fiasco and Cobra II. It's not John McCain's assessment. It's everybody's assessment of the mishandling.

Q: I read Fiasco and at the end was waiting for Tom Ricks, the author, to say "here's our way out of Iraq." He doesn't sound very optimistic.

A: A lot of people think it's too late (for a solution in Iraq). I don't think so. I think we have a good chance of success with a new strategy and new leadership. But do I think there is a risk of failure? Absolutely. I can't guarantee success. But I can guarantee the results of failure. Fortunately, some Americans are beginning to think about that.It's one thing to be frustrated and say withdraw. But then you've got to think about the consequences of withdrawal – and it's chaos.

Q: How much is your support of the troop increase hurting your presidential campaign?

A: I have no idea and I don't worry about it.

Q: The polls in New Hampshire show a steady decline. Does that trouble you?

A: There is one poll that shows that. There are other polls that show it just steady. But I don't worry about it.

Q: Why don't you worry about it?

A: This is far more important than any political ambitions I might have. I go out to Walter Reed and Bethesda (military hospitals) and see kids who have given one heck of a lot more than I could ever contemplate.

Q: But why be so vocal about this? You've become the most vocal supporter of the plan.

DOJ_NMG_0130554

A: I was the greatest critic of the way it was conducted - and I end up being a supporter. It's got to do with my visibility on the Armed Services Committee, the view that people have of me in the country as one of the people who is listened to on national security.

You've got to do what you think is right.

Q: I know you don't like talking about your kids...

A: I won't. I won't talk about my kids.

Q: Why won't you talk about them?

A: I'm doing what I hope is right for every family in America.

Q: But I think anybody who is a parent is going to be struck by the fact that you are calling for a troop increase that could lead to Jimmy going over there.

A: I cannot allow that to be a consideration.

Q: Does duty come before family in this case?

A: I do not talk about my family.

Q: Why do you want to be president?

A: Because I think we're in very challenging times in America and I think my life and my credentials and my experience and my vision for the future of this nation qualifies me to be president.

Q: You're in a different position now, if not the front runner, one of them. There was always an appeal to McCain as the underdog, as the maverick. Is that going to change the dynamic this time around, that you've become the one to beat?

A: Already, when MoveOn.org is running hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of ads attacking you in January of the odd-numbered year, then you know that certainly the dynamic has changed in some represent. Every comment I make is under a microscope and the attacks from the far left have intensified.

Q: Does that alter your strategy at all?

A: No.

Q: You're a shrewd legislator, you've gone after Abramoff and many others. But being president takes different skills. Why would you make a good president?

A: All my life, I've been involved in national security issues in one way or another, I've been involved in leadership on many many issues, working both sides of the aisle. I have a clear record of legislative achievement. I have been in positions of leadership.

Q: Why are conservatives wary about you?

A: I think because there have been times when I've taken positions that they may not agree with on specific issues. I'll match my record of being a conservative on social, economic and national security issues with anyone.

Q: The Democrats are calling the troop increase the Bush-McCain escalation. . .

A: Actually they're calling it the McCain Doctrine. (laughs)

Q: You like that?

A: Not everybody has a doctrine named after them. I've got to say thanks. The MoveOn.org ad, there's a good shot – they are all shots of me with Bush – of me with sunglasses on. I thought it was a pretty good shot.

Q: You're 70 years old now. You would be the oldest president, even older than Reagan. Are you fit enough to be president?

A: I've got more scars than Frankenstein and I'm older than dirt. But I've learned a few things along the way. Last August, I hiked the Grand Canyon rim to rim with my son Jack. We had a great, great hike…it almost killed me. (laughs)

Q: Do you think you have the vigor . . .

A: I work 16-18 hours a day, seven days a week. Ask anybody who has been on one of these trips to Iraq with me. They say I almost kill them - they call it the Death March. I get 'em up early and come back late at night.

Q: How is your family? Are they ready for this?

A: I think so. They're older. They have certain reservations, of course, but we continue the discussion. I think they are favorably inclined, with a lot of concerns of course. Kids in their teens like to lead their own lives.

DOJ_NMG_0130555

Q: Romney has come out the gates fast, with lots of endorsements, particularly in Florida. Do you need to pick up the pace to get your campaign up more quickly?

A: We've got a lot of good support down there. We expect that it will increase over time. I'm very happy with where we are.

Giuliani Praises Bush's Iraq Policy, Foresight (LAT)

By Michael Finnegan

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2007

SACRAMENTO — Republican presidential hopeful Rudolph W. Giuliani praised President Bush's war leadership on Saturday and mocked supporters of a nonbinding congressional resolution condemning the U.S. troop buildup in Iraq.

The former New York City mayor came to Bush's defense as he promoted his White House candidacy at a California Republican convention. Drawing parallels between Iraq and America's Civil War, Giuliani compared Bush's political troubles to Abraham Lincoln's. When the Civil War was unpopular, Giuliani said, Lincoln "kept his eye ahead."

"He was able to say, 'I know my people are frustrated, and I know my people are angry at me.' " But after weighing public opinion, Lincoln had "that ability that a leader has — a leader like George Bush, a leader like Ronald Reagan — to look into the future," Giuliani said.

Giuliani's defense of the currently unpopular president comes as he is portraying himself as a decisive leader unafraid to buck public opinion.

Several potential Republican presidential candidates, including Arizona Sen. John McCain and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney as well as Giuliani, have supported Bush's plan to add more than 20,000 troops to U.S. forces in Iraq.

The major Democratic candidates have opposed the move. Several are senators who have advocated a nonbinding resolution condemning the buildup.

"In the business world, if two weeks were spent on a nonbinding resolution, it would be considered nonproductive," Giuliani told the lunch crowd, setting off a burst of laughter.

He called the concept "a comment without making a decision." America, he added, is "very fortunate to have President Bush."

"Presidents can't do nonbinding resolutions. Presidents have to make decisions and move the country forward, and that's the kind of president that I would like to be, a president who makes decisions."

Giuliani, who takes liberal stands on abortion, guns and gay rights, avoided those issues in his speech to party delegates, many of whom are staunch social conservatives. They warmly applauded him, giving him several standing ovations for a speech that emphasized tough rhetoric on terrorism and repeated invocations of Reagan and other Republican icons.

"The great moral issue of Ronald Reagan's time was defeating communism, and he understood that," said Giuliani, whose national popularity burgeoned after he led New York through the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. "The great moral issue of our time is defeating terrorism."

Giuliani spent a good deal of time in Sacramento courting Republican lawmakers, part of his early effort to build the foundation of a political operation in California.

The state, long an afterthought in races for parties' presidential nominations, California is likely to play a much larger role in 2008 because lawmakers are on the verge of advancing the state's primary to Feb. 5.

That could benefit Giuliani, since California's Republicans are somewhat more accommodating to socially moderate candidates than those in other states. He plans to spend Monday and Tuesday in California as well, raising money and introducing himself to key voter groups.

Giuliani made the rounds of Republican constituency groups at the convention, attending small meetings of women, Jews, Asian Americans and lawyers.

But he canceled a plan to take questions from members of the conservative California Republican Assembly. The group's president, Mike Spence, called it "your basic snub."

"His problem is that his views on so many issues are out of the mainstream of the Republican Party," Spence said. "He has a lot of explaining to do."

DOJ_NMG_0130556

But Bruce L. Bialosky, a moderate Republican fundraiser in Los Angeles, called Giuliani "an excellent candidate" after hearing his speech.

"He can really connect with the American people," Bialosky said.

"America's Mayor" Praises Bush In State GOP Speech (SFC)

By Carla Marinucci, John Wildermuth

San Francisco Chronicle, February 11, 2007

Sacramento -- Former New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, arguing that America is in desperate need of a Ronald Reagan-style optimistic vision, told California Republicans on Saturday that he wants to be a president who will "win the world for a set of ideas ... that I believe come from God."

"We're for freedom, we're for the future, and in order to do that, we need leadership that uplifts us and moves us toward the future," Giuliani told the lunchtime crowd at the state GOP convention, all but formally declaring his candidacy for his party's presidential nomination. "You get to decide who that leader is going to be -- and I wish you'd decide on me."

Asked by reporters afterward when he would make a formal announcement of his 2008 presidential campaign, Giuliani joked, "If you listened to my speech, I may have announced it."

Giuliani, who last Monday filed a declaration of candidacy, is considered one of the early favorites in the GOP 2008 presidential contest with Arizona Sen. John McCain and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney.

Giuliani's sold-out, $60-a-head lunch before 800 California Republicans -- with at least another 100 in overflow rooms -- was a hot ticket at the semi-annual GOP gathering at the Hyatt Hotel.

Giuliani's audience was primed for a lovefest: Excited Republicans in the hall jumped to their feet and cheered when scores of young volunteers waving "I (heart) Rudy" signs marched through the room, where the man introduced as "America's mayor" took the stage to the sound of the Clash tune "Rudie Can't Fail."

Giuliani regaled the crowd with self-deprecating stories of his days as a federal prosecutor, moved them with recollections of the horror of the Sept. 11 attacks and delivered an inspirational call to action regarding the nation's current problems. His speech was interrupted repeatedly by applause, cheers of "Rudy! Rudy!" and several standing ovations from the grassroots activists.

In his 45-minute address and in remarks to reporters afterward, Giuliani lavished praise on President Bush, insisting Bush will have "a very strong place in history," in part because of his "very brave and very wise" decision to go after al Qaeda in Afghanistan after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

"We are very fortunate to have President Bush," Giuliani told the Republican delegates. "Presidents ... have to make decisions and move the country forward, and that's the kind of president I would like to be."

Democrats immediately seized on Giuliani's strong defense of the unpopular Republican president, saying it showed the former mayor is out of touch with voters in California and across the nation.

"Giuliani is part of Bush's three stooges," said state Democratic Party strategist Bob Mulholland, who noted that McCain, Romney and Giuliani "all support increasing the troop level in Iraq."

"When you look at (GOP) Senate candidates running away from Bush, you see the presidential candidates all running with Bush," Mulholland said. "It's almost as though they didn't read the (midterm) election results."

Giuliani, 62, a consultant and financier since leaving office, emphasized his qualifications, saying he had been challenged with "having had a job where I didn't have any choice but to decide, and to make decisions and to move things forward."

Giuliani's speech touched on a number of key issues but steered clear of policy details.

Talking about health care, for example, Giuliani seemed to distance himself from Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's new universal health care proposal by agreeing that while changes must be made, they should happen under the "free market system."

On school reform, he drew some of his biggest cheers when he called for parents to have more local control over where their children go to school.

In education, he said, "the Republican Party is for parents, the Democrats are for bureaucrats."

DOJ_NMG_0130557

On immigration, Giuliani stressed the need for border control and called it a matter of national security.

"We need a (border) fence, and a highly technological one."

Giuliani also said he favored a program that would allow illegal immigrants already in the country to earn legal status. He toughened that stance by saying those immigrants should "display the ability to read and write English," and must assimilate into the American culture.

Still, "Giuliani's endorsement of an amnesty program for people in the country here illegally will not be popular among conservative Republicans," said Jon Fleischman, a newly elected official of the state GOP and publisher of FlashReport.org, a popular Republican Web site.

In addition to the volatile immigration issue, the former New York mayor and his backers were quick to deal with the potential problems a pro-choice, pro-gay rights, pro-gun control candidate could have in a California GOP primary.

Giuliani insisted that his many trips to California over the years will put him in a good position should state legislators continue their fast-track effort to move the state's presidential primary up to early February 2008.

An early vote in California "changes the whole nature of the (GOP) primary," he said.

Giuliani has clearly set his sights on beefing up his support in the state.

He had appearances in Southern California just three weeks ago, and has extended his current statewide swing from a scheduled three days to six days.

Sherry Bebitch Jeffe, a political analyst at the University of Southern California, said Giuliani has electrified Republicans in part because "the McCain momentum has flattened."

She says the Arizona senator is increasingly seen as "the author of the (troop) surge, joined at the hip of an unpopular president and an unpopular war."

McCain, for several years, has been the most vocal advocate of increasing troop levels in Iraq as well as a steadfast supporter of the president. He also has been a vigorous backer of Bush's current plan to add 21,500 U.S. troops to the war.

Many delegates at the convention, even stalwart conservatives, said they are willing to overlook some of what they see as Giuliani's political faults because they think he can win the White House in 2008.

Sophie Wong, president of Asian American Republican Women Federated, was one of many who barely contained her happiness at the prospect of meeting Giuliani at a reception where Republicans paid $100 for a close-up look at the former New York mayor.

"He has the charisma and the vision for our party," she said. "He's upbeat and positive. ... We may have differences with him, but the bottom line is that we are all Republicans."

Giuliani Announces Candidacy, Or Then Again, Maybe Not (NYT)

By Richard Perez-Pena

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

SACRAMENTO, Feb. 10 — Rudolph W. Giuliani made it clear Saturday that he was running for president and half-joked that he had just announced. But in keeping with his recent comments, he chose his words coyly and seemed amused by the news media's obsession with his every nudge toward a formal statement.

Referring to the presidential race as he concluded a speech to a convention of the California Republican Party, Mr. Giuliani said: "You get to decide who that leader will be. I wish you'd decide on me." Then he walked away from the podium as surprised delegates asked themselves whether they had just heard a declaration.

Speaking to reporters a short time later, he said, "Yes, I am committed" to the race. Asked when he would formally announce his candidacy, he said: "I don't know. If you go back to my speech, I think I may have. I'm not sure. I think I did, I'm not sure. I don't know what formally means. We'll figure out how to do it in five places where it gets more attention."

Republican activists have complained in recent months that Mr. Giuliani is not following the script for a presidential campaign, and say he was late in assembling a campaign team and starting serious fund-raising. Most recently, they have said he risks alienating supporters if he does not announce his candidacy, as so many others have done.

DOJ_NMG_0130558

Mr. Giuliani seems amused by such concerns, and his advisers say his celebrity allows him to go at his own pace, with confidence that the support and the money he needs will follow.

Mr. Giuliani got a more enthusiastic reception here than he has from Republican party gatherings in most parts of the country. The lunch audience of 800 people — more than the banquet hall at the Grand Hyatt could accommodate, and several hundred more than turned out the night before for Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger — repeatedly interrupted him with standing ovations.

"It's an overwhelming response," said Allan Hoffenblum, a onetime Republican consultant who publishes the California Target Book, a political newsletter. "He is clearly the biggest star for these people. But don't be fooled, most of them are holding their fire." They are probably leaning toward Senator John McCain or Mitt Romney, the former Massachusetts governor, Mr. Hoffenblum said.

That was borne out by interviews with dozens of delegates who said they were to Mr. Giuliani's right, especially on social issues. They spoke glowingly — even emotionally — about him, but most said they were not sure they could support him.

"There's no shortage of feeling for him, and he gets really high marks on competence and leadership," said Representative Doug Ose, Republican of California, who has not taken sides in the race. "But so have the other two."

State Assemblyman Ted Gaines endorsed Mr. Giuliani on Friday, although, he said, "I'm more conservative than he is." Mr. Gaines said he was swayed by the thought of who would lead the country through another terrorist attack.

Mr. Giuliani gave one of his most partisan speeches since the November election. He compared himself repeatedly to Ronald Reagan, as unassailable a figure as there is in this crowd, and effusively praised President Bush.

Mr. Giuliani also took a rare series of shots at Congress, describing it as a group of people who could not take sides on difficult issues.

"Presidents have to take decisions and move the country forward, and that's the kind of president I would like to be: a president who makes decisions," he said.

Giuliani Strikes A Note With California GOP (WP)

By John Pomfret

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

SACRAMENTO, Feb. 10 -- Rudolph W. Giuliani came west to learn whether his brand of Republican politics has a chance among party members significantly more conservative than himself. By the time he had received a fourth standing ovation Saturday at the California Republican Party convention, the answer seemed clear.

Equating the U.S. fight against terrorism with the Civil War and the Cold War, Giuliani told about 750 of his party's faithful that failure in Iraq would turn that country into a "massive headquarters for terrorism."

"Having had a job where I didn't have any choice but to make a decision," the former mayor of New York said, "prepares you as best you can be prepared to be the president of the United States."

Asked in a subsequent news conference when he would formally announce his candidacy for president, Giuliani quipped: "If you go back to my speech, I think you'll find one. We'll figure out how to do it in five places so we'll get more attention."

As mayor during the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, Giuliani gained worldwide recognition for his leadership in the face of a tragic disaster, propelling the former federal prosecutor onto the national political stage. Giuliani leads the polls in the race for the Republican nomination.

Nevertheless, the Brooklyn-born son of an ex-convict has significant obstacles in his quest to become president.

He has been in the private sector for six years; he still supports the war while the rest of the country is shifting against it; he would be only the second Roman Catholic to win the White House; and his social views -- he is pro-choice, pro-gun-control and pro-gay-rights -- are at odds with those of much of his party.

Still, Giuliani's sometimes meandering, 45-minute speech was received warmly by party enthusiasts, a marked contrast to the tepid response they gave Friday night to their own Republican governor, Arnold Schwarzenegger.

Giuliani called for a broadening of the war on terrorism into a war of ideology similar to the ideological battle of the Cold War between the West and the Soviet Union.

DOJ_NMG_0130559

"A much bigger part is about ideas," he said, and "the hearts and minds of people. We've got to get better at selling our life, our economy."

Giuliani, 62, did not shy away from the controversial positions that have put him at loggerheads with some party faithful. He praised President Bush numerous times, at one point seemingly comparing him to Abraham Lincoln. In the news conference, Giuliani said the United States is "very, very fortunate" to have Bush as president, crediting his decision to consider preemptive strikes against potential enemies as "very, very brave."

"I believe that President Bush has a very, very strong place in history," Giuliani said.

Giuliani also waded into the issue of illegal immigration. Many California Republicans consider it one of the nation's most important issues, and a significant portion do not support any program to grant citizenship to long-term illegal residents. Giuliani, however, said that he supports plans to "allow people to earn status" and that he wants to create a way for U.S. industries to find workers.

Many in the audience said they are aware of the gaps between their views and Giuliani's. Nonetheless, several who were interviewed seemed willing to give him a break.

"I'm a Christian, and his views on a lot of social issues are to the left of mine," said Larry Stirling, a retired state superior court judge from San Diego. "But if you have to make a trade-off, I'll make the trade-off for Giuliani. He's been through a trial by fire. He's got gravitas. The first thing a president has to do is protect us. The rest is a secondary consideration."

Giuliani's speech "hit the right tone and the right messages," said Kevin C. Eckery, a Sacramento-based Republican political consultant. "He managed to be true to himself and connect with an audience that is more conservative than he is. It shows he can do it."

California could play a critical role in Giuliani's strategy for winning the nomination. In the past, the GOP nomination was wrapped up before California. But the state legislature is considering a measure to change the primary to Feb. 5, shortly after contests in Iowa, New Hampshire, Nevada and South Carolina.

"California's Republicans are conservative, but not as conservative as Iowans or those in South Carolina," said Allan Hoffenblum, a Los Angeles-based Republican political strategist. Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), another GOP front-runner, might be a closer ideological fit for California Republicans than Giuliani, but, Hoffenblum said, "some of them just don't like him."

"Giuliani is by no means a shoo-in," Hoffenblum said, "but if a streak of pragmatism hits traditionally conservative voters, he's got a chance."

Romney, Brownback Makes Pitches To Michigan Republicans (AP)

AP, February 10, 2007

GRAND RAPIDS, Michigan (AP) — Republicans Mitt Romney, son of a Michigan governor, and Sam Brownback promoted their presidential campaigns Saturday before nearly 3,000 party activists at their state convention.

Romney reminded the crowd that he grew up sharing the Automotive News each morning with his father, George, who headed American Motors Corp. before becoming Michigan's governor from 1963-69.

The younger Romney, himself a former Massachusetts governor, said his father brought many of the lessons he learned from business to the governorship.

"He got Michigan moving again," Romney said, before running through his stands opposing abortion, favoring the restriction of marriage to a man and a woman and backing controls on illegal immigration. "It's time for Republican principles to come back to Michigan again."

Brownback, the Kansas senator who is running as the conservative heart of the party, earned a warm reception with his pledges to protect life and the traditional family.

He also called for wiping out cancer in 10 years and for putting more resources into alternative energy.

"Michigan is going to be a key state in getting that done," he said, noting its efforts to encourage the production of ethanol and biodiesel.

Romney Courts State GOP (SLPD)

By Jo Mannies

DOJ_NMG_0130560

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, February 11, 2007

FRONTENAC – Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, now a presidential hopeful, sought to seal the deal Saturday with many of Missouri's top Republicans by emphasizing his values and vision.

His values include requiring that U.S. schools teach only in English, opposing gay marriage, and guarding the nation against the "Jihadists" who are "intent in causing our entire collapse."

His vision: "We are the hope of this world, and we always will be."

Romney laid out those points, and more, to an enthusiastic crowd of Republicans attending the state party's annual Lincoln Day festivities, held this weekend at the Frontenac Hilton.

Romney's aim: to portray himself as the best mix of conservative values and proven government experience. Earlier, Romney told reporters that any presidential candidate must appeal to Missouri voters because "Missouri is part of the heartland of America and the heartland ultimately decides who the nominee will be."

Romney's message — that the conservative changes he brought to Massachusetts can help the country— fit in with the "reform" message that Lincoln Day speakers emphasized as their party's best hope for wooing back Missouri voters in 2008. Republicans didn't fare so well last fall, when Democrats won both statewide contests, for U.S. senator and state auditor.

Speaker after speaker on Saturday promised to press for dramatic Republican initiatives in Missouri, such as:

•Lt. Gov. Peter Kinder's call for the Legislature "to redouble our efforts to pass a scholarship tax credit'' program so that parents could get a tax break to send their children to any public or private school." He said that was the best way the state could help the city of St. Louis' troubled school system.

•House Speaker Rod Jetton's promise to make English the official language in Missouri. The designation, he said, would offer schools the option to drop programs for children who don't speak English, end the publication of state documents in Spanish, and ease mandates that courts have interpreters for non-English speakers charged with crimes.

•U.S. Sen. Christopher "Kit" Bond's support of proposals to end the state's non-partisan court plan of assembling panels of nominees for governors to fill positions on the supreme and appellate courts and of trial courts in St. Louis, St. Louis County and three Kansas City area counties. Bond, a former governor, said he agrees with Gov. Matt Blunt that the panels too often only have Democratic-leaning choices. The Federalist Society, a group of conservative lawyers, is pushing for changes.

Romney's visit — three days before his official kickoff — was aimed largely at bolstering the substantial GOP ties he's already forged in Missouri. Gov. Matt Blunt is leading Romney's outreach to other governors, while former U.S. Sen. Jim Talent, R-Mo., is a Romney policy advisor.

State Democratic Party spokesman Jack Cardetti that the Blunt-Romney alliance "shows that politics makes for strange bedfellows. Mitt Romney is known for expanding health care in his state, while Matt Blunt is known for slashing it in Missouri."

Talent praised Romney and Blunt as strong leaders willing to confront tough problems. Talent was among several at Lincoln Days who compared Romney to former President Ronald Reagan. "He's created consensus behind big ideas," Talent said of Romney. "He's a person of hope, a person who wants to persuade rather than polarize."

But not everyone is ready to jump on board. Bond said he had no plans at the moment to endorse any Republican presidential contender. Lt. Gov. Peter Kinder said the same thing.

State Treasurer Sarah Steelman, who co-chaired U.S. Sen. John McCain's presidential bid in 2000, remains on the fence about helping the Arizona Republican or any presidential hopeful in 2008.

U.S. Rep. Todd Akin, R-Town and Country, said he was intrigued by Romney and wanted to hear more from him. Akin said he likes the social conservative views of U.S. Sen. Sam Brownback — who's headlining St. Louis County Republicans Lincoln Day dinner March 10 — but wasn't sure if he had a chance.

The congressman added that he was cool towards McCain. Akin said he also had concerns about former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani because he had been married three times.

However, several St. Louis area Republicans informally polled Saturday in the hotel's halls indicated, privately or publicly, that they leaned towards Giuliani. Said former state Sen. Betty Sims, R-Ladue: "He has more of a vision of the future, and understands the effects of terrorism."

DOJ_NMG_0130561

Jetton, the state House speaker, told Missouri Republicans that -- regardless of who get the party's nod for president -- they may face election trouble at home in 2008. At least 18 House Republican seats "are in jeopardy,'' Jetton said. A loss of eight would put Democrats back in control.

A Massachusetts Conservative (BOS)

By David Greenberg

The Boston Globe, February 11, 2007

Well before Senator John F. Kerry went windsurfing in 2004, the failed presidential bids of Michael Dukakis and Paul Tsongas had all but doomed Massachusetts Democrats seeking the White House. In former governor Mitt Romney, however, a new kind of Bay State presidential aspirant is now taking the national stage: A conservative Republican who tacked to the center to get elected statewide and now courts the Christian right to win his party's nomination. If the "Massachusetts liberal" has become a national punch line, what of the "Massachusetts conservative"?

In fact, though he's not well remembered today, there was a Massachusetts conservative who not only won the presidency but enjoyed phenomenal popularity throughout his tenure: former governor Calvin Coolidge. Mitt Romney could do worse than to study his example.

The 30th president may strike some as an unlikely source of inspiration. His reputation today is that of the ineffectual "Silent Cal" -- the taciturn, hands-off executive who chomped a cigar while America spent and gambled its way into the Depression. Or he's remembered as the business-friendly exponent of "trickle-down" economics who embodied a fading set of Victorian values such as thrift, industry, and self-reliance that even during his tenure in the 1920s seemed a throwback to bygone times.

Indeed, in recent years, Coolidge's admirers have included mainly diehard conservatives, such as the columnist Robert Novak (who ranks him as his second favorite president), the folks at the Heritage Foundation (who recently screened the first ever Coolidge documentary), and -- no surprise -- Ronald Reagan, who cribbed from Coolidge's speeches and hung his portrait in the Cabinet Room.

The popular image of Coolidge -- of personal reticence and political restraint -- isn't wrong. Five-foot-nine and slender, with wispy sandy hair and a pallid complexion, Coolidge had bony features and a downturned line of a mouth that gave him an air of sternness.

Coolidge's restrained demeanor and personality also expressed a restrained philosophy of governance. He believed in a minimal federal state and a relatively inactive presidency. Deeply attached to his native 19th-century Vermont, he espoused its Yankee mores of piety and parsimony long after they had come to strike many Americans as anachronistic.

Yet to dismiss Coolidge as a vestige of olden days is to overlook his contributions to American politics. Coolidge in fact straddled two ages. Leading the nation during what the sociologists Robert and Helen Lynd, authors of the pioneering sociological study "Middletown," called "one of the eras of greatest rapidity in change in the history of human institutions," Coolidge silently blessed the go-go consumption of the 1920s, even as he shared widespread fears about moral decay.

By epitomizing old-fashioned values -- showing that they could thrive amid the kinetic consumerism -- Coolidge sanctified the so-called "New Era." He offered the public, wrote Walter Lippmann, a "Puritanism de luxe, in which it is possible to praise all the classic virtues while continuing to enjoy all the modern conveniences."

Coolidge was wildly popular in his time and broke ground in self-consciously governing not just as the head of his party or the leader of a particular faction, but as president of all the people. His image -- as sensible and modest, upright and prudent, a uniter and not a divider -- allowed different political groups to see him as one of their own. In 2008, with voters newly wary of ideological zeal, such a Coolidgean strategy just might show the way to the GOP nomination -- and offer Republicans their best shot at holding the White House.

"The chief business of America is business," runs Coolidge's best known aphorism -- and to be sure, his appreciation of 20th-century novelties included, foremost, a respect for the fruits of capitalism. But Coolidge's embrace of modernity revealed itself in subtler ways, including a new style of politics and governance in which candidates were replacing parties as the focus of voters' loyalties.

DOJ_NMG_0130562

In the 19th century, politicians ascended through service to their party machinery, voters identified much more deeply as Democrats or Republicans than they do today, and there were few independents. Congress, seen as the people's representatives, set the agenda in Washington more than the president. But in the new century, as Lippmann noted, decisions were being "made by the interaction, not of Congress and the executive, but of public opinion and the executive." Theodore Roosevelt and Woodrow Wilson relied on their own outsized personalities as much as on partisan appeals. They ran for office -- and governed -- by appealing through the new mass media to the still-novel concept of public opinion (still then measured in primitive ways).

Coolidge, too, governed mainly through what Campbell Bascom Slemp, the conservative Virginia congressman whom the president hired as his chief aide, called "direct reliance upon the mass of the people." Holding the presidency when radio, newsreels, and photography were transforming political communication, the tremendously popular Coolidge -- despite his famous silence -- learned to speak directly to the public. According to his vice president, Charles Dawes, "The popularity of Coolidge is due to the fact that he, not [Congress], best understood the people and they him."

What Coolidge understood about the people in the 1920s was their aversion to ideological crusades. In politics as well as personality, he embodied a moderation that fit his age.

This moderation was in evidence from early on in his career, when he began ascending the ladder of Massachusetts state politics. As a legislator, lieutenant governor, and in his two years as governor, he leavened his trademark fiscal discipline with progressive elements that accommodated the popular desire for reform. He vetoed bills to raise legislators' salaries by 50 percent, to upgrade the Boston ferry, and to widen a South Boston thoroughfare. Yet he backed measures to improve working conditions, regulate landlords, fund reforestation projects, and control outdoor advertising. His greatest feat as governor -- restructuring the state government by consolidating more than 100 agencies into fewer than 20 -- married the efficiency of progressivism to small-government conservatism.

It was Coolidge's role in the 1919 Boston police strike that made him a national figure. When cops walked off the job one September night and rioting broke out -- causing much property damage and taking several lives -- Coolidge backed the police commissioner's decision to fire the strikers. "There is no right to strike against the public safety by anybody, anywhere, any time," he wrote to the labor leader Samuel Gompers. The message, cannily released to the press, was classic Coolidge, neatly articulating a common-sense wisdom with a tautness that made it ripe for repetition in newspapers, newsreels, and conversation.

Due to this stringent stand, many historians assumed Coolidge to be a troglodyte on labor issues. But earlier in his term he had helped placate Boston's aggrieved streetcar workers, and in 1912 as a state senator he had mediated a major textile strike in Lawrence. Even his stance on the police strike was widely deemed reasonable, shared by President Wilson, for one, who se said the officers' abdication of their "sacred and direct" duty amounted to "a crime against civilization."

After handily winning reelection in 1919 -- Massachusetts governors then served one-year terms -- Coolidge was hailed as a presidential candidate. Fueling the talk was journalist and public relations man Bruce Barton, a founder of the advertising firm BBD&O, who sculpted the governor's image as the quiet, common-sensical moderate. "The radicals and reactionaries fill the newspapers, but the great majority of Americans are neither radicals nor reactionaries," Barton wrote in Collier's, in the first of many paeans to Coolidge. "They are middle-of-the-road folks who own their own homes and work hard....Coolidge belongs with that crowd."

Barton promoted Coolidge at the 1920 Republican convention. Though his effort failed -- the handsome, undistinguished Ohio Senator Warren G. Harding got the nod on the tenth ballot -- a spontaneous outcry by floor delegates made Coolidge vice president virtually by acclamation. Whereas Harding was famously picked in the old manner, by power-brokers amid swirling cigar smoke, Coolidge acceded in the newer fashion -- by publicity and direct appeals.

When Harding died of a heart attack in August 1923, Coolidge was visiting his father's farmhouse in Plymouth Notch, Vt. -- a tiny hamlet nestled in the Green Mountains where he was raised. The news of the president's passing reached the farm after midnight, and Coolidge was sworn in as president -- by his father, a notary public -- in a small parlor by the glow of a kerosene lamp. Had Coolidge and Barton planned the scene, they couldn't have devised more propitious atmospherics: The spare, rural tableau exuded the New England virtues of simplicity, piety, and duty that Coolidge had long traded on in cultivating his image. The tone for his presidency was set.

DOJ_NMG_0130563

Soon after taking over from the late Harding, Coolidge moved to contain the executive-branch corruption scandals -- soon to be lumped under the umbrella term "Teapot Dome" -- that were just surfacing. After some missteps, he named a bipartisan pair of special prosecutors, unloaded tainted Cabinet members, and voiced a pitch-perfect note of condemnation to reassure the public that justice was being done. In contrast to the stench of the Harding pols, Coolidge seemed a breath of fresh Vermont air.

But while Coolidge distanced himself from the sleaze of the so-called "Ohio Gang," he maintained his bona fides with the business world in other ways -- showing his ability to unify most of the diverse elements within the fractious GOP. With Wall Street, Coolidge stayed right by imposing few constraints on business, presiding over a new laxness at regulatory agencies, and, when additional agencies were called for -- such as the Federal Radio Commission, needed to oversee the rapidly growing broadcasting industry -- he blessed an emerging regime that favored the leading commercial networks.

Though many liberals viewed Coolidge as a stooge of business, he retained support from several of the GOP's Progressives -- the former acolytes of Roosevelt who continued to prefer enlightened government activism to raw laissez-faire. Coolidge walked a similar tightrope on cultural issues. On the one hand, he made known his distaste for the decadence of the youth culture and flouters of Prohibition, earning jeers from the era's "smart set." But his public stands on the day's moral controversies convinced most Americans that he was no zealot.

Coolidge shared none of the bigotry of the revived Ku Klux Klan -- though he never mustered a rousing denunciation of the noxious fraternity, even when 40,000 robed members marched by the White House in 1925. He spoke nobly about toleration and religious diversity in America -- even while signing into law immigration restrictions that kept out Southern and Eastern Europeans. He quietly opposed the prosecution of John Scopes for teaching evolution in a Tennessee school, and he supported anti-lynching laws, although he did so with such tepidness that they never passed. Overall Coolidge kept himself out of debilitating controversies, exuding an air of morality but not alienating voters with moralism.

It was a strength, not a weakness, that within his own party Coolidge occupied no clear niche. "He is not easy to classify as either a conservative or a progressive -- the two major lines of political division," noted Bascom Slemp. His personality, not his party or even his platform, commended him to voters. "I have not met anybody who is going to vote for the Republican Party," Barton said in 1924. "They are going to vote 'for Coolidge' or against him."

Clearly, 2008 is not 1924. Too much has changed -- in the nature of the parties, in the values of Americans, in the issues facing the country -- for Coolidge's model to provide any neat formula for presidential candidates today. But it's clear the Republicans will be seeking a new direction. The ideological adventures of the current administration seem to have discredited, with a majority of the public, the brand of hard-line conservatism espoused by George W. Bush in the last two presidential elections, the Newt Gingrich Congress of the 1990s, and even Ronald Reagan in the 1980s (though his genial and folksy -- not to say Coolidgean -- talk of traditional values still bestirs his many admirers).

GOP voters may be looking for a Coolidge-like figure who can espouse the party's traditional pro-business creed without evoking fears of corruption, someone who can project old-fashioned values without prompting anxieties about the power of religious conservatives. Thus John McCain burnishes a trans-partisan, good-government aura. Rudolph Giuliani styles himself a football coach for the nation. Even Romney, when he's not wooing the Christian right, trades on his pre-Big Dig reputation of can-do competence. For one of these men, the forsaken mantle of Calvin Coolidge is waiting to be taken up.

David Greenberg, a professor of history and of journalism and media studies at Rutgers University, is the author of "Calvin Coolidge," recently published by Henry Holt, and "Nixon's Shadow: The History of an Image" (2003).

Profit And Public Health (WP)

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

THE DEBATE over requiring girls to receive a shot against a sexually transmitted virus that sometimes causes cervical cancer should be about what's in the best interests of these young women. It should not be about the interests of the maker of the vaccine. Regrettably, the two are being confused thanks to a lobbying effort undertaken across the country by Merck & Co. on behalf of its new product.

Merck makes Gardasil, the vaccine approved by the Food and Drug Administration as effective against strains of the human papillomavirus (HPV) leading to most cases of cervical cancer. Merck also, according to reports by the Associated Press and Baltimore Sun, is helping to finance efforts across the nation to persuade states to make the vaccine mandatory for all girls. It has had success in Texas, where Gov. Rick Perry (R) issued an executive order requiring the vaccine, and in Virginia, where bills have passed both houses of the General Assembly. Merck's involvement in Texas has become particularly controversial because Mr. Perry's former chief of staff now lobbies for the company and because the governor has ties to a national women's advocacy group that is active in the campaign and also receives funding from Merck. Mr. Perry's unilateral action cut the legislature, and by extension the public, out of any discussion of the issues and is likely to make public compliance with his policy more difficult.

DOJ_NMG_0130564

Merck officials say that they are simply promoting policies that benefit public health: What's more benign than a vaccine able to prevent cancer? We don't disagree either about the efficacy of the vaccine, which the FDA says has been demonstrated in extensive tests, or the argument for its widespread use. There is, though, something unseemly about a company that stands to make billions of dollars driving a debate that already is sensitive because it involves young girls, sex and parental rights. Merck's commercial interests unnecessarily muddy the waters and give critics ammunition with which to attack worthwhile legislation. Indeed, in Maryland the sponsor of such a bill recently pulled the measure after reports surfaced about Merck's lobbying.

The best move Merck can now make is to back off. Happily, that's not necessary in the District, where the only role Merck has played has appropriately been to provide information in response to questions from D.C. Council members. Virginia is a different matter. Sen. Janet D. Howell (D-Fairfax) and Del. Phillip A. Hamilton (R-Newport News), sponsors of bills that passed in the respective houses, are right to push for Virginia to take the lead in fighting cervical cancer. But Merck's help needlessly clouds the issue. While continuing to promote their initiative, the legislators might want to think about how they can bolster public confidence. Returning campaign contributions would be a good step.

Who's Afraid Of The New Economy? (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

Once, there was a bridge to the 21st century. But no major Democrat today speaks as confidently about globalization and technological change as Bill Clinton and Al Gore did a decade ago. No major Democrat today speaks as optimistically about free trade as Gordon Brown does in Britain.

In the Democratic Party today, neopopulists and economic nationalists are on the rise. The free-traders are on the defensive. The Democratic view of the global economy has grown unremittingly grim. When John Edwards talks about the economy, you think he's running for the Democratic nomination of 1932.

Which is why the report to be released tomorrow by the Democratic activist group Third Way is so remarkable. Here is a group of Democratic economists and strategists who are taking on the rising neopopulists.

The first thing their report, "The New Rules Economy," does is challenge the neopopulist depiction of economic reality. Neopopulists are good at describing the suffering in towns like Mansfield, Ohio, and Flint, Mich. But they act as if they've never been to Charlotte or Phoenix, where office parks are shooting up.

The authors of this report, Anne Kim, Adam Solomon, Jim Kessler and Stephen Rose, try to blend all the diverse pieces of American reality, and to expose what they call "the myths of neopopulism."

The first myth, they write, is the myth of the failing middle class. It's true there are more households headed by young and old people, who tend to have lower incomes. But if you take households headed by people in their prime working years, 25 to 59, you find those people are not failing. Their median income is $61,000. If they are married, their median income is $72,000. Those are decent incomes in most parts of the country.

Moreover, their living standards are not stagnant. Between 1979 and 2005, the percentage of prime-age households making over $100,000 in current dollars rose by 12.7 percentage points. As Ben Bernanke, the Fed chairman, said last week, incomes at all levels are rising; it's just that incomes at the upper end are rising much faster.

The Third Way authors also dispute recent warnings of wildly increasing income volatility. The main reason incomes have grown more volatile over the past decades is motherhood, they write. As women play a more significant role in the economy, their movements in and out of the labor force to care for children increase volatility.

DOJ_NMG_0130565

The report goes on to challenge the direst warnings about rising credit card debt (household assets have risen faster than debts), rising corporate profits (they are cyclical and pretty much normal for this stage in a recovery) and American decline.

The Third Way authors are not saying everything is hunky-dory — far from it — but they are saying Democrats tend to lose when they are relentlessly grim and when the reality they describe is detached from the reality most Americans experience.

Moreover, they are restating the truth neopopulists are loath to admit: that no nation on earth is better positioned to take advantage of an ever-more-open economy, and today's challenge is not to retard openness but enable more people to take part in it.

The second half of the report describes how government can help people adjust to the new economic rules. Frankly, I wish the authors had been a bit more creative here, asking, for example, why so many people don't heed the huge incentives to finish high school and college. There are deeper mental and cultural processes in play than can be dealt with by the usual mix of tax credits.

Still, the significance of the report is that at least some Democrats have the guts to take on the neopopulists, who are masters of vilification.

In fact, their political method is based on vilification over explanation. They vilify unpatriotic executives, but the vast majority of job losses are caused by technological change, not outsourcing. They vilify overpaid C.E.O.'s, even though their pay packages have nothing to do with the stagnant wages of the unskilled. They vilify foreign governments for not living up to the rules of "fair trade," even though developing countries could enforce every labor and environmental regulation under the sun and their workers would still be cheaper for low-skill tasks.

The neopopulist caucus in the Democratic Party is like the anti-immigrant caucus in the Republican Party. Both speak for loud and angry minorities who have been hurt by globalization. But the party that mistakes their experience for the central reality will doom itself for years to come.

Unmasking Our Pain In New Orleans (WP)

By Lolis Eric Elie

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

The rush begins approximately right now. Even as I write this, thousands of Americans are packing away their inhibitions and preparing to come to my city and go native. They will arrive in the French Quarter uninhibited, as they imagine we are. They will remove their clothes. They will empty their beer-filled guts onto each other's shoes. They will clown for hungry cameras and for journalists eager to capture New Orleans as some distant editor has imagined it. Invariably, the networks will set up their shots in the French Quarter, though none of the major parades and few of the emblematic Carnival activities take place there. Neither the journalists nor the revelers seem to care that our lives, local lives, are elsewhere.

For us, Mardi Gras is family time. We gather on our favorite corners to watch parades with parents and cousins and picnic lunches prepared by grandmothers (then) or bought from fast-food dispensaries (now). We don masks. We drink. We dance. We drink. We yell loudly. We drink. This we do, ever aware that the people on our right and on our left are the same people we will see during more sober times at work, school and church.

America would recognize us in family mode, but we may never be seen that way. Hurricane Katrina confirmed for now, and perhaps forever, the sense that New Orleans is a foreign place attached to the United States by geography, but distant from it in every meaningful way. We are more European, more African, less serious. And we lack the good sense God gave a goose. Why else would we raise our kids among girls gone wild in a hurricane magnet of a city that lies largely below sea level?

When Hurricane Katrina hit, our nation offered us sympathy. Millions of Americans accepted us into their cities. They sent 18-wheelers heavy with goodwill and provisions. Others came here, donned hazard suits and helped us. But I fear this compassion is wearing thin. It has been nearly 18 months. By now, the thinking goes, real Americans, self-reliant Americans, would have picked themselves up by their stiff upper lips and gotten on with life. They wouldn't be waiting for a government check. They would rebuild their homes and their lives with money and fortitude held in reserve.

My mother is a real American. Her difficulties have been minor compared with the setbacks suffered by others in our city. She's 72 years old. A decade ago, she moved into a new house she chose specifically because she thought it was on high, safe ground. She put her all into renovating and decorating it. On Aug. 29, 2005, it was inundated by four feet of water. Her blood pressure began to rise. Her borderline diabetes crept across the border. A pain developed in her left leg. Like many ailments these days, hers seemed stress induced.

DOJ_NMG_0130566

From her sister's home in Dallas, she rebuilt. The first contractor she hired disappeared with the down payment. The first doctor said the back pain would go away. The first call to an insurance office put her in touch with a Ms. Bear. From her office somewhere in America, Ms. Bear insisted that my mother could just knock the insulation and roofing materials to the side and sleep in the filth of her waterlogged bed. That's what a Bear would do.

The second contractor was moving quickly among his various jobs, but slowly on my mother's house. Then he developed cancer and stopped moving much at all. (Was it his men who stole the ladder and the toilet and broke that glass table we'd carefully salvaged?) The second doctor recommended back surgery. The insurance company asked for more photos. Several doctors, two chiropractors, one surgery, a dozen letters and scores of phone calls later, my mother is back in her house. About a quarter of her neighbors have returned.

It's lonely there. My mother speaks to her friends long-distance.

Somehow, when people look at us and our city, they don't see my mother. They see the desperate brown faces at the Superdome or hear the otherly accented voices from St. Bernard Parish. They don't see the old man in the Lower Ninth Ward, gutting his house by day and sleeping in it by night because he has nowhere else to stay. They don't see the families cramped in trailers because they have nowhere else to live. They don't see the fishermen in Plaquemines Parish begging to get back to work. Those men need government help to move their boats from the land, where the floodwaters left them, back to the bayous, where they can again ply their trade. That's not the kind of work the Federal Emergency Management Agency is allowed to do.

In the immediate aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, the federal government did a terrible job. No doubt about that. Americans stranded on roofs. Americans without food and water. People in war-ravaged, dysfunctional nations looking at us on television saw that our country could be just as dysfunctional as their own. Domestic politics demanded that our misery be seen as the result either of Democratic Great Society programs or Republican social Darwinism. In fact, neither was apt.

Make no mistake -- the devastation in New Orleans and southern Louisiana was a government-enabled disaster. The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers designed and built the levees and floodwalls that were supposed to protect us. The failure of these structures resulted in the devastation of our city. This is not the crank conspiracy theory of angry New Orleanians. This is the conclusion that the Corps reached in a 6,600-page report, released June 1.

Hurricane Katrina was no more than a Category 2 storm when it hit New Orleans. The levees and floodwalls were supposed to be able to withstand a Category 3 storm. The Corps acknowledged that the flood-control system was badly designed and badly built. "For the first time the corps has had to stand up and say we had a catastrophic failure with one of our projects," said Lt. Gen. Carl Strock, the commander of the Corps.

You may expect that an admission by a government agency that its poor work was responsible for the destruction of an American city would have been big news. But the story of the Corps' admission, released on a Thursday, didn't live long enough to make the Sunday talk shows. The confession was irrelevant. The nation had already concluded that the death of New Orleans was a suicide caused by our irrational desire to live in harm's way.

This blame-New-Orleans attitude has been devastating for us. Though Louisiana suffered far more damage per capita than did Mississippi, our neighbor to the east has received a disproportionate share of federal funding. But neither of us was treated fairly. Six weeks after the storm, Congress passed legislation allowing low-interest loans for Gulf Coast communities to use to pay public employees. But the White House and the Republican leadership in Congress specifically required that the money be paid back, even though such federal disaster loans have generally been forgiven for the past three decades. "Notwithstanding section 417 of the Stafford Act, such loans may not be canceled," the offending passage reads.

In its zeal to punish Louisiana for sins that are largely not of our own making, the federal government has twisted our national priorities so radically as to render them unrecognizable. In this era when homeland security is the nation's paramount concern, there is no enthusiasm for protecting American land along the coast of Louisiana. For the past several decades, we've lost an average of 24 square miles of territory every year. About 40 percent of U.S. wetlands are in Louisiana, but my state experiences 80 percent of the nation's coastal wetlands loss. This loss is crucial to us because hurricanes lose strength when traveling over this land and are thus less powerful when they reach populated areas. Fewer wetlands means more hurricane damage.

DOJ_NMG_0130567

Two years ago, before Katrina, the Corps of Engineers and the state of Louisiana estimated that it would take $14 billion to stem the tide of coastal erosion. In December, the lame-duck Congress allocated 34 percent of the federal oil royalties collected off our shores to Louisiana to combat coastal erosion. But we won't get the full amount for 17 years. For the next decade, we will receive about $20 million a year to combat a $14 billion problem.

The latest forecast by coastal experts gives us about 10 years to restore the territory that has been lost south of New Orleans. If we fail to do that, those communities will have to be written off in a couple of decades.

If, say, Cuba or Venezuela had seized 24 square miles of American territory, the call to arms would have been immediate and decisive. But because coastal erosion is an enemy neither foreign nor domestic, we seem willing to surrender to it. We've retreated behind the excuse that New Orleans can't be saved. We've abandoned our can-do pride. In the Netherlands, the Dutch have managed to craft a flood-control system that protects the huge percentage of that nation's land that lies below sea level. These days Americans lack the money, the ingenuity, the patriotism, the humanity of the Dutch.

Much of the wealth of Louisiana lies in our culture. This is the state that gave the nation jazz and Louis Armstrong, Jerry Lee Lewis and Fats Domino. We created two of the nation's signature regional cuisines, Creole and Cajun. Our architecture is some of the oldest and most distinguished in the nation. But it seems that our country views our culture not as a national treasure worth saving, but as further evidence that we are not real Americans at all. But this view could change.

Earlier this month the Corps released the locations of 122 levees that are at risk of failing. They are located in 27 states and the District of Columbia. We New Orleanians have suffered much in the past 18 months. We wouldn't wish such devastation on anyone. But I would like to remind my nation that according to this list, the problems of my home town are not so foreign after all.

I may seem like a foreigner to you when I scream for an independent commission to study government failures in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, or when I decry the plodding incompetence of FEMA. I may seem like the stereotypical welfare cheat when I argue that the federal government has not invested nearly enough in protecting my state from an even greater future disaster. Indeed, mine may seem like a voice emanating from a distant Southern wilderness. But in truth, the problems of Louisiana are the problems of the United States.

Or, as Ralph Ellison wrote, "Who knows but that, on the lower frequencies, I speak for you?"

Lolis Eric Elie is a columnist for the New Orleans Times-Picayune.

Putin Hits U.S. Over Unilateral Practices (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks, Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

MUNICH, Feb. 10 -- Russian President Vladimir Putin, in some of his harshest criticism of the United States since he took office seven years ago, said Saturday that Washington's unilateral, militaristic approach had made the world a more dangerous place than at any time during the Cold War.

"The United States has overstepped its national borders in every way," he said in an address at an annual international security conference here. "Nobody feels secure anymore, because nobody can take safety behind the stone wall of international law."

Putin criticized the expansion of NATO, saying the alliance's placement of military forces on Russia's borders reduces "the level of mutual trust." He said the U.S. desire to place antimissile systems in Eastern Europe could further upset the international balance of power and embolden the United States in its foreign policy decisions.

The Russian president defended his country's arms sales to Iran as a way of reaching out to that Middle Eastern power, which is under pressure from the United States and Europe to curtail its nuclear program. Russia has supplied some air defense weapons to Iran because, he said, "we don't want Iran to feel cornered."

Dozens of foreign and defense ministers and other officials, including U.S. Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and an American congressional delegation, attended the meeting. An Iranian nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, also was present and is scheduled to address the conference Sunday after Gates speaks.

DOJ_NMG_0130568

Several U.S. politicians in attendance sharply criticized Putin's remarks, which Russia specialists said were familiar in their assertiveness but unusual in their hostility toward the United States.

The White House also reacted strongly. "We are surprised and disappointed with President Putin's comments," spokesman Gordon Johndroe said in a statement. "His accusations are wrong. We expect to continue cooperation with Russia in areas important to the international community such as counterterrorism and reducing the spread and threat of weapons of mass destruction."

The back-and-forth underscored the recent stark changes in U.S.-Russian relations. The friendship that was struck when President Bush first met Putin and said he had looked into the former KGB colonel's soul in 2001 has soured as the Kremlin suppressed political opposition at home, used its energy resources to pressure its neighbors and split with the White House over Iraq, Iran and other issues.

Bush has grown increasingly disaffected with Putin and occasionally tried to prod him to recommit to democracy and better relations with his neighbors, only to be rebuffed. Bush has been reluctant to force a more direct confrontation out of worry that it would push Putin further from the West and because he needs Russia's help to pressure Iran to abandon its nuclear program.

In recent days, top Bush administration officials have met in Washington with Garry Kasparov, the former chess grandmaster who has emerged as a leading figure in Russia's marginalized political opposition. Kasparov has said that he advised the officials that lecturing Russia on democracy can be counterproductive but that they should not pretend Putin is one of them, either. "That's why I say, 'Don't interfere, just don't support Putin,' " Kasparov said.

Putin has said that U.S. criticism of his rollback of democracy stems from a Cold War mentality, and he has long opposed the U.S. operation in Iraq. But his remarks here seemingly were not prompted by any particular provocation.

In a tone that was more a considered lecture than a Khrushchevian dais-thumper, Putin said Russia would pursue an independent foreign policy. "We are not going to change this tradition today."

Putin called on the West to resist pushing Russia to be more democratic and more respectful of human rights. "Russia is constantly being taught democracy, and the people who try to teach it don't want to learn it themselves," he said.

Putin ended his critique of the post-Cold War world by attacking the West's view of international relations. Stability and economic justice, he said, should be "not only for the chosen ones, but for everybody."

During Putin's 32-minute address, several members of the U.S. delegation frowned or looked away. Gates, a professional Sovietologist, stared down at notes he was writing. Asked for comment afterward, Gates smiled and shook his head.

After speaking, Putin took questions from the audience, elaborating on several points but backing down from none of them. Explaining his view that the world is now more dangerous than it was during the Cold War, he said that back then, "it was a fragile peace, a scary peace, but it was fairly reliable, as it turns out. Today it is less reliable."

In his one peace offering, Putin called Bush "my friend." Bush is "criticized for everything he does, but he is a decent man," Putin said.

Putin also alluded to Russia's indirect cutoff of crucial energy supplies to Europe twice in the past two years, insisting that Russia's actions are simply intended to put its energy exports on a transparent, market-based system built around long-term contracts.

Some European diplomats, speaking on condition of anonymity, saw his attack on the United States as a preemptive measure to deflect criticism of Russia that has been building in European capitals. In addition to an ongoing crackdown on pro-democracy groups and political opponents, Russia has antagonized some in Europe with its use of energy as a tool of foreign policy.

NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, who also attended the meeting, said he was disappointed by Putin's remarks. He said NATO and the United States had been forthright in their communications with Moscow on the eastward expansion of NATO and had made clear that such moves should not be interpreted as a security threat.

Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.) said that much of Putin's address was "Cold War rhetoric" and that his comments about Iran were "outrageous" and "provocative."

DOJ_NMG_0130569

Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) added, "If you're waiting for Russia to be constructive on Iran, forget it." Putin "did more in a single speech to unite Europe and America than anything we could have done in a decade," Graham said, referring to tensions over the war in Iraq.

Putin Says U.S. Is Undermining Global Stability (NYT)

By Thom Shanker, Mark Landler

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

MUNICH, Feb. 10 — President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia accused the United States on Saturday of provoking a new nuclear arms race by developing ballistic missile defenses, undermining international institutions and making the Middle East more unstable through its clumsy handling of the Iraq war.

In an address to an international security conference, Mr. Putin dropped all diplomatic gloss to recite a long list of complaints about American domination of global affairs, including many of the themes that have strained relations between the Kremlin and the United States during his seven-year administration.

Among them were the expansion of NATO into the Baltics and the perception in Russia that the West has supported groups that have toppled other governments in Moscow's former sphere of influence.

"The process of NATO expansion has nothing to do with modernization of the alliance," Mr. Putin said. "We have the right to ask, 'Against whom is this expansion directed?' "

He said the United States had turned the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, which sends monitors to elections in the former Soviet sphere, "into a vulgar instrument of ensuring the foreign policy interests of one country."

The comments were the sternest yet from Mr. Putin, who has long bristled over criticism from the United States and its European allies as he and his cadre of former Soviet intelligence officials have consolidated their hold on Russia's government, energy reserves and arms-manufacturing and trading complexes.

Rubble from the Berlin Wall was "hauled away as souvenirs" to countries that praise openness and personal freedom, he said, but "now there are attempts to impose new dividing lines and rules, maybe virtual, but still dividing our mutual continent."

The world, he said, is now unipolar: "One single center of power. One single center of force. One single center of decision making. This is the world of one master, one sovereign."

With the German chancellor, Angela Merkel, the American defense secretary, Robert M. Gates, and a Congressional delegation sitting stone-faced, Mr. Putin warned that the power amassed by any nation that assumes this ultimate global role "destroys it from within.

"It has nothing in common with democracy, of course," he added. "Today we are witnessing an almost uncontained hyper use of force in international relations — military force."

"Primarily the United States has overstepped its national borders, and in every area," said Mr. Putin, who increasingly has tried to re-establish Russia's once broad Soviet-era influence, using Russia's natural resources as leverage and defending nations at odds with the United States, including Iran.

American military actions, which he termed "unilateral" and "illegitimate," also "have not been able to resolve any matters at all," and, he said, have created only more instability and danger.

"They bring us to the abyss of one conflict after another," he said. "Political solutions are becoming impossible."

The comments irritated some European leaders and prompted sharp criticism from the Americans in attendance. Senator John McCain, the Arizona Republican widely expected to make a bid for the White House, made a rebuttal that began, "In today's multipolar world, there is no place for needless confrontation." He said that the United States won the cold war in partnership with powerful nations of Western Europe, and that "there are power centers on every continent today."

Mr. McCain then hit back at Mr. Putin more directly. "Will Russia's autocratic turn become more pronounced, its foreign policy more opposed to the principles of the Western democracies and its energy policy used as a tool of intimidation?" he asked. "Moscow must understand that it cannot enjoy a genuine partnership with the West so long as its actions, at home and abroad, conflict fundamentally with the core values of the Euro-Atlantic democracies."

DOJ_NMG_0130570

In Washington, Gordon D. Johndroe, a White House spokesman, said in a statement: "We are surprised and disappointed with President Putin's comments. His accusations are wrong. We expect to continue cooperation with Russia in areas important to the international community such as counterterrorism and reducing the spread and threat of weapons of mass destruction."

Russia has also faced criticism from the United States and other Western countries that believe it has used energy reserves and transport pipelines to reward friendly countries and to punish those seeking to distance themselves from Kremlin control. Some analysts saw the tone of the speech as evidence of how much oil and mineral revenues have strengthened Mr. Putin.

The occasion of the speech was the 43rd Munich Conference on Security Policy — an event begun deep in the cold war, when Germany was divided and hundreds of thousands of American troops were stationed in Western Europe as a bulwark against Warsaw Pact forces.

Mr. Putin began with an apology for the tough talk to come. But during a lively question and answer period full of challenges and rebukes, the Russian president indicated that he relished provoking the international audience of legislators, government leaders, political analysts and human rights advocates.

"I love it," Mr. Putin said as he reviewed a long list of questions. He has long enjoyed high and durable public approval ratings at home, in part for standing up to the West and for pursuing an assertive foreign policy with former Soviet states.

He did offer at least two significant and conciliatory statements to the United States.

President Bush "is a decent man, and one can do business with him," he said. From their meetings and discussions, Mr. Putin said, he has heard the American president say, "I assume Russia and the United States will never be enemies, and I agree."

And while Mr. Putin denied that Russia had assisted the Iranian military with significant arms transfers, he also criticized the government in Tehran for not cooperating more with the United Nations nuclear watchdog agency or responding to questions about its nuclear program.

Other American lawmakers offered measured criticism afterward. "He's done more to bring Europe and the U.S. together than any single event in the last several years," said Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina.

Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, an independent from Connecticut, described the speech as "confrontational," saying, "some of the rhetoric takes us back to the cold war."

Iran's top nuclear official, Ali Larijani, listened impassively from the back of the room. His attendance had become a sideshow in itself. After accepting an invitation to speak Sunday, he canceled, citing health reasons, after a tense meeting with the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna that concluded with a decision to freeze technical cooperation projects.

Mr. Putin joked that he worried the United States was "hiding extra warheads under the pillow" despite its treaties with Moscow to reduce strategic nuclear stockpiles. And he indicated obliquely that the new Russian ballistic missile, known as the Topol-M, was being developed at least in part in response to American efforts to field missile defenses.

He expressed alarm that an effective antimissile shield over the United States would upset a system of mutual fear that kept the nuclear peace throughout the cold war. "That means the balance will be upset, completely upset," he said.

Addressing tensions between Europe and Russia over energy exports, Mr. Putin said 26 percent of Russian oil was extracted by foreign companies. While Russia is open to outside investment, he said, it has found its businessmen blocked from deals abroad.

The Kremlin has been criticized for attempting to impose registration and taxation laws that could restrict the work of foreign nongovernmental organizations with offices in Russia to aid democratization.

But Mr. Putin said his concerns about the work grew from the fact that they "are used as channels for funding, and those funds are provided by governments of other countries." That flow of foreign money to assist opposition Russian political organizations, he said, is "hidden from our society.

"What is democratic about this?" he asked. "This is not about democracy. This is about one country influencing another."

Mrs. Merkel, in her opening speech, struck a far more diplomatic tone than Mr. Putin, though she alluded to the tensions between Europe and Russia over energy shipments and the independence of Kosovo.

Addressing herself to Mr. Putin, who was sitting in the front row, Mrs. Merkel said, "In my talks with you, I have sensed that Russia is going to be a reliable and predictable partner." But she added, "We need to speak frankly with each other."

DOJ_NMG_0130571

Mrs. Merkel had previously criticized in sharp terms Russia's recent shutdown of oil shipments to Belarus, which followed a dispute over natural gas prices. She is pressing Russia to sign a charter with the European Union on energy, which Moscow has resisted.

Mrs. Merkel alluded to another potential confrontation between Europe and Russia. The United Nations is weighing a proposal that would put Kosovo on the path to independence from Serbia, which Russia opposes because it fears that such a move could upset its own turbulent relations with ethnic groups in the Caucasus. Russia has crushed one separatist-minded people within its own borders, in Chechnya, but supports two breakaway regions in Georgia: Abkhazia and South Ossetia.

"We're going to come to the stage where we have to decide: does Serbia, does Kosovo want to move in the European direction?" Mrs. Merkel asked. "If that's the route they choose, both will have to make compromises."

Putin Says U.S. Militarism Fosters Global Instability (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2007

Munich, Germany — Russian President Vladimir V. Putin berated the United States in a major speech Saturday before senior American and European officials, declaring that Washington's militarism had fostered global instability and forced vulnerable nations to seek nuclear weapons.

In harsh language sometimes reminiscent of the Cold War; at other times pleading or mocking, Putin accused the United States of attempting to create a world in which it was free to ignore international law and impose its economic, political and military will.

"We are witnessing an almost uncontained hyper-use of military force in international relations," Putin said. "One country, the United States, has overstepped its national borders in every way."

Putin's litany of accusations was not unfamiliar. The Russian leader has been able to leverage high demand and prices for Russia's oil and gas into an increasingly assertive role on the world stage. But the tenor of his remarks sent a quiver through the hall. Participants said that, coming after a conciliatory opening speech by German Chancellor Angela Merkel, they were widely resented by the hosts. One German questioner jokingly told Putin he hoped the president had not set off "another world war."

In Washington, Gordon Johndroe, spokesman for the National Security Council, said: "We are surprised and disappointed with President Putin's comments. His accusations are wrong."

He said the Bush administration expected to continue to cooperate with Moscow in areas such as counterterrorism and reducing the spread of weapons of mass destruction.

The speech was a first for a Russian president at the increasingly high-profile Munich Security Conference. It was delivered with U.S. Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates seated stoically in the front row flanked by a stone-faced congressional delegation led by Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., considered a leading candidate to be the 2008 Republican presidential nomination.

The symbolism was all the more stark given that it came on the new Defense secretary's first formal trip to Europe and that it occurred at a conference once dominated by his predecessor, Donald H. Rumsfeld. Putin spoke in a prime first-day time slot once used as a platform for Rumsfeld; Gates is to address the gathering Sunday.

U.S. analysts said Putin's remarks appeared timed to take advantage of the Bush administration's weakness as it struggles with Iraq policy and dwindling support at home. Putin in the past has lashed out at U.S. criticism of Russia's human rights record, turning the tables last month to focus on the U.S. detention center at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Putin did touch on some areas of common interest with the U.S. He criticized Iran for not responding positively to proposals by the U.N. to suspend Tehran's nuclear program. His comments were among Russia's most pro-Western remarks on the topic in several months.

But he also defended Moscow's sale of anti-aircraft weapons to Tehran, and most of the address focused on perceived American unilateralism and hegemony.

"Unilateral, illegitimate actions have not managed to resolve any problems, but made them worse," Putin said. "The wars, local and regional conflicts, have only grown in number."

DOJ_NMG_0130572

Arguing the U.S. was ignoring international law in its use of military power, a clear reference to the Iraqi invasion, Putin said the legal constraints that once protected smaller, weaker nations were no longer viable.

"This is very dangerous," he said. "Nobody feels secure any more."

"Of course, such a policy stimulates an arms race," Putin said. "The force's dominance inevitably encourages a number of countries to acquire weapons of mass destruction."

Putin did not make a specific reference to Iran or North Korea as being among those smaller nations that feel threatened, but his reference seemed clear.

The Russian president also said he believed American and Western economic interests were seeking unfettered access to Russian markets, even as they blocked Russian groups from achieving parity abroad.

Putin was most specific when discussing U.S. moves in Eastern Europe, saying efforts by the Bush administration to set up a missile defense system with radar and interceptor rockets in Poland and the Czech Republic threatened Russian's ballistic missiles. The U.S. has repeatedly said the system is not aimed at Russia, but at potential longer-range Iranian missiles.

He questioned why the U.S. believed it was necessary to base troops in two other former Soviet allies, Bulgaria and Romania. "NATO is bringing its adversarial forces to our state's borders," he said. "It is a serious factor provoking reduction of mutual trust."

The attack on NATO appeared to put off European dignitaries as much as U.S. officials, a rare show of unity from the trans-Atlantic partners since the start of the Iraq war.

Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, secretary-general of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, told the conference later in the day that he was "disappointed" by Putin's statements, noting NATO has for a decade held regular security consultations with Moscow through a formalized, legally binding agreement.

"Who can be worried that democracy and the rule of law are coming closer to somebody's border?" Scheffer asked.

Stephen Sestanovich, ambassador-at-large to states of the former Soviet Union during the Clinton administration, said Putin most likely spoke out so sharply because he had grown tired of constant U.S. criticism.

"Most Americans are not aware of how heated and agitated the Russians' discussions are about their relationship with the West," he said. "It may come as a surprise to Americans, but for the Russians, the rhetoric on these questions tends to be pretty grim, among the experts and regular folks, about the deterioration of the relationship."

"The theme is, 'We're tired of American hegemony, we're tired of being treated like a former superpower doormat, and we're back, and we're mad," Sestanovich said.

During a question period following the address, Putin appeared to try to temper his prepared remarks, which several of those seated near him said included several hand-written inserts.

He said President Bush had told him that the U.S. assumes the two countries will "never be enemies again, and I agree with him."

"I really consider the president of the United States my friend," Putin said. "He's a decent man and one can do business with him." Putin also strode purposefully to Gates immediately after his address, shaking his hand with a smile and exchanging quick pleasantries.

But the remarks clearly perturbed the U.S. delegation. During his formal remarks to the conference later Saturday, McCain echoed the sentiments of several Americans in attendance, saying Russia appeared to be turning more autocratic and its foreign policy was standing increasingly in opposition to Western democracies.

"Today's world is not unipolar," McCain said, disputing Putin's main theme. "In today's multipolar world, there is no need for pointless confrontation."

Putin's criticism was not limited to the U.S. He noted that Germany had shortly after the end of the Cold War sought to reassure its historic rivals in Moscow that it would never send its military forces outside its borders. Berlin now has troops in the Balkans and Afghanistan.

"Where are those guarantees now?" Putin asked, arguing Europe was now attempting to set up new "virtual" walls between to replace the Berlin Wall.

DOJ_NMG_0130573

He also dismissed European complaints about Russian threats last year to cut off energy supplies to its neighbors, saying Moscow was only seeking market prices and stable, long-term contracts with countries like Ukraine and Georgia, who in the past have received subsidized supplies.

Putin Accuses U.S. Of Sparking Arms Race (AP)

By Slobodan Lekic, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 11, 2007

Russian President Vladimir Putin on Saturday blamed U.S. policy for inciting other countries to seek nuclear weapons to defend themselves from an "almost uncontained use of military force" — a stinging attack that underscored growing tensions between Washington and Moscow.

"Unilateral, illegitimate actions have not solved a single problem, they have become a hotbed of further conflicts," Putin said at a security forum attracting senior officials from around the world.

"One state, the United States, has overstepped its national borders in every way."

The Bush administration said it was "surprised and disappointed" by Putin's remarks. "His accusations are wrong," said Gordon Johndroe, Bush's national security spokesman.

In what the Russian leader's spokesman acknowledged was his harshest criticism of the United States, Putin attacked Bush's administration for stoking a new arms race by planning to deploy a missile defense system in eastern Europe and for backing a U.N. plan that would grant virtual independence to Serbia's breakaway province of Kosovo.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., who was also attending the conference, described Putin's remarks as "the most aggressive speech from a Russian leader since the end of the Cold War."

The United States and an increasingly assertive Russia repeatedly have butted heads during the past year, with Vice President Dick Cheney accusing Moscow of using its energy resources as "tools of intimidation or blackmail." Washington also has been angered by Russia's reluctance to impose meaningful sanctions against Iran, which is accused of seeking to develop nuclear weapons under the cover of a civilian atomic energy program.

But Putin said it was "the almost uncontained hyper use of force in international relations" that was forcing countries opposed to Washington to seek to build up nuclear arsenals.

"It is a world of one master, one sovereign ... it has nothing to do with democracy," he said. "This is nourishing the wish of countries to get nuclear weapons."

"This is very dangerous, nobody feels secure anymore because nobody can hide behind international law," Putin told the gathering.

Putin did not mention the wars in Iraq or Afghanistan, but he voiced concern about NATO's expansion plans as possible challenges to Russia.

"The process of NATO expansion has nothing to do with modernization of the alliance or with ensuring security in Europe," Putin said. "On the contrary, it is a serious factor provoking reduction of mutual trust."

On the missile defense system, Putin said: "I don't want to accuse anyone of being aggressive" but suggested it would seriously change the balance of power and could provoke an unspecified "asymmetric" response.

On Kosovo, Moscow has said a solution imposed against Serbia's consent could serve as a model for other separatist provinces elsewhere in the world. Washington, which supports Kosovo's independence, maintains that the Kosovo situation is a "one-off" because the province has been under U.N. rule since 1999 when Serb forces were ejected following a brief aerial war with NATO.

U.S. Defense Secretary Robert Gates had little to say about the accusations, remarking only that Putin "was very candid."

NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer said he was disappointed by Putin's criticism about NATO expansion. "Who can be worried that democracy and the rule of law is coming closer to somebody's border?" he asked.

Putin's spokesman Dmitry Peskov said the president's speech was not "confrontational" and attributed his blunt words to the sense that the number of conflicts fomented by Washington "was constantly growing" and that international law was being undermined by such actions.

DOJ_NMG_0130574

"It is in the interest of the United States, the European Union and other countries that international law is upheld, not further destroyed," Peskov said.

Minutes earlier, German Chancellor Angela Merkel — whose country holds the European Union's rotating presidency — had praised Russia, saying it would be a reliable energy supplier to Europe. She called for closer relations between the EU and Moscow to enhance stability on the continent.

"How relations between the EU and Russia evolve will have a crucial impact on how security in the region will develop," Merkel told the annual Munich Conference on Security Policy. The forum is often used as an opportunity for officials to conduct diplomacy in an informal setting.

Russia's reputation as a supplier of natural gas to the West was damaged in the recent past when it halted supplies to Europe through main pipelines crossing Belarus and Ukraine due to pricing disputes with those two countries.

Merkel also said that the international community is determined to prevent Iran from obtaining nuclear weapons. Tehran needed to accept demands made by the U.N. and the International Atomic Energy Agency, she said.

On the sidelines of the conference, Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani defended his country's nuclear program as peaceful, saying: "We are no threat to our region or other countries," while indicating a willingness to return to negotiations.

___

Associated Press writers Lolita C. Baldor and David Rising contributed to this report.

Putin Hits U.S. Use Of Force (WT/AP)

By Slobodan Lekic

The Washington Times, February 11, 2007

MUNICH -- Russian President Vladimir Putin yesterday blamed U.S. policy for inciting other countries to seek nuclear weapons to defend themselves from an "almost uncontained use of military force" -- a stinging attack that underscored growing tensions between Washington and Moscow.

"Unilateral, illegitimate actions have not solved a single problem. They have become a hotbed of further conflicts," Mr. Putin said at a security forum attracting senior officials from around the world.

"One state, the United States, has overstepped its national borders in every way."

The Bush administration said it was "surprised and disappointed" by Mr. Putin's remarks. "His accusations are wrong," said Gordon Johndroe, President Bush's national security spokesman.

In what the Russian leader's spokesman acknowledged was his harshest criticism of the United States, Mr. Putin attacked Mr. Bush's administration for stoking a new arms race by planning to deploy a missile-defense system in Eastern Europe and for backing a U.N. plan that would grant virtual independence to Serbia's breakaway province of Kosovo.

Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, who was attending the conference, described Mr. Putin's remarks as "the most aggressive speech from a Russian leader since the end of the Cold War."

The United States and an increasingly assertive Russia repeatedly have butted heads during the past year, with Vice President Dick Cheney accusing Moscow of using its energy resources as "tools of intimidation or blackmail."

Washington also has been angered by Russia's reluctance to impose meaningful sanctions against Iran, which is accused of seeking to develop nuclear weapons under the cover of a civilian atomic-energy program.

But Mr. Putin said it was "the almost uncontained hyper-use of force in international relations" that was forcing countries opposed to Washington to seek to build up nuclear arsenals.

"It is a world of one master, one sovereign ... it has nothing to do with democracy," he said. "This is nourishing the wish of countries to get nuclear weapons."

Mr. Putin did not mention the wars in Iraq or Afghanistan, but he voiced concern about NATO's expansion plans as possible challenges to Russia.

"The process of NATO expansion has nothing to do with modernization of the alliance or with ensuring security in Europe," Mr. Putin said. "On the contrary, it is a serious factor provoking reduction of mutual trust."

DOJ_NMG_0130575

On the missile-defense system, Mr. Putin said: "I don't want to accuse anyone of being aggressive," but suggested it would seriously change the balance of power and could provoke an unspecified "asymmetric" response.

On Kosovo, Moscow has said a solution imposed against Serbia's consent could serve as a model for other separatist provinces elsewhere in the world.

Washington, which supports Kosovo's independence, maintains that the Kosovo situation is a "one-off" because the province has been under U.N. rule since 1999, when Serbian forces were ejected after a brief aerial war with NATO.

U.S. Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates had little to say about the accusations, remarking only that Mr. Putin "was very candid."

NATO Secretary-General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer said he was disappointed by Mr. Putin's criticism about NATO expansion. "Who can be worried that democracy and the rule of law is coming closer to somebody's border?" he asked.

Mr. Putin's spokesman, Dmitry Peskov, said the president's speech was not "confrontational" and attributed his blunt words to the sense that the number of conflicts fomented by Washington "was constantly growing" and that international law was being undermined by such actions.

"It is in the interest of the United States, the European Union and other countries that international law is upheld, not further destroyed," Mr. Peskov said.

Minutes earlier, German Chancellor Angela Merkel -- whose country holds the European Union's rotating presidency -- had praised Russia, saying it would be a reliable energy supplier to Europe. She called for closer relations between the EU and Moscow to enhance stability on the continent.

"How relations between the EU and Russia evolve will have a crucial impact on how security in the region will develop," Mrs. Merkel told the annual Munich Conference on Security Policy.

The forum is often used as an opportunity for officials to conduct diplomacy in an informal setting.

Russia's reputation as a dependable supplier of natural gas and oil to the West was damaged in the recent past when it halted supplies to Europe through main pipelines crossing Belarus and Ukraine as a result of pricing disputes with those two countries.

On the sidelines of the conference, Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani defended his country's nuclear program as peaceful, saying: "We are no threat to our region or other countries," while indicating a willingness to return to negotiations.

Putin Stuns With Attack On US (AFP)

AFP, February 11, 2007

Russian President Vladimir Putin attacked the United States as a reckless "unipolar" power that has made the world more dangerous by pursuing policies that have led to war, ruin and insecurity.

Putin stunned an audience that included US Defence Secretary Robert Gates and senior US and European officials with the speech at a high-level security conference in Munich.

The White House said it was "surprised and disappointed" by Putin's accusations and Gates was expected to respond on Sunday, in his first major speech since taking office.

In comments reminiscent of his campaign opposing the 2003 US-led invasion of Iraq, Putin said the United States had disastrously "overstepped" its borders.

"The United States has overstepped its borders in all spheres... and has imposed itself on other states," Putin told delegates at the annual Munich Conference on Security Policy.

Putin said a "unipolar" world "means in practice one thing: one centre of power, one centre of force, one centre of decision-making, a world of one master, one sovereign."

Such a situation "is extremely dangerous. No one feels secure because no one can hide behind international law," Putin said.

He added that US dominance was "ruinous."

"Local and regional wars didn't get fewer. The number of people who died didn't get less, but increased.... We see no kind of restraint."

DOJ_NMG_0130576

Putin also rejected criticism that under his watch, Russia has back-tracked on democracy, saying that the United States was "permanently teaching Russia about democracy. But those who teach us, for some reason don't really want to study it themselves."

The speech added to tensions between the Kremlin and the United States, which have grown after a period of relative rapprochement in the 1990s.

Boosted by his country's oil wealth, the Russian leader has tried to restore Moscow's international clout, making common cause with fellow critics of the United States, notably Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, and maintaining a traditional friendship with Iran.

After what many Russians regard as the humiliation of the Soviet Union's collapse, the Kremlin plans to build up its defences and has vowed an effective response to US hopes of establishing a missile defence system close to Russia's borders in the Czech Republic and Poland.

That threat has fuelled fears of a new arms race reminiscent of the Cold War.

Putin drew immediate criticism from the White House.

National security spokesman Gordon Johndroe said: "We are surprised and disappointed with President Putin's comments.

"His accusations are wrong," he said.

"We expect to continue cooperation with Russia in areas important to the international community such as counter-terrorism and reducing the spread and threat of weapons of mass destruction."

Putin's speech also prompted dismay at the conference itself, which is traditionally pro-Western and devoted to the future of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation (NATO).

"I can't hide my disappointment. I will not hide my disappointment," said the NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer.

Prominent US Republican Senator and presidential hopeful John McCain said that "today's world is not unipolar.... Russian leaders' apparent belief to the contrary raises a number of very difficult questions."

There was also criticism from Estonian President Toomas Hendrik Ilves, whose Baltic Sea country was unwillingly ruled from Moscow for most of the second half of the 20th century.

The EU should think carefully about how it deals with "a country that considers democracy on its borders as a threat, or despotism on its borders as a source of stability," said Ilves.

Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, was also likely to be in the spotlight when he addresses the conference Sunday.

The United States has been trying to increase pressure on Iran to give up its nuclear programme, which Tehran says is aimed only at generating electricity but Washington says is a cover for a weapons programme.

Putin's Speech: Back To Cold War? (BBC)

By Rob Watson

BBC.com, February 10, 2007

The Munich security conference was born in the 1960s - the height of the Cold War. Forty years on, there been talk of a new chill.

Given the tone and content of Russian President Vladimir Putin's address to the gathered defence ministers, parliamentarians and pundits, it is not, perhaps, hard to see why.

Warming quickly to his task after only the briefest of greetings, President Putin accused the US of establishing, or trying to establish, a "uni-polar" world.

"What is a uni-polar world? No matter how we beautify this term, it means one single centre of power, one single centre of force and one single master," he said.

'Formula for disaster'

President Putin continued in a similar vein for some time.

"The United States has overstepped its borders in all spheres - economic, political and humanitarian, and has imposed itself on other states," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0130577

It was a formula that, he said, had led to disaster: "Local and regional wars did not get fewer, the number of people who died did not get less but increased. We see no kind of restraint - a hyper-inflated use of force."

The US has gone "from one conflict to another without achieving a fully-fledged solution to any of them", Mr Putin said.

With the new US Defence Secretary Robert Gates and several US congressmen sitting in the audience, he called for the reconsideration of the whole existing architecture of global security.

'Disappointing' speech

But he did not win over his audience.

Several delegates did not like his rather brusque brushing off of questions about Russia's own commitment to democracy and his defence of Moscow's decision to sell an air-defence system to Iran.

Nato Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer described President Putin's speech as "disappointing and not helpful". And there was similar reaction from the president of Estonia and others.

But it was left to US Republican senator and presidential hopeful John McCain to lead the retort.

Today's world, he said sternly, was not uni-polar, adding that it was an autocratic Russia that needed to change its behaviour.

"Moscow must understand that it cannot enjoy a genuine partnership with the West so long as its actions at home and abroad conflict so fundamentally with the core values of Euro-Atlantic democracies," he said.

"In today's multi-polar world, there is no place for needless confrontation, and I would hope that Russian leaders understand this truth," Senator McCain said.

Spotlight on Moscow

Afterwards in the corridors there were dark mutterings by some about a new Cold War.

Others were less gloomy, dismissing President Putin's performance as one of Russia's periodic bouts of letting off steam at its diminished world status.

But it has made an impression.

For the last few years, as one observer suggested, it was the former US Defence Secretary, Donald Rumsfeld, who was the man everybody loved to hate at this conference.

President Putin's performance has single-handedly switched the spotlight from the US to Russia.

Putin In First Saudi State Visit (BBC)

By Stephen Eke

BBC.com, February 11, 2007

Russian President Vladimir Putin, sets off on a tour of the Middle East on Sunday, arriving in Saudi Arabia, then going on to Qatar and Jordan.

It is the first time a Russian head of state is to visit these countries, considered allies of the West.

Moscow sees them as key to building new economic, political and even military ties with the Arab world.

Mr Putin is setting off on what may be his last major visit to the Middle East as president.

Russian diplomats deny any notion of grandstanding, however, pointing to rapidly growing trade with the region, which in the case of Saudi Arabia, tripled last year.

Military ties?

King Abdullah II of Jordan has travelled to Russia six times over recent years; the Emir of Qatar has also visited.

While talks between Mr Putin, the accompanying Russian businessmen and diplomats, and their Arab hosts, are expected to focus on trade and business, Moscow has cautiously suggested introducing what it calls "military and technical ties" into the equation.

Some Russian commentators have suggested Mr Putin may be about to flex Russia's muscle by visiting countries traditionally considered to be pro-western.

But senior diplomats have played that idea down, stressing that the major factor is the potential market for conventional and hi-tech weaponry they represent.

DOJ_NMG_0130578

Russian arms - like these Sukhoi jets - could be part of talks

Russia had close links with the Middle East during the Communist era, but the end of the Soviet Union saw it marginalised and struggling to maintain influence.

In recent times, Moscow has built close links with Israel - an enemy in Soviet times - and with Iran, where Russian engineers have built the country's first, controversial, nuclear power station.

Russia's once-close political and ideological links with Syria, the Palestinians and Egypt have taken second place to a much more pragmatic factor - where can Russia make money by selling its machinery and weaponry.

Talks With N. Korea Extended To 4th Day (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

BEIJING, Feb. 10 -- Despite three days of hard bargaining, North Korean nuclear disarmament talks remained stuck Saturday over the energy aid North Korea would receive in return for closing its main nuclear reactor, diplomats said.

Discord over the compensation cast a pall over what had been high hopes that the six-nation talks could produce swift agreement on the first steps toward eliminating North Korea's nuclear weapons and dismantling the nuclear facilities that produce its fissionable material.

As a result, diplomats from the six nations -- North and South Korea, Japan, Russia, China and the United States -- made plans to return to the negotiating table at the Chinese government's secluded Diaoyutai guest compound here for additional sessions of negotiations Sunday and perhaps into next week.

"It's definitely an issue that has prevented us from sealing the deal right now," said Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill, the chief U.S. negotiator, without revealing the terms of the dispute. "I think it may take another day or two to get through this."

The stakes are high, Hill suggested, because another failure would again raise questions about the utility of the Chinese-sponsored six-party process, which has been underway off and on since August 2003 without results on the ground. In October, while the talks languished, North Korea set off a nuclear test blast and declared itself a nuclear power.

Hill, briefing reporters, emphasized that the other main elements of an agreement on initial disarmament steps were ready to sign. But he warned that other disagreements could also arise as long as the talks continue, suggesting the accord that looked so close when this round of talks began Thursday may turn out to be more distant than thought.

The last round of talks ended Dec. 22 in stalemate after the senior North Korean negotiator, Kim Gye Gwan, said he could not formally discuss North Korea's nuclear program until resolution of a financial dispute over U.S. allegations that a Macau bank was being used to launder illicit North Korean funds. Hill said that dispute, although not resolved, has been smoothed over by separate negotiations among U.S. and North Korean banking officials and a meeting last month in Berlin.

As a result, he said, Kim has been negotiating seriously. But the talks nevertheless reached an impasse over what South Korean diplomats described as the amount and timing of aid North Korea would receive in exchange for shutting down the Yongbyon reactor and readmitting international nuclear inspectors.

The facility, North Korea's main nuclear installation, produces plutonium that can be used for nuclear fuel. U.S. officials estimated that North Korea has produced enough plutonium to fuel eight to 10 nuclear weapons.

Two U.S. nuclear experts who visited North Korea's capital, Pyongyang, early this month were told that North Korea wants heavy fuel oil to produce electricity in return for closing Yongbyon, in addition to a commitment from the five other negotiating nations to build civilian-use nuclear power reactors in the future.

New Setback In North Korean Nuclear Talks (NYT)

By Jim Yardley

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

BEIJING, Feb. 10 — Negotiations over North Korea’s nuclear weapons program stalled on Saturday as disagreements arose about the size and timing of the aid package that would be provided to North Korea in exchange for shutting down the country’s nuclear weapons facilities.

DOJ_NMG_0130579

“The differences on the issue still remain large,” said Qin Gang, spokesman for China’s Foreign Ministry.

The impasse occurred amid rising expectations for an agreement in Beijing, where the diplomatic talks were under way, and in Washington, where Bush administration officials had predicted a major announcement this weekend. Instead, negotiators from North Korea, China, the United States, South Korea and Japan will meet again on Sunday for a fourth day of talks.

Christopher R. Hill, the chief American envoy, would not discuss any specifics about the dispute but said negotiations had largely boiled down to one issue. “Frankly, I had hoped we could get it done on Saturday,” Mr. Hill said. “But I think it’s going to take another day or two.”

The diplomatic effort to resolve the North Korean nuclear issue has gone nowhere since the six participating nations signed a broad accord in September 2005 in which North Korea agreed to end its weapons program in exchange for economic and energy benefits, as well as security guarantees. Negotiations almost fell apart last October after North Korea tested a nuclear device.

This week’s focus has been on establishing a schedule for shutting down North Korea’s nuclear program, as well as the timing and amount of assistance the North gets in return. Bush administration officials say that the current draft calls for North Korea to shut down and seal its main nuclear facilities within two months in exchange for shipments of fuel oil from South Korea and the opening of talks with Washington over diplomatic recognition.

But the process now seems stuck on the fine print of exactly how much help North Korea is demanding. Aleksandr Losyukov, the top Russian negotiator, said the parties had not decided on final figures for assistance, and he declined to detail the amounts requested by North Korea.

“The biggest obstacle to reaching a joint statement remains on the issue of economic aid,” said Mr. Losyukov, according to Xinhua, China’s official news agency.

However, at least one diplomat suggested that the process faced more than one problem. “The situation continues to be severe,” Kenichiro Sasae, the Japanese envoy, told reporters. “We are boiling down our problems, but there is no conclusion in sight for several issues.”

Kyodo, the Japanese news agency, quoted an unidentified diplomatic source as saying that North Korea had demanded the equivalent of about two million tons of fuel oil annually, a figure that stunned other participants.

Mr. Hill, speaking to reporters late Saturday night, said North Korea wanted “a very precise measurement with how we are going to get through this.” He predicted that the problem could be solved. “We are kind of reaching a point where we have got to solve this,” he said.

US Envoy Says Time To 'Wrap Up' NKorea Talks (AFP)

AFP, February 11, 2007

The US envoy to talks on disarming North Korea has expressed impatience over Pyongyang's fixation on a detail in a draft deal that he said could be resolved later.

"I think it's time to wrap this up and get going," US negotiator Christopher Hill told reporters in Beijing Sunday morning before beginning a fourth day of negotiations.

"I hope the other participants will share that view that it's time to get it over with."

The six-nation talks on dismantling North Korea's nuclear arms programmes -- which also group South Korea, Japan, Russia and hosts China -- failed to strike a deal Saturday, with Hill saying only one sticking point remained.

The specific point has not been revealed, but discussions have centred on China's draft accord outlining steps the five parties would take in order for North Korea to disarm, including an aid package for Pyongyang.

Hill said the detail in dispute is one that should be worked out later by specialists.

"Frankly, an issue of this kind is more appropriate for experts," he said.

However, Hill said he planned to meet North Korean negotiator Kim Kye-Gwan again on Sunday and expressed hope that the talks could wrap up by the end of the day.

But that upbeat view was contradicted by South Korea's envoy, Chun Yung-Woo.

"It looks unreasonable to expect a breakthrough today," Chun told reporters as he left his hotel for the talks.

DOJ_NMG_0130580

Under the draft agreement, North Korea would close its main nuclear-related facilities, including a five-megawatt reactor at Yongbyon, within two months in return for alternative energy sources, press reports have said.

The potential breakthrough comes after North Korea conducted its first atomic test in October last year.

Analysis: N. Korea Debating Nuke Future (AP)

By Burt Herman, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 11, 2007

North Korea is a totalitarian state where simply mishandling a portrait of leader Kim Jong Il is considered a crime. That doesn't mean there is no internal debate as the regime weighs whether to dismantle its nuclear weapons program.

At the North Korean nuclear negotiations in Beijing, the U.S. envoy alluded to disputes in the communist nation over whether the regime can give up its most potent weapons without sacrificing its security.

Some in the North "understand that these weapons have done more to isolate and endanger and impoverish the DPRK than they will ever do to protect" it, Christopher Hill said Friday, referring to North Korea by the initials of its official name. "Alas, I don't think this is a universal view in the DPRK."

Hill said there was one group with a "very antiquated, and I would say isolated view that somehow nuclear weapons of this kind can create prestige."

He did not give names. But analysts widely believe there are divisions between North Korean military and diplomats, a tug-of-war that sends mixed signals to an outside world with little information about the country's internal policy struggles.

The United States, China, Japan, Russia and South Korea are trying to win a commitment from the North to make its first tangible steps toward abandoning its nuclear programs since the negotiations began in 2003. That goal has become more pressing since the North tested its first nuclear bomb in October, during one of the many deadlocks in the talks.

For Kim, going nuclear has been one way to solidify his authoritarian rule among the military. He has generally favored the armed forces under his proclaimed "Songun," or "military-first" policy, in which the military has the primary role in society.

The military has quashed past diplomatic initiatives, including efforts at detente between North and South Korea. Last year, they refused to allow a test run of trains across the peninsula's heavily fortified border because security arrangements had not been made.

At this round of nuclear negotiations, however, North Korea has committed in principle to taking the first steps toward disarmament. A Chinese draft agreement would grant the communist nation unspecified energy aid for shutting down its main nuclear facilities within two months, South Korea's Yonhap news agency reported.

Talks ended Saturday without consensus, and Hill said disagreements had come down to a single issue that may take another day or two to resolve. He declined to say what the issue was.

South Korean envoy Chun Yung-woo hinted that the dispute was related to North Korea's long-standing demand that Washington drop its "hostile" policy toward Pyongyang.

"There is something that North Korea has said every time since long ago as to what should be the basis (for the agreement)," Chun said.

Japanese envoy Kenichiro Sasae said the North was still "very much apart from that of the other" five countries involved. "We are boiling down our problems but there is no conclusion in sight for several issues," he said.

On Sunday, Sasae said one of the issues frustrating negotiations was the North's demands for large amounts of energy aid.

North Korea is demanding it be given energy aid equivalent to 2 million kilowatts of electricity during the initial disarmament period, Yonhap said. Japan's Kyodo news agency quoted unidentified diplomats as saying that North Korea was also seeking 2 million tons of fuel oil as part of the deal.

Russian envoy Alexander Losyukov said Saturday the size of the aid package was being discussed, the Interfax news agency reported. "The most important task today is to define the amount of planned aid," he was quoted as saying.

Two other key issues that have previously stalled the negotiations have not been problematic this time, Hill said. They include U.S. restrictions on a bank where the North held accounts for its complicity in alleged financial crimes, and demands that North Korea be given a nuclear reactor for generating electricity.

DOJ_NMG_0130581

___

Burt Herman is chief of bureau in Korea for The Associated Press.

Palestinian Tout Unity Deal To World (AP)

AP, February 11, 2007

The Palestinians have begun a diplomatic blitz aimed at persuading reticent leaders in the U.S. and Europe to accept their new power-sharing deal and lift painful economic sanctions, officials said Saturday.

Palestinian representatives already have spoken to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and the U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon. Next week, they turn their efforts to European leaders, beginning with Germany.

"We are trying to market the agreement and get international support for it," Nabil Amr, a top aide to President Mahmoud Abbas, told The Associated Press.

Western governments and Israel have only given muted reactions to Thursday's agreement between Abbas' Fatah faction and the Islamic militant group Hamas _ dashing Palestinian hopes that the deal would lead to a quick end to the sanctions.

International leaders said they want to study the deal further and see whether it changes the situation on the ground.

The Quartet of Mideast mediators _ the U.S., the U.N., Russia and the European Union _ had demanded that the militant Hamas group, which won Palestinian parliamentary elections last year, recognize Israel's right to exist, renounce violence and accept past peace deals.

The deal, negotiated in the Saudi holy city of Mecca, says only that the new government pledges to "respect" the previous deals. It makes no reference to recognizing Israel or renouncing violence and appears to fall short of the Quartet's demands.

Abbas, a moderate Fatah leader who pushed for a deal for months, is hoping that personal diplomacy with every member of the Quartet will help end the embargo imposed on the Palestinian Authority after Hamas' election last year.

The embargo has frozen roughly $1 billion in annual foreign aid and about $500 million in tax revenues Israel collects on behalf of the Palestinians, crippling the Palestinian government.

Amr said he would head this week to Germany, which holds the rotating presidency of the EU, and then travel to Belgium to meet with Javier Solana, the EU's chief foreign policy envoy. "We urge the officials in Europe to exert efforts to lift the siege imposed on the government," he said.

Abbas, meanwhile, plans meetings with the pro-Western leaders of Egypt and Jordan. He also plans to meet Russian President Vladimir Putin in Amman, Jordan on Tuesday.

"There will be contacts with other countries to clarify the program," said Nimr Hamad, another Abbas adviser. He said was optimistic that European leaders would accept the government program.

The new Palestinian government program could put Western leaders in a difficult position.

While apparently falling short of Quartet demands, it goes a long way toward ending months of Palestinian infighting that has killed more than 130 people, and the international community might be reluctant to take any steps that could renew tensions.

Hamas also appears to be giving Abbas approval to pursue peace talks with Israel. Abbas is scheduled to meet with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Rice on Feb. 19.

Abbas' aide Abed Rabbo said Rice told him she was skeptical that Hamas would abide by the deal, but she would reserve judgment until it was implemented.

America wants the new government to stop Gaza militants from launching rockets at Israel, prevent other attacks and respect previously signed agreements, he said. Accepting past peace deals has been perceived as implicit recognition of Israel's right to exist.

"The Americans are worried that Hamas will not succeed in this test," he said.

Ahmed Youssef, a top aide to Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas, was noncommittal when asked whether the group would recognize Israel. "The declaration of Mecca did not mention anything about recognition of Israel," he said.

Israel planned to give an official response to the Palestinian program at its weekly Cabinet meeting on Sunday.

Vice Premier Shimon Peres said in an interview with the German weekly focus that "we will study the agreement and then judge it." But in the comments published Saturday, he said Hamas must recognize Israel if it wants negotiations.

DOJ_NMG_0130582

Hamas, listed as a terror group by Israel, the United States and the EU, is responsible for scores of deadly suicide bombings in Israel.

Previous efforts to form a national unity government have foundered, though none has ever come this far. Still, there were fears that the new deal could unravel in coming weeks as the two sides choose ministers.

A Very Partial Palestinian Peace (NYT)

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

Peace with Israel was not the subject of the summit meeting Palestinian leaders held in Mecca last week. The Saudi government summoned the leaders of Hamas and Fatah to negotiate a halt in their incipient civil war, which was alarming and embarrassing the Arab world.

Still, the vaguely worded agreement, and the creation of a coalition cabinet, might make peace with Israel more imaginable — if there is a lot more compromise from Hamas and a lot more diplomatic help from Washington.

Hamas and Fatah have reached understandings before, only to have them unravel. This deal could prove more durable because of the heavy investment of Saudi diplomatic capital and the dire financial condition of the Palestinian Authority.

Before Europe and the United States will release aid to the authority, Hamas must recognize Israel, renounce violence and abide by previous agreements between Israel and the Palestinians. What Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian president and a Fatah leader, managed to extract from Hamas last week was far less — an agreement merely to respect international agreements and resolutions previously agreed to when Fatah was in charge.

That grudging and highly equivocal concession is further than Hamas had gone. It will be parsed in various ways by various interested parties for weeks to come. But what really matters is how Hamas acts. The most important action would be a credible effort by the joint Hamas and Fatah government to detect and thwart terrorist attacks against Israel. Saudi Arabia is reportedly ready to offer the Palestinian government a large aid package. That might help show Hamas the advantages of improved behavior. But Riyadh should make clear that continued aid will require clear proof that the new government is reining in terrorism.

Whether Hamas is prepared to take that crucial step is doubtful. Israel and the United States should encourage it by making clear that an all-out effort against terrorism would radically improve the negotiating climate — and open the aid spigots.

Given the current political paralysis in Israel, Washington will have to take the lead in sending this message. That will take more courage than the Bush administration has yet managed to muster. Mr. Bush has wasted more than six years without coming up with a serious policy for reducing violence between Israel and the Palestinians and promoting diplomacy.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is set to meet with Israel's prime minister, Ehud Olmert, and Mr. Abbas a week from tomorrow. Her past trips to the region have been empty exercises. By recognizing last week's minimal Palestinian pact as a potential starting point, the White House could give her a chance to improve on that dismal record.

Calm Prevails In Jerusalem On Day After Excavation Clashes (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

JERUSALEM, Feb. 10 — A few stone-throwing incidents occurred Saturday, but Jerusalem streets were largely quiet a day after the police clashed with Palestinians protesting Israeli construction work near the religious compound known to Muslims as the Noble Sanctuary and to Jews as the Temple Mount.

Some tires were burned and rocks thrown at police officers in east Jerusalem, an area largely populated by Arabs, and some rocks were thrown at a bus full of Canadian tourists near the Mount of Olives, said a Jerusalem police spokesman, Inspector Micky Rosenfeld. "No one was injured, and as far as we are concerned, things are relatively calm and quiet," Inspector Rosenfeld said. The police presence, he said, was down from 2,000 officers on Friday.

In Bethlehem, some 30 Palestinians were arrested Saturday after brief clashes with Israeli troops near Rachel's Tomb, the police said.

The renovations have preoccupied Palestinian and pan-Arab news coverage in the week since the work began. The site, a man-made plateau where Jewish temples stood before their destruction in ancient times, is now occupied by Al Aksa Mosque and the Dome of the Rock and is regarded by Muslims as the third-holiest site in Islam, controlled by a trust called the Islamic Waqf.

DOJ_NMG_0130583

The coverage has been full of charges and anxieties that the Israeli work, which is to reconstruct a ramp to the mount for visitors, is a secret preparation to take over the area and rebuild a temple, or at the least is intended to damage the mosque and the Dome of the Rock by undermining their foundations.

Statements of concern and opposition have come from Palestinian, Egyptian and Jordanian leaders, as well as clerics throughout the Muslim world, including in Iran, Indonesia and Malaysia. On Saturday, the Arab League called on the world to press Israel to stop the excavations, which it termed "criminal."

Israeli officials have called such charges nonsense and have promised that the renovation will not disturb the mount or damage any structures there. They say the work, scheduled to last eight months, will take place alongside the mount but not on it and has been coordinated with all relevant organizations.

"Whoever needed to be informed was informed," Inspector Rosenfeld said. "Both security and Muslim leaders, the Waqf and Israeli Arabs leaders knew exactly what will take place and when."

The sensitivity of the area is without dispute. In 2000, the second intifada broke out after a controversial visit to the site by Ariel Sharon, then the opposition leader. Whether Mr. Sharon's visit was responsible for sparking the intifada, a charge disputed by many Israelis, his visit was used to incite Palestinian protests and anger, and the intifada is known as the "Aksa intifada."

There was no construction work on Friday and Saturday, but it is expected to resume Sunday morning with excavation work to anchor supports for a new permanent ramp.

On Friday, the United States supported Israel's right to perform the work, but urged the Israelis to be careful of the "sensitivities" of others when carrying out repair work.

The Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, has also criticized the project and described Friday's clashes, in which 17 Palestinians were lightly wounded, 17 were arrested and 19 Israeli police officers were hurt, as a "day of anger."

A former aide to Mr. Abbas, Walid M. Awad, issued a long statement on Friday in which he accused Israel of working gradually to "Judaize" the Arab areas of Jerusalem and to take over the Noble Sanctuary, also known as Haram al-Sharif. Mr. Awad is the foreign press spokesman for the Central Media Commission of Fatah, Mr. Abbas's faction in the Palestinian Authority.

The renovation work, Mr. Awad charged, "is part and parcel of extensive Israeli efforts that began in June 1967 designed to undermine Islamic holy sites and construct the 'Jewish Temple.'

"The Israeli claim that it is only renovating or maintaining the said road is completely false," he continued, "for if that was its objective, it could have brought in the Islamic Waqf Authority, and asked them to fix the problem."

Mr. Awad also said that while Mr. Abbas "is trying to contain the situation in our area, calming it down and bringing together a collective Palestinian effort in support of an expected resumption of genuine peace talks between the Palestinian people and Israel, it seems Israel is more interested in undermining these efforts."

Small groups of Jewish extremists have said they would like to destroy the mosque and build a temple.

The harsh Muslim criticisms and the Arabic coverage have been taken seriously by Israeli officials, some of whom suggest that the issue is intended to divert attention from Palestinian infighting, while others echo Khaled Abu Toameh, a journalist for The Jerusalem Post who compares the atmosphere to the days just before the 2000 intifada.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel has said the work will continue, even after his rival and defense minister, Amir Peretz, simultaneously gave him and Israeli newspapers a letter warning him to stop the work to avoid security problems.

An Israeli Islamic leader, Sheik Raed Salah, said he has planned "a full program of protests for the coming weeks in order to stop the Israeli crimes against Al Aksa Mosque," adding, "Continuing the work will increase tension and anger among Palestinians and in the Arab-Islamic world."

A leader of the Islamic Movement in northern Israel, Sheik Salah spent two years in jail on charges of raising money for Hamas but was released in 2005. He has been barred from the construction area.

In Gaza, Palestinians expressed hope that Thursday's agreement between Mr. Abbas and Hamas leaders in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, would bring an end to factional fighting and result in a government that could again pay them their full salaries. Members of the so-called quartet — the United States, European Union, Russia and the United Nations — were cautious, saying that much about the deal remained unfinished or unclear, but Russia independently said restrictions should be lifted once the new government was formed.

DOJ_NMG_0130584

The quartet announced that it would meet on Feb. 21 in Berlin.

Clashes By Jerusalem Holy Site Continue (AP)

By Laurie Copans, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 11, 2007

Sporadic Palestinian protests, including a rock-throwing attack on a busload of Canadian tourists, broke out in Jerusalem and the West Bank on Saturday over Israel's construction of a ramp leading to a flashpoint holy site.

The demonstrations came the day after Israeli police raided the mosque compound, firing tear gas and stun grenades at rioting Muslims. Protests have spread throughout the world as Muslim leaders accused Israel of trying to damage the Islamic shrines.

Israel denies the repair work will come anywhere near the holy site, known to Muslims as the Noble Sanctuary and to Jews as the Temple Mount.

In Jerusalem, a few dozen Palestinian teenagers threw stones at Israeli security forces at the walled Old City, burning an Israeli flag at one point. At the Mount of Olives holy site, Palestinians pelted a Canadian tour bus, but no one was injured.

"We were just driving and all of a sudden a bunch of kids started picking up rocks and whatever they could get their hands on and started throwing it at the bus," said Dave Wood, one of the tourists. "This is our first day in the Holy City and it was quite disturbing to say the least."

Israeli police arrested a total of 17 protesters in the Jerusalem protests that were "relatively quiet," police spokesman Shmuel Ben-Ruby said. The Israeli crews did not work on the ramp Saturday, the Jewish Sabbath.

In the West Bank town of Bethlehem, dozens of Palestinian youths threw rocks at Israeli soldiers guarding a checkpoint into Jerusalem. The soldiers detained 30 protesters, the army said.

In a similar protest in the West Bank city of Hebron, police responded with tear gas and rubber-coated bullets. No injuries were reported in either demonstration.

In anticipation of further protests in Jerusalem on Sunday when the work will resume, police will maintain a beefed-up force and restrictions at the mosque compound, barring all Muslim men under the age of 45 from praying there, Ben-Ruby said.

On Friday, about 200 riot police streamed onto the compound shooting stun grenades and tear gas when some of the 3,000 Muslim worshippers there threw rocks at them. Clouds of tear gas rose into the sky and sharp booms pierced the air.

The compound — a catalyst for earlier rounds of Israel-Palestinian fighting — is home to the third holiest site in Islam and is believed to be the site where the Prophet Muhammad ascended to heaven.

Jews venerate the compound as the site of their biblical temples, and one of its outer walls — known as the Western Wall — is the holiest site in Judaism.

The Israelis say the purpose of the construction project is to build a new walkway leading to the mount to replace a ramp that was damaged in a 2004 snowstorm. But the Palestinians say the excavations are actually attempts to damage their shrines.

Israeli officials reject that accusation and say they are not digging under the compound since the work is about 200 feet away from the mount.

The Arab League chief said Saturday the dig reflects "Israeli attempts" to tighten control over Jerusalem and urged the international community to intercede.

"There are plans to change the features of the city," Amr Moussa said in a statement distributed to the Arab representatives at an emergency League meeting in Cairo. The statement said the construction "is threatening the security and stability in the region."

Jordan and Egypt — Israel's sole Arab peace partners and key U.S. allies in the region — have demanded the Jewish state stop the work, as did Indonesia, the world's most populous Muslim nation.

Malaysia, which chairs the 57-member Organization of Islamic Conference, urged the international community to intervene immediately to stop the "illegal activities."

DOJ_NMG_0130585

___

Associated Press writer Maggie Michael in Cairo contributed to this report.

Protest Targets Tourists, Police (WT/AP)

By Ravi Nessman

The Washington Times, February 11, 2007

JERUSALEM -- Palestinian teenagers threw rocks at Israeli police and attacked a Canadian tourist bus yesterday in a new wave of protests against Israeli construction work near a flash point holy site in Jerusalem.

The violence came a day after police stormed the disputed compound in the Old City, using tear gas and stun grenades to disperse Muslims, who rioted after Friday prayers.

Protests against the construction have spread throughout the Muslim world, where demonstrators accused Israel of plotting to harm Islamic shrines.

Israel denies the repair work and accompanying excavations will come anywhere near the compound, known as the Temple Mount to Jews and the Noble Sanctuary to Muslims.

Sporadic violence continued yesterday as Palestinian teenagers set large garbage containers on fire in the streets of East Jerusalem just outside the Old City and threw rocks at police nearby.

Some of the rocks smashed the windows of cars parked on the side of the road. They also set fire to an Israeli flag. Other small protests broke out inside the Old City, police said.

The police, some on horseback and others in riot gear, responded by firing tear gas to disperse the protesters and arrested 15.

Angry Palestinians also pelted a bus carrying vacationing Canadians on a tour of the Mount of Olives holy site in East Jerusalem.

"We were just driving and all of a sudden a bunch of kids started picking up rocks and whatever they could get their hands on and started throwing it at the bus," said Dave Wood, one of the tourists. "This is our first day in the Holy City and it was quite disturbing to say the least."

A police station in East Jerusalem also was stoned, police spokesman Shmuel Ben-Ruby said. No one was injured in the incidents yesterday, he said.

Police kept a beefed-up force in the city and maintained restrictions at the holy site, barring all Muslim men under the age of 45 from praying there yesterday.

In the West Bank town of Bethlehem, dozens of Palestinians threw stones at Israeli soldiers, and the soldiers arrested 30 Palestinians, the army said.

In the southern West Bank city of Hebron, Palestinian youths threw stones at Israeli soldiers, who fired tear gas and rubber-coated steel bullets, witnesses said. Six protesters were treated for gas inhalation, medical officials said.

On Friday, about 200 riot police streamed into the Temple Mount compound and scuffled with some of the 3,000 Muslim worshippers there. Clouds of tear gas rose into the sky and sharp booms pierced the air.

The compound -- a catalyst for earlier rounds of Israel-Palestinian fighting -- is home to the golden-capped Dome of the Rock shrine and Al Aqsa mosque, and Muslims believe it to be the site where the prophet Muhammad ascended to heaven. It is the third-holiest site in Islam.

Jews venerate the compound as the site of their biblical temples, and one of its outer walls -- known as the Western Wall -- is the holiest site in Judaism.

Jewish Inroads In Muslim Quarter (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

JERUSALEM, Feb. 10 -- From the roof of his home just inside the Old City walls, Palestinian landlord Nasser Karain has a view of the valleys and plateaus where scriptures say Solomon built the first Temple, Jesus was betrayed and Muhammad rose to heaven.

DOJ_NMG_0130586

A new landmark may soon rise next to his family compound.

The Israeli government is funding the first construction of a Jewish settlement in the Old City's Muslim Quarter since taking control of it nearly four decades ago. The Flowers Gate development plan calls for more than 20 apartments and a domed synagogue that would alter the skyline of the Old City.

Karain's property is at the center of an accelerating campaign by Jewish settler organizations to change the ethnic and physical character of this city's oldest Arab neighborhoods. The Israeli government is financing projects that dovetail with the settlers' goals, which they say are to secure the Old City and an adjacent valley for Israel in any final peace agreement with the Palestinians.

Resistance is growing. Last week, Palestinians protested throughout the West Bank over an Israeli renovation project in the Old City, leading to some of the worst clashes with Israeli police in years. Surrounded by crenelated walls, the Old City is divided into four quarters -- Armenian, Christian, Jewish and Muslim -- that contain some of the holiest sites in Christendom, Islam and Judaism.

The Flowers Gate development would expand a nearby enclave where two Jewish families now live in red-roofed bungalows just feet from Karain's home. The settler organization Ateret Cohanim has begun showing prospective residents the strip of land designated for the synagogue and apartments.

Karain is watching the project encircle his compound. He said Jerusalem city officials have denied his many applications to add a second story to his home as his family has grown to include 33 grandchildren. His new neighbors, whose children are escorted to school by armed guards, have offered several times to buy his property for millions of dollars. He refused the most recent bid just months ago.

"I wouldn't want anyone in this place except family now," said Karain, born 63 years ago in the house he inherited from his father. "I'd be afraid they'd sell to settlers."

The settlers' parcel-by-parcel campaign is unfolding within a single square mile bordered by ancient ramparts and sheer valley walls. Israel seized the Old City, the adjacent valley known as the Holy Basin and the rest of East Jerusalem from Jordan in the 1967 Middle East war, later annexing them. The move gave the 250,000 Palestinians of East Jerusalem residency status and the right to vote in local elections, but the annexation is not recognized internationally.

The Jewish population of the Old City makes up about 9 percent of its 35,400 residents, nearly all concentrated in the Jewish Quarter. Under a U.S.-brokered agreement reached in January 2001, Israel would have maintained control of the Jewish Quarter and part of the Armenian Quarter. The Muslim and Christian Quarters would have come under Palestinian authority in the deal, which collapsed soon after.

Only a few dozen Jewish families live among the approximately 20,000 Palestinian residents of the Holy Basin, a picturesque crescent that encompasses the Kidron Valley, parts of the Mount of Olives, and the hillside neighborhood that Jews call the City of David and Palestinians call Wadi Hilweh. Israel suggested international oversight of the Holy Basin at the 2001 talks, an informal proposal the Palestinians rejected.

The effort to expand the Jewish presence in the Old City and Holy Basin, a cause of violent protest over the past century, had been largely dormant since a 1992 state commission found that government agencies were illegally channeling public funds to private settler organizations and allowing them insider access to seized Palestinian property.

That partnership has been revived in pursuit of identical goals. The same settler groups are working now in tandem with the government as they purchase Palestinian property at a time of deep recession in the occupied territories, build new housing and promote the Jewish historical claim to the Old City and Holy Basin. The Israeli government plans to spend $106 million in the area on housing development, tourist centers and historic renovation near contested religious sites through 2013 -- money that began flowing last year.

"The conflict is being reduced to its volcanic core," said Daniel Seidemann, a Jerusalem lawyer and critic of Israel's land-use policy in the city.The Old City

A short walk along sloping alleys from the Flowers Gate compound, the Via Dolorosa joins al-Wad Street, forming the crossroads of three faiths.

DOJ_NMG_0130587

On any Friday afternoon, families of ultra-Orthodox Jews stroll among Muslim men, each heading toward the plateau that Jews know as the Temple Mount and Muslims as the Haram al-Sharif, or Noble Sanctuary. Christian pilgrims walk among them tracing Jesus's final steps, monitored by some of the 400 closed-circuit Israeli police cameras that continuously watch over the Old City.

Along the way, new signs depicting the sanctuary's 1,300-year-old al-Aqsa mosque hang above entrances to shawarma shops and boutiques. Funded by an Islamic organization in Israel as a response to new Jewish settlement activity, the signs emphasize the Islamic character of the quarter.

Ateret Cohanim, an organization named for the crown worn by members of the ancient Jewish priesthood, seeks to rebuild the Temple on the al-Aqsa site and is the primary settler group working within the Old City walls. To move Jews into the Muslim and Christian quarters, the group buys property in ways that have been challenged in court over the years. The 1992 Klugman Commission named it as a prime beneficiary of illegal government help.

"Our goal is to reestablish the Jewish presence in all of the Old City," said Ezra Waner, 26, a student at the Ateret Cohanim Yeshiva, which has existed periodically in the Muslim Quarter for 120 years. "Slowly, slowly, we want to bring the Jews back."

Jews control 75 to 80 buildings, homes and single stories of apartment complexes in the Muslim and Christian quarters, according to Israeli and Palestinian officials. Most of the properties, a small fraction of the total in those areas, are along routes to the Western Wall, where Jews pray at the base of the Temple Mount.

"Sometimes it takes 10 years of work just to buy one house," said Waner, who moved to Israel from South Africa 14 years ago. "And even then the Arabs will take everything out of it, even the electrical wiring, before turning it over."

The yeshiva entrance runs through a low, damp tunnel, just down al-Wad Street from the several-story building that Ariel Sharon, then Israel's infrastructure minister, bought in the 1980s. He purchased the place to create a symbolic Jewish presence in the Muslim Quarter, where Waner said 3,000 Jews lived during the British mandate that preceded Israel's founding in 1948.

Drifting out from behind locked gates, student prayers echo from crowded rooms where antique chandeliers provide young men the light to study the Torah and Talmud. During the 1936 Arab riots, the yeshiva's 100 or so students collected the Torah scrolls and fled. Waner said an Arab watchman held the keys, handing them to yeshiva officials after the 1967 war.

"Before the war there was no Muslim Quarter and no Jewish Quarter," Waner said in a book-lined room overflowing with young men. "We tell our stories. Soon all of them here will learn."

Adnan Husseini, the Jerusalem director of the Waqf, the Islamic land trust that has authority over the al-Aqsa mosque complex, traces his Palestinian family's Jerusalem roots back 800 years. His office overlooks the olive grove and cypress stands of the Haram al-Sharif, his centuries-old walls rising into vaulted ceilings above his cluttered desk.

"They have failed to control the city," he said. "And they will never succeed."

Husseini, a 59-year-old engineer wearing gold-rim half-glasses and a cardigan, said Jewish settlers with help from the Israeli government are "destroying the scale of the city" by pushing large symbolic projects in the Muslim Quarter and in contested religious areas.

He cited the Flowers Gate synagogue, which requires several more layers of approval, and the project to build a wider ramp from the Western Wall plaza to the Mugrabi Gate, the entrance to the mosque complex used by Israeli soldiers and tourists. Walls dating to the 7th-century Umayyad rule are threatened by the work, and Muslim concern prompted last week's protests.

"They want to create a new situation, a new conflict," Husseini said. "Jerusalem is in danger."

From the Old City ramparts above the Flowers Gate project, Jon Seligman, Jerusalem director of the Israel Antiquities Authority, looked toward a horizon spiked with spires and minarets. The only Jewish buildings that once appeared there were a pair of synagogues, destroyed by Jordan during its nearly two-decade reign.

"Whether a Jewish presence on the skyline is appropriate is something that can be legitimately raised," said Seligman, referring to the Flowers Gate synagogue. "It is something that is present for all other major religions here except Judaism."

More than half of Seligman's budget comes from construction projects that require preliminary excavations, which at the Flowers Gate site have revealed the thick stone walls of a 600-year-old Arab neighborhood. Plans call for the synagogue to be built above it.The Holy Basin

DOJ_NMG_0130588

Just outside the Old City walls, the beige limestone hillside dips sharply to the Kidron Valley floor. Homes with arched windows and iron balconies are packed tightly along narrow streets, where Jewish settler groups have been buying Palestinian property and moving in behind high fences and guard towers.

But the hillside expanses of Jewish and Muslim cemeteries, strips of parkland and the remnants of ancient stone walls have given Jewish settler groups in the Holy Basin more to work with than in the cramped confines of the Old City -- open land and an abundance of archaeological sites useful in promoting the historic Jewish claim to the area.

Stone steps 2,000 years old rise from the Siloam Pool, climbing into a tunnel toward the Western Wall hundreds of feet above. Among the few people who have seen the recently discovered steps is David Beeri, a spry 53-year-old whose organization is financing the excavation.

"Every step is important," said Beeri, founder of Elad, a private organization that moves Jewish settlers into the Holy Basin, oversees its main archaeological sites and finances new digs. "Every step is a story."

The story that brought Beeri to this place began before his birth. His father was saved from a firing-squad pit at Auschwitz by a German officer he had befriended -- giving his future son "a mission" to work on behalf of Jews.

Beeri first saw the City of David in the 1980s as a soldier disguised as an Arab in an army undercover unit. After the first Palestinian uprising ended with the 1993 Oslo accords, he moved his wife and six children into a hillside house he said he bought from a Palestinian family through a third party.

Beeri pointed to large holes at the edges of the steps that revealed a musty tunnel beneath. Israeli archaeologists have discovered food-storage jars and coins dating to the 1st-century Jewish rebellion against the Romans. According to Roman histories, soldiers pulled escaping Jewish rebels from a tunnel, slaying them with swords. Beeri believes this is the place it happened.

"The Romans are no longer here, but we have come back," he said.

Beeri's organization, Elad, works with the National Parks Protection Authority, the Jerusalem municipality and the Jewish National Fund, an agency that controls large tracts of land in the Holy Basin purchased in the 1920s by Baron Edmond James de Rothschild. The Klugman Commission said government agencies gave Elad privileged access to at least two dozen houses in the area, including some seized from Palestinians under the absentee-property law Israel imposed after the 1948 war.

Elad says it and its partners control more than 55 percent of the Holy Basin. The organization owns the City of David visitors center, the entrance to some of Jerusalem's most important archaeological sites. Elad officials say 250,000 visitors came to the center last year -- a tenfold increase from 2001.

Beeri's house is on a path paved with cut stones and lined with the same street signs seen in the city's western neighborhoods. Israeli critics say the intention is to make the neighborhood indistinguishable from West Jerusalem.

"This area poses enormous challenges for the Palestinian national movement," said Meir Margalit, a Jew and former Jerusalem councilman now with the nonprofit Israeli Committee Against House Demolitions. "The biggest problem here is temptation. The settlers come with suitcases full of cash and say, 'Take it.' "

Elad sometimes offers three times the market rate for homes near important archaeological sites, Beeri said. "We must do this in a legal way on the free market. And in doing so, we think we can change the future of this part of Jerusalem."

Over the years, several dozen Jewish families have moved into homes that Elad has purchased from Palestinians, some of whom faced demolition orders from the Jerusalem city government for building or expanding without proper permits.

"At times we are pushed to despair," said Fakhri Abu Diab, 44, a Palestinian who heads a homeowners group in the area along the Kidron Valley floor. His house, set in a courtyard of lemon and olive trees, sage and wild thyme, is among 88 in the area slated for demolition to make way for an Israeli national park.

The demolition orders were frozen two years ago, amid protest. But they have not been lifted, and Abu Diab and his neighbors continue to pay fines for building without permits. Margalit, the former Jerusalem councilman, said only about 120 permits were granted in East Jerusalem last year.

That is one-tenth the number needed to accommodate growth, Israeli critics say. They contend the dearth drives Palestinians to look elsewhere for room to raise families. Just up the hill, Beeri is putting in a new floor and adding rooms to his house.

DOJ_NMG_0130589

"A human being is at the end only a human being, and there is only so much he can take," said Abu Diab, the Palestinian, who grew up swimming in the Siloam Pool, where the Bible says Jesus cured a blind man, now behind locked gates controlled by Elad and the park service. "But the majority of us remain steadfast."

Most Palestinians have resisted offers to sell their homes, facing deadly reprisals if they accept. But settler leaders said two recent developments have made it easier for Jews to acquire Palestinian property.

The international aid boycott of the Palestinian Authority imposed after Hamas's election a year ago has ravaged the economy in the territories, prompting more Palestinians in East Jerusalem to sell their land out of financial necessity. In addition, they said, the 24-foot-high wall Israel is building around Jerusalem has nearly sealed the city off from the West Bank, home to armed Palestinian groups opposed to selling property to settlers, offering a sense of protection for those who do sell.

But the threat has not disappeared. In April, a Palestinian father of eight, Mohammed Abu al-Hawa, sold his apartment building in the A-Tur neighborhood of the Mount of Olives, which lies on Israel's side of the wall. Days later his body was found tortured and burned near Jericho. The purchase marked the first Jewish foothold in the neighborhood, which has a vivid view of the Temple Mount stretching across the ridgeline to the west.

Portugal To Vote On Putting End To Abortion Ban (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

LISBON, Feb. 9 — Last week, children from two Roman Catholic day-care centers in the port city of Setúbal were sent home with a most unusual note: a fictional letter from a fetus to the woman who conceived and aborted it.

“Mommy, how were you able to kill me?” the letter read. “How were you able to allow me to be cut up in pieces and thrown into a bucket?”

The Rev. Miguel Alves, the day-care center director who sent the letters, defended his action as perfectly normal, adding, “There’s no reason for indignation.”

The letter reflects one view in a passionate, often raw campaign to sway voters before a referendum this Sunday on whether Portugal should decriminalize abortion.

But it infuriated abortion-rights advocates and some of the children’s parents, and it even made some opponents of the referendum uneasy.

“It was completely incorrect, low class,” said Manuel de Lemos, a lawyer who runs a confederation of Catholic charitable organizations and opposes liberalization of the law. He added: “Yes, abortion is an issue for the Catholic Church. But it is also a moral issue. Preserving life is essential in a civilized world. And we should do all that we can to create the conditions for women to avoid the trauma, the violence of abortion.”

With one of the most restrictive abortion laws in the European Union, Portugal is also the only member state that has put on trial women who undergo illegal abortions, the health care providers who perform them and even so-called accomplices like husbands or family members.

The referendum, if approved, would be the first step toward both legalizing abortion in the first 10 weeks of pregnancy and allowing women to openly seek medical support from the state-run health system. In that case, Parliament is expected to pass it quickly into law.

But in this overwhelmingly Catholic country, the referendum has pitted the Socialist government against the Roman Catholic Church and exposed divisions within the church itself.

It has recalled the stories of botched backstreet abortions that ended in mutilation and even death, and the humiliation of women who have been charged and tried. And it has set off a debate on whether more than three decades after the end of its dictatorship, Portugal has become a “modern” European country.

“This is an important moment for Portugal because it’s a chance to shed the image that we are in the Middle Ages,” said Maria de Belém Roseira, a Socialist deputy and a former health minister. “We had the Inquisition here, and we still have people who want to publicly punish women. That a woman who ends an unwanted pregnancy can be sent to prison is unacceptable and hypocritical.”

DOJ_NMG_0130590

Women who have been prosecuted for having abortions have been punished not with prison but with suspended sentences and a fine. But health-care professionals have been punished more severely. In one highly publicized trial that ended in 2002, a hospital nurse spent four years in prison for conducting illegal abortions.

The criminal aspect of abortion here is widely seen as unfair to women, even by much of the church and supporters of the no vote.

"This practice is so stupid, so inhumane," said Marcelo Rebelo de Sousa, a political commentator and the former leader of the center-right Social Democratic Party who opposes approval of the referendum. "This is very Portuguese — you have the law and you have the social reality."

The validity of the referendum hinges on whether more than 50 percent of the country's 8.8 million voters cast their ballots. A similar referendum in 1998 took place on a sunny Sunday in June, when many Portuguese were at the beach. Only 32 percent of the electorate turned up at the polls, voting by a razor-thin margin to retain the existing law. The result was declared invalid.

Last fall, opinion polls showed that more than 70 percent of voters supported a change in the law, although recent surveys indicate a drop in support to slightly less than 60 percent. Several polls have shown that about 40 percent are either undecided or will not vote.

The referendum has touched off the memories of women who had illegal abortions many years ago.

"There is still a stigma," said one 46-year-old educator who said she was only now able to talk to her friends about the abortion she had 18 years ago.

She and her boyfriend split the cost of the abortion, which was done by a midwife in the city of Porto. When she went for a follow-up checkup the next day, the midwife told her to look at what was in her hand. "She held up the broken fetus and said, 'See how beautiful it is. And now, into the garbage,' " she recalled.

The campaign has played out on the streets, on the Web, in churches, in health clinics and in the corridors of power.

On Thursday, two dozen Socialist members of Parliament carried green and white flags with the word sim, or yes, through one of Lisbon's main squares, buttonholing potential voters on their lunch hours. At a headquarters for youth for the no vote a few blocks away, young people sold T-shirts and handed out brochures. Plastic fetuses made in China were kept hidden in a box under the table, but were available upon request for $1.30.

Prime Minister José Sócrates, a Socialist whose center-left government enjoys a comfortable majority in Parliament, has campaigned hard in favor of the referendum, calling the country's estimated tens of thousands of illegal abortions every year "Portugal's most shameful wound."

Arguing for the official church position, Cardinal José da Cruz Policarpo, the patriarch of Lisbon, has told Catholics to uphold the "sanctity of life" and oppose any change to Portuguese law, saying the balance of Europe's race and culture is at risk as a result of low birth rates.

The practice of abortion in Portugal is among the most restrictive in the 25-country European Union. Only a few countries, including Malta (where all abortion is illegal), Ireland and Poland, have tougher laws.

Despite a legal morning-after pill and contraception use by 80 percent of women of fertility age, Portugal has the second-highest pregnancy rate among teenagers in Europe, second only to Britain.

The current law in Portugal, passed in 1984, allows abortion until the 12th week of pregnancy in case of "mental and physical risk," until 16 weeks in case of rape, until 24 weeks in case of a malformed fetus and at any time if the woman's life is in danger. It calls for prison sentences of up to three years for a woman who has an illegal abortion and up to eight years for the person who illegally performs it.

But the availability of abortion is complicated by the medical profession's narrow interpretation of the existing law. Portugal's conservative psychiatric hierarchy has ruled that an unwanted pregnancy can be a mental health issue only in the most extreme cases; most medical doctors are unwilling to challenge the conventional wisdom.

By contrast, in Spain, which has a similar law, the legislation is liberally interpreted, and abortions are routinely performed. That has created a lucrative market for legal abortions in Spain for those Portuguese women who can afford to travel there.

The Portuguese newspapers carry advertisements every day of clinics over the border in Spain offering "voluntary treatment" of pregnancy.

DOJ_NMG_0130591

Even within the clergy, there are divisions. On Thursday, a 79-year-old priest, the Rev. Manuel Costa Pinto, from the small town of Lamego, stunned the church hierarchy in declaring that he planned to vote yes.

"I don't take it lightly," he said of his decision, according to the news agency Lusa. "I know my responsibility as a Catholic and as a priest."

Calling the current law the "real infanticide," he described the crisis of women who are too poor and too afraid to terminate their pregnancies illegally. "They put their babies into a bag and throw them into the garbage, into the gutters" or "abandon them in the middle of the fields," he said.

The referendum will ask the question: "Do you agree with the decriminalization of a woman's choice to voluntarily interrupt pregnancy in the first 10 weeks, in a legally authorized health establishment?"

Supporters of the referendum have radically changed their strategy from 1998. Then, the campaign was distinctly feminist. "My belly is mine and I'll do what I want with it" was the slogan.

This time, the yes side has emphasized the importance of the health and safety of women and the need to eliminate the thriving and sometimes unsafe black market.

"There has always been a double standard in Portugal toward abortion, and that's what we want to eliminate," said Duarte Vilar, executive director of Portugal's Family Planning Association. "Even if we are Catholic, we are a soft Catholic country."

Bosnia Defies U.N. Over Dismissals In Police (NYT)

By Nicholas Wood

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

LJUBLJANA, Slovenia, Feb. 9 — Acting against the wishes of the United Nations Security Council, the Bosnian government said Friday that it would review the status of almost 800 federal and local police officers that the United Nations barred from working in 2002.

In a challenge to the United Nations, Bosnian officials said a commission was examining whether police officers were unfairly barred from employment, either on the grounds that they might have committed crimes during the 1992-1995 civil war, or on the grounds that they were not properly qualified.

The officers were dismissed in 2002 as the United Nations mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina was ending. The United Nations had a mandate to overhaul the country's police forces after the war, but only five months to check the backgrounds of the officers. The government argues that the review performed by the United Nations was flawed and rushed, and that many officers could not appeal the dismissals.

The officers have gained widespread support among Bosnia's three main ethnic groups. But the issue also has taken on a broader significance because a number of international authorities have backed the government and said mistakes were made by the United Nations during the vetting process. The government's previous demands of the United Nations to re-examine the vetting process have been supported by the office of the High Representative, Christian Schwarz-Schilling of Germany, who is Bosnia's most-senior international official, as well as Europe's main human-rights authority, the Council of Europe.

The criticisms go to the heart of the United Nations mission here and the broad freedoms it had in exerting its powers.

The origins of the dispute date to the final months of the United Nations mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina, when it needed to vet 18,000 police officers serving in 16 forces across the country. The process involved checking qualifications from schools, checking backgrounds with investigators at the United Nations war crimes tribunal in the Netherlands, and ensuring that officers had completed human-rights courses.

Subsequently, 793 officers were denied certification and dismissed from their jobs. Many of the police officers said they had not been told sufficiently and clearly why they had failed the vetting process, or they had not been truly able to appeal. The United Nations mission in Bosnia concluded its work at the end of 2002, and handed it over to a European Union-led police monitoring mission. Many officers began to dispute the United Nations decisions in Bosnian courts. In some cases, the courts concluded that there had been unlawful dismissal.

DOJ_NMG_0130592

In June 2004, the secretariat of the United Nations helped draft a statement warning the Bosnian authorities not to challenge its decisions, and expressing concern that the government was not standing up to the police officers. For a time, the government stopped reviewing the cases but public pressure grew.

On Friday, a senior official in Bosnia's human rights ministry confirmed that the commission had been formed and that it would make its recommendations when the new government is in place next week.

A spokesman for the office of the Secretary General in New York declined to comment Friday on the United Nations' policy.

A report expected to be released this weekend by the European Stability Initiative, a research and policy group, takes aim at the United Nations secretariat, saying it failed to inform Security Council members about the extent of the problems with the vetting process.

After Castro Dies, Will There Be Chaos Or Calm? (LAT)

By Scott Gold

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2007

MIAMI — Ramon Saul Sanchez has put out the call: "Get ready. We're going to Cuba."

Sanchez, 52, the founder of a Miami group called the Democracy Movement, or Movimiento Democracia, has led flotillas toward Cuba's territorial water to protest the regime of Fidel Castro and what he believes is deeply flawed U.S. policy toward the island nation.

When Castro dies, he said, he plans to sail for the island with generators, medicine and other supplies — and bring word that "freedom is on its way."

Military leaders, law enforcement officials and aid organizations preparing for the Cuban leader's death are hoping for a calm and measured response on both sides of the Florida Straits.

They are well aware, however, that Castro's death could lead to a turbulent series of events — even an international incident, they fear, if Sanchez and other Cuban American leaders in South Florida sail for the island in large numbers.

Knowing the passion that Castro evokes — passion that could overwhelm even the best planning — officials are unsure whether they should be preparing for chaos or calm, or something in between.

"We've been waiting a long time for this. Realistically, anything can happen," said Andy S. Gomez, an assistant provost at the University of Miami and a senior fellow at the Institute for Cuban and Cuban-American Studies. Gomez has briefed federal officials on the spectrum of events that could unfold after Castro's death.

It has been six months since Castro, 80, underwent emergency intestinal surgery and provisionally ceded power to Raul Castro, 75, his brother and defense minister. Recent footage released by the Cuban government appeared to show that Fidel Castro had regained strength and weight. But reports that he is in "grave" condition, coupled with U.S. intelligence officials' grim appraisals of his health, have prompted authorities to put preparations in overdrive.

Officials in South Florida believe a composed response to Castro's death is most likely.

In that scenario, Raul Castro would seamlessly maintain control through a blend of modest economic reform and political tactics. On the island, he would be seen as the face of a brighter future, giving Cubans little reason to flee. In Florida, Cuban Americans would demonstrate and celebrate — the largest event would probably be held at the 80,000-person-capacity Orange Bowl — but would generally heed calls for restraint.

But upheaval is possible. In what officials perceive as the worst case, the Cuban government would collapse, prompting a dangerous mass migration out of and into Cuba. Cubans fleeing the island and Cuban Americans trying to get in from Florida could meet in the middle of the Straits, creating a crisis that could overwhelm rescuers and further erode the stability of Latin America.

"You want to plan. You don't want to have to put the plans in motion," said Sam Tidwell, chief executive of the American Red Cross of Greater Miami & the Keys and a leader in the effort to prepare for Castro's death.

Law enforcement officials are holding tabletop exercises of emergency plans and laying the groundwork to restrict the sale of gasoline in Florida or to close marinas so Cuban Americans can't make a run for the island. On Spanish-language radio stations, authorities are pleading with Cuban Americans to stay home.

DOJ_NMG_0130593

Military officials believe that if American activists try to get to Cuba, they will disrupt the official response to Castro's death and perhaps put more strain on relations between Cuba and the United States.

If even a single Cuban American group tried to make its way to the island, "it would be a very serious risk," said Marielena A. Villamil, a member of the American Red Cross board of directors and an owner of an economic consulting firm in Coral Gables, Fla.

"We don't know what the situation will be in Cuba," said Villamil, who is also involved in preparations for Castro's death. "Would they be welcomed with open arms? Or with arms — weapons?"

A network of aid groups, meanwhile, is preparing to help reunite families, coordinate donations and care for refugees in the event of an exodus from Cuba to the United States.

Delicate tasks could lie ahead in Florida.

For instance, some officials have debated whether Castro's death could force them to alter the "wet-foot, dry-foot" immigration policy, which typically repatriates Cubans interdicted at sea but generally allows those who reach U.S. soil to stay.

If the policy were altered, the federal government could find itself detaining refugees who made it to the United States, Tidwell said. At that point, the Red Cross, founded as a neutral caregiver, would be prohibited by its bylaws from providing any assistance, he said.

"We can be helpful in places where people are being processed but not where people are being detained," Tidwell said. "If there are political decisions being made — if people are no longer free to go — we pull out."

The bulk of preparations in the U.S. for Castro's death aims to ensure that is not an issue — by preventing any mass migration.

Authorities are planning extensive water patrols to stop boaters trying to reach the United States. Most refugees would be returned to Cuba, either to a port or to Guantanamo Bay, a U.S. naval base, where military officials would house them in large tents or other temporary structures until they could return home.

Communication, coordination between government agencies, and intelligence inside Cuba, among other factors, are much improved since officials were caught off-guard by the Mariel boatlift of 1980, which brought an estimated 125,000 Cubans to Florida.

"We've learned quite a bit," said Miami-Dade County Assistant Fire Chief Carlos J. Castillo. "I don't see anything approaching Mariel."

Authorities believe Raul Castro would probably view a large exodus after his brother's death as a discrediting sign of dissent within his regime, and would probably deploy the military to prohibit it. They also believe that the response to Castro's death could be muted because the transition between the brothers has brought little sign of unrest.

Through intelligence sources, U.S. officials are monitoring signs of boat building in Cuba and have found no evidence of an increase, said Coast Guard Lt. Cmdr. Chris O'Neil.

"The passing of Fidel Castro, in and of itself, is not going to create a mass migration," he said.

Others disagree. Some involved in the preparations worry that there won't be enough boats to police the Florida Straits. Others question whether Raul Castro has the clout or the charisma to hold Cuba together.

Gomez, of the University of Miami, predicts that 500,000 people will head for Florida within a year of Castro's death.

"We do not have the infrastructure to handle that kind of migration," he said. "You will see a large humanitarian crisis."

Over lunch in Miami's Little Havana, Ramon Saul Sanchez outlined his group's plans. A businessman has donated the use of 400 feet of dock space on the Miami River, he said, from which Sanchez plans to launch boats toward Cuba, including a ferry that can carry 50 passengers to the island, as well as 20 tons of cargo.

He has two cargo planes on call and is amassing supplies at a large storage space, he said.

Sanchez believes Cuba's government may collapse after Castro dies. With the communist government in control of so many functions, such as food distribution, that could mean a collapse of civic structure, Sanchez said.

Therefore, he said, the only way to avoid a migration from Cuba is to go to the island immediately after Castro's death, against the wishes of both nations' militaries and government leaders, with supplies and a message of hope.

DOJ_NMG_0130594

"What we intend to do helps the U.S. interest, because it diminishes the chance of a mass exodus to the United States," he said.

"We have moral leverage, and we intend to use it."

Inflation, Food Scarcity Roil Venezuela (LAT)

By Chris Kraul

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2007

CARACAS, VENEZUELA — Police swooped down last week on a grimy central market district, forced open a warehouse and seized 7 tons of a white substance. It wasn't cocaine. The contraband was sugar, and the seizure of at least 184 tons nationwide showed how President Hugo Chavez's efforts to remake the economy are fraying at the edges.

The bust near the Quinta Crespo market came as double-digit inflation and scarcity have hit Venezuela's markets. The seizures were efforts to strike at what one Chavez supporter, Carabobo Gov. Luis Felipe Acosta, said was hoarding by "terrorist capitalists who want to destroy the country."

But economists and industry officials describe the raids as the latest in a sequence of hamhanded, politically motivated attempts to rein in market forces beyond Chavez's control. Inflation and the development of a huge underground market in goods including sugar were simply symptoms of mismanagement, they say.

Venezuela is rolling in oil wealth with about $46 billion in energy sales last year, and there is little risk of a financial crisis in the near term. Chavez in recent years has tried to transfer much of the wealth to the poor via welfare programs including cheap or free housing, the donation of cash and government assets to worker cooperatives and free education.

Among the most ambitious and popular programs has been the establishment of the Mercal retail chain. Since early 2003, the network of about 14,000 retail outlets mainly in poor barrios, has sold basic foodstuffs and household goods at discounts of 35% off standard supermarket prices.

Chavez has imposed price controls on a variety of goods, such as 29 basic food items produced in Venezuela including beans, cooking oil, meat and chicken. He also has imported such goods as Uruguayan pasta and Brazilian pork that are resold to the poor at greatly reduced costs, thanks to government subsidies.

But mismanagement, rampant corruption and scarcities have cut into Mercal's operations. At the same time, low prices set by the government have caused manufacturers and other suppliers either to cut production or divert output to an enormous black market.

A recent government report found that Mercal sales in November fell in volume to half that of a year earlier and that customers were increasingly unhappy with how the stores were run and what they sold. In January, Chavez shuffled Mercal's management, expressing dismay that huge quantities of goods were unaccounted for.

"This can't be. We should be going forward, not backward," Chavez said in a Jan. 21 broadcast to the nation.

The suspicion is that much of the inventory is siphoned off before the products reach the shelves, sold either to the domestic underground market or exported as contraband to Brazil, Colombia or Caribbean countries.

At the same time, the flood of cash washing over Venezuela from oil sales has caused demand for all goods — watches and whiskey, detergent and SUVs — to climb, adding inflationary pressure. In the last week, Venezuela's central bank released figures showing that inflation rose in January to an annual rate of more than 25%, twice the national target.

A survey by researchers at the National Federation of Teachers found that basic food prices increased in the 12-month period that ended Jan. 31.

Food prices are rising faster than the increases in minimum wages that the government pushed through last year. The reigniting of inflation threatens the poor constituency Chavez is trying to help, economists say.

Scarcity of items such as sugar, beans and meat and empty supermarket shelves dominated the headlines here last week. Meat disappeared for several days after slaughterhouses shut down, saying they couldn't afford to process meat at the prices set by the government.

A sugar industry source said production had fallen because prices the industry received were lower than farmers' cost of production and because the government-sponsored takeover of sugar cane plantations had cut productivity.

DOJ_NMG_0130595

In Yaracuy, a prime sugar-producing state west of Caracas, the capital, 80% of plantations have been taken over by farmer cooperatives, the source said.

In the poor Caracas suburb of Catia on Saturday, sugar and chicken were being rationed at a Mercal shop for the first time in a week. "I came in the morning and waited two hours for milk. Now I'm back in line waiting for chicken, one to a family," said Marietta Abreu, as she stood with 100 other customers.

"It's the fault of the street vendors," she said, referring to the informal merchants who sell the black-market goods. "They're always ahead of the game."

The government is trying to retain its grip by taking measures that at times seem highly improvisational. Justifying the seizure of the sugar Thursday, officials declared it was illegal for sugar to remain in storage for more than three days.

The government said it would ease the meat shortage by importing beef from Bolivia before someone pointed out that imports from Bolivia were banned because of threat of foot-and-mouth disease.

Last week, the government announced it was forming a state-run company to buy and sell meat and fish. Previously, Caracas city officials began a crackdown on the tens of thousands of street vendors in a bid to clean up the city and inhibit the informal market.

In the Quinta Crespo market and in the informal stalls that surround it, sugar and tuna were being sold under the table for three times the government-mandated prices, eggs and meat for twice the prescribed prices.

"The government wants all the power, but they can't control how we think. This is a free country," said a street vendor who was selling black beans at twice the regulated price of 45 cents a half-kilo.

After So Many Deaths, Too Many Births (NYT)

By Stephen Kinzer

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

MAYANGE, Rwanda

CONVINCING women in the deeply impoverished Rwandan countryside that they should have fewer children is a daunting task. “They say we’re not Christian,” said Jeannette Mukabalisa, a local health advocate, of the predominantly Catholic population. “They say, ‘You’re town people, we’re traditional.’ Children bring these families prestige. For them, children come from God. So it’s difficult, very difficult.”

After the 1994 genocide, in which more than 800,000 Rwandans were slaughtered, it seemed difficult to believe that overpopulation would ever be a problem. Yet Rwanda has long had more people than its meager resources and small area can support.

In a recent interview, President Paul Kagame said he was preparing a sweeping population control program, to be unveiled in the coming months, that would aim to cut Rwanda’s birth rate by at least half.

“We recognize we are late on this,” Mr. Kagame said.

After the genocide, officials were reluctant to promote population control because they feared it would offend the survivors, who believed they had a right to replenish what they had lost.

“Because of the genocide, many people didn’t want to hear about birth control,” said Odette Nyiramilimo, a legislator who proposed a bill last year that would have given incentives and detailed disincentives for families to limit themselves to three children. Previous efforts had been opposed by officials who told Ms. Nyiramilimo that education, not population, was the problem.

But nearly half of Rwanda’s legislators are female, and Ms. Nyiramilimo is among several who have spent years pushing for a serious population control effort.

The country’s population has quadrupled over the last half-century. Today Rwanda has 8.8 million people; most are subsistence farmers. If current fertility rates are not curbed — Rwandan women bear an average of 6.1 children — the population will double by 2030. That would almost certainly doom Mr. Kagame’s ambitious plan to raise Rwanda from poverty over that same period.

DOJ_NMG_0130596

"The last government's philosophy was that the country was too small for all Rwandans," said Dr. Richard Sezibera, a close adviser to Mr. Kagame, referring to the rulers who oversaw the genocide. "We insisted that the country was big enough to accommodate everybody. But many people took that to apply to the unborn as well, and we're having to face that mind-set."

Dr. Sezibera and President Kagame, like many members of the minority Tutsi group that suffered the brunt of the genocide, were forced out of Rwanda decades ago and grew up as refugees.

Officials who are designing the new population control program said it would include a requirement that everyone who visits a hospital or health center for any reason be counseled on family planning. Women of child-bearing age will be offered free contraceptive devices including Norplant II, a small silicone pin that is inserted beneath the skin and is effective for up to five years. All schools will offer comprehensive sex education courses.

"The basis for this new campaign is already in place," said Laura Hoemeke, director of the Twubakane Decentralization and Health Project, a community initiative that includes family planning. Though the Bush administration has often discouraged birth control, the United States government is financing this program.

Political opposition to population control measures has melted away as it has become clear that President Kagame now strongly favors them.

In a sign of the changing climate, a government-sponsored newspaper, New Times, recently published a supplement with a front-page headline, "Rapid Population Growth: A Constraint on Resources." Below was a photo of an idyllic landscape with the caption, "This beautiful scenery will diminish if population is not controlled." An accompanying editorial said that Rwanda's population "is already big enough" and that "drastic measures" were needed to keep it from growing.

Officials designing the population control campaign say they hope to produce a plan that could become a model for other African countries, and perhaps persuade a foreign philanthropy to pay its entire cost. They have already begun consulting specialists from the United States and other countries.

Though Rwanda is predominantly Catholic, the church's leaders here are not expected to oppose a campaign for population control. A number of priests, nuns and lay workers participated in the 1994 genocide, which weakened the church's moral authority, and has led it to avoid politics.

President Kagame said he thought the church might present a problem, but noted that it had already showed a flexibility that might not have been expected on issues like AIDS education and condom distribution. "They do not come out and preach, as we do, but they do not actively oppose what we are doing," he said.

According to Josh Ruxin, an American public health administrator based in Rwanda, the rate of Rwandans living in extreme poverty declined from 60.4 percent to 56.6 percent from 2001 to 2006. Mr. Ruxin is helping to design the new population control project. "If Rwanda wants to be an Asian tiger," he said, "this is where it all starts."

Death By Dollars (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

So is your Fidelity account underwriting genocide in Sudan? Is your pension fund helping finance the janjaweed militias that throw babies into bonfires in Darfur and Chad?

The answer to both questions is complicated but may be yes, and that's one reason a divestment campaign is gaining strength around America and abroad. Six states (including California) have already begun divesting from companies active in Sudan, and legislation is pending in 23 more states, including New York.

More than 30 universities, beginning with Harvard in 2005, have sold certain Sudan-related investments. Five cities have divested, and New York is considering doing so. A bill before Congress would bar certain companies active in Sudan from receiving federal contracts.

Let's start by acknowledging that divestment and economic sanctions generally fail. The closest thing to a success was the way they helped topple white rule in South Africa in the 1980s, but even there one result was greater hardship for ordinary blacks.

DOJ_NMG_0130597

Elsewhere, divestment and economic sanctions have mostly been counterproductive. Our Cuban embargo has hurt Cubans but cemented Fidel Castro in power; our sanctions against Myanmar have inflicted tremendous pain on Burmese without dislodging the brutal government.

So I'm against economic sanctions in almost every case. But Sudan is an exception, a rare instance where narrowly focused divestment makes practical as well as moral sense.

Partly that's because Sudan's economy depends on foreign oil companies, giving the outside world leverage. And 70 percent of Sudan's oil revenue goes to weaponry, like bayonets used to gouge out people's eyes.

The oil companies in Sudan aren't American; the biggest players are Chinese companies. Pressure on them is also one way to get the attention of the Chinese government, which is Sudan's main protector in the U.N. Security Council.

So in this case pressure on a small number of foreign companies could help get Sudan's attention, and that of its protectors in China, without hurting ordinary people. And Sudan has shown that it can be nudged and embarrassed into behaving better: the best example is the way that pressure (including economic sanctions) led Sudan's leaders to end their brutal war in southern Sudan in 2005.

Fortunately, the Darfur divestment campaign has been remarkably restrained in choosing targets. Organizers are not seeking divestment from all of the more than 400 foreign companies that operate in Sudan, but only from a few dozen that are complicit in genocide without helping ordinary Sudanese. (See the guidelines at www.SudanDivestment.org, developed largely by a recent U.C.L.A. graduate, Adam Sterling.)

"People are surprised to find out that Royal Dutch Shell is not a targeted company by us, even though they are an oil firm and operate in Sudan," notes Mark Hanis, who runs the Genocide Intervention Network (which has a divestment hot line, 1-800-GENOCIDE). That's because Shell sells gas in Sudan at a retail level, rather than enriching the army through production, Mr. Hanis said, and less than 5 percent of those sales are believed to be to the government.

More than other money managers, Fidelity has resisted the pressure and clung firmly to Sudan-related investments. So Darfur campaigners are urging investors to avoid Fidelity mutual funds: more information is at www.FidelityOutofSudan.com.

The biggest U.S. investor in Class H shares of PetroChina, a Chinese oil concern whose parent company is active in Sudan, is Warren Buffett's Berkshire Hathaway. I have huge respect for Mr. Buffett, and he may be thinking: My obligation is to make money for shareholders, not to use their investments in a dubious attempt to save the world. But surely if Berkshire Hathaway and Fidelity mutual funds saw lucrative opportunities in selling bayonets to the janjaweed, they would balk at that. We do have limits; the question is where we draw them.

In this case, the cost of divestment to fund managers or investors is negligible, and there is a real prospect that the strategy will add enough attention, embarrassment and pressure that Sudan will stop slaughtering Darfuris — just as it has stopped massacring people in southern Sudan.

It's not a sure thing. But remember that in Darfur and Chad, aid workers — some of them Americans — are being killed, raped and beaten as they try to alleviate the slaughter. So shouldn't we make the minimal sacrifice of divestment, rather than blithely continue to invest in ways that provide grenades and guns to kill aid workers and Darfuris alike? <NYT_TAGLINE>

To comment on this column, go to Nicholas Kristof's blog, On the Ground. </NYT_TAGLINE>

DOJ_NMG_0130598

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Homeland Response:
More Airline Pilots Toting Guns After 9/11 Attacks (LAT)..... 3

War News:
Path In Iraq Hard But Not Hopeless, U.S. General Says (WP)..... 3
New Boss Takes Reins Of U.S. Forces In Iraq (NYT)..... 4
New U.S. Commander In Iraq Says "Barbarians" Must Be Defeated (LAT) 5
Third U.S. Commander Takes Over In Iraq, Vows Support (WT/AP) 6
Iraq Resolution Typifies Rift In Senate (WP) 7
Victory Is Not An Option (WP) 9
A Road Map Out Of Iraq (LAT) 11
Legitimacy Was Step One (WP) 12
The Diplomats On Capitol Hill (WP)..... 13
At This Point, It's Kamikaze Strategy In Iraq (LAT) 14
Blame (Blank) For Iraq (NYT) 15
U.S. Keeps Pressure On Iran But Decreases Saber Rattling (WP)..... 17
Iran Reformists Want U.S. To Tone It Down (LAT) 18
U.S. To Reveal Tehran's Link To Iraq Insurgency (WT/AP)..... 20
Merkel: Must Stop Iran Getting Nuclear Weapons (AP)..... 21
Suicide Bomber Kills 30 Near Tikrit (AP) 22
KBR Driver Killed By U.S. Forces In Iraq (HC)..... 22
Iowa Guardsmen Are Proud But Disappointed (WP) 23
To Protest War, Councilman Forgoes The Pledge (NYT/AP)..... 24
Taliban Stepping Up Attacks In Afghanistan (NYT)..... 24
NATO: Afghanistan On Road To Stability (AP) 24
Attack In Pakistan On Red Cross Office (NYT) 25
Defense, Not Pork (LAT)..... 25

DOJ:
Lam Shows Her Personal Side During School Forum (SDUT)... 26
Prosecutor Roulette As More U.S. Attorneys Are Fired, The Specter Of A Political Spoils System Is Unmistakable (ALBANYTU) 27
Editorial Tampering With Justice (SEATIMES) 27
Editorial: Wanted: A U.S. Attorney (BVND) 28
U.S. Attorney Garcia On Public Corruption Cases: We're Not Done (NYJN)..... 28
Robins Lawyer Fighting Removal As Sexual Assault Prosecutor (MACT) 29

Criminal Law:
Pay-to-play Ticket To Power In Lake County? (NWT)..... 32
WiFi Turns Internet Into Hideout For Criminals (WP)..... 33
The Dying Death Penalty? (WP)..... 34

Civil Law:
Editorial: Pay Up: Maybe We Could Help People If Feds Could Collect (LONGNJ)..... 35

Civil Rights:
In Search Of Justice (JCL)..... 36
Local Inmate Claims Guards Beat Him To Near Death (WILNJ) 37
Noxubee's Bill For Voting Right Trial Tops $25,000 So Far (MEMCD)..... 39
Human Trafficking Legislation Is Pushed (LCJ)..... 40
Justice Dept. Major Player In Every Step Schools Make (MEMCD)..... 41
Leaders See A Black America Sailing Off Course (WP/AP) 42
States Fund Anti-abortion Efforts (LAT)..... 43
Slavery And Remorse (WP)..... 44

Environment:
Updating Bush's Spin On Climate Change (LAT)..... 45
T.R.? He's No T.R. (NYT)..... 46
Wash Your Hands! (WP)..... 47

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
Will L.A.'s Strategy To Battle Gangs Work? (LAT) 47

Immigration:
A Town That Wants Illegal Immigrants (LAT)..... 50

Congress-Administration:
Bush Seeks Teacher Merit-pay Funds (WT) 51
Broad Voucher Plan Is Approved In Utah (NYT/AP)..... 52
Critics Question Education Department's Screening (NYT)..... 52
Bush's Proposed Health-Care Cuts Get Mixed Reviews (WP)... 53
Happy Talk In Bush's Budget (WP) 55
Stem-cell Researchers Look Beyond The Embryo (WT) 56
Congress Finds Ways To Avoid Lobbyist Limits (NYT)..... 58
S.D. Senator Starts Working From Hospital (LAT/AP)..... 60
Questions For Dr. Andrew C. Von Eschenbach: Put To The Test (NYT) 60

Other News:

Obama Joins Race With Goals Set High (WP) 61
Obama Invokes Lincoln For Run (WT) 63
Obama Launches Campaign With Emphasis On Grassroots (HILL) 64
It's Official: Obama Is Running For President (LAT)..... 64
Obama Formally Enters Presidential Race (NYT)..... 66
The Audacity Of Barack Obama (POL) 67
Frigid Weather Tests Crowd's Fortitude (WP)..... 68
Obama: I'm Running For President (CHIT) 69
Obama Urges Iowans To Join Him Against Cynicism (DMR) 70
Obama Announces Presidential Bid In Illinois (AP)..... 71
Obama Declares He's Running For President (CNN) 72
Obama Formally Joins '08 Presidential Race (GAN)..... 73
Recalling A Natural (WP) 75
Australian Leader: Al-Qaeda Wants Obama (AP)..... 77
Decoding The Debate Over The Blackness Of Barack Obama (NYT) 77
Stop Him Before He Gets More Experience (NYT)..... 78
Clinton Cheered In N.H.; Some War Foes Skeptical (POL)..... 80
Clinton Campaigns In New Hampshire (WP) 81
In New Hampshire, Clinton Owns Up To Her Vote On Iraq War (NYT) 82
Clinton Draws Crowds In First NH Stops (NHUL) 83
People Had Points To Make To Hillary (NHUL) 84
Hillary Deflects Pressure To Repudiate Iraq Vote (WT/AP)..... 85
Hillary Faces Tough Questions On Iraq (NSDY)..... 86
Spielberg For Hillary (NOVAK) 87
Campaign Bloggers Caught In Web (LAT)..... 88
Searching For Mr. Right (NYT) 88
The Limits Of Sunniness (WP)..... 90
McCain Taps Cash He Sought To Limit (WP)..... 91
A Conversation With Sen. John McCain (STPETE)..... 93
Giuliani Praises Bush's Iraq Policy, Foresight (LAT) 94
"America's Mayor" Praises Bush In State GOP Speech (SFC)... 95
Giuliani Announces Candidacy, Or Then Again, Maybe Not (NYT) 96
Giuliani Strikes A Note With California GOP (WP)..... 97
Romney, Brownback Makes Pitches To Michigan Republicans (AP)..... 98
Romney Courts State GOP (SLPD) 98
A Massachusetts Conservative (BOS) 99
Profit And Public Health (WP)..... 102
Who’s Afraid Of The New Economy? (NYT) 102
Unmasking Our Pain In New Orleans (WP) 103
Putin Hits U.S. Over Unilateral Practices (WP) 105
Putin Says U.S. Is Undermining Global Stability (NYT)..... 106
Putin Says U.S. Militarism Fosters Global Instability (LAT)..... 108
Putin Accuses U.S. Of Sparking Arms Race (AP)..... 110
Putin Hits U.S. Use Of Force (WT/AP) 111
Putin Stuns With Attack On US (AFP)..... 112
Putin's Speech: Back To Cold War? (BBC)..... 113
Putin In First Saudi State Visit (BBC)..... 114
Talks With N. Korea Extended To 4th Day (WP)..... 114
New Setback In North Korean Nuclear Talks (NYT) 115
US Envoy Says Time To 'Wrap Up' NKorea Talks (AFP) 116
Analysis: N. Korea Debating Nuke Future (AP)..... 116
Palestinian Tout Unity Deal To World (AP)..... 117
A Very Partial Palestinian Peace (NYT) 118
Calm Prevails In Jerusalem On Day After Excavation Clashes (NYT) 118
Clashes By Jerusalem Holy Site Continue (AP)..... 120
Protest Targets Tourists, Police (WT/AP)..... 121
Jewish Inroads In Muslim Quarter (WP)..... 121
Portugal To Vote On Putting End To Abortion Ban (NYT) 124
Bosnia Defies U.N. Over Dismissals In Police (NYT)..... 126
After Castro Dies, Will There Be Chaos Or Calm? (LAT)..... 127
Inflation, Food Scarcity Roil Venezuela (LAT) 128
After So Many Deaths, Too Many Births (NYT)..... 130
Death By Dollars (NYT) 131

DOJ_NMG_0130600

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

More Airline Pilots Toting Guns After 9/11 Attacks (LAT)

By Ken Kaye

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2007

FORT LAUDERDALE, FLA. — Five years after the Sept. 11 attacks, a growing number of U.S. airline pilots are armed, prepared to use lethal force to protect the cockpit. Soon, they will carry badges, bringing them even closer to being bona fide law enforcement officers.

"Every cop has that metal badge to flash," said John Mazor, spokesman for the Air Line Pilots Assn. "It is a valid recognition signal between law enforcement officers."

About 8,000 pilots carry government-issued guns on a voluntary basis, or about 8% of the nation's 100,000 pilots, according to the Airline Pilots Security Alliance, a volunteer organization that advocates increased cockpit security. Two years ago, about 3,000 pilots were armed.

These pilots, officially known as federal flight deck officers, keep sidearms handy to provide one more layer of security and a last line of defense against hijackers.

Although there have been no reports of pilots drawing their weapons since the Sept. 11 attacks, the federal government has granted pilots slightly more leeway in how they take guns on board planes.

Notably, pilots now can lock their guns into holsters, which are then placed in a discreet bag. After pilots are in the cockpit, the holsters are removed from the bag and latched onto their belts. Previously, the guns had to be transported onto planes in a heavy steel box.

To further fold pilots into the police community, the federal flight deck officer program has been placed under the Federal Air Marshal Service, an arm of the Transportation Security Administration. Last month, the marshal service approved issuing badges to pilots so they are more easily identifiable.

"We're a law enforcement agency, so we understand the culture they're trying to develop as federal flight deck officers," said Federal Air Marshal Service spokesman Conan Bruce.

To become flight deck officers, pilots undergo six days of intense training at a federal complex in Artesia, N.M., including weapons handling and close-combat techniques.

Most important, Bruce said, they learn "how to use the appropriate level of force."

About 50 pilots are trained each week. After graduation, the TSA issues the pilots a Heckler & Koch .40 caliber semiautomatic revolver.

WAR NEWS:

Path In Iraq Hard But Not Hopeless, U.S. General Says (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 10 -- Gen. David H. Petraeus, assuming his position as the new U.S. military commander in Iraq, said Saturday that the "rucksack of responsibility" was too heavy to carry alone there and that without cooperation between Iraqi and U.S. forces, "Iraq will be doomed to continued violence and civil strife."

During a handover ceremony below the crystal chandelier and marble columns in one of Saddam Hussein's former palaces, Petraeus characterized the challenges facing Iraq as daunting but said that "these tasks are achievable, this mission is doable." Promoted to the rank of four-star general, Petraeus will lead a growing U.S. force of more than 130,000 troops in Iraq in an attempt to contain the sectarian killing, especially in violence-racked Baghdad.

"The situation in Iraq is exceedingly challenging, the stakes are very high, the way ahead will be hard and undoubtedly there will be many tough days," Petraeus said in a 5 1/2 -minute address to a gathering of Iraqi and U.S. generals, ambassadors and other officers and dignitaries at Camp Victory on the western outskirts of Baghdad.

"However, hard is not hopeless," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0130601

Petraeus, 54, a Princeton-educated military man who previously served as the commander of the 101st Airborne Division in the northern city of Mosul, and also led the U.S. military effort to train Iraqi soldiers, takes over from Gen. George W. Casey Jr., who will return to Washington as U.S. Army chief of staff after serving 2 1/2 years in the top position. Casey has been criticized for riding the inchoate Iraqi security forces too hard toward self-sufficiency. Petraeus, an expert in counterinsurgency tactics, is expected to rely on a more visible U.S. presence, sending his troops to live on smaller outposts within embattled Iraqi neighborhoods.

Casey said it was "too close in time" to judge the mistakes made on his watch.

"But I think the main point that people will debate for some time to come was whether I relied too much on Iraqi security forces to carry the security load and too little on coalition forces," he said. "But I'm certainly not ready to say that's a mistake, I'll let history judge that."

During the brief but formal handover ceremony, an Army band with the 1st Cavalry Division played the Iraqi and U.S. national anthems, and Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, the outgoing Central Command chief, passed a military flag to Petraeus. In the front row sat U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, along with the Iraqi general leading the Baghdad security plan, Lt. Gen. Abboud Gambar; Iraq's interior minister, Jawad al-Bolani; and the national security adviser, Mowaffak al-Rubaie.

Three more U.S. soldiers died on Friday, when explosives detonated inside a building in Diyala province north of Baghdad, the U.S. military said in a statement issued Saturday. The three soldiers, from Task Force Lightning, were hunting for a weapons cache in the building at the time of the blast, the military statement said. Four other soldiers were wounded in the explosion. A shop owner working nearby, Hussein al-Shimmari, 35, said the U.S. troops raided the house after coming under gunfire from the area. What appeared to be American helmets and parts of uniforms were strung up from a utility pole near the building after the explosion, Shimmari said.

At least two car bombs exploded Saturday in Baghdad, killing at least 14 people, Iraqi police said. The first bomb struck outside a bakery in the central Baghdad neighborhood of Karrada, killing seven people and wounding 13, said Brig. Abdulla Hassoun of the Interior Ministry. A second bomb in a parked car exploded outside a government communication center in Khamliyah, in eastern Baghdad, killing seven people and injuring nine, said Maj. Abdul Aziz Abdul Kareem of the Interior Ministry. Some believe members of the Mahdi Army, a powerful Shiite militia, operate there.

The Associated Press reported that the military confirmed that U.S. forces shot and killed a civilian contract truck driver Monday at Camp Anaconda, a huge air base north of Baghdad. The driver, who has not been identified, worked for KBR, a contracting subsidiary of Halliburton formerly known as Kellogg, Brown & Root.

In a letter to U.S. service members, Petraeus said: "The enemies of Iraq will shrink at no act, however barbaric. They will do all that they can to shake the confidence of the people and to convince the world that this effort is doomed. We must not underestimate them."

Before the ceremony, Casey stood outside overlooking a manmade lake and said his departure after 2 1/2 years left him feeling proud but "a little numb."

"Everything's not as I would have expected it to be or wanted it to be on my way out, but that's kind of the way things are," he said.

Casey said his greatest fear for the country is that "Iraqis can't put the past behind them."

"We liberated them from 35 years of tyranny; we can't liberate them from the fears and the prejudices that grew up in that 35 years. They have to do that themselves," he said. "I think they'll get past it, but if they don't, it'll be difficult."

New Boss Takes Reins Of U.S. Forces In Iraq (NYT)

By Damien Cave

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 10 — Gen. David H. Petraeus formally took command of American troops in Iraq on Saturday, declaring that the mission here is hard but not hopeless.

General Petraeus, who wore the fourth star of a full general for the first time during the transfer ceremony, succeeds Gen. George W. Casey Jr., who is returning to Washington to become the Army's chief of staff. The new commander will oversee 132,000 American troops currently in Iraq and thousands more on their way as part of a so-called surge that is widely considered the last, best effort to bring peace to a country increasingly riven by sectarian violence, crime and corruption.

General Petraeus, 54, and General Casey, 58, spoke at a formal ceremony on a military base outside Baghdad, striking tones of optimism and caution, while hinting at their different approaches to Iraq.

For the past two and a half years, General Casey has pushed for a speedy transfer of control to Iraqi security forces so that American troops could withdraw; General Petraeus, an expert in counterinsurgency, has instead supported a more active American role, in line with new White House demands.

DOJ_NMG_0130602

"The rucksack of responsibility is very heavy," General Petraeus said, after beginning his speech with the Muslim greeting "salaam aleikum," or "peace be upon you."

"In truth, it is too heavy for any one person to bear, and we will all have to share the burdens and move forward together," he said.

"If we can do that and if we can help the people of Iraq do likewise, then the prospects for success are good," he said. "Failing that, Iraq will be doomed to continuing violence and civil strife and surely that is a prospect all must strive to avoid. The stakes are very high."

General Casey, whose tactics have come under blistering attack recently in Congress, emphasized that Iraq would need to take responsibility for its own troubles if it was to ever move forward. Before the ceremony, he told reporters: "Everything is not as I would have expected it to be or wanted it to be on my way out. But that's kind of the way things are."

Asked about whether he had made any mistakes in his tenure, he said, "The main point that people will debate for some time to come is whether I relied too much on Iraqi security forces to carry the security load and too little on coalition forces."

"But I'm certainly not ready to say that's a mistake," he said. "I'll let history judge that."

He later added: "My greatest fear is that Iraqis can't put the past behind them. We liberated them from 35 years of tyranny. We can't liberate them from the fears and prejudices that grew up in that 35 years. They have to do that themselves."

A few hours later, the United States military announced in a statement that three American soldiers were killed Friday and four others wounded in an explosion at a building in Diyala Province, northeast of Baghdad. The statement said the explosion took place as the soldiers searched the building for weapons.

Residents of the area, just west of Baquba, said a gun battle between American troops and unidentified men followed the explosion, with American helicopters hovering overhead. It was just the latest sign of trouble in the area, a stronghold of Sunni Arab insurgents who recently have stepped up attacks on Shiite families and American forces. On Jan. 20, insurgents in the area shot down a Black Hawk helicopter, killing all 13 Americans aboard.

In the central Baghdad neighborhood of Karrada, a suicide car bomber killed five people and wounded 10 outside a bakery on Saturday. It was the latest in a recent series of bombings in the mostly Shiite area, and residents said that violence had become a numbing reality for them.

Mayson Umran, a bookstore owner, said she had been on her way to pick up sandwiches from a Kurdish kebab seller and friend when the explosion hit, shattering glass, destroying shops and scorching cars. She returned to discover her friend was killed, cut into pieces.

"It's become something normal," she said. "Even children have lost the sense of fear now because everyone is expecting an explosion at any minute."

"All of those who died today were simple people looking for their daily living," she said. "The terrorists want nothing but to keep Iraq unstable."

Iraqi officials, faced with such relentless violence, seemed unsure of whether a new American commander — and the new plan — could stop the bloodshed. Among American military officers, General Petraeus is considered an imaginative leader with a deep understanding of Iraq's problems, culled from two tours here. But for some in Baghdad, his assumption of control looked routine.

"The commanders change every now and then," said Naseer al-Ani, a Sunni member of Parliament. "I don't think that changing the commander will have a significant impact on the American policy."

Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki did not attend the ceremony, though Iraq's security adviser and other officials were present. Sami al-Askari, an aide to the prime minister, said the Iraqi government supported General Petraeus and had high hopes for his tenure.

"The character of the commander affects the performance of the military command," he said. "General Casey had a certain perspective in fighting terrorism, but we hope that General Petraeus will be more cooperative with the Iraqi command based on his past experience in Iraq, and the relationship will be smoother and more positive."

New U.S. Commander In Iraq Says "Barbarians" Must Be Defeated (LAT)

By Tina Susman

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2007

BAGHDAD — Army Gen. David Petraeus took command of U.S. forces in Iraq today with a sober assessment of the job he faces and a warning that Iraq will be doomed if "barbarians" fueling violence across the country are not defeated.

As Petraeus took over the reigns from Gen. George Casey, who is leaving to become the new Army chief of staff, new reports of U.S. and Iraqi deaths illustrated the challenges cited by both men during the handover ceremony. U.S. military officials announced that at least three American troops had died in Diyala province, northeast of Baghdad, when a blast went off in a building they were scouring for weapons. In Baghdad, two car bombs went off, killing at least seven civilians.

DOJ_NMG_0130603

The U.S. deaths brought to 36 the number of American troops killed in the first 10 days of February, representing one of the highest daily death rates since the war's start in March 2003. A brief military statement said in addition to the three killed, four soldiers from Task Force Lightning were killed in the Diyala incident, which occurred Friday.

U.S. and Iraqi forces mounted an offensive last month in Diyala, which hugs the Iranian border northeast of Baghdad. The military says it is a hotbed of Sunni Muslim extremists with ties to Al Qaeda. The leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq, Abu Musab Zarqawi, was killed in a U.S. air strike in June in Diyala, a region so notorious for insurgent attacks that Iraqi forces have refused to venture into much of it without U.S. backing.

At least 3,121 U.S. troops have died since the invasion of Iraq, according to the web site icasualties.org, which tracks civilian and military casualties in the war.

In comments made before he handed control to Petraeus, Casey said no obvious mistakes on his part sprang to mind.

"It might seem a little trite, but for me, it's too close in time to judge the mistakes, because if I thought I was making a mistake I would have changed it," said Casey, speaking to journalists before the ceremony.

Instead, Casey said he went away "with a great feeling of pride, because I really feel we've laid the foundation for Iraq's success."

Casey predicted that Iraqi forces would be ready to take control of the country's security by the end of summer or early fall, a seemingly optimistic view given what appears to be the sluggish start to a much-vaunted, U.S.-Iraqi security plan aimed at bringing violence under control. The plan was announced in January and is to put an additional 21,500 U.S. troops, as well as thousands more Iraqi soldiers and national police, in Baghdad and in Al Anbar province.

So far, only 3,000 more Americans and 2,000 Iraqis have been put in place, a schedule that U.S. military officials say is on target at least for the Americans. They have said all the new U.S. troops should be in place by May.

Petraeus appeared to take a more tempered note in his first comments as commander, calling the situation he had inherited "extremely challenging."

"However, hard is not hopeless," he said in speech to coalition forces and Iraqi and U.S. political leaders. "The prospects for success are good. Failing that, Iraq will be doomed to continuing violence and civil strife."

There was no letup in that strife as the handover unfolded in the mosaic and marble rotunda of one of Saddam Hussein's former palaces.

In Baghdad's mainly Shiite Karrada neighborhood, a suicide bomber parked his car near a bakery and crowded market shortly after noon. The explosion killed at least four civilians and injured 10, Iraqi police said. In Kamaliya, another mainly Shiite district in eastern Baghdad, a car bomb tore through a street lined with auto parts and repair shops, killing at least three civilians and injuring six.

A 15-year-old girl died in a cross-fire between rival groups in a street battle typical of Baghdad's neighborhoods. Across Baghdad, at least six other people were found dead, apparent victims of sectarian violence.

Twenty-four additional bodies were reported in the area around Kut, south of Baghdad. In Mussayib, also to the south of Baghdad, mortars slammed into civilian homes overnight, killing two women and a man, and a man died when a roadside bomb exploded.

Third U.S. Commander Takes Over In Iraq, Vows Support (WT/AP)

By Lauren Frayer

The Washington Times, February 11, 2007

BAGHDAD - Gen. David Petraeus took charge of U.S. forces in Iraq yesterday, becoming the third commander in the war and declaring the American task now was to help Iraqis "gain the time they need to save their country."

Gen. Petraeus took command under a glistening crystal chandelier that decorated a one-time palace of ousted dictator Saddam Hussein at Camp Victory.

The media-savvy, Princeton-educated Gen. Petraeus, 54, spoke bluntly of the task before him that coincides with President Bush's decision to send an additional 21,500 troops to clamp off violence in Baghdad and nearby regions.

"We will have to share the burdens and move forward together. If we can do that and if we can help the people of Iraq, the prospects of success are good," he said. "Failing that, Iraq will be doomed to continued violence and civil strife."

The U.S. military reported the deaths of three more American soldiers, killed in an explosion Friday in Diyala province northeast of Baghdad. U.S. and Iraqi forces have battled Sunni insurgents and Shi'ite militias in Diyala for months.

The deaths raised to 36 the number of Americans killed in Iraq so far this month. At least 3,120 service members have died since the Iraq war started in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

DOJ_NMG_0130604

At least 51 Iraqis were killed or found dead Saturday across the country.

In central Baghdad, a car bomb exploded in a shopping district, killing six civilians and wounding 14.

"The driver said, 'I have to buy some fruit and vegetables. I'll be right back.' About five minutes later, the car exploded and killed three of my best friends," said Ismail Mohammed, a fishmonger in the Karradah district.

Gen. Petraeus, whose appointment was announced in early January, takes command of the roughly 135,000-strong American force in Iraq after two previous tours: what was seen as a highly successful stint in the north at the head of the 101st Airborne Division in Mosul, and a second tour in charge of training Iraqi forces.

Gen. Petraeus, who was confirmed by the Senate on Jan. 26, assumed four-star general status in conjunction with taking over command.

"The stakes are very high. The way ahead will be hard, and there undoubtedly will be many tough days. But as I recently told members of the U.S. Senate, hard is not hopeless," said Gen. Petraeus, as he took command from 58-year-old Gen. George Casey.

Lt. Gen. Ricardo Sanchez was Gen. Casey's predecessor and his tenure was marred by the Abu Ghraib prisoner-abuse scandal. He has since retired.

The Sunni insurgency broke out during Gen. Sanchez's command, and the conflict in Iraq took on many of the aspects of a civil war during Gen. Casey's tenure.

In a letter to U.S. troops, Gen. Petraeus wrote: "The enemies of Iraq will shrink at no act, however barbaric. They will do all that they can to shake the confidence of the people and to convince the world that this effort is doomed. We must not underestimate them."

While Gen. Petraeus spoke of "barbaric enemies who brag of inhuman acts in the name of religion," outgoing commander Gen. Casey, who will become Army chief of staff, spoke frankly about religious infighting that is tearing Iraq apart.

"It's no secret that sectarian violence has changed the dynamics of what Iraqis must face here on the ground," he said. A new U.S. National Intelligence Estimate issued in Washington last week cited sectarian violence as the biggest security problem in Iraq.

An adviser to Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said the Iraqi government hoped Gen. Petraeus' command would help a new joint U.S.-Iraqi security plan.

"It reflects the change in U.S. policy in Iraq. We have so much hope that the security plan will succeed and that Gen. Petraeus will be part of that success," said the adviser, Bassam al-Husseini.

Neither Mr. al-Maliki nor Iraqi President Jalal Talabani attended yesterday's ceremony, though Mr. Talabani and his two deputies met Gen. Petraeus on Friday and discussed the security plan and "appropriate ways to reach security and stability and annihilate terrorism," a government statement said.

The new U.S. military commander in Iraq, Gen. David Petraeus (right), and outgoing Gen. George Casey prayed during the handover ceremony yesterday in Baghdad.

Iraq Resolution Typifies Rift In Senate (WP)

By Shailagh Murray, Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

Since the new Congress convened, Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) and Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) have emerged as the Senate's odd couple, the even-tempered McConnell hurling parliamentary brickbats at the quirky Reid with an even smile and a "Who, me?" shrug.

But though McConnell may be winning procedural battles -- on ethics legislation and a minimum-wage increase and by stopping a high-profile Iraq debate -- Reid, at least this past week, may have played the stronger hand on the war issue, on which public opinion is clearly on his side.

The drama started Monday evening, when McConnell rallied GOP senators to block from the Senate floor a nonbinding resolution opposing President Bush's plan to increase troops in Iraq. But since then, the headlines have been withering, blaming Republicans for sidetracking the debate. Rank-and-file Republican senators are grumbling and threatening to break with McConnell, as the much ballyhooed war debate has morphed into a procedural spat with the GOP playing defense.

"I'm very surprised how they handled this," Reid said of McConnell and his Republican leadership team. "It was so obvious. I just think they miscalculated. And it keeps getting worse."

Julian E. Zelizer, a congressional expert at Boston University, said the Republicans may be "on top" in the short term, but they must be careful how their tactics play with the public in the long term. "They can't look like obstructionists, especially on this war resolution," he said. "This is wartime lawmaking, not peacetime lawmaking."

DOJ_NMG_0130605

McConnell asserts that the conflict is less about political tactics than about ensuring "fair treatment" for the Senate GOP, which is barely in the minority.

"This is not about keeping score," the Republican leader told reporters on Thursday, his monotone voice bristling slightly. "This is about an extraordinarily important issue. The American people are not happy with the current status of the Iraq war. Republican senators are not happy about it."

Looking back, did he have any regrets?

"The only thing we could have done differently would have been to capitulate," McConnell shot back. "That didn't happen Monday and won't happen in the future."

Reid and McConnell began the year vowing to cooperate, but so far they have clashed over practically every important issue to come before the Senate. Democrats control the Senate by the slimmest majority, 51 to 49, presenting formidable challenges to both party leaders and suggesting that procedural one-upmanship could become a permanent part of the narrative. "That's just how you have to do things here," Reid said, expressing the relatively sanguine view that he and McConnell are forced by circumstances to take.

As a tactician, McConnell, 64, a four-term veteran, has shown in recent weeks that he is one tough competitor. Both he and Reid, 67, are former party whips, jobs that require a deep knowledge of Senate rules and an instinctive feel for political and ideological idiosyncrasies. They both also sit on the Appropriations Committee, the chief spigot for federal spending, where Republicans and Democrats traditionally have supported each other's pet programs.

The pair share low-key temperaments, although Reid has the more colorful personality. The son of a Nevada miner, Reid became a successful Las Vegas trial lawyer before entering politics, and he views himself as an outsider among the Washington elite. McConnell, who is married to Labor Secretary Elaine L. Chao, is a staunch conservative who is regarded as one of President Bush's closest allies in Congress. He has vowed to do whatever he can to prevent Congress from passing a resolution criticizing Bush's war policies.

In an editorial titled "A Minority to be Reckoned With," the conservative magazine National Review strongly praised the GOP leader. "Under Sen. Mitch McConnell, Republicans have quickly gotten the hang of serving in a minority that can successfully frustrate Harry Reid's partisan maneuvering on the war in Iraq," the editorial declared.

The war debate now shifts to the House, where Democratic leaders will offer their own formal protest next week against Bush's plan to deploy an additional 21,500 combat troops in Iraq. In the meantime, the Senate battle is expected to remain suspended.

Reid and the Democrats had been prepared for a week-long debate on a nonbinding bipartisan resolution criticizing Bush's troop buildup and calling for a political solution to the war, but it ran into a procedural roadblock Monday evening after McConnell complained that the Democrats were denying Republicans a vote on alternative resolutions supportive of the war effort.

McConnell lined up all but two Republicans -- Sens. Susan Collins (Maine) and Norm Coleman (Minn.) -- to vote in favor of blocking the debate until Reid agrees to GOP terms. But that Republican alliance quickly frayed. On Wednesday night, five Republicans who had voted with McConnell joined Collins and Coleman in signing a letter to the Senate Democratic and Republican leaders, vowing to "explore all our options" to ensure that the bipartisan nonbinding resolution reaches the floor.

Sen. Olympia J. Snowe, a moderate Maine Republican, fumed that she had been assured by GOP leaders that the Monday setback would be temporary. Her support for the McConnell position, she said, "was always predicated on the expectation that we would move forward," adding: "No one ever entertained the possibility that it would be a dead end."

Snowe called McConnell and Reid's inability to come to terms "inexcusable," adding that "the House of Representatives is preparing to debate and our Senate is deadlocked. It sort of marginalizes the U.S. Senate as an institution. We can't even determine how to go forward procedurally with a nonbinding resolution."

McConnell and Reid have clashed on other big issues. Early in January, McConnell nearly brought down a major ethics and lobbying bill over GOP demands for a vote on granting the president virtual line-item veto authority. Later, he and other Republicans forced Democrats to accept tax breaks for small businesses as a condition for passing the minimum-wage bill.

But with polls showing that Americans overwhelmingly oppose the war in Iraq and believe that it was a mistake for Bush to commit U.S. troops, the president's decision to boost troop levels and seek billions of dollars more in spending clearly constitutes the most important issue facing Congress this year.

Every Monday, Reid and McConnell meet one on one, and last Monday at 3 p.m., the huddle took place in McConnell's office. The two leaders quickly established that neither side was budging on the procedural dispute surrounding the war resolutions, and a showdown vote was set for 5:30 p.m.

The next morning, newspaper headlines around the country blared that Republicans were to blame for the gridlock, and Democrats pummeled GOP lawmakers for allowing partisan considerations to get in the way of a vital debate.

By week's end, Republicans were breaking ranks.

DOJ_NMG_0130606

On the floor of the Senate and before television cameras, McConnell maintained a reassuring and conciliatory air. Almost apologetically, he explained that the impasse over the Iraq war resolution was a minor bump in the road and would surely be worked out. He expressed faith in his relationship with Reid, and looked genuinely taken aback by Democratic charges of obstructionism and nefarious intent.

Reid, for his part, also seemed on shaky ground in the immediate aftermath, appearing to protect Democrats from political controversy at the expense of a war debate. The letter from the seven Republicans vowing to do whatever it takes to get the debate back on track helped to reverse this impression by suggesting buyer's remorse on the Republican side.

"Everything Harry Reid has done this week, and I know some of you had some tough questions, has been vindicated by that letter," Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) told reporters.

But it did not appear to faze McConnell. "I think 40 to 42 of our members are comfortable with where we are," he said. "They all understand that we'll get back to this debate and, at whatever point we get back to this debate, the [funding] amendment or other amendments will be in the mix."

Victory Is Not An Option (WP)

By William E. Odom

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

The new National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq starkly delineates the gulf that separates President Bush's illusions from the realities of the war. Victory, as the president sees it, requires a stable liberal democracy in Iraq that is pro-American. The NIE describes a war that has no chance of producing that result. In this critical respect, the NIE, the consensus judgment of all the U.S. intelligence agencies, is a declaration of defeat.

Its gloomy implications -- hedged, as intelligence agencies prefer, in rubbery language that cannot soften its impact -- put the intelligence community and the American public on the same page. The public awakened to the reality of failure in Iraq last year and turned the Republicans out of control of Congress to wake it up. But a majority of its members are still asleep, or only half-awake to their new writ to end the war soon.

Perhaps this is not surprising. Americans do not warm to defeat or failure, and our politicians are famously reluctant to admit their own responsibility for anything resembling those un-American outcomes. So they beat around the bush, wringing hands and debating "nonbinding resolutions" that oppose the president's plan to increase the number of U.S. troops in Iraq.

For the moment, the collision of the public's clarity of mind, the president's relentless pursuit of defeat and Congress's anxiety has paralyzed us. We may be doomed to two more years of chasing the mirage of democracy in Iraq and possibly widening the war to Iran. But this is not inevitable. A Congress, or a president, prepared to quit the game of "who gets the blame" could begin to alter American strategy in ways that will vastly improve the prospects of a more stable Middle East.

No task is more important to the well-being of the United States. We face great peril in that troubled region, and improving our prospects will be difficult. First of all, it will require, from Congress at least, public acknowledgment that the president's policy is based on illusions, not realities. There never has been any right way to invade and transform Iraq. Most Americans need no further convincing, but two truths ought to put the matter beyond question:

First, the assumption that the United States could create a liberal, constitutional democracy in Iraq defies just about everything known by professional students of the topic. Of the more than 40 democracies created since World War II, fewer than 10 can be considered truly "constitutional" -- meaning that their domestic order is protected by a broadly accepted rule of law, and has survived for at least a generation. None is a country with Arabic and Muslim political cultures. None has deep sectarian and ethnic fissures like those in Iraq.

Strangely, American political scientists whose business it is to know these things have been irresponsibly quiet. In the lead-up to the March 2003 invasion, neoconservative agitators shouted insults at anyone who dared to mention the many findings of academic research on how democracies evolve. They also ignored our own struggles over two centuries to create the democracy Americans enjoy today. Somehow Iraqis are now expected to create a constitutional order in a country with no conditions favoring it.

This is not to say that Arabs cannot become liberal democrats. When they immigrate to the United States, many do so quickly. But it is to say that Arab countries, as well as a large majority of all countries, find creating a stable constitutional democracy beyond their capacities.

Second, to expect any Iraqi leader who can hold his country together to be pro-American, or to share American goals, is to abandon common sense. It took the United States more than a century to get over its hostility toward British occupation. (In 1914, a majority of the public favored supporting Germany against Britain.) Every month of the U.S. occupation, polls have recorded Iraqis' rising animosity toward the United States. Even supporters of an American military presence say that it is acceptable temporarily and only to prevent either of the warring sides in Iraq from winning. Today the Iraqi government survives only because its senior members and their families live within the heavily guarded Green Zone, which houses the U.S. Embassy and military command.

DOJ_NMG_0130607

As Congress awakens to these realities -- and a few members have bravely pointed them out -- will it act on them? Not necessarily. Too many lawmakers have fallen for the myths that are invoked to try to sell the president's new war aims. Let us consider the most pernicious of them.

1) We must continue the war to prevent the terrible aftermath that will occur if our forces are withdrawn soon. Reflect on the double-think of this formulation. We are now fighting to prevent what our invasion made inevitable! Undoubtedly we will leave a mess -- the mess we created, which has become worse each year we have remained. Lawmakers gravely proclaim their opposition to the war, but in the next breath express fear that quitting it will leave a blood bath, a civil war, a terrorist haven, a "failed state," or some other horror. But this "aftermath" is already upon us; a prolonged U.S. occupation cannot prevent what already exists.

2) We must continue the war to prevent Iran's influence from growing in Iraq. This is another absurd notion. One of the president's initial war aims, the creation of a democracy in Iraq, ensured increased Iranian influence, both in Iraq and the region. Electoral democracy, predictably, would put Shiite groups in power -- groups supported by Iran since Saddam Hussein repressed them in 1991. Why are so many members of Congress swallowing the claim that prolonging the war is now supposed to prevent precisely what starting the war inexorably and predictably caused? Fear that Congress will confront this contradiction helps explain the administration and neocon drumbeat we now hear for expanding the war to Iran.

Here we see shades of the Nixon-Kissinger strategy in Vietnam: widen the war into Cambodia and Laos. Only this time, the adverse consequences would be far greater. Iran's ability to hurt U.S. forces in Iraq are not trivial. And the anti-American backlash in the region would be larger, and have more lasting consequences.

3) We must prevent the emergence of a new haven for al-Qaeda in Iraq. But it was the U.S. invasion that opened Iraq's doors to al-Qaeda. The longer U.S. forces have remained there, the stronger al-Qaeda has become. Yet its strength within the Kurdish and Shiite areas is trivial. After a U.S. withdrawal, it will probably play a continuing role in helping the Sunni groups against the Shiites and the Kurds. Whether such foreign elements could remain or thrive in Iraq after the resolution of civil war is open to question. Meanwhile, continuing the war will not push al-Qaeda outside Iraq. On the contrary, the American presence is the glue that holds al-Qaeda there now.

4) We must continue to fight in order to "support the troops." This argument effectively paralyzes almost all members of Congress. Lawmakers proclaim in grave tones a litany of problems in Iraq sufficient to justify a rapid pullout. Then they reject that logical conclusion, insisting we cannot do so because we must support the troops. Has anybody asked the troops?

During their first tours, most may well have favored "staying the course" -- whatever that meant to them -- but now in their second, third and fourth tours, many are changing their minds. We see evidence of that in the many news stories about unhappy troops being sent back to Iraq. Veterans groups are beginning to make public the case for bringing them home. Soldiers and officers in Iraq are speaking out critically to reporters on the ground.

But the strangest aspect of this rationale for continuing the war is the implication that the troops are somehow responsible for deciding to continue the president's course. That political and moral responsibility belongs to the president, not the troops. Did not President Harry S. Truman make it clear that "the buck stops" in the Oval Office? If the president keeps dodging it, where does it stop? With Congress?

Embracing the four myths gives Congress excuses not to exercise its power of the purse to end the war and open the way for a strategy that might actually bear fruit.

The first and most critical step is to recognize that fighting on now simply prolongs our losses and blocks the way to a new strategy. Getting out of Iraq is the pre-condition for creating new strategic options. Withdrawal will take away the conditions that allow our enemies in the region to enjoy our pain. It will awaken those European states reluctant to collaborate with us in Iraq and the region.

Second, we must recognize that the United States alone cannot stabilize the Middle East.

Third, we must acknowledge that most of our policies are actually destabilizing the region. Spreading democracy, using sticks to try to prevent nuclear proliferation, threatening "regime change," using the hysterical rhetoric of the "global war on terrorism" -- all undermine the stability we so desperately need in the Middle East.

Fourth, we must redefine our purpose. It must be a stable region, not primarily a democratic Iraq. We must redirect our military operations so they enhance rather than undermine stability. We can write off the war as a "tactical draw" and make "regional stability" our measure of "victory." That single step would dramatically realign the opposing forces in the region, where most states want stability. Even many in the angry mobs of young Arabs shouting profanities against the United States want predictable order, albeit on better social and economic terms than they now have.

DOJ_NMG_0130608

Realigning our diplomacy and military capabilities to achieve order will hugely reduce the numbers of our enemies and gain us new and important allies. This cannot happen, however, until our forces are moving out of Iraq. Why should Iran negotiate to relieve our pain as long as we are increasing its influence in Iraq and beyond? Withdrawal will awaken most leaders in the region to their own need for U.S.-led diplomacy to stabilize their neighborhood.

If Bush truly wanted to rescue something of his historical legacy, he would seize the initiative to implement this kind of strategy. He would eventually be held up as a leader capable of reversing direction by turning an imminent, tragic defeat into strategic recovery.

If he stays on his present course, he will leave Congress the opportunity to earn the credit for such a turnaround. It is already too late to wait for some presidential candidate for 2008 to retrieve the situation. If Congress cannot act, it, too, will live in infamy.

William E. Odom, a retired Army lieutenant general, was head of Army intelligence and director of the National Security Agency under Ronald Reagan. He served on the National Security Council staff under Jimmy Carter. A West Point graduate with a PhD from Columbia, Odom teaches at Yale and is a fellow of the Hudson Institute.

A Road Map Out Of Iraq (LAT)

By Zbigniew Brzezinski

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2007

THE WAR IN IRAQ is a historic strategic and moral calamity undertaken under false assumptions. It is undermining America's global legitimacy. Its collateral civilian casualties, as well as some abuses, are tarnishing America's moral credentials. Driven by Manichean impulses and imperial hubris, it is intensifying regional instability.

Yet major strategic decisions in the Bush administration continue to be made within a very narrow circle of individuals — perhaps not more than the fingers on one hand. With the exception of the new Defense secretary, Robert M. Gates, these are the same individuals who have been involved from the start of this misadventure, who made the original decision to go to war in Iraq and who used the original false justifications for going to war. It is human nature to be reluctant to undertake actions that would imply a significant reversal of policy.

From the standpoint of U.S. national interest, this is particularly ominous. If the United States continues to be bogged down in protracted, bloody involvement in Iraq, the final destination on this downhill track is likely to be a head-on conflict with Iran and much of the Islamic world.

Here, for instance, is a plausible scenario for a military collision with Iran: Iraq fails to meet the benchmarks for progress toward stability set by the Bush administration. This is followed by U.S. accusations of Iranian responsibility for the failure, then by some provocation in Iraq or a terrorist act in the United States blamed on Iran, culminating in a "defensive" U.S. military action against Iran. This plunges a lonely United States into a spreading and deepening quagmire lasting 20 years or more and eventually ranging across Iraq, Iran, Afghanistan and Pakistan.

Indeed, a mythical historical narrative to justify the case for such a protracted and potential expanding war is already being articulated. Initially justified by false claims about weapons of mass destruction in Iraq, the war is now being redefined as the decisive ideological struggle of our time, reminiscent of the earlier collisions with Nazism and Stalinism. In that context, Islamist extremism and Al Qaeda are presented as the equivalents of the threat posed by Nazi Germany and then Soviet Russia, and 9/11 as the equivalent of the Pearl Harbor attack that precipitated U.S. involvement in World War II.

This simplistic and demagogic narrative, however, overlooks that the Nazi threat was based on the military power of the most industrially advanced European state and that Stalinism was not only able to mobilize the resources of the victorious and militarily powerful Soviet Union but had worldwide appeal through its Marxist doctrine.

In contrast, most Muslims are not embracing Islamic fundamentalism. Al Qaeda is an isolated, fundamentalist aberration. Most Iraqis are engaged in strife not on behalf of an Islamist ideology but because of the U.S. occupation, which destroyed the Iraqi state. Iran, meanwhile, though gaining in regional influence, is hardly a global threat; rather, it is politically divided, economically and militarily weak. To argue that the United States must respond militarily to a wide Islamic threat with Iran at its epicenter is to promote a self-fulfilling prophecy.

No other country shares the Manichean delusions that the Bush administration so passionately articulates. And the result, sad to say, is growing political isolation of and pervasive popular antagonism toward the United States.

Our international interest calls for a significant change in direction. We need a strategy to end the occupation of Iraq and to shape a regional security dialogue. Both goals will take time and require genuinely serious U.S. commitment. The quest to achieve these goals should involve four steps.

First, the United States should reaffirm explicitly and unambiguously its determination to leave Iraq in a reasonably short period of time. Right now, the U.S. occupation, even though resented by most Iraqis, is serving as an umbrella for internal intransigence. Nobody inside or outside the Iraqi government feels any real incentive to compromise while the U.S. is keeping the situation more or less afloat.

DOJ_NMG_0130609

A public declaration that the U.S. intends to leave is needed to allay fears in the Middle East of a new and enduring American imperial hegemony. Right or wrong, many view the establishment of such a hegemony as the primary reason for the U.S. intervention in a region only recently free of colonial domination. That perception must be discredited. If the president is unwilling to do so, perhaps Congress could by passing a joint resolution.

Second, the United States should announce that it is undertaking talks with Iraqi leaders to jointly set a date by which U.S. military disengagement should be completed. Roughly a year might be a good goal — but the date must be agreed on with the Iraqis and announced as a joint decision. In the meantime, the U.S. should avoid military escalation, including the troop "surge," which can, at best, have only a passing tactical benefit.

Only by holding serious talks with Iraqi politicians about an exit date can we identify the authentic Iraqi leaders with the self-confidence and capacity to stand on their own legs, without U.S. military protection. The painful reality is that the current Iraqi regime, characterized by the Bush administration as representative of the Iraqi people, largely defines itself by its physical location: the 4-square-mile U.S. fortress within Baghdad — protected by a wall 15 feet thick in places and manned by heavily armed U.S. military — popularly known as the Green Zone. Only Iraqi leaders who can exercise real power beyond the Green Zone can eventually reach a genuine Iraqi accommodation.

Third, the United States should encourage Iraqi leaders to issue an invitation to all neighbors of Iraq and perhaps some other Muslim countries, such as Egypt, Morocco, Algeria and Pakistan, to discuss how best to enhance stability in Iraq in conjunction with U.S. military disengagement and to participate eventually in a conference regarding regional stability.

Such a serious discussion about regional security cannot be undertaken with Iraq or its neighbors while the U.S. is perceived as an occupier for an indefinite duration. Iraq's neighbors don't fear any real explosion in Iraq because we're there, and the volatile status quo comes at our expense and does not require them to make any real choices.

But an agreed-on departure date would have the effect of forcing all of the governments around Iraq to ask themselves: "How do we deal with the problem of stability in Iraq? Do we really want to have a regional war among ourselves?" Would a war that might, for example, pit the Saudis and the Jordanians against the Iranians, with the Syrians in between, be worth risking? Most of the regimes in the region know that that kind of a war could spread and destroy them.

That is why the effort to engage the neighbors is desirable; it could help prevent an escalating civil war in Iraq that also poses a mounting threat to their own stability. But it can only take place provided the United States is in the process of leaving. An announcement of our willingness to leave and to convene a conference to discuss the next steps would be a powerful trigger for change.

Fourth, the U.S. should activate a credible and energetic effort to finally reach an Israeli-Palestinian peace. The record shows that the Israelis and the Palestinians will never do so on their own. Without such a settlement, nationalist and fundamentalist passions in the region will in the longer run doom any Arab regime that is perceived as supportive of U.S. regional hegemony.

After World War II, the U.S. prevailed in the defense of democracy in Europe because it successfully pursued a long-term political strategy of uniting its friends and dividing its enemies. It soberly deterred aggression without initiating hostilities, and all the while, it explored the possibility of negotiating arrangements.

Today, American global leadership is being tested in the Middle East. A similarly wise strategy of genuinely constructive political engagement is urgently needed.

Zbigniew Brzezinski was National Security Advisor to President Carter.

Legitimacy Was Step One (WP)

By Gian P. Gentile

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

I learned as a tactical battalion commander in Baghdad's Amiriyah district last year that government legitimacy was exponentially more important than the number of coalition and Iraqi army forces patrolling the streets, the number of coalition advisers with Iraqi army and police units, or money spent improving services. Indeed, legitimacy of the government of Iraq as seen through the eyes of all Iraqis -- Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds -- is the necessary condition for peace based on reconciliation.

In Amiriyah we were neither winning nor losing; we were in stasis. Between August and November last year, I substantially increased the number of combined American and Iraqi army patrols there and the capacity of the American adviser team that worked with a local Iraqi army battalion. Still, the deadlock did not break.

Amiriyah is one of the few districts in Baghdad that is almost completely Sunni. It was built in the early 1970s as a residential area for lawyers, doctors, engineers and members of the Baathist elite. When Saddam Hussein's regime fell in 2003,

DOJ_NMG_0130610

Amiriyah's affluent residents had the most to lose, and partly because of its long-standing tribal ties to Anbar province, Amiriyah gradually became Baghdad's Sunni insurgent headquarters.

In the spring of 2003 Sunnis made up about 85 percent of Amiriyah's population. But sectarian killings have made Sunnis nearly the entire population, and the district has become lethal for the few remaining Shiites.

The enemy of peace in Amiriyah, much like in the rest of Baghdad, was and is a hybrid. The enemy is still an undefeated Sunni insurgency that attacks coalition and Iraqi forces. The enemy is also a vicious and brutal sectarian war carried out not only by Sunni and Shiite extremists but sometimes also by neighbors against neighbors.

As violence mounted significantly in Baghdad over the summer, we confronted this hybrid enemy head-on for a week in early August with an almost fourfold increase of American and Iraqi troops. We also shut down all vehicular traffic in the district, among other things.

The stated purpose for our efforts was to provide breathing room for the government, to allow a break in the violence so it could demonstrate that it was a government of unity. In this sense we "cleared" Amiriyah, and there were no violent acts during that week. Yet the increase in troops was not sustainable.

In the weeks and months after our weeklong operation, American forces did not leave or abandon Amiriyah. We held it with nearly double the number of American and Iraqi troops that had long operated there.

My basic and most fundamental mission was to protect the people. As models of how to proceed, I used Col. H.R. McMaster's brilliant operations in Tall Afar and the successful actions of my brigade commander, Col. Mike Beech, in the nearby Sunni district of Doura. I also used the Army's new counterinsurgency doctrine as my operational guide. We spent millions of dollars rebuilding schools and cleaning garbage from the streets. We continued to capture and kill Sunni insurgents and Shiite militia members who attempted to attack Amiriyah from outlying areas. We established trust between the Sunni population and our forces and improved their views of the local Iraqi army battalion. For its Sunni residents, Amiriyah became one of the most secure districts in Baghdad.

But the violence continued. Sunnis killed and continue to kill Shiites and government forces because of sectarian hatred, to retaliate for what they view as unfair acts by the Shiite government and because they fear that any Shiites remaining in their district would provoke more oppressive government actions against them.

Could more American troops have eliminated the Sunni insurgency in Amiriyah? Probably not, because the people were not willing to separate themselves from the insurgents. Residents saw the Sunni insurgents as their final hope for protection from an illegitimate government out to crush them.

Could more American troops have stopped the sectarian violence? Possibly, if this war was still being carried out only by Shiite and Sunni extremist groups. But it is now a sectarian war of the people. When I spoke to shopkeepers, professionals, imams and others in Amiriyah, I was told that the solution to ending the violence -- both insurgent attacks and sectarian killings -- was an Iraqi government they saw as legitimate.

More American troops, more Iraqi troops and more American advisers cannot produce a legitimate government; only the Iraqis can do that. To be sure, a minimum amount of military power is needed in a place such as Amiriyah to maintain order. Those forces are in place and should remain there to provide a baseline of security for the Iraqi government and to demonstrate to all Iraqis that the government is a force for reconciliation and fairness, not division.

The writer, a lieutenant colonel in the 4th Infantry Division, operated in West Baghdad last year.

The Diplomats On Capitol Hill (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

Foreign ministers usually try to avoid commenting on election results in other countries. But their appointment schedules are not so discreet. An increasingly well-beaten path to Capitol Hill by special envoys and other visiting officials attests to the new power that Congress holds in foreign policy.

That result -- like so many others it has produced -- is exactly the reverse of what the Bush administration hoped to achieve. As it empowered its critics on Iraq by focusing so relentlessly on them (see the trial of Scooter Libby) and made civil liberties a salient issue by adopting extreme positions (see the Bill of Rights), the dismissive attitude President Bush has displayed toward the legislative branch helped push Congress into taking on policymaking duties it is ill-equipped to handle.

The confusion and bickering over competing Senate resolutions to support, oppose or split the difference on Bush's proposed "surge" of five additional brigades into Iraq illustrate how Washington is rolling rapidly toward the worst of all policy worlds: one in which 535 would-be secretaries of state try to micromanage battlefield tactics on the basis of November's election returns.

DOJ_NMG_0130611

In public and in private comments to foreign visitors, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi has suggested that Democratic victories in those elections have settled any lingering debate over Iraq for the American public. It is the job of the Democratic Party and Congress to bring the troops home as quickly as possible, Pelosi asserts, or Congress will not be complying with the public will.

The push for rapid U.S. withdrawal understandably alarms Turkey and Arab states in the region, which are already traumatized by the violence and chaotic conditions of neighboring Iraq. Among the diplomats headed to Capitol Hill last week to assess the new balance of power and to urge Washington to exercise strategic patience in Iraq were the foreign ministers of Turkey and Egypt.

While noting that their countries had opposed the 2003 invasion, both urged lawmakers to consider the disastrous consequences of hasty American withdrawal. "We support President Bush's new strategy and think it should be given a chance," Turkey's Abdullah Gul told me during a session with journalists here Monday night. A similar message was carried to Capitol Hill by Egypt's Ahmed Aboul Gheit, who devoted 90 percent of his official meetings on a two-day trip to talking with members of Congress, according to aides.

Predictably, bilateral concerns dominated the exchanges on Capitol Hill. Gul made a spirited case that U.S.-Turkish relations would be wrecked by congressional passage of a bill that would condemn as "genocide" the mass killing of Ottoman Armenians a century ago. Gheit showed concern that Democratic majorities in the House and Senate might exert new pressures on Egypt over human rights and democracy issues.

But they also sought to inject foreign policy considerations into an American debate that is now above all about domestic U.S. political strategies and fortunes and only nominally about Iraq. "We now understand better the problem of taxation without representation," says a diplomat based in Washington. "You make decisions that profoundly and increasingly affect our survival and prosperity, while our ability to influence those decisions shrinks to next to nil."

This emerging foreign lobby is not a monolith. Most European governments "more or less secretly cheer the Democratic efforts to rein in Bush," says a European diplomat. "But they will be very careful about taking a public position for or against the surge."

The White House has contributed significantly to the debasing of the public debate by its secrecy and political manipulation of national security issues and by walling out the congressional leadership of both parties from serious consultation and coordination while undertaking a historic high-risk, high-reward gamble to conquer and then remake Iraq. That kind of close-minded, dogmatic approach is not one that Democrats in Congress should aspire to emulate by tuning out the genuine concerns of Iraq's neighbors and other nations.

Bush is reported to be preparing to shake up his unsuccessful congressional liaison office as chief of staff Josh Bolten completes his overhaul of the White House staff. But all of the evidence argues that it is Bush's own view of cooperation with Congress that most urgently needs to be shaken up.

The White House hunkered down behind procedural gimmicks to block Senate passage of a resolution opposing Bush's surge. That was shortsighted. But Democrats will fare no better if they use domestic election results as the main criterion for shaping what will increasingly be a congressionally influenced U.S. foreign policy.

At This Point, It's Kamikaze Strategy In Iraq (LAT)

By Jonathan Chait

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2007

THERE IS something genuinely bizarre about those remaining supporters of President Bush's strategy in Iraq. It is not just that they are wrong — being wrong happens to all of us from time to time. It's that they are completely detached from reality.

Their arguments have nothing to do with what is actually happening in Iraq. They aren't claiming that Bush's critics have a wrong impression of what's happening in Iraq. They just seem to have no interest in the subject themselves. Their arguments take place almost entirely at the level of abstraction.

If you follow the news in Iraq, the story has become depressingly familiar. Prime Minister Nouri Maliki is a creature of hard-line Shiite sectarians, and his government has been deeply infiltrated by Shiite militias. Everything he has done in his job has been toward the end of giving the Shiites an upper hand over the Sunnis.

Shiite militias have infiltrated the Iraqi army. We're equipping and training the bad guys. The Shiite militia members who haven't joined the army lay low when our troops patrol Baghdad, so that we fight the Sunnis and leave them standing. As Tom Lasseter of McClatchy Newspapers reported a week and a half ago, "The U.S. military drive to train and equip Iraq's security forces has unwittingly strengthened anti-American Shiite Muslim cleric Muqtada Sadr's Mahdi Army militia."

That's why Maliki supports the surge. To the extent it succeeds, the surge will do a faster and better job of driving Sunnis out of Baghdad. But why should we want to help him do that?

DOJ_NMG_0130612

The critiques of Bush's strategy all flow from this interpretation of events. The administration's critics say that our current role has the unintended but unavoidable effect of furthering sectarian warfare. If we stop cooperating with one party to a civil war, we can't make things much worse. We might possibly make them better: If we're no longer doing the Shiites' fighting for them, perhaps they'll have to bargain with the Sunnis.

What do the administration's supporters say to this? Let's look at a brief survey. Sen. Joe Lieberman (I-Conn.), one of the most vocal supporters of Bush's strategy, has made two major statements on the war in 2007. In the first, a letter in January, he wrote that "withdrawing from the fight is not a sound, long-term policy for the national security of the United States. Withdrawing from the fight is a recipe for defeat." How did Lieberman envision us winning? What about the reports that our actions are simply fueling the civil war? His letter had nothing to say.

Since then, Lieberman delivered a speech on the war, and that was even worse. The entire point of it was that a Senate vote of no confidence in Bush would demoralize our allies and embolden the enemy. Nothing at all about how the Bush strategy could work.

OK, you say, so maybe Lieberman has nothing of substance. But he's a politician, and they craft their words for sound bites. So surely the intellectuals who support Bush must have something deeper, right?

Sadly, no. The Weekly Standard — Bush's strongest bastion of remaining support — has editorialized about the war for three consecutive issues. The first editorial asserted that "abandoning American efforts to control the violence in Iraq would lead to an increase in violence" but offered no evidence to support this claim. It did not mention Maliki's clear lack of interest in making peace with the Sunnis nor the infiltration of the Iraqi armed forces.

The next editorial, by Executive Editor Fred Barnes, consisted of an extended analogy to Vietnam. The closest Barnes came to a substantive point was pointing out that war opponents had denigrated the Vietnamese government too. Did this mean we're wrong to denigrate the Iraqi government today? Barnes did not say.

And the next editorial consisted entirely of attacking proponents of the anti-surge resolution as cowards. It didn't even bother to make a claim that we're winning, or we could still win, or withdrawing would make things worse.

So, there you have it, the case for supporting Bush: Trust the commander in chief, don't undermine the troops, withdrawal equals defeat. These aren't arguments to support Bush's strategy, they're generic pro-war arguments. Change a few details and these lines could support Napoleon's invasion of Russia or the Crusader occupation of Jerusalem or almost any war. Generic pro-war arguments may be trite, but that's what you turn to when you've given up on reality.

Blame (Blank) For Iraq (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

WASHINGTON

THE blame game on Iraq seems to be reaching a peak. The surest sign is that people inside the Beltway have started to proclaim loudly that they're not looking to assign any blame.

"This is not at all a finger-pointing exercise," Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, helpfully told a Senate panel on Tuesday as he explained that other federal agencies weren't shouldering their responsibility for sending civilians to help out in Iraq.

"Self-righteous finger-wagging will not make Iraq any more secure," lectured Representative Tom Davis, a Virginia Republican, during a House hearing in which his colleagues tore apart L. Paul Bremer III, the former United States point man in Baghdad after the war.

No one can say with certainty that Iraq is lost; it is too early to say whether President Bush's new strategy to increase the number of American troops in Baghdad and Anbar by 21,500 won't work. But, a continent and an ocean away, Washington is already positioning to lay blame if the worst happens. After all, history books are being written right now.

So, in a decidedly gloomy Capitol, a steady succession of administration officials, military types and yesterday's dignitaries have trooped through various Senate and House hearing rooms to lash out — and be lashed.

Blame the Democrats.

Back when the Republicans were in control of the House and the Senate, they didn't venture far toward an examination of President Bush's Iraq strategy. Newly empowered, the Democrats have hauled in everyone but the kitchen sink: from Henry Kissinger to President Jimmy Carter's national security adviser, Zbigniew Brzezinski.

A whole lot of blame has been spread around. The Pentagon took a swing at the State Department, with Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates publicly griping to a Senate panel about a State memo asking the military to temporarily fill some Iraq jobs that State is supposed to be responsible for. "If you were troubled by the memo, that was mild compared to my reaction when I saw it," Mr. Gates said.

DOJ_NMG_0130613

The next day, in a telephone interview, Adm. Edmund P. Giambastiani Jr., vice chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who was asked by State officials to defend them to a reporter, showed that when the chips are down and blame is being assigned, his first priority is not the diplomatic corps. "The military won't lose this war," he said, then added, pointedly, "but we won't win it by ourselves either."

The State Department shot back, but not with much gusto. David Satterfield, the senior adviser on Iraq, took the high road during a conference call with reporters, eschewing direct criticism of the Pentagon and saying only that "the skill sets needed for the additional staff are not skill sets in which any foreign service in the world, including our own," are proficient.

Beyond that, State left its blame-mongering to smaller guns, relying on unnamed career employees to point out that if the Pentagon had bothered to include State in the initial postwar planning, Iraq might not be the mess it is today.

Robert K. Brigham, a historian of American foreign relations at Vassar, argues that the finger-pointing is a natural outcome for bureaucrats who are secretly frustrated by American policy in Iraq but unable to change it.

"These different departments are all stuck with the same playbook," Mr. Brigham says. "In the absence of any kind of movement to change the geometry, this is what you get. You didn't have this dissension during the Nixon years, you had it in Johnson's."

Mr. Brigham said that Lyndon B. Johnson got more flak for Vietnam than Richard M. Nixon did because Mr. Johnson did not make significant changes to Vietnam policy, while Mr. Nixon did, by going to China, among other things. Unless President Bush makes an about-face in American foreign policy, Mr. Brigham argues, by, say, beginning a pullback of troops, the blame game will continue.

Or increase. "This game has got a lot more plays before it plays out," says Joseph Cirincione, senior vice president for national security and international policy at the Center for American Progress, a liberal research group. "Are we reaching a crescendo? Heck no."

Well, even if the blame game hasn't reached its zenith, now seems a good time to look at the latest culprits, scapegoats and whipping boys who have become fashionable in Washington. It's a disparate group.

Whipping Boy: Iran.

Whip: President Bush.

The president upped his rhetoric in January when he unveiled his new troop surge plan, announcing that "Iran is providing material support for attacks on American troops" in Iraq. Expect more in the coming weeks, as administration officials say they will disclose new intelligence that shows Iran meddling in Iraq.

Whipping Boy: L. Paul Bremer III.

Whip: Henry A. Waxman.

The last time Mr. Bremer, the American civilian administrator in Iraq in 2003-2004, testified before Congress, he was hailed by Republicans and Democrats alike. But that was in the past, before de-Baathification became the dirty word it is now, before the Michael Gordon book and the Tom Ricks book and the Bob Woodward book.

At a House hearing on Wednesday, Representative Mr. Waxman, the California Democrat, upbraided Mr. Bremer for a Bush administration decision to send billions of dollars in cash into Iraq quickly after the United States had occupied the country. "Who in their right mind would send 360 tons of cash into a war zone?" demanded Mr. Waxman. He suggested that some of that money may have ended up financing the insurgency.

Mr. Bremer acknowledged that he made mistakes, but said, "I think we made great progress under some of the most difficult conditions imaginable."

Whipping Boy: Gen. George W. Casey Jr.

Whip: John McCain.

General Casey, responsible for the Army's Iraq war strategy for the past two years, appeared before a Senate panel weighing whether to approve his promotion to be the Army's next chief of staff, and quickly came under attack.

"I question seriously the judgment that was employed in your execution of your responsibilities in Iraq," Senator McCain informed him. "And we have paid a very, very heavy price in American blood and treasure because of what is now agreed to by literally everyone as a failed policy."

Mr. McCain then went on to vote against General Casey's promotion. But the general got the last laugh; the full Senate confirmed him on Thursday by a vote of 83 to 14.

Whipping Boy: Presidents Bill Clinton and Jimmy Carter.

Whip: Dinesh D'Souza.

The conservative author argues in his recent book, "The Enemy at Home," that President Carter's withdrawal of support for the shah of Iran helped Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini's regime gain power in Iran, thus giving radical Islamists control. Mr. D'Souza also says that President Clinton failed to respond to Islamic attacks and thus emboldened Osama bin Laden into thinking he could get away with the Sept. 11 attacks. Therefore, Mr. D'Souza says, American liberals are to blame for the rise of radical Islam and Muslim anger at America.

DOJ_NMG_0130614

O.K., this isn't technically an Iraq finger-point, but it seemed to capture the moment.

U.S. Keeps Pressure On Iran But Decreases Saber Rattling (WP)

By Karen DeYoung

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates insisted again Friday that, despite persistent reports to the contrary circulating in Washington and around the world, the United States is not planning military action against Iran.

"I don't know how many times the president, Secretary Rice and I have had to repeat that we have no intention of attacking Iran," an exasperated Gates told reporters at a NATO meeting in Spain. In fact, he said, the administration has consciously tried to "tone down" its rhetoric on the subject.

Similar statements in recent weeks by President Bush, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and others follow a high-level policy assessment in January that U.S. and multilateral pressure on Tehran, to the surprise of many in the administration, might be showing signs of progress.

Officials highlighted growing internal public and political criticism of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, as well as the reemergence, after months of public silence, of Tehran's chief nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani. Larijani arrived in Munich yesterday for talks with European Union officials.

As a result, new talking points distributed to senior policymakers in the administration directed them to actively play down any suggestion of war planning.

Such demurrals are not meant to suggest that the administration will stop pressing Iran on several fronts or that it expects Iranian behavior to change soon. Warnings of new sanctions if Tehran does not suspend its nuclear enrichment program, the dispatch of a second carrier battle group to the Persian Gulf, presidential authorization to treat Iranian intelligence and paramilitary operatives in Iraq as "enemy combatants," and encouragement of Sunni Arab states to take a united stand against Iranian aggression are all designed to convince Tehran that "we have options" and are prepared to use them, a senior administration official said.

"We're a power, too," is the message to Tehran, the official said. "Your power is not unlimited. You can't go anywhere and do anything you want."

The changed rhetoric also stems from a growing foreign policy "maturity" within the administration, according to foreign diplomats and senior officials who agreed to discuss the issue on the condition of anonymity. They described a new attitude, born of the administration's awareness that the Iraq war has left it with a wide credibility gap at home and abroad and the realization that military action against Iran would strain U.S. capabilities, undercut other goals and possibly explode into a regional conflagration. Internal discussion has also focused on the likelihood that an attack could destroy whatever political plurality exists in Iran by uniting even those opposed to Ahmadinejad in a wave of anti-U.S. nationalism.

"It's very important that we proceed carefully, patiently and with some skill," said Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns, who by all accounts is playing a lead role in formulating Iran policy. "We believe that diplomacy can succeed. We're focused on that. We're not focused on a military conflict with Iran."

Some senior administration officials still relish the notion of a direct confrontation. One ambassador in Washington said he was taken aback when John Hannah, Vice President Cheney's national security adviser, said during a recent meeting that the administration considers 2007 "the year of Iran" and indicated that a U.S. attack was a real possibility. Hannah declined to be interviewed for this article.

However, sources described agreement among the Bush administration and leading governments in Europe and the Middle East -- including those in Britain, France, Germany and Saudi Arabia -- over consistent but measured pressure on Tehran. They said close consultations, a stark contrast to deep divisions over the U.S. invasion of Iraq, have become self-reinforcing for Washington and its allies.

Upcoming events are likely to test U.S. patience. The Tehran government has promised a "significant" nuclear announcement today, following a 10-day celebration of the anniversary of the 1979 Islamic revolution. Among the possibilities, U.S. officials and experts believe, is a declaration that Iran has moved from experimental to industrial-scale enrichment. Iran has insisted that its nuclear program is purely for peaceful energy purposes, while the West has accused Tehran of secretly trying to build an atomic weapon.

Later this month, the U.N. Security Council will convene to judge Iranian compliance with a unanimous December resolution giving the nation until Feb. 21 to suspend all enrichment and reprocessing activities. Anticipating a negative finding, the administration is readying a new resolution to increase Iran's isolation. Among other measures, officials are considering charging Iran with violating U.N. resolutions that prohibit member countries from harboring or assisting known terrorists. Tehran has refused to hand over a number of senior al-Qaeda operatives it has claimed to be holding under "house arrest" for years.

DOJ_NMG_0130615

This week, the administration plans to publicly present evidence of an Iranian role in supplying lethal weaponry to Shiite militias in Iraq. The weapons, including a sophisticated, armor-piercing explosive device, have been used almost exclusively against U.S. forces in Iraq and are considered responsible for numerous military deaths over the past two years. Gates said on Friday that Iran has been conclusively linked to the weapons through serial numbers and other markings on the bombs.

But initial plans to lay out a broad case of Iranian involvement in Iraq were shelved two weeks ago. Sources said policymakers acknowledged that they risked a repeat of the now-discredited weapons of mass destruction charges used to justify the Iraq invasion and wanted to avoid any embellishing. "We're not saying the Iranians pulled the trigger," one administration official said. "They provided the technology."

That expanded presentation would have appeared to contradict a new National Intelligence Estimate concluding that Iran, despite the attacks against U.S. forces, is not a significant factor in the sectarian violence in Baghdad.

Over the past two years, the administration has pursued different tracks to stymie increasingly bold Iranian activities. In March 2005, the United States signed on to an unsuccessful effort by Britain, France and Germany to begin negotiations with Iran over its nuclear enrichment activities. Although the administration offered early last year to open bilateral talks on Iraq between the United States and Iranian ambassadors in Baghdad, it subsequently "pulled the plug" on the initiative, one official said, after the Iraqi government objected and Iran tried to expand a planned session to include all outstanding issues between the two countries.

The administration warned Iran against efforts to block oil-shipment lanes in the Persian Gulf. It publicly accused Iran of helping to instigate last summer's war between Israel and Lebanese Hezbollah and of trying, through its support for Hezbollah, to overthrow the elected government in Beirut. It also escalated its allegations of Iranian interference in Iraq.

It was not until a series of high-level policy meetings last fall, which included the president, that the various tracks began to meld into a coordinated effort. "There was not a presidential directive," said a senior official who participated in the process, "but there was a very active interagency discussion. We talked about measures to take, and sequencing."

U.S. officials decided to push for a new U.N. Security Council resolution imposing a 60-day deadline for Iran to suspend nuclear activities or risk sanctions, and imposed unilateral restrictions on Iranian banks. They repeated the U.S. refusal to hold bilateral talks on the nuclear issue until Iran's program was ended.

Bush authorized U.S. military forces to capture and kill, if necessary, identified Iranian intelligence and paramilitary operatives in Iraq, and increased covert intelligence activities against Iranian-backed forces in Lebanon. A second carrier battle group was sent to the Persian Gulf region, while officials emphasized that it had no "offensive" mission against Iran. Cheney flew to Riyadh to consult with Saudi King Abdullah.

At the same time, the administration tried to increase its appeal to an Iranian public that it determined was increasingly disenchanted with Ahmadinejad. The State Department launched, for the first time since relations were severed in 1979, a series of educational and professional exchanges with Iran.

In December, a group of Iranian physicians and medical academics came to the United States for a three-week public health program. Last month, 20 American athletes and coaches from USA Wrestling were greeted with a standing ovation when they competed in the Takhti Cup in Bandar Abbas, Iran. A reciprocal trip by Iranian wrestlers is planned for spring, along with a visit by Iranian disaster-relief professionals.

As different elements of the policy were pulled together, the administration found that its European and Arab partners thought it had adopted the right approach and appeared to strengthen their own resolve to pressure Iran. Last month's decision to dial back the war rhetoric came in response to concerns at home and abroad that the administration's saber rattling was drowning out its more finely calibrated strategy.

"We truly believe this combination can succeed," a senior official said. "We're not saying that it will."

Iran Reformists Want U.S. To Tone It Down (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2007

TEHRAN — It is a few weeks before the Iranian new year, and already the narrow market streets in south Tehran are boiling with extra shoppers. Houses must be cleaned, new curtains hung on the windows, the table laid with fresh linens. No child should leave home without new clothes and a few crisp bills in his pocket.

These neighborhoods of tight-clustered houses, dingy auto parts shops, cheap shoe stores and endless ribbons of honking, fuming cars were the bosom of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's sweep to the presidency in 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0130616

"Most people voted for Ahmadinejad because he promised they would never have to feel sad again on New Year's Eve in front of their children," said Farshid Bakhtieri, a 21-year-old computer salesman. "Everyone right now, they feel nothing but regret.

"One person says he voted for Ahmadinejad because he would create jobs. And there are no jobs. Another person says it was because he would build houses. No one can afford these houses," Bakhtieri said. "He is like all the other politicians in the history of Iran, all of them coming with lots of promises, but no one follows these promises. He is exactly like the others."

Tens of thousands of Iranians will gather in the streets today for what is supposed to be a ringing public endorsement of Iran's 28-year-old Islamic Revolution and its embattled drive for nuclear power.

But many Iranians say the international dispute over Iran's nuclear program has become a rallying point for a president who otherwise would be facing substantial public dissatisfaction over soaring inflation, rising unemployment and widespread censorship.

This has been a source of frustration to Iran's reformists, who dealt the president's party a blow at the polls in local elections in December but complain that the Bush administration's threatening rhetoric has pulled the rug out from under them.

"You are harmful for us. We try to tell politicians in Washington, D.C., please don't do anything in favor of reform or to promote democracy in Iran. Because in 100% of the cases, it benefits the right wing," said Saeed Leylaz, a business consultant and advocate of economic reform and greater dialogue with the West.

"Mr. Ahmadinejad tries to make the international situation worse and worse. And now with the U.N. Security Council resolution, he can say, 'Look, we are in a dangerous position, and nobody can say anything against us, because the enemy is coming into the country.' Exactly like George W. Bush in Washington, D.C. They are helping each other. They need each other, I believe."

The government and clerical establishment have gone to great pains in recent weeks to stress to Iranians that the nation's independence is under threat. More than anything else, a strong sense of national pride has pushed Iran toward developing a nuclear power program, which the U.S. and other nations believe is aimed at building a nuclear weapon.

"Our revolution was a gift from God. If we don't say 'Thank God' every day, we will lose this gift and all we have," Ahmad Khatami, a hard-line cleric from Qom, reminded hundreds gathered for Friday prayers at Tehran University last week. "Attacking the government and the parliament and the judiciary is fanning the flames of the enemy."

Ahmadinejad's approach has been broadly popular in the provinces and among many in Tehran fed up with the wealth and corruption of those in power. The slight president, who typically wears a tan jacket, lives in a simple house and drives a normal car.

He has tried to give the lower classes a bigger share of Iran's oil wealth and has been known to respond to constituents who write to him about problems with a handwritten note, directing them to take it to the nearest bank for a loan.

But the state's share of the economy has swollen, and the Tehran stock exchange has lost more than a quarter of its value over the last 18 months. Unemployment stands at an official 11.5%, and little new foreign investment is coming in.

Meanwhile, prices are increasing at a dizzying rate. Tomatoes have risen threefold in the last year, while housing prices in more prosperous north Tehran appear to have doubled.

Bakhtieri said his mother, a university librarian, was one of several public employees who got a raise shortly after Ahmadinejad was elected, only to see it taken back when the government couldn't afford it. Some employees even had to repay the extra money they received, he said.

Bakhtieri said many Iranians blame their troubles on Ahmadinejad's generous aid programs to Afghanistan, Central Asia, the Palestinian territories and Latin America.

"I don't know why, when our people need lots of things, they have to be spending all this money in other countries," he said.

Economists say the inflation can be traced to the amount of money in circulation doubling over the last 18 months.

The government ordered banks to grant millions of dollars in new loans to small and medium-sized businesses. Bad loans put the banks at risk.

New roads, wastewater treatment plants and sports centers were launched, paid for by the government, and when the government couldn't afford it, from yet more bank loans. Banks are facing a reported $8.8 billion in bad loans.

Meanwhile, imports have doubled, to $50 billion a year. And the oil stabilization fund, which had accumulated $9 billion in unanticipated oil revenue as a hedge for the future, is forecast by some to be tapped out by the end of next month.

Voter response has been swift: When Iranians went to the polls for December's municipal council elections, Ahmadinejad's party took a beating.

DOJ_NMG_0130617

"That is a devastating defeat for the president. And this is unprecedented in Iran, that after a year and a half in office a president's party is defeated like this," said a former government official, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "This voice has to be heard now by the government."

The international conflict over the country's nuclear program has only compounded the economic problems.

U.N. sanctions targeting Iran's nuclear and missile programs will probably have little effect on the public. But a separate banking embargo being pushed by the Bush administration means Iranian businessmen must pay much more to import goods.

"The only solution we have now is to deal with Chinese companies, because the Chinese are more flexible," said Amir Saqaei, an engineer in the oil and gas industry who is developing an oil project in the western region of Cheshmakhosh. However, he said, the Chinese goods are of poor quality.

Not all of the government's troubles have been economic. Writers have complained of a near-halt to the publishing of novels. Foreign books such as William Faulkner's "As I Lay Dying" have been banned, and several newspapers have been closed.

In December, crackdowns on student associations and repression of activists prompted students at Tehran's Amir Kabir University to heckle the president during an appearance there. Chanting "Death to the dictator" and carrying a banner reading "Fascist Ahmadinejad," the crowd sent a shoe sailing toward the president as he stood at the podium.

A large number of parliamentary deputies signed letters this year demanding answers from the president on the nuclear issue and the economy. But new, strong language from Washington starting in January that hinted at the possibility of a military strike quickly took the wind out of their sails.

Independent legislator Akbar Alami, who had circulated a letter, said he stopped getting signatures almost immediately.

If Iranians perceive a foreign threat, he said, "they don't pay attention anymore to differences, and the problem they have between parties and governments doesn't matter anymore."

To the contrary, said former central bank governor Mohammad Hossain Adeli, it mobilizes the Iranians and ratchets up the conflict.

"The foreign pressure is counterproductive and radicalizes the domestic environment," he said. "And then this radicalization results in more confrontational positions on the part of Iran."

U.S. To Reveal Tehran's Link To Iraq Insurgency (WT/AP)

By Katherine Shrader

The Washington Times, February 11, 2007

The Bush administration is haunted by the history of intelligence blunders about Saddam Hussein's supposed weapons of mass destruction as the United States tries to document that Iran is providing lethal help to Iraqi fighters.

After weeks of preparation and revisions, U.S. officials are preparing to detail evidence supporting administration claims of Iran's meddlesome and deadly activities. A briefing was scheduled today in Baghdad.

The Iran dossier, some 200 pages thick in its classified form, was revised heavily after officials decided it was not ready for release as planned last month. What is made public probably will be short, and shorter on details than the administration recently had suggested.

No one who has seen the files has suggested the evidence is thin. But senior officials -- gun-shy after the drubbing the administration took for the faulty intelligence leading to the 2003 Iraq invasion -- said they were underwhelmed by the packaging.

Officials from several intelligence agencies scrutinized the presentation to make sure it was clear and that "we don't in any way jeopardize our sources and methods in making the presentation," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Friday.

National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley recently said some Iran material was overstated. Privately, officials say they want to avoid the kind of gaffe akin to former Secretary of State Colin Powell's case for war before the United Nations in 2003.

"My colleagues, every statement I make today is backed up by sources, solid sources. These are not assertions," Mr. Powell said as he laid out unproven claims of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction. "What we're giving you are facts and conclusions based on solid intelligence." It later turned out that Iraq did not have such weapons.

The evidence on Iran is intended to give backbone to the administration's claim that an emboldened Iran is playing a dangerous game across the Middle East, meddling in conflicts and seeding terrorism beyond its borders while rushing to acquire nuclear know-how that could produce an atomic bomb.

Government officials familiar with the dossier's documents and slides, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the materials still were classified, said they make a compelling case about Iranian actions in Iraq.

Among the evidence the administration planned to present are weapons that were seized over time in U.S.-led raids on caches around Iraq, said one military official.

DOJ_NMG_0130618

Other evidence includes documents captured when U.S.-led forces raided an Iranian office Jan. 11 in Irbil, a city in Kurdish-controlled northern Iraq about 220 miles north of Baghdad, this official said.

In that raid, the U.S. captured five Iranians. They included the operations chief and other members of Iran's elite Quds Force, which is accused of arming and training Iraqi militants. Tehran said it was a government liaison office and called for the release of the five, along with compensation for damages.

The dossier also details Iran's role in providing Iraqi fighters with the "explosively formed penetrator" devices that can pierce the armor of Abrams tanks with nearly molten-hot charges. One intelligence official said the U.S. is "fairly comfortable" that it knows with some precision the origin of those Iranian-made explosives.

While traveling in Europe on Friday, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said that serial numbers and markings on explosives used in Iraq provide "pretty good" evidence that Iran is providing either weapons or technology for militants there. Mr. Gates did not say how the United States knows that.

A senior U.S. government official said yesterday that members of Congress were shown proof in December. "I'm convinced from what I've seen that the Iranians are supplying and are giving assistance to the people in Iraq who are killing American soldiers," said Sen. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut independent.

Merkel: Must Stop Iran Getting Nuclear Weapons (AP)

AP, February 10, 2007

MUNICH, Germany (AP) -- German Chancellor Angela Merkel said Saturday that the international community is determined to prevent Iran from developing a nuclear weapon.

Speaking at a weekend gathering of the world's top security officials, expected to include Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani, Merkel said Tehran needed to accept demands made by the U.N. and the International Atomic Energy Agency.

"There is no way around this," she told the 250 officials, including more than 40 defense and foreign ministers. "What we are talking about here is a very, very sensitive technology, and for that reason we need a high degree of transparency, which Iran has failed to provide, and if Iran does not do so then the alternative for Iran is to slip further into isolation."

Merkel, whose country holds the rotating European Union presidency, emphasized the international community's support for Israel and said there was a unified resolve to prevent Iran from developing nuclear weapons.

"We are determined to prevent the threat posed by an Iranian military nuclear program," she said.

The annual Munich Conference on Security Policy, now in its 43rd year, is often used as an opportunity for officials to conduct diplomacy in an informal setting.

Key figures attending also include Russian President Vladimir Putin, new Defense Secretary Robert Gates and other top officials.

Some 3,500 police were on hand to provide tight security for the conference and kept the usual throng of demonstrators away. This year, several thousand protesters were expected, protest organizers said.

Heading in to the conference, Larijani, who is scheduled to speak on Sunday, said he planned to use the conference as an opportunity to talk about Iran's nuclear program. Those would be the first talks with Western officials since limited U.N. sanctions were imposed on the country in December, which fell short of harsher measures sought by the United States.

Larijani was expected to meet with German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier and Javier Solana, the EU's chief foreign policy envoy.International solidarity

At the opening dinner on Friday, Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni urged international solidarity in putting pressure on Iran to prevent it from producing a nuclear weapon.

"It is a regime that mocks the Holocaust while threatening the world with a new one, while trying to develop a weapon to do so," she said. "Iran is a threat not only to Israel ... but to the world. The international community cannot show any hesitation ... Any hesitation on our part is being perceived as weakness."

The conference this year focuses on "Global Crises -- Global Responsibilities," looking at NATO's changing role, the Middle East peace process, the West's relations with Russia and the fight against terrorism.

Merkel opened the conference telling the delegates that one of the major threats facing the world today is global warming, urging a combined effort to combat it.

"Global warming is one of the major medium- to long-term threats that could have a dramatic effect," Merkel said.

Gates, who planned to talk Sunday on trans-Atlantic relations, was expected to press allies for more troops and aid for a spring offensive in Afghanistan.

He delivered the message Friday to a NATO defense minister's meeting in Seville, Spain, but got a lukewarm response.

France and Germany are questioning the wisdom of sending more soldiers, while Spain, Italy and Turkey have also been wary of providing more troops.

DOJ_NMG_0130619

Suicide Bomber Kills 30 Near Tikrit (AP)

AP, February 11, 2007

A suicide truck bomber slammed into a crowd of police lining up for duty Sunday near Tikrit, killing at least 30 people and wounding 50, police said.

Minutes later, a roadside bomb struck a car on a highway on the western outskirts of Tikrit, 80 miles north of Baghdad, killing two civilians and wounding two others, police said.

The first blast occurred about 8 a.m. as police were arriving for work at the Adwar police station, provincial police Capt. Abdel-Samad Mohammed said, giving the casualty toll. He said 21 of the 30 killed were policemen.

The bomber drove a small truck that was packed with explosives covered by hay and the force of the blast caused the building to collapse. Three houses close to the station, along with municipal offices and the post office, also were heavily damaged.

Local residents who rushed to the scene tried to help with rescue efforts before civil defense squads arrived with shovels to remove the debris and pull out the dead and those injured. U.S. and Iraqi forces later surrounded the area while recovery efforts continued.

Adwar, about 12 miles southeast of Tikrit, is where former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein was captured on Dec. 13, 2003.

Insurgents frequently target Iraqi security forces, accusing them of collaborating with the U.S.

KBR Driver Killed By U.S. Forces In Iraq (HC)

Houston Chronicle, February 11, 2007

Military, firm team to investigate the Monday death of contractor

The shooting Monday of a civilian contract truck driver for KBR, a subsidiary of Halliburton, is under investigation by the company and by the U.S. Army.

The U.S. military confirmed on Saturday that American forces shot and killed the truck driver at Camp Anaconda, an air base about 42 miles north of Baghdad.

A spokeswoman for KBR, a subsidiary of Halliburton formerly known as Kellogg, Brown & Root, said the shooting was under investigation.

Melissa Norcross, the KBR spokeswoman, said the company was not releasing the name of the dead driver or a second truck driver who was wounded "to protect the individuals' privacy."

"A KBR truck driver was fatally shot, and another wounded, by U.S. military personnel on the evening of February 5, 2007, at an entry control point just outside of Camp Anaconda in Balad, Iraq. Our thoughts and prayers are with the family of the truck driver who was killed," Norcross wrote in an e-mail.

"The wounded truck driver was transported to the Air Force Theater Hospital (AFTH) and has since been treated and released."

The Walker-Martin Funeral Home in Chesaning, Mich., posted an obituary on its Web site Saturday saying that a man named Donald Tolfree of nearby Owosso, Mich., had been killed Monday in Balad, Iraq, where he was employed as a civilian contractor.

Norcross did not respond to e-mail queries about why the news about the contract worker's death, and the second worker's injury, was not made public until Saturday.

"As this matter is presently under investigation, it would be inappropriate to comment further at this time," Norcross said.

The company and the Defense Department on Friday honored 28 contractors who were killed or wounded in the Middle East with the agency's civilian version of the Purple Heart, at a private ceremony at the Hilton Houston Post Oak hotel.

'An escalation of force'Ninety-eight KBR employees and subcontractors have been killed in Iraq, Kuwait and Afghanistan since the two U.S.-led invasions began.

Another 450 have been wounded in hostile action, Norcross said.

The House Oversight and Government Reform Committee held a public hearing Wednesday on the Pentagon's reliance on military contractors for the war effort in Iraq.

George Seagle, director of security for KBR's government and infrastructure division, testified. He made no mention of the truck driver's death.

In Baghdad, Lt. Cmdr. Bill Speaks told the Associated Press that: "There was an escalation of force incident at Camp Anaconda on Feb. 5 (Monday) that resulted in the death of a civilian contractor. The incident is under investigation by the Army Criminal Investigation Division and KBR."

DOJ_NMG_0130620

The Associated Press contributed to this report.

Iowa Guardsmen Are Proud But Disappointed (WP)

By Christian Davenport

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

AL ASAD, Iraq -- Army Spec. Jesse Espinosa figured he was down to just six more missions off this base west of Baghdad. Six more missions in the turret of his armored vehicle, fingertip at the trigger, performing duty so dangerous soldiers here liken it to Russian roulette: providing convoy security along supply routes in deadly Anbar province.

Six more missions, then home to his wife, three children and civilian job as a cook in Bricelyn, Minn.

But all that has to wait.

The deployment of his unit, the Iowa National Guard's 1st Battalion, 133rd Infantry Regiment, was recently extended for up to 125 days because of President Bush's decision to temporarily increase troop levels in Iraq. Like many of his fellow soldiers, Espinosa, 24, was upset because "almost every mission we see at least one" roadside bomb, he said. Although most times, the soldiers are able to spot them before they blow up, he said.

Now, instead of getting back by March, his homecoming will likely be July or August. And instead of six, Espinosa, has about 40 more missions to go.

The Iowa guardsmen have accepted the extended duty, while absorbing the anxieties of their families, said Lt. Col. Benjamin J. Corell, the battalion commander. "You won't find anyone ready to throw in the towel and walk away from what they're doing," he said. "They're proud of their sacrifice."

But that sacrifice is being acutely felt -- here and at home, he acknowledged. "There's a balance there that somehow we have to keep. Because we're crossing the line of what they're willing to sacrifice. And that's a concern. I'm not saying the sky is falling. But families have a big say in whether our soldiers continue their membership in the Guard."

The extension comes as military officials are adjusting the way Guard and reserve units are used. Since the Sept.11, 2001, attacks, some have been called up for multiple tours, and military officials have worried that they are being stretched too thin. Recently, the Pentagon announced that the reserve components would be called on more often to support their active-duty counterparts, but for shorter tours.

For the Iowa Guard soldiers, many of whom are on their second tour since the Iraq war began, the extension means another four months at this base west of Baghdad. It's a world away from home despite comforts that have earned it the nickname "Camp Cupcake": a recreation center with pool tables, all-you-can-eat chow halls and relatively few mortar attacks.

But it also means more trips escorting supplies along desert roads dotted with improvised explosive devices, the roadside bombs known as IEDs.

"Every time they go out, they're going to find an IED," Lt. Randy Hartley said.

Two of the battalion's soldiers were killed when their convoy came under attack in September. Their photos hang in the battalion headquarters, along with those of 11 others from the brigade who have been killed across Iraq. Five of the battalion's soldiers were wounded and flown home for treatment, said Lt. Matthew Parrino.

"We're not happy about" the extension, said Spec. Joel Pleggenkuhle. "But we weren't forced to sign the [enlistment] papers. Throughout the battalion it's, 'Okay, let's get it done.' "

As a member of the Army's Individual Ready Reserve, Sgt. Timothy Stamper, 27, was deployed last year. His contract with the Army is supposed to end in April, he said.

But he knows he won't be going home to his 2-year-old son until at least summer. And he worries that when he does finally get home, his child "won't know who I am."

Although there had been rumors of an extension for weeks, the news caught some by surprise: About 10 soldiers who were flying home because they had reached the end of their contracts with the Army were turned around and flown back to the unit, soldiers here said.

News of the extension hit many soldiers hard at first. For a few, it has even led to divorce, Hartley said. Many soldiers were furious about how they found out about the extended duty: The news came from families back home -- and not the chain of command -- which "kills morale," Hartley said.

When Hartley's fiancee, Jill Kiehl, learned of the extension from news reports, "I just started crying," she said in a telephone interview from her home in Des Moines. Her late husband, James M. Kiehl, was killed close to the beginning of the war when his convoy came under attack.

Now, Hartley too is out on convoys, where, he admits, "the odds aren't very good at all."

Shortly after Hartley, 36, and Kiehl started dating a couple of years ago, he broke it off. He knew he was going to be coming back to Iraq for a second tour, and he didn't want to put her through the pain of the deployment.

DOJ_NMG_0130621

"People look at me like I'm crazy," said Kiehl, 25. "They say, 'Why are you with someone in the military?' And I tell them you can't determine who you love. You just have to hope and pray that it's all going to work out."

To Protest War, Councilman Forgoes The Pledge (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

MESA, Ariz., Feb. 10 (AP) — A city councilman has been receiving threats since he started refusing to recite the Pledge of Allegiance or stand during it at council meetings to protest the war in Iraq.

The councilman, Tom Rawles, has angered fellow council members and constituents in this conservative Phoenix suburb of about 400,000. The police briefly provided him with protection before deciding the threats were no reason for alarm.

"You have disrespected our country and the symbol of it and the men and women who fought for it," Mike Thelan, a resident, told Mr. Rawles through tears at a council meeting last Monday. "You have acted like a spoiled little child that has not received what he wants from his parents."

Mr. Rawles, a 57-year-old lawyer who long ago decided not to run for re-election when his term is up in June 2008, said he would continue his protest "until the troops come home." He said he did not mind that his stand was angering people.

"That's what political speech is supposed to do," Mr. Rawles said. "It's supposed to infuriate and irritate and challenge and make people think. They apparently would prefer me just to walk lockstep and mouth ritualistic words to a mandatory ceremony."

Councilman Kyle Jones said it was not Mr. Rawles's opinion about the war that offended him, but his refusal to stand during the pledge.

"The privilege of reciting the pledge is just that — it's a privilege," Mr. Jones said.

Another resident, Joann Stewart, said she was not offended by Mr. Rawles's protest.

"I personally would never have picked that way to protest, because that's the flag of the United States of America and I honor that," Ms. Stewart said. "But the main concern is what's going on with the war."

Taliban Stepping Up Attacks In Afghanistan (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan, Feb. 10 — Taliban insurgents have stepped up attacks in southern Afghanistan in recent days, killing four Afghan policemen in an ambush on Friday night and aiming at NATO troops with the second suicide bombing in a week in what seems to be the opening of the fighting season, officials said Saturday.

The suicide bomber smashed his car into a NATO military convoy north of Kandahar on Saturday morning, killing himself but not hurting anyone else, said the province police chief, Asmatullah Alizay. Another bomber attacked a military convoy in the same place on Feb. 4.

Taliban insurgents have also appeared again in the troubled southern district of Panjwai, ambushing a police patrol on Friday night and killing four policemen and wounding two more. NATO troops mounted two heavy combat operations last year to clear insurgents from the area and have tried to establish security by boosting the local police forces.

NATO forces also fought Taliban forces for several hours in the next-door province of Helmand, where they have been trying to clear the area around the Kajaki dam to allow engineers in for a renovation project, one of the United States government's largest development efforts in the country.

Taliban forces who overran the town of Musa Qala last week were also preparing for a fight if government or NATO troops moved against them, a resident from the town said in a telephone interview. The resident, Amir Jan, 32, who has a clothes shop in the town but has fled along with other townspeople who feared renewed fighting, said that the Taliban were promising more heavy fighting this year against foreign forces in Afghanistan and were vowing to seize control of more towns.

The fighters said they were loyal to the fugitive Taliban leader, Mullah Muhammad Omar, and were under his orders to fight, Mr. Jan said. Although their local leader, Mullah Abdul Ghafoor, was killed in a NATO airstrike on Feb. 4, his deputy, whom Mr. Jan did not name, was in charge and vowing to take revenge for Mullah Ghafoor's death.

NATO: Afghanistan On Road To Stability (AP)

By Slobodan Lekic, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 11, 2007

NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer said Saturday he thinks the back of the insurgency in Afghanistan will be "broken" and that the country will be on the road to a long-term peace by 2009.

There have been warnings by commanders of the NATO-led International Security Assistance Force in Afghanistan that Taliban guerrillas may mount a spring offensive from their winter-safe havens in neighboring Pakistan.

DOJ_NMG_0130622

But De Hoop Scheffer said the tide of the fight will turn.

"In 2009 I think we should see Afghanistan on the road to long-term peace and stability with the back of the resistance broken," he told a gathering the world's top security officials.

Afghanistan's neighbor Pakistan is of key importance to the fight, he said.

"Pakistan is vital to our success in Afghanistan," De Hoop Scheffer said. "A military dialogue with Pakistan should now be teamed up with a political dialogue."

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz, noted that fighting in 2006 was bloodier than ever.

"If NATO does not prevail in Afghanistan, it is difficult to imagine the alliance undertaking another 'hard security' operation ... Its credibility would suffer a grievous blow," McCain said at the conference.

German Chancellor Angela Merkel urged NATO and the European Union to work together in Afghanistan, saying this was "crucial for success" of efforts to defeat Taliban guerrillas and bring stability to the nation.

"In Afghanistan our alliance is being particularly tested," Merkel said. "It is indisputable that the Taliban are testing our determination."

The NATO-led force has about 35,000 soldiers in Afghanistan, and commanders have expressed confidence they are able to defeat any Taliban military effort in the coming months. But they have complained that, in the past, battlefield successes were not followed up by reconstruction aid to help rebuild regions devastated by the fighting.

Earlier this month, the EU Commission proposed a new $780 million package for Afghanistan to focus on health, justice and rural development over the next four years.

Merkel said that military stabilizing measures have to be coordinated with civilian measures. But she acknowledged the mission "is more difficult than we originally thought" when NATO forces were first deployed to Afghanistan three years ago.

Attack In Pakistan On Red Cross Office (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, Feb.10 — An explosion in the parking compound of the International Committee of the Red Cross headquarters in Peshawar, a northwestern city, damaged four vehicles but hurt no one early Saturday, officials said.

A spokeswoman for the Red Cross, Layla Berlemont, confirmed the attack and lack of casualties in a telephone interview. She said the office had not received any threats before the attack and would continue its activities in the North-Western Frontier Province, where Peshawar is.

Some news reports said that a gas cylinder had been thrown over the wall of the complex, but the police could not confirm that and were still investigating, said Iftikhar Khan, of the Peshawar police force.

Foreign aid agencies in the province have been attacked or threatened by Islamic militants at times. On Monday, a grenade was lobbed at a compound of the American aid group Save the Children in Battagram, wounding two Pakistani employees.

Defense, Not Pork (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2007

VOLTAIRE WAS No accountant, but the 18th century philosopher's observation that "the best is the enemy of the good" applies when analyzing the Bush administration's $725-billion defense request for next year.

Congress needs to be far more rigorous in scrutinizing the Pentagon's wish lists than it has been since 9/11. Because we cannot mount perfect defenses against terrorist attack — only good ones — and because taxes and deficits aren't limitless, choices must be made.

Wartime has proved too much of a temptation for wasteful military spending that goes unquestioned. Why, for instance, is the administration insisting that hundreds of millions of dollars be poured into the Marine Corps' glitch-plagued, tilt-wing V-22 Osprey program? It's also cheeky of the Pentagon to request funds for two F-35 Joint Strike Fighters under the "reconstituting the force" ledger that's meant to catalog the costs of replacing equipment lost in war, considering the planes won't be ready for combat until 2010.

The overarching question isn't whether the country is spending too much on defense but whether it is spending its resources on the right priorities. By modern historical standards, military leaders are quick to note, the 4% of gross domestic product currently devoted to defense spending is still on the low side. And Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates may have been right in his congressional testimony last week when he said that the nation ought to be devoting at least 5% of its GDP to defense, given U.S. commitments.

DOJ_NMG_0130623

But no national wealth should be diverted to defense contractor fantasies with little value in today's world. Billions are being requested for Cold War relics of questionable use, such as Virginia-class submarines for about $2.5 billion a pop. On a more positive note, President Bush's budget request does include much-needed sums for the expansion of the Army and Marine Corps as well as the National Guard.

The U.S. remains the world's indispensable power, and until the rest of the democratic world takes more responsibility for collective security, it will be an unfortunate fact of life that defense spending soaks up about one-fifth of the federal budget. It makes no sense to deny this reality, nor to dispute the nation's need to be prepared to confront any number of potential threats ranging from Al Qaeda to a more conventional regional aggressor. The nation could hardly afford to spend less on defense; but when it comes to national security, it also can't afford to spend unwisely.

DOJ:

Lam Shows Her Personal Side During School Forum (SDUT)

By Kelly Thornton, Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, February 11, 2007

NORTH PARK – San Diego U.S. Attorney Carol Lam joked yesterday about the travails of juggling family and a high-powered career, confiding the reaction of her four children when she told them she may "stay home and take care of you for a while" after she leaves her post this week.

"It was clear from their faces this was their version of hell," Lam said, getting a big laugh from an audience of mothers and their teenage daughters at a leadership forum at The Academy of Our Lady of Peace in North Park.

Lam, 47, is reluctantly leaving her job of 4½ years after being forced out by the Justice Department, which asked for her resignation because of what one official described as "performance-related" issues. The official said members of Congress complained that Lam didn't prosecute enough immigration cases.

But Lam, best known for going after corrupt politicians such as former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Rancho Santa Fe, has become a national hero of sorts to critics of the Bush administration. They say her dismissal and those of six other top federal prosecutors in recent weeks are politically motivated.

The normally guarded Lam, known for a tough exterior in public, gave a rare glimpse of her personality and sense of humor at the leadership forum, where a key topic was managing demanding careers and motherhood.

Lam said her husband has been the primary caregiver for their four children and that the arrangement has worked well for their family. Still, she shared funny stories of her maternal missteps.

Like how her house is a mess. How her children have left home many times in mismatched clothes. And the time she brought out the birthday cake with the wrong number of candles.

"I had misjudged the age of my child!" Lam said. "It was clear to us my husband would be the better caretaker and not harm the children."

More laughs.

Her husband, Mark Burnett, is a geophysicist.

When she told the crowd the ages of her children – 17, 15, 11 and 9 – she paused to reconsider if those ages were correct. More laughs. She said she makes sure to appear in videos of family events to prove she was there.

Lam, a political independent, recalled for the audience some of the milestones in her career, such as becoming one of few women in a position of leadership in law enforcement and walking into rooms filled with male FBI and Internal Revenue Service agents.

She imagined that they wondered how she would "make a fool" of herself. "I thought this was kind of cool," she said. "I thought, 'I'll be fine.' And I really was."

Lam told the crowd she also was ambivalent over being labeled the first Asian-American and the first woman to become U.S. attorney in San Diego.

On one hand, she was proud to be a trailblazer. But she said she had lived a childhood of privilege and opportunity, and didn't feel she should benefit from affirmative action.

"I'm a Chinese-American woman, and when I first became U.S. attorney, there was a lot of talk about me being the first Asian-American and first female. A lot of reporters asked, 'Do you see yourself as a role model?'

"I was very conflicted. It probably helped me get the job in the first place," she said. But because Lam did not lack for opportunities the way some minorities do, she wondered, "Why should I benefit from affirmative action?"

DOJ_NMG_0130624

Lam said she discussed the matter with a trusted colleague who had expertise in civil rights. He said there is another reason for affirmative action that does apply to her: to demonstrate that there is no glass ceiling for minorities.

That thought resonated with Lam.

She said that as she prepares to leave office Thursday, she has been gratified by comments from younger male attorneys who thanked her for being a role model. “That was a nice benchmark for me. We've sort of transcended the demarcations.”

Lam said she is hard on herself and others.

“I set very high standards for myself and I constantly disappoint myself, and that's a tough way to live my life,” she said. “And, I set high standards for people around me and I'm often disappointed. But I'm also forgiving. If you set low standards, you'll get there.”

Her advice to high school girls as they pursue their careers? Define success as being happy and comfortable with yourself. Set high goals and “forgive yourself if you don't make it.”

There will be missteps, dead ends, things that don't go as planned, Lam said, adding, “Just deal with it and move on.”

Kelly Thornton: (619) 542-4571; kelly.thornton@uniontrib.com

Prosecutor Roulette As More U.S. Attorneys Are Fired, The Specter Of A Political Spoils System Is Unmistakable (ALBANYTU)

Albany Times Union, February 11, 2007

By tradition, U.S. attorneys are confirmed by the Senate and serve throughout the term of the sitting president. But under a change in the law, they can now be appointed by the attorney general -- indefinitely -- without Senate approval, and without showing serious cause for removing the incumbent.

This shocking change in the appointment process has come to light thanks to hearings called by Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., who suspects the Bush administration has been firing U.S. attorneys either for patronage reasons or because they have pursued politically sensitive investigations.

So far, seven federal prosecutors have been removed or told to step aside. In the most recent firing, U.S. Attorney Ed Cummins of Little Rock, Ark., says he was asked to step aside to make room for an appointee who had once worked for presidential adviser Karl Rove.

In testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee on Tuesday, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty denied that politics played any role in Mr. Cummins' removal, claiming that his successor had more prosecutorial experience. Sen. Schumer wisely warned Mr. McNulty that the Judiciary Committee will subpoena job evaluations of the fired prosecutors if the Justice Department refuses to turn them over voluntarily.

In another case, U.S. Attorney Carol Lam was removed from her post in San Diego in what some critics believe was White House retaliation for her aggressive pursuit, and conviction, of former Republican Rep. Randy Cunningham of California. Mr. McNulty denied there was any payback involved, but without far more detail, including records of job performance appraisals, senators should remain skeptical.

Until now, the Justice Department had to prove real cause for removal, to ensure that the process was based on merit and not politics. Federal prosecutors, after all, have broad powers to investigate, or not, and those decisions should be based on the facts, regardless of political affiliations. But now it turns out that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales can replace federal prosecutors at will, under powers given to his office in a little noticed section of the USA Patriot Act. And from all appearances, Mr. Gonzales is taking full advantage of that provision.

Some Democrats in the Senate and the House are now proposing to change the law and replace it with a requirement that district courts, not the Justice Department, appoint interim prosecutors. That's the least Congress should do. Had it done its job in the first place, and carefully scrutinized the Patriot Act, there's a good chance this prosecutorial power grab would never have succeeded.

Editorial Tampering With Justice (SEATIMES)

The Seattle Times, February 11, 2007

The imbroglio surrounding the forced resignations of at least seven U.S. attorneys from across the country proves the U.S. Senate needs to reclaim its right to vet the president's appointments.

In a bipartisan vote Thursday, the Senate Judiciary Committee approved a measure to do just that, reversing an ill-advised provision inserted last year into the Patriot Act. John McKay, the former U.S. attorney based in Seattle, was among those kicked out. He was first-rate by all accounts, including a glowing Justice Department review seven months ago. That is, except for one: Last week, U.S. Deputy Attorney Paul McNulty testified to the Senate Judiciary Committee that McKay and five other U.S. attorneys were asked to resign for "performance-related" reasons.

DOJ_NMG_0130625

In Seattle, disbelieving elected officials, law-enforcement leaders and judges denounced the insinuation as a load of blarney.

U.S. attorneys are appointed by the Bush administration and can be dismissed without cause. However, in the past, such appointments had to be confirmed by the U.S. Senate within 120 days. But the new Patriot Act provision permits appointees to serve indefinitely without the Senate's OK. Some speculate the administration, under siege and facing a newly empowered Democratic leadership with a chip on its shoulder, was taking advantage of the new latitude.

Then there's McNulty's admission that one U.S. attorney in Arkansas was removed solely to make room for a former aide to White House strategist Karl Rove.

Could the motives be that cynical? Disrupt crucial law-enforcement offices to give cronies a line for their résumés?

If political patronage rules this process, McKay might not have passed muster. Though he has impressive Republican and public-service credentials, McKay irked some in his party by deciding not to wade into the irregularities of the 2004 gubernatorial election that ultimately went to the Democrat. While basing such a decision on facts rather than politics might tick off partisans, the approach engenders trust in government for everybody else.

Whatever the White House's reasons for the firings, Justice Department officials need to get their stories straight and tell the truth about them.

More importantly, Congress must fix that unwise new Patriot Act provision. This episode proves the need for presidential accountability on U.S. attorney appointments.

Editorial: Wanted: A U.S. Attorney (BVND)

The Belleville News Democrat, February 11, 2007

When, oh when, will Southern Illinois get its new U.S. attorney?

When Belleville native Phillip J. Green was nominated for the job, we were told the confirmation process would take four to six weeks. That was in June, eight months ago.

The five other U.S. attorney candidates nominated by President Bush the same day won confirmation in the Senate months ago. Green's appointment has lingered so long now that a new session of Congress has begun, and the process has to start anew.

But Green has not yet been renominated by the Bush administration. Tasia Scolinos, a spokesman for the U.S. Department of Justice, said they are checking into a complaint against Green: "The review has not been completed and while we are working to address it as quickly as possible, there is no set timeline."

An anonymous writer tried to derail Green's appointment with allegations related to a sentencing in Michigan, where Green is an assistant U.S. attorney. But the review shouldn't take this long. The record is clear that Green is an ethical, principled attorney. The chief federal judge in West Michigan told The Grand Rapids Press that Green is "Mr. Integrity."

The Bush administration needs to quit dragging its feet.

Southern Illinois needs a permanent U.S. attorney who can aggressively take on crime and corruption. The Southern District has been without one since November 2005. Acting U.S. attorney Randy Massey is doing a fine job in the interim, but he's not likely to start controversial prosecutions. For instance, some people in the legal community think the office is waiting for a new leader to decide whether to prosecute powerful attorney Tom Lakin.

Once Green is renominated, Illinois Sen. Dick Durbin, a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, needs to get his confirmation on the fast track.

U.S. Attorney Garcia On Public Corruption Cases: We're Not Done (NYJN)

New York Journal News, February 11, 2007

Strange as it might seem, U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia has other fish to fry besides Jeanine Pirro, whose affairs are still being looked into by federal investigators. He said next to nothing about the former Westchester district attorney during his Editorial Board visit last week - we didn't expect otherwise. He had plenty to say about other matters pertinent to his territory, which includes Westchester, Rockland and Putnam. Excepts from our sit down:

On pursuing public corruption cases:

We have some of our local partners working on corruption. We are getting a lot of tips and referrals. We're looking at everything that comes in. If we believe there is a risk, we do the research that goes into taking a harder look at it. What I want to get out of public corruption cases is a comfort level where we have taken a hard look at areas of risk. For example, how much is a green card worth? Those are very valuable commodities and there is a risk for fraud. You also have the higher levels of corruption. We had indictments (involving Albany lawmakers); it exposed a funding process that had risk (for corruption) and people were taking advantage of it and committing crimes. You got to take a hard look there. You go up to a different plane and you look at the United Nations. A unique role for the feds and my office is fraud - that whole Oil for Food program. Obviously that case has progressed. I think those cases are important. I think those will be signature cases that people will look back on. Regarding Albany matters, what I say about it is, we're not done.

On the federal Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Person Act; the Justice Department has been criticized for siding with religious groups on controversial building projects, usurping local land-use law:

I'm not an expert on RLUIPA, but I understand and I've read some of the comments in the paper about it. All I can say on that is that it's not a hard and fast rule (in terms of how his office looks at cases). We're going to go in and look at a case, if there is something to look at. We look at what's going on, what's the (proposed land) use, what do they really want to do, what's the zoning, and at the end of the day we may find that there is a violation. I don't think there is any more going on than that.

On quelling local gun violence:

I think it's a great thing to get people off the street who have guns. We're starting to do some of this in Yonkers. By nature, it has to be a partnership, you have to work with local authorities who are the first responders.

On pursuing sex trafficking cases:

It's a horrible thing. There are a couple of problems with going after traffickers. One, a lot of times you have to rely on the people who are through the door first - local officials with some kind of domestic violence report. The first responders will be local officials because they have to have some kind of tip-off of what's going on. Once you get in the door and determine there is forced prostitution or sex trafficking, getting witnesses is very difficult because there is tremendous distrust from people who have suffered horrible abuse over sometimes very substantial periods of time. It's hard to say how widespread it is because it's hard to get a firm read on it. People are willing to pay such a high price to get into a country, and it's a terrible crime. The good side is that it gets a lot of attention now. More people are looking for it now than they were in the past.

On enforcement of the Voting Rights Act - an action is pending in Port Chester - and whether more cases can be expected in the Lower Hudson Valley:

There is no initiative here; where we think there is a problem, we will take a hard look at it. In Port Chester we did. By the end of last year we filed a complaint. We believed that the at-large voting structure they had for the trustees was depriving the Hispanic voters of the rights they had under the Voting Rights Act. It wasn't resolved without litigation. That is really ongoing litigation. (He wouldn't comment further.)

On accusations by Pirro, during the fall election, about leaks in his office:

We keep our heads down and do what we do.

Robins Lawyer Fighting Removal As Sexual Assault Prosecutor (MACT)

By Gene Rector

The Macon Telegraph, February 11, 2007

ROBINS AIR FORCE BASE - A Robins Air Force Base lawyer, called a "guardian angel" by at least one base sexual assault victim, was removed Jan. 10 as special assistant to the U.S. attorney for reasons that she claims have little to do with allegations lodged against her.

Dee Dial contends Air Force officials are trying to destroy her career because she has been too aggressive in prosecuting sexual offenders and declined to testify in a Robins effort to discredit the case of a victim seeking a huge cash settlement.

Dial, who has successfully worked seven sex offender cases in the past three years, has in turn filed a complaint with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission against the Air Force, alleging reprisals and the creation of a hostile working environment.

The Georgia native said she is terrified of her employer and what could happen to her career. She remains a general attorney in the 78th Air Base Wing judge advocate's office, but is no longer assigned to prosecute Robins cases in U.S. District Court in Macon.

Dial said accusations raised by the base and U.S. Attorney Max Wood in Macon are being investigated by the Department of Justice - accusations of failing to correct an error in a court document and withholding DNA results from a defense attorney.

A representative from Air Force Materiel Command, the parent agency for Robins, is also investigating issues related to her EEO complaint, Dial said.

"I'm fighting a cultural battle," she emphasized, "and you can't win those. At least one person can't. I have almost 16 years of unblemished service and it doesn't seem to count for much."

The mother of two said she planned to fight the allegations and her removal as special assistant to the U.S. attorney.

"It's either fight or let them run over me, and I'm not going to let them run over me," Dial said. "They have the power and the people, but I'll be a lot meaner because my life is on the line. The ability to support my children and my reputation are on the line. I'm not perfect, but I don't work with perfect people. And I will make sure that everybody knows how not perfect they are."

Air Force officials will say very little about the Dial situation, claiming EEO complaints and personnel actions are privacy matters.

Col. Theresa Carter, the 78th Air Base Wing commander, declined to comment. So did Lt. Col. Nathan Berman, the 78th ABW staff judge advocate. Robert Ely, spokesman for AFMC, said the command could not discuss the "existence or status of investigations."

U.S. Attorney Wood declined to answer questions about the case.

However, conversations with several sources and a review of documents filed in U.S. District Court reveal a series of events that led to the current dispute:

· October 2004: Sharon Peacock, a Robins procurement clerk, filed an equal employment opportunity complaint charging sexual harassment by her former supervisor, Mark Ferris. The Robins EEO office disallowed Peacock's complaint, saying it was not filed within 45 days of the alleged event and did not state a remedy. Peacock appealed the decision to the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

· January 2005: Ferris pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court to two counts of simple assault and was sentenced to six months in prison. Dial was the Air Force prosecutor in the case.

· April 2006: The EEOC upheld Peacock's appeal and ordered Robins to reopen her case.

· November 2006: Dial said she was asked by Robins officials to testify in the pending Peacock EEOC hearing. She refused, saying it was a conflict of interest.

· December 2006: Dial's co-workers reviewed a December 2004 pre-sentence report sent to Judge Claude Hicks Jr. in the Ferris case and accused Dial of missing a reference that erroneously specified testing of carpet samples taken from Ferris' office were positive for semen. In fact, two separate tests completed in December 2004 showed no DNA material. Dial said she did not compile the document and was not aware of the error until December 2006.

Ferris' attorney, Macon lawyer Hale Almand, subsequently accused Dial of having confirmed to him by telephone in December 2004 that DNA results were positive. Dial has denied that accusation. Almand said in a court filing last month that the presence or absence of Ferris' DNA "was a critical factor" and the absence of semen offers "a substantial defense to the defendant."

· Dec. 20, 2006: Dial's superiors told her that the Department of Justice would be investigating the accusations against her.

· Dec. 20, 2006: Sharon Ratley, criminal chief, assistant U.S. attorney, notified Almand by letter of the erroneous report and confirmed that DNA test results had not been turned over to the defense. Dial said Almand never requested the test results and the results were not a factor since they related to charges that were later dropped in the plea agreement.

· Jan. 4: Dial filed her EEO complaint.

· Jan. 9: Almand filed a motion in U.S. District Court for extraordinary relief in the Ferris case asking for a "full investigation" to determine "the course that (Ferris) will follow."

· Jan. 10: Lt. Col. Berman notified Dial that she would be relieved of her role as special assistant to the U.S. attorney.

· Jan. 18: U.S. Attorney Wood's letter informed the Justice Department that Dial's status as special assistant to the U.S. attorney would be terminated effective Feb. 10.

Dial declined to discuss the specifics of her case, authorizing her sister, Beth O'Connor, to provide additional details of the current battle and what Dial described as a "working environment that has grown increasingly hostile" over the past three years.

Asked about the legal distinction of O'Connor discussing her case, Dial said she was uncertain. "Maybe it's just more my comfort level," Dial responded in an e-mail.

O'Connor, an Alabama pharmacist, said her sister's objectives were simple. "She wants to work in an environment where her record counts for something when times get tough," O'Connor said by telephone. "She wants an environment where she doesn't have to defend herself and other women simply because women are presumed to be liars."

She said Dial has kept pages of notes over the past three years, documenting what O'Connor characterized as the Air Force's belief that men - particularly white men - are guilt-free and women who report sexual offenses are not telling the truth.

"They're doing everything they can to destroy her and possibly fire her," O'Connor said.

Dial insists that DNA results from carpet samples in Ferris' Robins office had no impact on the final plea agreement.

"If (the Air Force) can overturn Ferris' confession, that will destroy Sharon Peacock's case. The motive is to avoid a huge monetary settlement," O'Connor said.

Asked to respond specifically to questions raised about the telephone call with Ferris' attorney, Dial said in an e-mail last week:

"He (Almand) now claims that I told him on the phone prior to the plea that the DNA lab results were positive. This is illogical and untrue. Every attorney I have ever dealt with except Mr. Almand has asked me for lab results and I always fax or mail them to the requesting attorney.

DOJ_NMG_0130628

"I would assume that most defense attorneys take positive results - which these weren't - to analyze the results, see if the evidence was handled properly, discuss the results with their client, consider the reputation of the lab and possibly ask to have the evidence analyzed by their own lab. Without written results how can you do that?" she said.

Dial continued: "This would have been the stupidest lie in history since I could have been immediately called on it. In particular, I assume that if your client is denying the possibility that the evidence was from him, that you would want to scrutinize it very carefully.

"In addition, if I refused to provide written results, the plea could have been held up until the judge could order me to provide them," Dial said.

"I may have made a comment such as 'you may have the lab results to deal with,' but no attorney that I know would risk their reputation - and mine has been unblemished for 16 years - and their license on a lie which is so easily proven," Dial concluded in her e-mail to The Telegraph.

Almand, who did not return phone calls from The Telegraph to his Macon office, insisted in court documents that DNA results were a key factor in the outcome of the case. He wrote in documents filed with the federal court Jan. 9 that without Dial's alleged telephone message regarding the DNA test results, "defendant Ferris would not have pleaded guilty."

Bowers, Peacock's Atlanta attorney, called the Air Force's action against Dial the "most extraordinary development" he can recall in his 20-year practice of employment law.

He said he has never been involved in a situation where a prosecuting attorney "charges sexual harassment against a federal agency related to (a) client's case."

Bowers said an EEOC administrative judge would hear the Peacock evidence beginning April 2. "That will just be on the issue of liability," the attorney said. "There will be a second hearing to determine what compensation she's due. If she's not satisfied with the decision, she can then take the case to federal court."

His client is prepared to reach an out-of-court settlement, Bowers insists. He confirmed the submission of an offer to the Air Force last week but would not discuss the details. "I'm not prepared to do settlement discussions in the press," Bowers said.

The Dial case is causing ripples across the massive military installation where more than 4,000 women report to work each day.

Knowledge of The Telegraph's inquiries prompted two women victimized by individuals prosecuted by Dial to come forward, providing their identities were protected by the newspaper.

One sexual assault victim who asked not to be identified said a number of women on base are terrified at the prospect of losing Dial as their champion.

She described Dial as her "guardian angel" and a check against how the Air Force usually handles sexual offense cases.

"Most of the time they try to cover it up, try to mediate, try to get the girl to calm down and be quiet," she said. "If Dee found out about it, she would throw a fit. And when you don't have someone in the JAG office doing that, it's pretty scary. Those are the people we depend on."

She described what she called the continuing trauma she feels when a man does or says something offensive to her at work.

"You try to smile and brush it off," she said. "You're thinking inside: 'My God, I can't go through this again. Maybe if I smile, walk out of here, act like I'm dumb, maybe he'll go away. Maybe he'll think I didn't get it.' That's how you play the game."

The harassment has been more blatant in the past, she concedes. "One of my supervisors would sleep with his girlfriend, put a tape recorder under the bed, come to work and play it on the loud speaker," she said. "We would have to work to that every night."

The veteran employee said that would not happen today. She said conditions have improved following the Air Force's reaction to the sexual assault scandal at the Air Force Academy in 2003.

Awareness training has become mandatory. Sexual assault response coordinators along with victim advocates have been established. The position of special assistant to the U.S. attorney - the job Dial no longer occupies - was created to focus on prosecution of sexual offenders.

But the Dial case could change that, the employee suggests. "If we don't have a watchdog, what's going to happen?" she asked. "Are they just going to shove it all under the carpet the way they used to?"

Cindy Graver, sexual assault response coordinator at Robins since June 2005, said she was unfamiliar with the Dial case, but stressed that the base's prevention program is doing its job.

"People are more aware of things they can and can't do," she said. "Education is the key. Some people have never heard that it's inappropriate to touch someone on their back or rub their shoulders. Now they're informed and aware of that."

Graver said 15 sexual assaults were reported to her in 2006. She was not sure how that compared to previous years.

"Not all the reports were valid," she said, "and we know there were assaults that were not reported."

DOJ_NMG_0130629

But it's a brand new program, she emphasized. "People feel comfortable to come forward. I'm on call 24/7 and we treat each case individually," Graver said. "One of the most important things I've seen is that people are getting help. It's not that we've had hundreds of calls. But one sexual assault is too many."

A 2006 assault victim who asked that her name not be used took issue with Graver's assessment. She claims conditions in the workplace haven't changed very much.

"They say there's zero tolerance," she said, "but they don't follow through. They preach it, but it's not that way. The base looks like a laughingstock."

O'Connor said her sister also has lost faith in the system. "She would never report any sexual assault if it happened to her," the Alabama pharmacist said. "It would be like the Polish cavalry when Hitler launched his blitzkrieg during World War II."

The Air Force wants half-hearted prosecuting attorneys, O'Connor suggests. "And that's not how my sister saw her job. Her job was to defend these women to the best of her ability. And it's been a battle. Every case has been a battle."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Pay-to-play Ticket To Power In Lake County? (NWT)

By Joe Carlson

Northwest (IN) Times, February 11, 2007

LAKE COUNTY -- One fed likens purchase of fund-raising tickets to bribery

The long-standing political tradition of pay-to-play in Lake County is something federal authorities say remains a political force today and in some cases equates to bribery.

"Here's how it works," said one source, a contractor who has done business with governments in cities and towns around the county and knows the importance of buying political fund-raising tickets.

"If you do business with the city, and it's campaign time, certain department heads will tell you to purchase tickets," the source said. "If you don't, you won't be doing business."

The discussion about when buying political fund-raising tickets becomes a form of bribery comes at a timely junction, as municipal leaders around the county and state are holding their regular political fundraisers for the 2007 election cycle.

Agents from the FBI thought they would discover evidence of just such a scheme going on in Gary in December 2003, when they raided three business offices owned by politically connected businessman Jewell Harris Sr.

Secret affidavits by federal agents used to justify the warrants came into public scrutiny last week after Harris' defense attorney, Thomas Durkin, took issue with the sweeping generalizations contained in them.

One longtime FBI agent, Fred Graessele, stated that the "sale of tickets" by corrupt officials has become a term "synonymous with bribe, kickback, and payoff" in Lake County.

For his part, Harris denies participating in anything of the sort and argues that Graessele's characterization are so overboard that the search warrant should be thrown out of court.

To a person, numerous political insiders and contractors interviewed by The Times last week bemoaned the unfortunate but necessary role money plays in region political races, particularly in modern times when it can cost $50,000 or $100,000 to run for mayor of a city or town.

Two local consultants, Tom Dabertin and James Bennet, said they often buy tickets from the governments that employ them but have never felt compelled to do anything illegal or unethical.

"I support people who basically I think are decent people, and if they're going to get elected, they're going to need money," Bennet said. "I've had people send me 10 tickets, and I've bought two. I try to keep it within what's reasonable."

Tom Collins Jr., vice president of Luke Oil Co., said he's never had qualms writing $20,000 checks to the campaign to support Hammond Mayor Thomas McDermott Jr.

Collins said he's heard the stories, and he was nervous about the possibility of putting money in the political game. But his apprehension was outweighed by his desire to see change in the leadership in Hammond, where former Mayor Duane Dedelow Jr. had tried to condemn land Collins' company owns near the lakefront casino.

"All we ever wanted from our support is to be treated fairly and not be harassed or pushed around," Collins said. "Do a good job and treat us fairly. We're not looking for anything in return."

But another government contractor recalled a municipal official handing over hefty stack of tickets, along with a reminder of how much business the company had gotten.

"It was just kind of part of the game," the contractor said. "But it was a two-way thing. We had to be fairly good, too, to keep the business."

DOJ_NMG_0130630

WiFi Turns Internet Into Hideout For Criminals (WP)

By Jamie Stockwell, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

Authorities Struggling With Anonymity Provided By Unsecured Networks

Detectives arrived last summer at a high-rise apartment building in Arlington County, warrant in hand, to nab a suspected pedophile who had traded child pornography online. It was to be a routine, mostly effortless arrest.

But when they pounded on the door, detectives found an elderly woman who, they quickly concluded, had nothing to do with the crime. The real problem was her computer's wireless router, a device sending a signal through her 10-story building and allowing savvy neighbors a free path to the Internet from the privacy of their homes.

Perhaps one of those neighbors, authorities said, was stealthily uploading photographs of nude children. Doing so essentially rendered him or her untraceable.

With nearly 46,000 public access points across the country -- many of them free -- hundreds of thousands of computer users are logging on every day to wireless networks at cafes, hotels, airports and even while sitting on park benches. And although the majority of those people are simply checking their e-mail and surfing the Web, authorities said an increasing number of criminals are taking advantage of the anonymity offered by the wireless signals to commit a raft of serious crimes -- from identity theft to the sexual solicitation of children.

"We're not sure yet how to combat that," said Kevin R. West, a federal agent who oversees the computer crimes unit in North Carolina's State Bureau of Investigation. "Free wireless spots are everywhere, and it makes it easy for people . . . to sit there and do their nefarious acts. The fear is that if we talk about it, people will learn about it and say, 'I can go to a parking lot, and no one will catch me.' But we need to talk about it so that we can figure out how to solve it."

The way it works is simple: Anyone who has a wireless card installed in his or her computer -- and most new computers are equipped with one -- can access the Internet from any of the public WiFi "hotspots," as they're known. In an age of portability and instant gratification, getting online has never been easier -- for law-abiding folks and those with bad intentions.

And in especially dense areas such as the Washington region, some neighborhoods might offer users a dozen or more open wireless signals from which to choose.

"Unsecured networks are a treasure trove for neighbors," said John Sheehan, program manager of the CyberTipline at the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children. "Those looking to access illegal content obviously feel they have anonymity" and can get away with it.

They most often do, authorities said.

"It's frustrating for officers," said Todd Shipley, director of training services at the National Consortium for Justice Information and Statistics. "If a suspect is going from coffee shop to coffee shop and using free signals to commit crimes, the police probably aren't going to catch him. That's the reality."

Open wireless signals are akin to leaving your front door wide open all day -- and returning home to find that someone has stolen your belongings and left a mess that needs cleaning.

One way to combat it is for people to secure their wireless networks by making them password-protected. But, authorities said, businesses and cities that offer free connections need some way to track the users, such as filtering measures that could scan to see who is accessing the network.

Locally, Alexandria recently announced plans to expand its wireless network. The Internet service provider EarthLink will build a citywide network for a 16-square-mile area, with free wireless connections available in more than two dozen public locations. The provider also has worked on municipal WiFi in cities including Philadelphia and New Orleans. Alexandria officials said EarthLink will decide whether to implement security measures on the network, which will be accessible to anyone passing through the city.

In one recent case, West said, a truck driver used free wireless signals at motels across the country to post and view pornographic images of children at a Web site. By pure luck, the man was caught, West said. When the suspect got online from his home computer, authorities were able to trace his computer's Internet Protocol address, or the unique set of numbers assigned to every computer that uses the Internet. That number, which serves as a virtual street address, often leads authorities to the offender's physical residence.

"Otherwise he would've slipped through the cracks," West said. "We wouldn't have been able to identify him."

These days, the Internet is as indispensable to an officer's arsenal as his gun and handcuffs. Indeed, a growing number of officers are being assigned to patrol cyberspace.

DOJ_NMG_0130631

Across the nation, 46 multi-jurisdictional Internet Crimes Against Children task forces have been created to carry out online sting operations aimed at ensnaring sex offenders because a man tapping away on a computer in Rockville might very well be soliciting a child in California. Every week, federal and local authorities cast their nets.

And although most sex crimes against underage boys and girls involve victims and suspects who know each other, an increasing number involve online interactions between strangers. Online solicitations -- in which pedophiles cultivate relationships with children and then arrange to meet them in public places -- are becoming more common, federal authorities said.

And even in those cases in which the suspect is brought to police attention by a neighbor or friend or relative, computers are often rich sources of evidence, West said.

"Technology just makes the park no longer the only place where the pervert goes," West said.

The Northern Virginia-D.C. task force has officers from 23 local, state and federal agencies. It was established in November 2004 through a grant from the Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention at the Justice Department. Since its creation, dozens of cases have been opened and more than three dozen arrests have been made.

Those assigned to the task forces patrol the virtual streets for pedophiles and others who want to commit crimes against children. Using software and other tracking devices, the officers trace a suspect's IP address. But as technology improves, so too do the tactics of criminals. Closing cases is more difficult if the IP address originated from a wireless signal because it often leads back to the owner of the network instead of the criminal.

The problem is going to get worse, authorities said. Every day, more homes, businesses and entire jurisdictions are outfitted with wireless networks, creating an almost seamless patchwork of available Internet connections to anyone with a laptop and the desire to get online.

"This is part of the future . . . and we're working to catch up and educate the public," said Capt. Tommy Turner of the Virginia State Police.

The Dying Death Penalty? (WP)

By Dahlia Lithwick

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

In a curious application of Newtonian physics, public and state support for capital punishment is steadily declining in America just as the resolve to maintain the death penalty seems to be hardening in the one arena where death-penalty policy once had seemed poised to change: the Supreme Court.

The trend is clear. According to the Death Penalty Information Center, which compiles statistics on capital punishment, two states have imposed formal moratoriums on the death penalty; executions in New York are on hold after the state's death penalty law was declared unconstitutional in 2004; 11 states (including, most recently, Florida and Tennessee) have effectively barred the practice because of concerns over lethal injection; and 11 more are considering moratoriums or repeals.

The raw numbers of executions and death sentences in the United States have plummeted: Information Center statistics show that in 1999 we executed 98 people, and in 2006 that number dropped to a 10-year low of 53. Whereas America steadily condemned about 300 prisoners a year to death through the 1990s, that number has declined by more than half and reached a low of 114 in 2006. Public support also seems to be faltering. A Gallup poll last year showed that two-thirds of the country still supports capital punishment for murderers, but when given the choice between the death penalty and a life sentence without parole, more people preferred the life prison term (48 percent) to capital punishment (47 percent) for the first time in 20 years.

The new uncertainty over capital punishment ranges from queasiness over the methods of execution to concern that we are executing innocents. Lethal injection, the preferred method of execution in 39 of the 40 states that permit capital punishment, is particularly fraught with problems.

In December, then-Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida ended executions following one in which it took the prisoner 34 minutes to die and he suffered chemical burns in the process. Recent scholarship, including a British medical journal report, indicates that the lethal-injection cocktail used may simply mask agonizing pain before death. And state courts are also increasingly bothered about the proper role of physicians -- often mandated by law to supervise the lethal-injection process over objections by medical associations and ethics boards.

There are numerous other reasons for our growing doubts about the death penalty. In a 2005 speech, Justice John Paul Stevens pointed to several, including DNA evidence that has shown that "a substantial number of death sentences have been imposed erroneously," the fact that elected judges face disproportionate pressure to impose capital punishment, and the problem of "death-qualified" jurors (those who oppose capital punishment are barred from sitting on capital cases). For these and other reasons, many Americans have begun to worry that the death penalty in this country is not reserved for the "worst of the worst," but for the poorest of the poor and those whose trial attorneys later prove to have been asleepest at the switch.

DOJ_NMG_0130632

The Innocence Project, a nonprofit legal clinic associated with the Benjamin N. Cardozo School of Law at Yeshiva University in New York, says there have been 194 post-conviction DNA exonerations. A wrongful-executions study by Hugo Bedau and Michael Radelet of contends that from 1900 to 1991, 416 clearly innocent people were sentenced to die. And studies about the racism that taints the entire system are unequivocal.

In recent years the Supreme Court has also shown concern about the death penalty. In an article published last year, Duke University professor Erwin Chemerinsky observed that in the final years of the William H. Rehnquist Court, the justices showed a marked tendency to overturn death sentences. Chemerinsky speculated that "a majority of the Court was (and continues to be) deeply concerned about how the death penalty is administered in the United States" and that, as a result of the revelations by various investigators, "the reality of innocent people facing execution has had a profound effect on the Justices."

So in the early years of the new century, the court handed down surprising decisions outlawing executions of the mentally retarded and of those who were juveniles at the time of their crimes, and refining the tests for the ineffectiveness of counsel. Several justices also voiced concerns off the bench: Stevens, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Sandra Day O'Connor each spoke publicly and passionately about flaws in the capital system.

But, largely as a result of a change in the court's composition, that trend may now be ending. Just as a few states are defiantly expanding their use of the death penalty. And there is some reason to fear that some justices don't share the burgeoning sense that the machinery of death in this country is broken. One is the new chief justice, John G. Roberts Jr., who, when he worked in the Reagan White House, wrote a memo suggesting that the high court could cut its caseload by "abdicating the role of fourth or fifth guesser in death penalty cases."

One case last term involved a man convicted of a rape and murder, who later produced DNA evidence raising serious doubt that he was the culprit. The court ruled 5 to 3 that this new evidence warranted a new hearing. But Roberts led the dissenters, who felt it wasn't enough for the new evidence to cast doubt on the defendant's conviction; to grant relief, the evidence had to prove he "was actually innocent."

In another death-penalty case from 2005, then-Justice O'Connor agreed with the court's liberals that trial counsel was ineffective. That decision reversed an opinion by Samuel A. Alito Jr., then a judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 3rd Circuit, that would have denied relief. The signals are still mixed. In a different case, the entire court allowed death-row inmates to pursue a civil claim against lethal injection.

But also last term, Justice Antonin Scalia wrote a separate opinion in a death-penalty case for the sole purpose of excoriating Justice David H. Souter, who had written in a dissent about exonerated innocents. Scalia's opinion was a full-bore attack on the notion of innocent exonerees "paraded by various professors" and claimed, in effect, that even if those exonerated were not guilty enough to warrant the death penalty, they were still far from "innocent." (How that made them candidates for the death penalty he did not explain.)

Oral argument this term has also revealed a subtle hardening on the part of some of the court's conservatives. In one case, Roberts questioned the need for a trial judge to specifically guide jurors regarding mitigating evidence.

Somehow, just as the American people are beginning to consider the grave injustices pervading the capital system, several justices seem to be staking out strong personal positions on this front in the culture wars.

In his article, Chemerinsky suggests that justices who change course on the death penalty often do so only after decades on the bench. That might suggest that the two new justices will only soften on capital punishment in the far distant future. These justices also would insist that if the death penalty in this country needs fixing, the state legislatures should do it, a process that's already beginning to happen. But if for most Americans the time for stubborn certainty about the death penalty, at least as it's currently practiced, seems to be over, a court that is more certain than ever of its fundamental fairness looks grievously out of step with an American public willing to recognize the dangers of injustice, error and doubt.

Dahlia Lithwick covers legal affairs for Slate, the online magazine at www.slate.com.

CIVIL LAW:

Editorial: Pay Up: Maybe We Could Help People If Feds Could Collect (LONGNJ)

LONGVIEW NEWS-JOURNAL

Longview (TX) News-Journal, February 11, 2007

Here's what is so frustrating when we hear excuses about why programs that help people — really help people — face cutbacks when times get tight:

A Cox News Service story reported Saturday that there is a backlog of cases in which pharmaceutical companies are suspected of defrauding federal and state health care programs of billions of dollars.

DOJ_NMG_0130633

That's billions with a "B."

The U.S. Justice Department office in charge of pursuing these cases has already recovered $5.3 billion from major drug companies since 1999, but an associate deputy attorney general told a House Committee that there are billions more out there to be recovered. The problem is that his office lacks the manpower to do it in a timely manner.

With the math showing that it costs about $1 in Justice Department expenses to recover $15 in restitution and fines, one might expect higher ranking officials in the Justice Department and White House to figure out it would pay dividends to add to the staff.

The first thing the feds might want to do, however, is send a few folks down to Austin to find out why Texas is so much more proficient at pursuing these cases.

Patrick J. O'Connell, chief of the Texas Attorney General's recently expanded Medicaid task force, pointed out that the state has collected more than $100 million in the same time frame, spending about $5 to $7 million to do so. That's a return even more impressive than the Justice Department's.

The scariest thing about this situation is that the federal Medicare program is only one year into its new "Part D" prescription drug benefit for seniors. With the estimated cost of that program running as high as $1 trillion over 10 years, its seems ripe for the plucking if the government can't stay on top of current fraud cases.

President Bush's proposed budget for the next fiscal year includes added funding for the feds pursuing fraud cases.

The bottom line is that for all of the concerns raised about individual patients or doctors who might be cheating federal health programs, the real money is in these big cases. Just ask O'Connell, who told congressmen that nearly two thirds of the $100 million collected by his team came from just four large drug companies.

Some people will find the feds' foot-dragging approach most frustrating because it's a waste of taxpayers' money. Although we find that frustrating as well, we are even more concerned about the fact that in the time the backlog has been building, we have frequently heard about needs to scale back public health programs because of budget difficulties.

Waste, fraud and misplaced priorities are all more serious problems than many of those that occupy our lawmakers' time.

People die when they don't get sufficient or timely health care. It's time to begin collecting the money that is due the government and using it to provide the services our neighbors need.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

In Search Of Justice (JCL)

By Jerry Mitchell

Jackson Clarion-Ledger, February 11, 2007

GREENWOOD — A Leflore County grand jury that will be impaneled in March is expected to take up the 1955 abduction and killing of Emmett Till.

The Emmett Till Justice Campaign is hoping to take out advertisements in a local newspaper before that happens, said president Alvin Sykes of Kansas City. "We want to encourage grand jurors to listen to the evidence and follow the law. If there is enough evidence, they should indict. If there is not enough evidence, they should not do it. We don't want them to do the same thing the jury did in 1955."

File photo/The Clarion-Ledger

Betty Pearson looks over the remnants of the old Wolf Grocery, formerly Bryant's Grocery and Meat Market in Money. The store is where Emmett Till reportedly wolf-whistled at Carolyn Bryant, leading to his murder.

That's when an all-white jury in Tallahatchie County acquitted Roy Bryant and J.W. Milam in the murder of Till, only to see the two men confess their involvement months later to Look magazine. They since have died of cancer.

This new grand jury could consider kidnapping charges against Bryant's ex-wife, Carolyn, who has told relatives and the FBI she is innocent.

Having the grand jury decide is "an idea whose time has come," said Till's cousin, Wheeler Parker of Chicago, who was with Till when he was abducted. "I'm not going to rejoice in somebody's downfall. I'm not aggressively trying to pursue someone, but you have to reap what you sow."

The pursuit of possible charges in the case comes at a time when there's been a renewed focus on crimes of the past. On Jan. 25, reputed Klansman James Seale of Roxie pleaded innocent to federal kidnapping and conspiracy charges in connection with the May 2, 1964, abduction and killings of Henry Hezekiah Dee and Charles Eddie Moore.

Seale's arrest is the 28th since 1989 in cases resurrected from the civil rights era. If convicted, he could face life in prison.

DOJ_NMG_0130634

A bill introduced in Congress last week would create a cold cases unit to track down unpunished killings from the civil rights era. The FBI already is examining 51 killings from that time period, and a Montgomery museum lists 127 racial killings between 1954 and 1968 - a number it concedes could be much higher.

In 2004, the Justice Department opened an investigation into Till's slaying. Less than two years later, the FBI turned over its findings to District Attorney Joyce Chiles of Greenville and recommended prosecutors take a closer look at Carolyn Bryant, the key suspect in the case.

On Aug. 28, 1955, Till, a 14-year-old African American from Chicago, was beaten and shot to death after he reportedly wolf-whistled at Bryant at a grocery store in Money.

During the wee hours of the morning, Bryant and Milam arrived with guns at the Leflore County home of Till's uncle, Mose Wright, and took Till away.

Wright testified that, as the pair left with Till, he heard someone in the pickup speak with "a lighter voice than men" identifying Till as "the one." Some have speculated that someone was Carolyn Bryant.

"He couldn't see who it was, but it may well have been her," said David Beito, a University of Alabama history professor who has researched the case exhaustively with his wife, Linda Royster Beito, a Stillman College professor.

The theory Carolyn Bryant was there appears to be supported, in part, by Bryant's and Milam's initial statement. They told Leflore County Sheriff George Smith they had abducted Till but released him unharmed after Carolyn Bryant, who was back at the store, told them Till wasn't the one.

Their claim they released Till unharmed was an obvious lie, but were they telling the truth when they said they showed Till to her?

Beito said it's difficult to say since no witness positively identified Carolyn Bryant outside Wright's house. She repeatedly has denied to the FBI she was there.

The biggest problem facing prosecutors is jurors might not hear some of these details.

Mississippi court rules permit testimony of dead or unavailable witnesses, but Mose Wright's 1955 testimony appears to be inadmissible since Carolyn Bryant wasn't on trial, said Aaron Condon, professor emeritus for the University of Mississippi School of Law.

It's unknown what additional evidence, if any, the FBI has uncovered in its investigation.

If the FBI found a witness who could put Carolyn Bryant at Wright's house that night, it might still be difficult to conclude she committed a crime because it remains unknown whether she objected to what was taking place or encouraged it, Condon said. "To get beyond reasonable doubt will be one hellacious trip."

One other possibility, legal experts say, would be if the FBI found someone whom Carolyn Bryant had confided in regarding her role, if any.

Some details in the case could assist her defense. The Look article says Roy Bryant learned of the wolf-whistle days later from a black customer, not his ex-wife.

Among defense lawyers, a common expression is a district attorney wields so much influence among grand jurors he could get them to indict a ham sandwich.

"My experience is grand juries are not as pliable as people think they are," said Condon, a former prosecutor in Attala County.

In one case, grand jurors indicted when he didn't want them to, he said. "The result was an immediate acquittal. They didn't take time to smoke a cigarette."

Chiles rejects talk that prosecutors exert that kind of influence on a grand jury.

That's not what she likes to use grand juries for anyway, she said. "If the evidence is there, we expect a grand jury to return an indictment. If it isn't, we wouldn't encourage a grand jury to indict."

She plans to share all the information gathered in the Till investigation with grand jurors, she said. "We wouldn't hold anything back."

Local Inmate Claims Guards Beat Him To Near Death (WILNJ)

By Lee Williams, The News Journal

Wilmington (DE) News Journal, February 11, 2007

David Kalm, a 56-year-old disabled sailor, spent seven days in hospitals

David L. Kalm, a 56-year-old disabled Merchant Marine sailor, says he was nearly beaten to death by prison guards at the Sussex Correctional Institution near Georgetown last October.

Kalm, who was serving a 60-day sentence for DUI, said two guards wearing black gloves took turns pounding his head into a cinder-block wall until he passed out.

DOJ_NMG_0130635

"They really seemed to enjoy smashing my head and my face into the wall," he said. "My ears looked like elephant ears when I came out of the hospital."

In written reports, the guards said Kalm's injuries were self-inflicted, and Kalm acknowledges an earlier physical confrontation with guards after he refused to be moved to a cellblock where he feared being harmed by other inmates. However, Christiana Hospital medical staff members who examined Kalm concluded that the injuries were suffered during an "assault."

"Anatomically, it could not have been possible" for the injuries to be self-inflicted, said Dr. Irwin Lifrak, a physician who has been an expert witness in several wrongful-death lawsuits. He was asked to review the medical records by an attorney working with Kalm.

The medical records, which Kalm provided to The News Journal, show that he suffered a concussion, a moderate coma, a broken nose, an eyeball that was oozing blood, two broken ribs, a punctured lung, bruising around an eye, extensive bruising to his face, head and ears, and two pharyngeal tears in his throat. Lifrak and another medical professional say the tears were caused by repeated blows to his neck or by an object such as a nightstick being shoved down his throat.

Last month, the FBI began collecting preliminary information on the incident, and the Department of Correction has begun an internal investigation.

After the last confrontation with guards, Kalm said, he was denied medical care for 13 hours by a prison system that was found by the U.S. Justice Department late last year to have committed numerous civil rights violations because of inadequate medical care going back years.

Kalm spent seven days recovering in hospitals.

"There are telephone numbers I've known my whole life that I can't remember anymore," he said.

Correction Commissioner Carl Danberg, who learned of the incident this month on his second day as commissioner, ordered his Internal Affairs unit to investigate Kalm's allegations and asked prison health director James Welch to review the inmate's medical records, along with assistance from "outside physicians."

Attorney General Beau Biden III declined to comment because of the internal investigation.

Kalm was released from Sussex Correctional Institution in November. In early January, he contacted Dover attorney Steve Hampton, who represented the family of Anthony Pierce, who became known as "the brother with two heads" as an inmate at Sussex Correctional Institution. Pierce died of a brain tumor while his condition was mishandled by the prison medical staff. In October 2005, the state settled the wrongful death lawsuit in a confidential agreement.

Kalm, who is legally disabled, has a heart condition, high blood pressure, stomach problems and arthritis in his spine that aggravates his sciatic nerve, causing intense, shooting pain down his leg, according to his medical records. Kalm's lungs were damaged while serving in the Merchant Marine, so he uses a "breathing machine" daily to treat a condition similar to asthma.

He also has struggled with alcohol. In 2006, he was charged on three separate counts of driving under the influence, in addition to an offensive touching charge from 2004. He pleaded guilty to DUI in May, but two more DUI cases are pending.

When he reported to prison late last year, because of his health problems, he went to the prison infirmary. One night, he claims, a nurse gave him the wrong medication, which made him ill. The next day, Kalm complained to a doctor.

The next night, the nurse was outraged, Kalm said.

"That's how this all got started," he said.

At around 9:30 p.m. on Oct. 6, guards tried to move him to a cellblock where he feared being victimized because guards had spread a rumor that he was gay.

Kalm protested the transfer in a supervisor's office.

"I was freaking. I was scared for my life," he said.

According to Sgt. Daniel R. Kobus' Oct. 26 disciplinary report, Kalm at the time was "acting funny, saying that someone was gonna hurt him, acting all crazy."

Kalm told a reporter that he grabbed the supervisor's desk to avoid being sent to a cell.

"Then the door flies open and a whole pile of guards run in, spray me with Mace and start punching me," he said. "I grabbed onto a computer and the wires. When they're dragging me out of there, the computer comes off the desk and hits a guard."

Kalm said he was taken to a dark cell where two guards punched him and slammed his head into the walls.

"It was a real strange room," he said. "There wasn't no window there, and they'd come through and spray Mace into the room. They'd make me stick my arms out the food slot and twist them, which really hurt. I still have arm pain today."

"The next thing I remember was a doc waking me up in Christiana, asking me if I know what day it is," he said. Medical records show Kalm was suffering a concussion and a moderate coma.

None of the seven guards named in department reports on the incidents chose to comment to The News Journal, according to correction officials.

DOJ_NMG_0130636

Guards' version

In another document, dated 20 days after the assault, several guards report finding Kalm "banging his head and fist off of the wall." He was "still being very combative," the document says. Kalm denies harming himself.

"I never banged my head on the cell wall," he said. "They banged my head on the cell wall."

At the hospital, the guards told the staff Kalm had stuck a pencil down his throat, causing the pharyngeal tears, but the pencil was not mentioned in the guards' report.

Dr. Lifrak, who practices internal medicine in Wilmington and also is a lawyer, questioned whether Kalm could have damaged his own throat.

"The esophagus is behind the trachea -- the food pipe behind the air pipe," he said. "If a person were to hurt or stab themselves in the throat, they would have to go through the trachea before getting to the esophagus. It's just not possible."

Lifrak maintains that the pharyngeal tears were caused by blows or an object inserted through Kalm's mouth.

"I don't remember anything getting stuck in my mouth before I passed out," Kalm said. "But afterwards, they could have done anything to me."

A Christiana psychiatrist noted that Kalm was in "fear for his life, believes prison officials and other inmates plan him further harm, states he is being denied access to a phone to call family or an attorney, and prison officials have forbidden me to make a call on his behalf."

Kalm said he still suffers from the alleged assault.

"I get two different types of headaches. They're crippling," he said. "And I still wake up in the middle of the night in extreme fear, soaking wet." Staff reporter Esteban Parra contributed to this article.

Contact investigative reporter Lee Williams at 324-2362 or lwilliams@delawareonline.com.

TIMELINE

9:30 p.m. Oct. 6 -- Kalm struggles with prison guards, who use pepper spray and fists to subdue him while he is being moved to a new tier in the Sussex Correctional Institution near Georgetown.

9:55 p.m. Oct. 6 -- Prison guards report Kalm was "banging on the walls." He is cuffed and taken to an isolation cell, and left overnight, despite substantial injuries which include a concussion, a moderate coma, two pharyngeal tears in his throat, a broken nose, two broken ribs, a punctured lung, bruising around the orbit of the eye, and extensive bruising to his face, head and ears.

10:46 a.m. Oct. 7 -- Nearly 13 hours after the second incident, Kalm is taken to the prison infirmary, where staff members clean his bloody eye and broken nose, and put a bandage on his bruised cheek.

1:20 p.m. Oct. 7 -- Kalm is moved from the infirmary to Beebe Medical Center in Lewes.

8:10 p.m. Oct. 7 -- Kalm is transferred from Beebe Medical Center to Christiana Care in Stanton. Christiana medical staffers find he has difficulty breathing on his own. They determine his injuries were suffered during an "assault."

Oct. 13 -- Seven days after the first struggle with prison guards, Kalm is discharged from Christiana and taken back to prison.

Noxubee's Bill For Voting Right Trial Tops $25,000 So Far (MEMCD)

By Jewel Miller, Dispatch Correspondent

Columbus (MS) Commercial Dispatch, February 11, 2007

MACON - More than half of the funds earmarked by the Noxubee County Board of Supervisors for their 2007 budget to cover legal expenses for the county's election commission has been spent.

And though the federal trial in which the Noxubee County Election Commission and Democratic Party Chairman Ike Brown were accused of discriminating against white voters wrapped up in Jackson on Jan. 31, officials said more fees for the case are imminent.

“We've spent over $25,000 already and we're not at the end of it,” said Janet Abrams, the county's comptroller at Friday's Noxubee County supervisors meeting.

The supervisors allotted $50,000 for the election commission's legal fees in 2007 to cover legal expenses for the precedent-setting voting rights trial. The commission is represented by Clinton attorney, Ellis Turnage. The county isn't however footing the bill to defend Brown, whose attorney is Wil Colom of Columbus.

The board avoided an additional $8,500 bill when Turnage opted not to use the testimony of political scientist Richard Engstrom. Engstrom had been expected to counter the testimony of the Justice Department's expert witness, political science professor Theodore Arrington.

Arrington testified last month Brown and his associates don't maintain practices to prevent “bias and fraud.” Engstrom has countered that Noxubee County whites lose elections simply because they're in the minority.

Noxubee's supervisors authorized payment of the $8,500 to Turnage for Engstrom's expert testimony at their regular Monday meeting. But hours later, Turnage informed Noxubee Board Attorney Chris Hemphill Engstrom won't be called to testify.

The federal trial pitted the U.S. Justice Department against the Noxubee County Election Commission and Brown, who stands accused of discriminating against and intimidating white voters during the past several elections. This trial marks the first time The Voting Rights Act of 1965 has been used to protect the rights of white voters.

During the non-juried trial, the Justice Department presented evidence of their allegations, including the testimony of more than 40 witnesses before U.S. District Judge Tom Lee.

But Hemphill said this doesn't mean the end to Turnage's charges for his representation.

“(Turnage) indicated in our conversation that other charges were coming,” Hemphill said.

Although the trial has been recessed, Lee set a March 26 deadline for the attorneys to submit final written briefs. He will make a ruling at a later date.

In other business, the board heard a request from Crayton Coleman, Extension agent, asking for their support of a 4-H agent for Noxubee County. No decisions will be made on the matter until further information is brought to the board.

Human Trafficking Legislation Is Pushed (LCJ)

By Deborah Yetter

Louisville (KY) Courier-Journal, February 11, 2007

Previous effort for bill fell short

FRANKFORT, Ky. — Cases of human trafficking have begun to surface in Kentucky, and advocates argue that the state should join 27 others that have enacted laws against exploiting people for forced labor, domestic work or the sex trade.

"It is happening here," said Cori Hash, a legal aid lawyer in Lexington. "We've seen it. We know the victims are out there."

A bill filed by Sen. David Boswell, D-Owensboro, would make it a criminal offense to bring people into the state for exploitation.

The measure, Senate Bill 43, also would provide services and help for the victims of human trafficking, often women or children.

"I think this issue is very important -- it's a human rights issue," Boswell said.

A human-trafficking bill passed the Senate last year, but it died after the House attached an unrelated amendment dealing with identity theft.

Boswell said he's discussing the bill -- which has been assigned to the Judiciary Committee -- with Senate leadership and thinks its chances are better.

"This bill is getting some traction," he said.

Groups backing the bill include the Catholic Conference of Kentucky, the Kentucky Office of Legal Services and the Kentucky Domestic Violence Association.

The Rev. Patrick Delahanty, who is working on the bill for the Catholic Conference, said it's difficult to know how significant the problem is in Kentucky.

"These people are coerced, intimidated and forced to work," he said. "They are very fearful of coming forward."

Trafficking victims often come from other counties -- enticed by purported offers of jobs or marriage. Many are laborers or migrant workers, but some are U.S. citizens, often children, forced into prostitution, Hash said.

Congress passed a law banning human trafficking in 2000 to combat what the State Department has said is a growing problem in the United States. It says that as many as 800,000 people a year are trafficked worldwide, with up to 17,500 of those coming to the United States, according to its 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report.

The Justice Department, which enforces the federal law, also is urging states to adopt their own laws, said Andrea Bertone, director of HumanTrafficking.org, a Washington resource and information center.

State laws provide more law enforcement resources to fight trafficking, as well as services for victims, Bertone said.

Indiana adopted a trafficking law last year, and Bertone said Kentucky should consider one as well.

"Victims of trafficking have been found in some pretty remote areas," Bertone said. "No state is immune to people at some point being exploited."

In Kentucky a handful of women believed to be victims of human trafficking have arrived at domestic violence shelters over the last few years, said Sherry Currens, director of the domestic violence association.

Domestic violence often is involved if the victim is forced to live with a male she thought she was coming to marry, Currens said. Some victims are forced into prostitution and have their passports and other documentation taken and freedom restricted, she said.

DOJ_NMG_0130638

The victims, who may not speak English and may not be in the country legally, often are afraid to go to authorities. If they do get away, they may have nowhere to go, Currens said.

"I think it's a growing issue," she said. "There are homeless shelters, but in rural areas the services just aren't there.

Hash, who works at the Maxwell Street Legal Clinic in Lexington, specializes in immigration cases. She said she and other immigration lawyers have seen several cases where they believe human trafficking was involved.

In one case, a Western Kentucky family brought a foreign woman to live with them to work as a nanny and housekeeper. But when she arrived, they took her passport, restricted her to the house and made her work long hours for wages that amounted to less than $1 an hour.

The woman was afraid to press charges, but legal aid lawyers were able to work with her to recover some of the wages she said she was owed, Hash said.

Hash said she also is working with a woman who said she was sold to a Southern Kentucky man as a wife. And her office is tracking child prostitution prosecutions in Tennessee and Ohio where evidence shows the prostitution rings operated in Kentucky.

"I expect the numbers are actually much higher than are coming through our doors," she said.

More information is available at www.HumanTrafficking.org.

Reporter Deborah Yetter can be reached at (502) 582-4228.

Justice Dept. Major Player In Every Step Schools Make (MEMCD)

By Garthia Elena Halbert

Columbus (MS) Commercial Dispatch, February 11, 2007

For decades, every move in the public education arena within Lowndes County has been under the scrutiny of the U.S. Department of Justice.

From construction to teacher recruitment, the Columbus Municipal School District and Lowndes County School District have had to make decisions with a willingness to change course since a federal court must give its approval.

Administrators say the process is cumbersome and restrictive.

“The biggest impediment is that all planning and future plans must be approved, and we really don't always know what will happen in terms of population growth or population shifts,” said Dr. Lester Beason, CMSD superintendent of education.

“For example, if we want to plan for a long-term building program, we can guess where the community will be in 10 to 12 years and plan and build accordingly, but if the population shifts or drops or accelerates, the plan has to be re-written and re-approved by the federal court,” Beason said.

“The public doesn't like it,” said Jeff Smith, who's been board attorney for the LCSD Board of Education for 16 years. “The public doesn't like the Justice Department having to approve construction.”

Since a 1970 court judgment declared the two districts discriminatory on the basis of race, the DOJ can step in when desegregation of extracurricular activities, transportation, administrative staff assignment, relative quality of education, faculty assignment, facilities and resources or student assignment may be compromised.

In 1989, the county school board decided to present all new construction projects to the Justice Department for approval to avoid potential litigation.

“July 1, 1989, there was a completely new school board,” said Smith. “... They replaced a much older, much more conservative school board. And they had just elected a new superintendent, and they had just hired a new lawyer, which was me.

“They decided ... that all construction needed to be approved by the Justice Department.”

That process caused the most friction for the county - until the more recent DOJ decision to keep Caledonia and New Hope students and teachers out of their new classrooms until West Lowndes improvements are complete - in the early '90's when planning began for a new high school in New Hope.

“The superintendent, board and architect planned it in 1990. It was built in '91-'92,” said Smith.

But the submission of the proposed project was tedious. Drawings and detailed specifications had to be submitted along with revisions from a bi-racial committee. Two such committees were formed in 1970 - one in each the county and city school districts - as a part of the original desegregation decree, but the county's had lapsed until the new board members were elected.

In addition, the DOJ called members of the community who weren't on the school board and weren't bi-racial committee members to get their input.

“Construction is real controversial,” commented Smith. “It's planned months in advance before it's ever submitted to the Justice Department.”

DOJ_NMG_0130639

Since the construction of New Hope High School, there have been two additional expansions, and the Justice Department has had its say-so in those projects as well.

“They always have suggestions,” said Smith, who noted the project proposals are almost never accepted as presented.

CMSD faced similar issues during its efforts to build a new Stokes-Beard Elementary School after a tornado ripped through the old facility in 2001.

“Probably, the most stressful situation we've found ourselves in was completing the new Stokes-Beard school with the expectation that we would simply reassign those students to that school and finding out that we had to consider a new assignment plan because we had four racially isolated schools,” said Beason.

The students previously assigned to Stokes-Beard temporarily met in classes at Hunt Intermediate. When the Stokes-Beard building was complete in 2005, the school board had a small window to come up with some sort of student assignment plan so as not to undermine the original 1970 court order. Students had been previously assigned by school zone; that was changed to the parental choice and lottery plan now in effect.

During Beason's three-year tenure with CMSD, he has envisioned the district with less elementary schools, - the district currently has seven elementary schools, some of which have very few students - separate pre-kindergarten programs and a new high school and middle school.

Beason will retire in June, and with all projects at the mercy of the DOJ, the redesigned district may remain just a vision.

Not until the two districts are declared unitary will their leaders be able to make decisions without being under the constant scrutiny of the Justice Department.

Once construction efforts are complete at West Lowndes campuses, the county could be declared a unitary school district.

“When the district has complied (with the terms of the settlement) it shall file its motion for a declaration of unitariness and dismissal of this lawsuit with prejudice,” court documents from a February 2006 settlement read.

Renovations at West Lowndes include baseball field developments at the high school and gymnasium improvements and sewage correction at the middle school.

Those improvements were slated for completion this month, but inclement weather has delayed them until spring break in mid-March (please see related story on page 1A.)

Leaders See A Black America Sailing Off Course (WP/AP)

By Dionne Walker

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

HAMPTON, Feb. 10 -- Beneath an oak tree on the campus of what is now Hampton University, historians say, Virginia blacks heard a reading of the Emancipation Proclamation and began to dream of a better life.

On Saturday, more than 8,000 people returned to the historically black Virginia university to chart how far they have come. They gathered for the State of the Black Union, an annual traveling town hall that is considered a barometer for black America's ills.

This year's conference, the eighth, coincides with the 400th anniversary of the nation's first permanent English settlement, Jamestown. Africans arriving in Virginia in the years after that milestone in American history faced enslavement and entrenched racism.

Today's black Americans grapple with political apathy, limited business strength and a lack of motivation, a panel of black leaders said Saturday.

"We need a big idea that unifies us all," said Rep. Keith Ellison (D-Minn.), the nation's first Muslim congressman. Ellison was on a panel that included Al Sharpton and former Virginia governor L. Douglas Wilder (D), the nation's first elected black governor.

They spoke of a black America adrift. Black males are more common in prisons than on college campuses, they said. Black children, meanwhile, are increasingly born into single-parent homes.

"A lot of us have lost the dignity that our community has shown from Jamestown to now," Sharpton said.

Others pointed to a lack of personal responsibility among blacks who, they said, are waiting for leaders to make changes.

"I didn't have to wait for people to tell me it was my time to run for governor -- it was my time," Wilder said, encouraging other blacks to take similar personal initiative. "We can't stop here."

Hampton's Convocation Center was packed with people, many waving their arms and clapping as the speakers tackled tough topics.

Some, such as Renita Seabrook, a professor at the University of Maryland Eastern Shore, considered the forum an important planning session for addressing issues such as education.

"So many of our black boys have been expelled" from schools, Seabrook said. "We've got to get a handle on the reason."

DOJ_NMG_0130640

Jamichael Heathington, 17, of Chattanooga, said he wants to create a youth program to dissuade teenagers from drugs and violence after he finishes college.

He came to the conference for some pointers, calling the event "a lifetime experience to gain perspective [and] to listen to some of the brightest leaders of America."

States Fund Anti-abortion Efforts (LAT)

By Stephanie Simon

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2007

In an experiment that's opening a new front in the culture wars, a growing number of states are paying anti-abortion activists to counsel women with unplanned pregnancies.

At least eight states — including Florida, Missouri and Pennsylvania — use public funds to subsidize crisis pregnancy centers, Christian homes for unwed mothers and other programs explicitly designed to steer women away from abortion. As a condition of the grants, counselors are often barred from referring women to any clinic that provides abortions; in some cases, they may not discuss contraception either.

Most states still spend far more money subsidizing comprehensive family planning, but the flow of tax dollars to anti-abortion groups has surged in recent months, as programs took effect in Texas and Minnesota.

The trend alarms abortion-rights supporters, who assert that the funds would be better spent — and would prevent more abortions — if used to expand access to birth control. But to anti-abortion activists such as Nancy McDonald, the funding is both practical and symbolic, a way of putting the state's stamp of approval on their work.

"It's a subtle thing," said McDonald, who runs five crisis pregnancy centers in South Florida. "But people seem to think if you're affiliated with the state, you must be good."

Here in Texas, the state reduced grants to a Planned Parenthood clinic in downtown Austin — and began sending some of the money to the Catholic diocese a block away.

There, in a cozy office adorned with paintings of Jesus and Mary, counselors can collect $1.05 in public funds for every minute they spend encouraging women and teens not to abort. They show clients photos of a translucent fetus; they give away maternity clothes and baby blankets. Later this month, they will begin offering a state-subsidized one-hour class on infant care.

Tax dollars cannot be used for religious purposes, but federal law permits faith-based groups to participate in government programs and protects displays of religious symbols, such as the basket of plastic rosaries at the diocese's Gabriel Project Life Center.

Amy Chestnut coordinates Gabriel Project, but she was once a client, pregnant at 16. The lessons she got on abstinence — she was told to commit to a "secondary virginity" — didn't stick; she got pregnant again at 19.

But she said the emotional support she received from the counselors — simple acts such as rubbing her belly and talking about the baby with delight, not dismay — persuaded her to carry both pregnancies. Chestnut, 25, has since married the man who fathered both children; she keeps a family photo with her to show clients that even unwanted pregnancies can bring joy.

"People were always assuming that I'd have an abortion. To hear just one person say 'You can do this' made such a difference," Chestnut said.

Crisis pregnancy centers have received tens of millions of dollars from the federal government over the last six years, mostly for abstinence education.

On the state level, Florida, Minnesota, Nebraska, North Dakota and Texas approved funding in 2005. Louisiana, Missouri and Pennsylvania have longer-running programs. Arizona and Kansas have offered one-time grants to anti-abortion groups; several other states fund abortion alternatives from sales of "Choose Life" license plates.

All told, states will spend at least $13 million this year — much of it from welfare or family-planning budgets — to dissuade women from abortion.

In a related campaign, conservatives in several states are pushing to restrict or eliminate public funding for groups that support abortion rights, especially Planned Parenthood. They've had some success, notably in Missouri; six other legislatures will take up the issue this year.

But the vast majority of states still send grants to Planned Parenthood, in amounts that dwarf the anti-abortion funding. Last year, Planned Parenthood received $80 million from states and $200 million from the federal government.

Tax dollars going to Planned Parenthood do not pay for abortions; they cover birth control, gynecological exams, cancer screening and treatment for sexually transmitted diseases. When clients come in with unwanted pregnancies, they hear about all of their options, including keeping the baby and giving it up for adoption. But critics say there can be a presumption that abortion is the easier solution.

DOJ_NMG_0130641

"You have a choice ... do what's right for you," a brochure available in the Austin clinic advises pregnant teens. The bright-red flier urges them to consider how raising a child would hurt their social lives and crimp their freedom. The cartoon on the cover shows a howling infant.

Anti-abortion activists say it's only fair for states to also fund an alternative view. Their pamphlets feature photos of adorable babies and beaming teenage moms; their counselors promise to help pregnant women find apartments, get jobs and finish their degrees — anything to make it easier for them to carry to term.

"I have heard many pro-choice people say, 'There ought to be fewer abortions.' [Funding] this is one way we can do that," said Pennsylvania state Rep. Tom Tangretti, a Democrat who opposes abortion. "I just can't imagine why anyone would be afraid of it."

Critics offer several reasons.

U.S. Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif), an abortion rights supporter, last year asked undercover investigators to contact 23 crisis pregnancy centers; 20 gave misleading information, such as exaggerating the risk of abortion, he reported. In Austin, the diocese hands out a booklet — approved by the state — that suggests a link between abortion and breast cancer, though the National Cancer Institute has found no such connection.

"It's reprehensible that taxpayer dollars are going to organizations that regularly and deliberately deceive women," said Vicki Saporta, president of the National Abortion Federation, which represents abortion providers.

Critics also claim that the emphasis on abortion alternatives drains money from basic healthcare. As evidence, they point to Texas.

In 2005, Texas lawmakers redirected $25 million that was to have gone to Planned Parenthood over two years. Most went instead to primary-care health clinics (which provide contraception but not abortion). But $5 million of the money was set aside for anti-abortion centers that do not provide medical care and will not refer clients to clinics that prescribe birth control.

To deal with its 62% budget cut, the Planned Parenthood clinic in downtown Austin began charging for services long offered free to low-income women. Since the fees took effect, the clinic has distributed 40% fewer birth-control pills and done 50% fewer Pap smears to screen for cervical cancer. Several thousand patients have stopped coming.

Among them is Christina Moore, a 22-year-old mother of two who said she and her husband can't afford $23 a month for birth-control pills she used to get free. "But we can't afford to have more kids, either," she said. Last week, Moore tried to make an appointment with a county clinic; even though she said she had urgent health questions, the earliest they can see her is April.

"I'm already out of pills. I'm worried," Moore said. Her year-old son began howling in the background, and her voice rose: "I do not want to get pregnant now."

Through January, Texas anti-abortion groups had counseled 660 women and teens with the tax dollars made available by the shift in resources. Some lawmakers question the cost: Not counting more than $400,000 in start-up expenses, the counseling has run an average of $450 per client. (By comparison, a year of exams and contraception costs $180.)

But activists remain passionate about the trend. Last week, the Texas Catholic Conference sent volunteers in turquoise shirts to the Capitol to give lawmakers angel food cakes — and a long list of legislative priorities.

At the top of the list: Abolish abortion in Texas. Just a few notches below: Fund alternatives.

Slavery And Remorse (WP)

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

THAT SLAVERY was a shameful episode in American history is beyond debate; not so the issue of whether or how states where it flourished for more than two centuries should apologize or express remorse for it. In recent weeks the legislatures of Virginia and Maryland, former slave states whose last slaves were freed more than 140 years ago, have grappled with that quandary and more broadly with the question of what symbolic or practical value attaches to an act of public contrition.

Virginia, whose state anthem with its references to "darkies" and "old massa" was retired (but not repudiated) just a decade ago, took up the question first. There, the House of Delegates approved a resolution stating its "profound regret" for the state's role in sanctioning slavery, as well as in "the historic wrongs visited upon native peoples." The resolution was approved without opposition, though not before an initial draft was rewritten and stripped of the word "atonement," which, some feared, might have opened the door to monetary reparations. Maryland may now follow suit with a similar if somewhat less elegantly worded resolution that also expresses the state's "profound regret."

Both documents seek to redress an enduring sense of grievance among some African Americans (and, in the case of Virginia's resolution, American Indians). Each rightly makes reference to slavery's lasting, poisonous legacy of discrimination, enforced segregation and racism. And each pays tribute to the high ideal of equal, inalienable rights that are the birthright of every citizen regardless of race, creed or color.

DOJ_NMG_0130642

Some may ask what purpose is served in making such a gesture so many years after the fact and with so many generations separating today's Virginians, black and white, from forebears who may have owned or been slaves. After all, as the Virginia resolution states, "even the most abject apology for past wrongs cannot right them, nor can it justly impute fault or responsibility to succeeding generations or justify the imposition of new benefits or burdens."

True enough. But it is equally true that expressions of repentance and remorse in public life, as in interpersonal relations, can be helpful, healing emollients. It is not just that they do no harm; they may also, as the Virginia document states, serve to "recall and remind so that past wrongs may never be repeated and manifest injustice may not again be overlooked." In that, surely, there is value.

There is value, too, in the debate itself, no matter how toxic its manifestations in the blogosphere and beyond. Evidence for that may be found in the person of Frank D. Hargrove, a white member of Virginia's House. His first public reaction to the idea of expressing remorse for slavery was to suggest that black citizens "should get over it." That remark made Mr. Hargrove, an 80-year-old Republican, the lightning rod for a brief storm of invective. But when the resolution's wording was tweaked, the House ultimately approved it by a vote of 91 to 0. And Mr. Hargrove, to his credit, voted "yea."

ENVIRONMENT:

Updating Bush's Spin On Climate Change (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds, James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush is widely considered one of the world's most prominent skeptics of global warming. But to hear White House officials tell it, the world's view of him is wrong.

In recent days, White House officials have made a special effort to argue that Bush has always been concerned about climate change. Moreover, they say, he has long acknowledged that human activity may be a significant factor.

"Perhaps folks have not taken notice of the fact that this is an administration that's been keenly committed both to environmentalism and conservationism from the start," White House spokesman Tony Snow said last week.

Indeed, the climate around global warming in Washington is getting hotter. Members of both parties are scrambling to get ahead of each other — and ahead of public demands — to take measures against the threat.

Apparently concerned that Bush was not perceived as being on the global warming bandwagon, White House officials released an unusual open letter Wednesday contending that "climate change has been a top priority since the president's first year in office."

"Beginning in June 2001, President Bush has consistently acknowledged climate change is occurring and humans are contributing to the problem," said the letter, signed by John Marburger, director of the White House Office of Science and Technology Policy, and James Connaughton, chairman of the White House Council on Environmental Quality.

But the record isn't quite so clear.

The letter cites a June 2001 speech by Bush, quoting him as saying that "we know the surface temperature of the Earth is warming…. There is a natural greenhouse effect that contributes to warming…. And the National Academy of Sciences indicates that the increase is due in large part to human activity."

But the parts of the speech excised or ignored by the letter give a somewhat different impression. For instance, the citation deletes a sentence that asserts that "concentration of greenhouse gases, especially CO2, have increased substantially since the beginning of the Industrial Revolution" — a time frame suggesting that the contemporary world may have played only a small role.

Moreover, Bush's mention of the National Academy of Sciences was quickly followed by a sentence that cast doubt on the notion of human contribution to climate change. "Yet the academy's report tells us that we do not know how much effect natural fluctuations in climate may have had on warming," Bush said at the time.

"We do not know how fast change will occur or even how some of our actions could impact it," he added.

Critics see such discrepancies as evidence that the White House is trying to take positions on both sides of the debate. "The president is all over the map," said Daniel Becker, a global warming expert with the Sierra Club, an environmental group.

The critics argue that Bush soft-pedaled the issue early in his presidency because of pressure from corporate interests, such as oil companies and operators of coal-fired power plants, that oppose regulation of greenhouse gas emissions. They note his frequent statements that technology is the answer to the problem.

DOJ_NMG_0130643

"America is on the verge of technological breakthroughs that will enable us to live our lives less dependent on oil," Bush said last month in his State of the Union address. "And these technologies will help us be better stewards of the environment, and they will help us to confront the serious challenge of global climate change."

Last week's release of a United Nations commission report proclaiming that global warming is incontrovertible has put additional pressure on Bush to appear responsive.

However, despite his pledge to devote new funds to research and to support efforts to curb the use of gasoline, critics remain unconvinced that Bush truly intends to confront longtime business allies.

Bush's latest pronouncements suggest that he is no longer ignoring the problem, Becker said, but also that he is still not committed to acting.

Critics say that Bush has repeatedly pledged to take action on climate change, only to backtrack.

The pattern began, they say, in Saginaw, Mich., on Sept. 29, 2000, during Bush's first presidential campaign. While calling for greater production of oil and natural gas, and more coal mining to reduce the reliance on foreign oil, he also said that "with the help of Congress, environmental groups and industry, we will require all power plants to meet clean-air standards in order to reduce emissions of sulfur dioxide, nitrogen oxide, mercury and carbon dioxide within a reasonable period of time."

Six months later, as president, Bush stepped away from that pledge, saying he had decided not to regulate carbon dioxide emissions from power plants out of concern that doing so could increase already high energy prices.

But perhaps the defining moment came in June 2001, when he declared the Kyoto Protocol — the United Nations' consensus document on climate change — "fatally flawed in fundamental ways" and announced that the United States was withdrawing from the pact. That is the speech his aides are now citing as evidence of his commitment to tackling the problem of global warming.

Kyoto "would have been economically ruinous and would have thrown a lot of people out of work," Snow said last week. "The president instead has aggressively pursued ways of trying to clean the environment that don't have to make people lose their jobs, and … at the same time, proceed on all the major areas where pollution is concerned."

The Kyoto agreement, completed in 1997, proposed carbon dioxide emission caps for the 35 richest countries. President Clinton signed it but never submitted it to the Senate, where it would have faced certain defeat from lawmakers concerned about the protocol's impact on the U.S. economy and irked that it did little to curb emissions from such large developing nations as China and India.

Bush in effect erased Clinton's signature, removing the United States from any obligation to meet the pact's emissions-reduction goals even without Senate ratification.

At the same time, Bush sought to blame global warming on "a natural greenhouse effect," suggesting it wasn't primarily caused by human activity. And, though acknowledging that limiting emissions was one way to stabilize concentrations of greenhouse gases, he immediately raised issues with such an approach, saying, "A growing population requires more energy to heat and cool our homes, more gas to drive our cars."

Whether White House officials succeed in their campaign to paint the president as a leader in battling global warming may, at this point, make little difference. The energy on the issue has moved to Congress, where the Democrats — now the majority in both chambers — and prominent Republicans are pressing ahead with an agenda that may depend little on Bush.

"For years we have been frustrated by the lack of recognition, much less cooperation, on the part of the administration in addressing this issue," said Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a potential presidential candidate in 2008. "Hopefully, we have now turned the corner, in that there is finally recognition that the debate is over."

T.R.? He's No T.R. (NYT)

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

Whenever President Bush is being hammered for his environmental policies, as he has been recently for his timid approach to global warming, he heads for a national park to reveal a hidden kinship with nature and, in effect, to promise a new day.

He did so again last week, visiting Shenandoah National Park to announce a sizable increase in the National Park Service's budget. The photo op elicited suggestions from Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne that Mr. Bush was somehow channeling Teddy Roosevelt. From Tony Snow, the White House spokesman and resident fantasist, it prompted the incredible claim that Mr. Bush had in fact been "keenly committed both to environmentalism and conservationism from the start."

From the start? The choice Mr. Bush faced on the day he took office was between two competing Republican approaches to environmental matters — the callous disregard for the country's natural resources displayed during the Reagan years and the responsible stewardship of those same resources associated with Theodore Roosevelt. Mr. Bush unhesitatingly chose the former.

DOJ_NMG_0130644

The result was an across-the-board antiregulatory crusade aimed not only at undoing Bill Clinton's environmental legacy but also at weakening bedrock economic law stretching back to Richard Nixon. It was orchestrated by the ideologues and industry lobbyists whom Mr. Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney installed in nearly every important position where environmental policy is made. The one exception was Christie Whitman, who finally tired of being told to do industry's bidding and retired to private life after two uncomfortable years as boss of the Environmental Protection Agency.

It is impossible to find Teddy Roosevelt's ghost in any of this. One suspects, for instance, that Roosevelt would have tried much harder to protect fragile landscapes than the Bush administration has in its frantic drive for more oil and gas resources in the Rocky Mountains. One suspects — knows, even — that Roosevelt, who started the national wildlife refuge system, would not have pushed for oil drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge.

Similarly, Roosevelt would not have declared — as Gale Norton, Mr. Kempthorne's immediate predecessor, did in 2003 — that America had already acquired enough protected wilderness; he would have demanded more. He would not have rolled back, as Ms. Norton did, environmental rules governing mining for gold, copper and lead. He would not have countenanced the demolition job that Mr. Bush's Forest Service has done on the web of forest protections it inherited from previous administrations. He would not have tried to scuttle one of the most important acts of environmental stewardship in many years, Mr. Clinton's roadless rule, which made 58.5 million acres of the national forests off limits to new road building and development.

And Roosevelt would certainly have kept his word. Mr. Bush made three big promises in this area in the 2000 campaign. One was to regulate emissions of carbon dioxide, the main global warming gas. He reneged on that one almost immediately. The second was to finance the federal government's core open space program, the Land and Water Conservation Fund, at its annual authorized level of $900 million. He has shortchanged it badly every year and this year he is asking for $85 million.

The third promise was to put more money into the national parks. Here history may give Mr. Bush higher marks, thanks largely to the entreaties of Mr. Kempthorne, who pressed for and received a commitment of $258 million in new spending this year and a guarantee of $1 billion over 10 years. The parks have been starved for years (and not just by this administration), and people who care about them have every reason to be pleased by the prospect of a substantial increase in the budget.

We can also hope, of course, that this represents a turnaround in Mr. Bush's thinking, and that in the next two years he will offer up an energy policy focused more on new technologies and conservation and less on the old extractive industries; a public lands policy that spares our last wild places; a meaningful strategy for global warming; and on and on into a Rooseveltian future. But neither gratitude for a few extra dollars for the parks nor our stubborn belief in the possibility of redemption should blind us to six years of bad policies.

Wash Your Hands! (WP)

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

THE RECENT discovery that turkeys on a British farm were infected with the H5N1 "bird flu" virus was, as bad news goes, auspiciously timed. Just before the turkeys once again focused attention on the fast-moving virus, the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention released interim guidelines detailing what states and localities could do to cope with a pandemic of a dangerous form of influenza -- the sort of outbreak that a mutated form of H5N1 could spark.

The CDC's guidelines instruct American communities on how they might slow the spread of a bad flu in the absence of viable drugs or vaccines. Such rules are desperately needed. Last September, a group of international experts on pandemic preparedness concluded that it was likely that vaccines would prove ineffective against mutated forms of the virus. Tamiflu can lessen the severity of flu symptoms but does not eliminate the virus. Meanwhile, efforts to shorten the time required to formulate new vaccines when a virus mutates still face years of research. So if a pandemic strain arrived in the United States tomorrow, the country's best tools might turn out to be old-fashioned technologies and techniques of the sort listed in the CDC report, such as quarantines and public information campaigns promoting proper hygiene.

Not everyone in the public health world welcomed some of the more extreme guidelines. The CDC's proposal to shut down schools for three months in the case of a severe outbreak is generating resistance from scientists who claim that the tactic is not as effective as the CDC says it is. Others point out that the guidelines, which advise people to avoid crowded spaces such as train cars or offices, do not address the needs of poorer Americans (among others) who must take public transportation or who can't telecommute. As the CDC gathers comment and updates its interim guidelines, it must consider how state and local governments might deal with the potentially massive social costs of school closures and work stoppages.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Will L.A.'s Strategy To Battle Gangs Work? (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0130645

By Richard Winton And Patrick Mcgreevy, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2007

Experts suggest police crackdowns do only half the job. One plan calls for a mix of programs designed to 'hold and build' neighborhoods.

Every few years, an act of gang violence rises above the rest, sparking outrage across Los Angeles and vows to finally conquer the gang problem.

When Karen Toshima was killed by gang crossfire in Westwood Village in 1988, then-Police Chief Daryl F. Gates intensified Operation Hammer. The gang sweeps yielded thousands of arrests but also generated much criticism about mistreatment by officers.

The 1995 killing of 3-year-old Stephanie Kuhen when her family drove onto a dead-end street in Cypress Park resulted in another gang crackdown.

When William J. Bratton became chief in 2002, he was faced with a string of 20 gang shootings — including the death of 14-year-old Clive Jackson. He declared war on gangs, referring to them as domestic terrorists.

Last week, he and Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa declared war again — the inspiration this time the racially motivated killing of Cheryl Green, a 14-year-old African American, by members of a Latino gang in the Harbor Gateway neighborhood.

The new crackdown — targeting 11 gangs — might suggest that the Los Angeles Police Department is trying again where it has failed before.

But it's more complex than that. Though gang crimes jumped 14% in 2006, they are down significantly from the early 1990s and even more compared with the mid-1980s. According to LAPD statistics, there were 7,714 gang crimes last year, compared with 10,945 in 1995.

"What we are doing is no different than what we have been doing. As a Police Department we have always been assertive, very aggressive in going at gangs," Bratton said. "What we are doing with this effort — it's more comprehensive."

But what some critics of the crackdown find familiar is the race to respond to a killing that garners news media attention and public outrage — an approach they say is not always comprehensive or effective.

"It is the same prescription every time they have a major event," said Malcolm Klein, a veteran gang sociologist and USC professor emeritus. "Gangs are defined as a crime problem and not a community problem. This is old fashioned suppression in a new guise, and where is the proof that has worked?"

He noted that since 1980, when gang slayings topped 200 in Los Angeles, the city has focused most of its gang response on policing.

A month ago, Connie Rice, director of the Advancement Project in Los Angeles, produced a comprehensive plan for the city to overhaul gang intervention programs and try to use means other than law enforcement to address its 39,000 gang members.

Rice proposes what she calls a Marshall Plan of sorts that would mix law enforcement with gang intervention and job programs, community outreach and newly created community oversight groups.

It would focus initially on 12 so-called hot zones around the city. Gang prevention efforts now cost the city $82 million a year, but the report called for as much as $1 billion to be spent over the first 18 months.

Rice said past LAPD gang suppression efforts have worked in some neighborhoods, but only for a short time. The city, she said, has always failed to follow up with programs to keep the gangs out.

"The surges of police activity work, and they may even work for months or years," Rice said. "But eventually, three years later, another [gang] set comes in."

She likened the situation to the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, where troops quickly routed the enemy, only to see a lack of proper planning lead to chaos.

"The LAPD knows how to surge and purge," Rice said. But "after the LAPD clears out a neighborhood, we don't know how to hold and build."

Rice and Klein said the city's response to the Stephanie Kuhen shooting in Cypress Park by the Avenues gang highlights the problem.

In the wake of the killing, the city created the L.A. Bridges after-school program, but it has not done what was required, Rice said. The program budgeted for $26 million last year reaches only 5% of gang members and 2% of children in neighborhoods with high gang activity, and is not keeping enough young people out of gangs, she said.

Cheryl Maxson, a UC Irvine criminologist and gang expert, said the problem is that the LAPD can move much faster than gang intervention groups.

"The program community, the interventionists, are not able to mobilize as quickly as LAPD, so law enforcement has taken the lead on gangs for decades," she said. "So the city goes with strategic suppression."

DOJ_NMG_0130646

Bratton, however, is quick to point out that LAPD efforts over the last four years have yielded results.

"In 2002, 2003 we had a similar initiative. [Before then] we had had three straight years of growing crime in the city. Gang violence in particular," he said. "We put in new resources. That year, we had a 23% decline in homicides throughout the city. About 20% of that decline, over 100 fewer murders, were in the South Bureau."

The latest plan calls for 200 extra officers to target the 11 gangs, a new South L.A. gang homicide bureau and an LAPD gang coordinator.

Villaraigosa said the plan, which identifies gangs by name, represents a more direct approach to the problem, learning from past mistakes.

"Part of what dynamic leadership is all about … is you are constantly evaluating what works and what doesn't," he said, adding that he also wants to boost gang-intervention programs.

The police crackdown has met with general support from community activists in some gang-plagued neighborhoods, who say they have been begging the city for years to make their areas safer.

But aggressive gang crackdowns have generated criticism in the past over heavy-handed tactics.

Efforts in the 1980s were widely seen as excessive, symbolized by police use of a tank-like battering ram to smash into suspected gang houses. In 1988, police ripped apart apartments on Dalton Street looking for gangs and drugs — but later admitted they had the wrong places.

A decade later, gang enforcement efforts were further tarnished by the Rampart scandal. Caught in a dope-stealing allegation, then-Officer Rafael Perez revealed that dozens of officers, many in the elite area gang unit, were making false arrests, giving perjured testimony and framing suspects.

Then-Chief Bernard C. Parks, now a city councilman, disbanded the anti-gang units. Subsequently, the U.S. Justice Department forced the LAPD and city into a consent decree with oversight of the department continuing today. Tough rules govern the gang units now in use, and there are audits and constant monitoring.

*

richard.winton@latimes.com
patrick.mcgreevy@latimes.com

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

Anti-gang efforts

Here are some defining moments in the Los Angeles Police Department's long — and at times controversial — fight against street gangs.

· 1985: The LAPD started using a tank-like battering ram to enter suspected gang and drug houses. The Times reported: "Police Chief Daryl F. Gates was so proud of the event that he personally christened the new tank and then rode inside it, while cameras rolled, as it did its dirty work."

· 1988: Eighty-eight LAPD officers stormed two apartment houses at Dalton Avenue and 39th Street, near the Coliseum. The officers broke windows, smashed walls, ceilings and furniture with sledgehammers and battering rams and ripped out sinks and toilets. Apparently, they had the wrong apartments. The city paid more than $4 million in settlements.

· 1988: The LAPD launched Operation Hammer, anti-gang sweeps that resulted in tens of thousands of arrests. Many blacks and Latinos said the effort amounted to racial harassment. On one night, officers in Operation Hammer arrested 1,453 people — 1,350 of whom were released with no charges filed.

· 1994: In the wake of riots in 1992, several major gangs agreed to truces, which appeared to reduce killings in some neighborhoods, but in many cases the results were short-lived.

· 1995: The LAPD and other agencies launched what was described as the "largest street gang crackdown of its kind in Los Angeles history." In two weeks, only 69 people had been arrested by the 800-member task force.

· 1997: Law enforcement agencies won a sweeping, first-of-its-kind injunction aimed at the heart of the notorious 18th Street gang's domain, a crowded and crime-plagued square-mile area west of downtown where the group had emerged more than 30 years ago.

· 1998: Crime in Los Angeles dropped to the lowest level in more than two decades.

· 1999: The Rampart scandal erupted, with accusations of criminal behavior by members of the LAPD's anti-gang detail.

· 2002: Mayor James K. Hahn and Los Angeles Police Chief William J. Bratton announced an "all-out assault" on the city's street gangs, with plans to use the same tactics that crippled organized crime to pursue gang members.

DOJ_NMG_0130647

IMMIGRATION:

A Town That Wants Illegal Immigrants (LAT)

By Gregory Rodriguez

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2007

Lindsay, Calif. — THE IMMIGRATION debate can get pretty sloppy and emotional in the abstract, but not here in this Central Valley town that can't afford to let simplistic rhetoric overshadow facts. Last month's devastating citrus freeze has put Lindsay, population 11,185, in dire economic straits; but its pragmatic response to the crisis sets an example for the rest of the nation.

The packing houses here in the heart of California's citrus belt are generally hopping the first week of February. In a normal year, the two LoBue Bros. plants would be open 50 to 60 hours a week, employing 230 workers and processing up to 7,000 bins of oranges. But after last month's freeze, the third since 1990, LoBue is operating at quarter speed. One plant is shut down, and the other is running just 20 hours a week. About 60% of the employees are off work.

After the first of March, there will be a brief spurt of activity, when agricultural officials determine which remaining oranges are frost-free and good enough to go to market. But by mid-April, when the good fruit runs out, all activity, from picking to trucking, will stop, and there will be no more work until late October. If workers leave town — and if those who stay are jobless — the city's economy will collapse.

Seeking to avert an economic meltdown, officials have come up with an innovative plan to not only address joblessness but to keep the workforce from abandoning the town. Invoking the memory of Franklin D. Roosevelt's Depression-era Works Projects Administration, the city's elected officials — all of whom are Republicans — are seeking federal aid to put the idle labor force to work on local improvement efforts.

The fact that a large-yet-undetermined percentage of farm laborers — particularly pickers — are illegal immigrants does not deter local officials from seeking aid for them. Unlike other parts of the U.S. where undocumented immigration is a divisive issue, in Lindsay it is a matter of economic survival.

In a city-owned youth club on Sweetbriar Avenue, officials and local nonprofits have set up the Lindsay Freeze Relief Center, where displaced workers can apply for food, clothing, rental and utility assistance, as well as for temporary employment. In its first week of operation, more than 1,200 workers applied. Last Tuesday afternoon, I watched a stream of Mexican immigrants stroll into the center, some with children in tow, looking for assistance.

Longtime Lindsay residents who have raised children here were likely to say that they would weather the hardship no matter what. But recent immigrants said they would leave if they didn't find work soon. "I'm thinking of leaving," said 27-year old Maria Cisneros from the Mexican state of Michoacan. Where to? "Wherever there's work," she replied.

Growers and labor contractors will tell you that the area can't afford to lose more workers. Some say that the current farm labor shortage — of as much as 50% — made the effects of last month's freeze worse than it otherwise would have been. The recent crackdown on the border is being felt in this corner of the Central Valley.

"If we had more workers, we could have picked up to 75% of the crop," said Lindsay-born labor contractor Alice Gutierrez. Growers had a week's notice that the freeze, which caused an estimated $418 million in damage in Tulare County alone, was imminent.

Lindsay Mayor Ed Murray says the worst-case scenario is that the town could lose up to 30% of its labor force. "Regardless of whether they're legal or illegal, it's imperative that we have workers here for next year's harvest," he said. Murray hopes that the federal government will find a way to not only aid his town's residents in the short term but to legalize the undocumented.

Given the divisiveness of the national debate, it is remarkable how many people here recognize the need for the workers who have come to this country illegally. Perhaps not surprisingly, business people, who already are feeling the pain of the freeze, are most likely to make the case.

"It helps all of us," said 71-year-old Bill Martin, who owns a tire shop in town. "I don't particularly care for illegal people in the U.S., but if they come in and want to buy a tire, I'll accommodate them. If you don't have people come, you won't get the fruit picked. And if the fruit doesn't get picked, nobody will have money to buy anything."

Of course, Lindsay is not the only town to try to soften the blow to farmworkers. But what makes its response extraordinary is that city officials are not just looking to solve residents' or employers' immediate needs. They have identified seven public works projects that could benefit from temporary labor — from building a new soccer field to clearing alleyways and constructing a library.

DOJ_NMG_0130648

"We're trying to be farsighted about this and improve the community in the long term," said Kindon Meik, the city's personnel director. "When people invest their labor, they are more vested in the town."

I suspect that much of Lindsay's innovative spirit comes from the knowledge that it has survived much worse. In 1992 — two years after a catastrophic freeze — residents gathered in a local park to bury a coffin containing symbols of the town's financial troubles.

That decade, Lindsay saw its share of white flight and the complete ethnic transformation of the population, which is now 78% Latino. But today, it is clear that the town has thus far survived the transition, and three of five City Council members are Mexican American. Consequently, race doesn't appear to play a big role in the city's approach to issues, including immigration. And so, stripped of the racial and broader ideological implications of the problem before them, Lindsay officials are free to do what they think is right for their little town. Or as citrus grower and Tulare County Supervisor Allen Ishida put it, "We don't have the luxury of not being practical."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Seeks Teacher Merit-pay Funds (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, February 11, 2007

President Bush wants more money in the 2008 budget for a fund that encourages performance-based pay systems for teachers -- a request that will no doubt feed into the larger debate on Capitol Hill about how best to attract, create and retain effective teachers.

The administration is asking for $199 million for its Teacher Incentive Fund, which was created in 2006. The fund provides financial incentives for teachers and principals who improve student achievement in high-poverty schools and helps to recruit top teachers to these schools. Rewards are left up to the states to decide and can include bonuses or raises.

The fund received $99 million in 2006. In November, the administration awarded the first 16 grants -- totaling a little more than $40 million -- to school districts across the country, including Washington, D.C.; Chicago; Memphis, Tenn.; and Philadelphia.

The administration requested an additional $99 million for the program for 2007, but in the interest of belt-tightening, the House essentially zeroed out funding for it in the recently passed fiscal 2007 funding package. That measure has yet to pass in the Senate, so the White House and some Republicans are working hard to get the money.

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said last week that there is a consensus about using compensation "to make sure our best teachers are in our most challenging" schools nationwide.

"We think that is a sound principle," she said, adding, "I think we'll have a lot of discussion about how our teachers are rewarded for doing the best work."

The top teachers union has criticized the fund.

Reg Weaver, president of the National Education Association, recently said the setup "is nothing more than a merit-pay system, and merit pay hasn't worked wherever it has been tried, for the most part."

Far from spurring teachers on to greater effectiveness, extra bonuses for some and not others simply "creates tension" between teachers and kills any teamwork, he said.

"It doesn't work and it's not going to do anything to attract and retain quality teachers," Mr. Weaver said. What will work is getting teachers involved in the decision-making process, giving them a safe and orderly school and a decent salary, he said.

The issue will be front and center as lawmakers work this year to renew the No Child Left Behind Act and pass the Higher Education Act.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, and Rep. George Miller, California Democrat, have crafted a comprehensive bill to improve teacher quality. Included in it is a grant initiative to encourage high-needs schools to implement teacher-incentive programs.

However, their plan would require the financial rewards to be based not just on student test scores, but on broad criteria, including whether the teacher takes on a leadership or mentorship role with other teachers. Each performance-based setup would have to be approved by the local teachers union as well.

Most public school teachers are paid based on years of experience. Merit-based pay systems for teachers are scattered throughout the country, and are more common in private and charter schools than in public schools.

Some recent studies have indicated positive results.

DOJ_NMG_0130649

The University of Arkansas examined a Little Rock elementary school that gave bonuses to teachers based on their students' test scores. The study found that math scores rose more in that school than in similar schools in Little Rock that didn't implement such merit systems. Students in the school where teachers received bonuses made gains over the other students equivalent to a 6 percentile or 7 percentile jump for a student who started at the 50th percentile.

"It's a pretty substantial gain," said Marcus Winters, a senior research associate at the Manhattan Institute, which was involved with the study.

A broader study released recently by University of Florida economics professors examined about 500 public and private high schools and found that having any salary incentive was associated with a 1.3 point to 2.1 point rise in test scores. It also found merit-pay programs were more effective if they targeted just a few teachers for rewards.

But researchers say more studies must be done to fully determine the effectiveness of such programs.

"I know we're not done evaluating nationwide," Mr. Winters said.

Broad Voucher Plan Is Approved In Utah (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

SALT LAKE CITY, Feb. 10 (AP) — The Utah State Legislature approved one of the broadest school voucher programs in the nation on Friday, allotting up to $3,000 for any public school student to put toward private school tuition.

Voucher programs in the handful of other states that have them are generally intended for poor families or students attending schools that have poor academic records. There will be no such restrictions in Utah, which has the largest class sizes in the country and until now has spent less per student than any other state.

The Senate approved the bill 19 to 10 on Friday, a week after the House endorsed it by a single vote, 38 to 37. Both chambers are controlled by Republicans. Gov. Jon Huntsman Jr., a Republican whose children attend public schools, has said he will sign the bill into law.

The vouchers will be open to all of the state's 512,000 public school students. The amount will depend on family income, but even wealthy families would be eligible for at least $500 per child. Students already in private schools would not be eligible.

The plan, which will go into effect this fall, is expected to cost $9.3 million in its first year and $327 million over 12 years. Utah has a $1.6 billion budget surplus. Public schools that lose enrollment because of the program will still get a portion of state financing for five years after each student departs.

The bill's sponsor, Representative Stephen H. Urquhart, a Republican, said public schools would not be shortchanged. In Utah, income taxes must pay for public education. The money for vouchers would come from the state's general fund, which pays for all other state programs.

Nearly every education organization in the state, especially the teachers union, opposes the program, saying tax money should not be spent at private schools.

"This has nothing to do about educating children," said Senator Gene Davis, a Democrat. "It's about taking taxpayer dollars and giving them to private industry."

Critics Question Education Department's Screening (NYT)

By Jonathan D. Glater

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

As a condition of his work for the federal government, Andrew A. Zucker was willing to be fingerprinted and provide an employment history. But then he was asked to let federal investigators examine his financial and medical records, and interview his doctors.

Dr. Zucker was not tracking terrorists or even emptying the trash at the Pentagon. He was studying how to best teach science to middle school students. He was stunned at the breadth of the request for information.

"To me, personally, it's shocking," said Dr. Zucker, who worked for a contractor doing research for the Education Department. He withdrew from the job.

For about a year, contractors say, the department has been requiring employees of the thousands of contractors it hires — many of them academic researchers like Dr. Zucker — to go through a level of security screening usually reserved for those working with very sensitive information.

Katherine McLane, a department spokeswoman, said the scrutiny was warranted because her agency had access to databases with financial data and other information, including names and social security numbers of students or of applicants to colleges or other programs. "We want to make sure that the people who handle and have access to this information are responsible, reliable and trustworthy," Ms. McLane said.

DOJ_NMG_0130650

The policy is prompting critics to question when a prudent background investigation becomes an invasion of privacy. About 100 researchers, including Dr. Zucker, have signed an open letter of protest to Margaret Spellings, the secretary of education, calling the quest for information "far beyond bounds of reason, necessity, and decency."

Others echo the protests.

"These requirements have very little connection with the work that we do," said Michael Knapp, director of the Center for Study of Teaching and Policy at the University of Washington.

Mr. Knapp, a former Education Department contractor, called the policy "an example of going overboard."

Gerald Sroufe, director of government relations for the American Educational Research Association, which represents about 25,000 people, most at universities or research organizations and companies, said, "Our concern is really whether or not all the measures that have been introduced are necessary."

But Ed Elmendorf, senior vice president for government relations at the American Association of State Colleges and Universities, said criminal record checks, which are considerably less invasive than the screening required by the Education Department, are becoming "pretty much a standard operating procedure" at many public academic institutions.

Still, efforts to put criminal record checks in place have met with resistance. Some faculty members protested when the chancellor of the University of Georgia said recently that new hires would be required to undergo a criminal record check.

Although some federal agencies like the Departments of Defense and Homeland Security routinely seek detailed personal information from contractors considered for classified work, others generally do not, unless the contractors are expected to work in federal buildings or have access to federal databases.

At the Agriculture Department, Boyd Rutherford, the assistant secretary for administration, said that if contractors were not in a position of public trust, the department was not asking for a detailed screening. He said that positions of public trust would include those that allowed a contractor access to areas like government information technology.

At the Department of Health and Human Services, which includes the National Institutes of Health, the intensity of background screening also turns on access, said Bill Hall, a spokesman. The lowest-level screening requires running fingerprints through the Federal Bureau of Investigation, performing a criminal records check and determining whether someone had undergone a background check with another government agency.

Ms. McLane, the Education Department spokeswoman, acknowledged that her agency's policy may be stricter than others, but she defended it, saying the department "takes very seriously its responsibility to safeguard information and maintains strong systems that protect confidential data."

Dr. Zucker, a Harvard-trained educator, was a consultant for a subcontractor on a Pennsylvania State University contract with the Education Department. He was developing a procedure to study methods of teaching middle-school science. "I was just designing a study, so I had no access to data because there was no data," he said.

Kyle L. Peck, associate dean at the College of Education at Penn State, said Dr. Zucker would have been comparing test scores of students taught using one method with scores of those taught using another. The data would not necessarily have identified individual students.

Dr. Zucker said he would not have had access to any databases that would identify individual students. He also did not work in a federal building.

"On the one hand, it makes sense," Dr. Peck said of the screening. "On the other hand, we have institutional review processes that govern educational research that protect the confidentiality, and, I think, make this additional level of security clearance unnecessary."

Many employees asked for information by the Education Department were academics like Dr. Zucker. In some instances, the agency has backed down when its policy was challenged. When Dr. Zucker protested, he said the department excused him from providing access to his medical and financial records.

But Dr. Zucker still had reservations about other information the agency required and stopped work on the project.

"I had worked on many Department of Education contracts before," he said, "and other federal contracts from other agencies, and I have 20 years of experience or more in the business, and I had never seen or heard of anything like this."

Bush's Proposed Health-Care Cuts Get Mixed Reviews (WP)

By Christopher Lee, Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

Depending on whom you ask, the budget that President Bush proposed last week will save or sink Medicare and Medicaid, two popular programs that, along with Social Security, threaten to swamp the federal budget as the baby-boom generation retires.

DOJ_NMG_0130651

Bush, citing the need for fiscal responsibility, proposed reducing by $101 billion over five years the spending growth of the two health programs, which serve 93 million people and will cost the government $564 billion this year. One of his most controversial ideas is to charge wealthier seniors higher Medicare premiums for the second time in the program's 41-year history.

Budget experts call the plan one of the most significant efforts in years to rein in federal spending on entitlement programs. But health-care providers and advocates for beneficiaries call the proposed cuts arbitrary and say they would exact an unaffordable toll on a big part of the nation's health-care system.

"It is very, very significant that they're willing to put on the table some specific proposals," said Comptroller General David M. Walker, who frequently warns of the government's troubled long-term fiscal outlook.

Stuart M. Butler, a budget expert at the conservative Heritage Foundation, said, "It's the only way forward in dealing with a huge unfunded obligation that right now is being left in the lap of our children and grandchildren."

Others see the proposals as likely to do more harm than good, and many congressional Democrats have accused Bush of trying to pay for the Iraq war and his signature tax cuts by reducing health care for elderly and poor Americans.

"There are problems in terms of future financing of Medicare, and those need to be dealt with in a comprehensive way," said Charles N. Kahn III, president of the Federation of American Hospitals. "To think we're going to solve all those problems by simply saying, 'We're not going to pay those who provide service what we need to pay them' is more than problematic. . . . This has more to do with the balanced budget and other things than it does with the preservation of Medicare."

Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.) said the Bush plan does nothing to address the underlying causes of the financial woes of Medicare and Medicaid -- rising health-care costs.

"I know it's difficult, but the administration would be doing this country a much greater service by finding ways to lower the underlying costs of Medicare and Medicaid, rather than just lopping off the top," Baucus said. "These costs will just get transferred somewhere else -- emergency rooms or uncompensated care."

Some of the institutions affected most would be hospitals, nursing homes, home health agencies and other providers, whose Medicare payments would be more than $61 billion lower than anticipated over five years (although still higher overall). Bush also proposes automatic across-the-board cuts in provider payments if Medicare spending reaches certain levels for two consecutive years. His budget would not forestall a planned 10 percent cut in Medicare payments to doctors next year.

Bruce Yarwood, president of the American Health Care Association, said the 9,000 nursing homes he represents would receive about $10 billion less than anticipated over five years.

"We'll squeeze, cut and trim administrative costs," he said. "You take a look at your staffing patterns, and rather than four people on the night shift you have three. And rather than seven or eight on the day shift you have six. You take a look at your maintenance crew; you say, 'Rather than mow the lawn every week, I'll mow it every two weeks,' so you lay off a maintenance guy."

David L. Elliott, 74, a retired professor who relies on Medicare, said he worries that Bush's cuts eventually will drive more health-care providers out of the program.

"Medicare currently is underpaying doctors and hospitals, and it's not clear how long they can stand it," the College Park resident said. "Some doctors already are refusing Medicare patients. And this is going to continue."

Since Medicare's inception, beneficiaries have generally paid the same amount for coverage regardless of income, but some experts say that is now unsustainable. The problem was made worse when the GOP-controlled Congress added a prescription drug benefit in 2003, which is expected to cost $38 billion this year.

A little-noticed section of that law, however, for the first time required the more affluent to pay higher premiums. Starting this year, about 1.5 million beneficiaries with incomes of more than $80,000 annually ($160,000 for couples) pay monthly premiums of $106 to $162.10 for Medicare Part B coverage for physician services, up from the standard premium of $93.50.

The Bush budget would no longer adjust the income thresholds annually by inflation. And it would tie drug benefit premiums to income starting next year, a move that would affect 1.1 million beneficiaries, the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services calculates. The changes would save more than $10 billion over five years.

Budget hawks say Democrats should swallow hard and sign on.

"I know Democrats are reluctant and resistant and don't like the concept, but they have to scale back the federal commitment in some way," said Robert L. Bixby, executive director of the nonprofit Concord Coalition, which advocates reducing the federal deficit. "This does so in a progressive way, which is a principle the Democrats should be able to support."

But many seniors and their advocates, including the AARP, say an income test is unfair and threatens to make Medicare a welfare program instead of a broadly supported social insurance effort. Some point out that higher-income seniors already paid more in the form of higher Medicare payroll taxes during their working lives.

"I look at it as a tax increase," said Melville, N.Y., resident Sam Gross, 79, a retired accounting firm partner who pays the higher premiums.

DOJ_NMG_0130652

Democrats have said they are not willing to accept cuts to Medicare and other entitlement programs unless the administration shows a willingness to raise revenues as well. Ultimately, however, treating beneficiaries differently based on income "does have to be part of the solution," Senate Budget Committee Chairman Kent Conrad (D-N.D.) said in an interview taped for C-SPAN and scheduled to air this weekend.

In Medicaid, which serves the poor and disabled, Bush proposes to trim spending growth by nearly $26 billion over five years through measures such as altering how the program pays for drugs and eliminating funding for graduate medical education in teaching hospitals. That would be a big blow for the nation's 800 teaching hospitals, said Richard M. Knapp, executive vice president of the Association of American Medical Colleges.

"We already struggle with our payments from Medicaid," Knapp said. "Major teaching hospitals have the lowest operating margins of all the hospitals in the country, and this would just add to that problem."

The White House argues that the proposals are not draconian. Medicare and Medicaid would account for about $596 billion in federal spending next year, up 5.7 percent. Medicare's average annual spending growth rate over the next five years would slow from 6.5 to 5.6 percent, while Medicaid's would be above 7 percent.

Happy Talk In Bush's Budget (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

Experience has taught us that the Bush administration's budget cannot be judged by its cover -- or by the cover letter the president puts at the start of each year's volume.

The message he released last week was headlined by the Page 1 declaration that "the Budget I am presenting achieves balance by 2012."

It would be wonderful were deficits to disappear -- if only it were true. But on the final page of the document, in Table S-10 on Page 172, one learns the disturbing truth. In fiscal 2012, the president's target year, the gross federal debt will -- by his own estimate -- grow by $372 billion.

How can this be? Well, the Page 1 claim is achieved by ignoring or minimizing a bunch of real-world challenges. For example, the president proposes just a one-year patch for the growing problem of the alternative minimum tax, which is whacking more and more middle-class families who thought they were beneficiaries of the Bush tax cuts. The one-year fix would cost the Treasury $47.9 billion, but no revenue is lost in the next four years -- because Bush just ignores the problem.

Similarly, he assumes that the cost of the Iraq and Afghanistan wars will drop dramatically from $142 billion next year to $50 billion the following year.

And he takes advantage of all the arcane bookkeeping rules that exclude major costs and embrace more helpful numbers.

Rep. Jim Cooper of Tennessee, a Democratic crusader for honestly balanced budgets, pointed me to another back-of-the-book table that illustrates the point.

As he noted, Table S-7 shows that the $61 billion surplus Bush claims for 2012 -- using all the gimmicks he can find -- is achieved only by counting on the $248 billion in anticipated Social Security surpluses that year to wipe out the $187 billion deficit rolled up by all the other activities of the federal government.

In other words, Bush is borrowing from Social Security to achieve his budget surplus -- and that money will have to be repaid out of future taxes, or beneficiaries will suffer.

What's sad about this chicanery is that, in some other respects, this budget is an improvement over its predecessors from Bush. Responding to a congressional mandate, he has put the short-term costs of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan into the regular budget, rather than withholding them until months later and then sending the big bill to Capitol Hill.

Bush also has described, in blunt terms, the dismal financial prospects for Medicare -- premiums will have to increase fivefold to sustain the program unless some way is found to curb health-care inflation. As a start on alleviating that crisis, Bush has proposed $66 billion in savings over the next five years, achieved mainly by trimming payments to providers and boosting premiums for the well-to-do.

Congressional Democrats are screaming even about these modest changes, but the problem is real. Bush would be in a stronger position to secure these savings if he were not pretending that he can balance the budget by 2012 while preserving all his tax cuts.

As Cooper says, "The happy talk from the White House will sap Congress's will to tackle the entitlement issues." The figures in Table S-10 are stark -- and they underline Cooper's warning.

In fiscal 2006, the past year, the total federal debt was $8.45 trillion. In 2012, by Bush's optimistic estimate, it will reach $11.49 trillion. That is $3 trillion of added debt in just six years.

DOJ_NMG_0130653

More and more of that debt is held by foreign countries. Another table, buried back on Page 234 of a supplemental volume, shows that the foreign holdings of U.S. government securities have more than doubled in the past five years, going from just over $1 trillion to $2.1 trillion. Japan and China are our largest creditors, increasing their leverage over our economy. And Uncle Sam has become the world's biggest borrower.

That's another fact you won't find anywhere in this budget.

Stem-cell Researchers Look Beyond The Embryo (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, February 11, 2007

The medical, moral and political debate over the need for embryonic stem-cell research remains fierce, with multiple medical reports in the past 18 months describing ways to produce disease-treating stem cells without destroying human embryos.

Stem cells are the body's master cells, the basic building blocks from which a person's tissue and organs develop. Scientists say the cells hold promise for treating -- and perhaps curing -- diseases such as Parkinson's, diabetes and cancer.

Proponents of embryonic stem-cell research think these types of cells hold the greatest potential for medical breakthroughs because they have the ability to grow into any type of cell in the body if scientists learn how to direct their development.

But critics of embryonic stem-cell research, including President Bush, say destroying or tampering with a human embryo is immoral.

"We recoil at the idea of growing human beings for spare body parts or creating life for our own convenience," Mr. Bush has said.

The president and others favor research that involves stem cells from adults and children, which can be obtained without harming the donor. Examples include stem cells taken from bone marrow and other organs and tissue, and from placentas left over from live births.

Some stem-cell researchers and others who closely observe the field think scientists will find viable alternatives to embryonic stem cells that are not morally objectionable.

"I believe we could get the equivalent of embryonic stem cells through technological solutions that do not require the creation and destruction of embryos," said Dr. William B. Hurlbut, a consulting professor at Stanford University's Neuroscience Institute.

"Had we acknowledged this possibility early and put our energies to the task, we would probably have found an answer by now," said Dr. Hurlbut, also a member of the President's Council on Bioethics.

"An alternative is going to happen," said Dr. Markus Grompe, head of the Stem Cell Research Center at Oregon Health and Science University in Portland. He says he uses "mouse embryo stem cells all the time" in his lab work but never human embryonic stem cells because of moral concerns.

B.D. Colen, spokesman for the Harvard Stem Cell Research Institute, is disturbed by the attention being given to those with moral concerns about embryonic stem cells.

"When did we start basing science policy in this country on what are fundamentally religious beliefs?" he asked.

Finding alternatives

A White House report on stem-cell research, released Jan. 9 by the Domestic Policy Council, stated that there should be a way "to create human pluripotent cells," meaning flexible cells such as embryonic stem cells, that "can transform into many or perhaps all of the different cell types in the body in cells derived without embryos."

The report, "Advancing Stem Cell Science Without Destroying Human Life," highlighted "tremendous scientific progress of late in exploring methods of deriving pluripotent stem cells without destroying embryos."

Research developments cited by the White House and other critics of embryonic stem-cell research include:

· On Jan. 7, scientists at Wake Forest University School of Medicine reported that a type of cell found in amniotic fluid has significant versatility in terms of the type of body tissue it can become and could be used to treat a variety of diseases.

The cells, discarded by the developing fetus and retrieved easily during prenatal testing, are easier to control in the laboratory than embryonic stem cells, according to authors of the report, published online in the journal Nature Biotechnology.

· In August 2006, researchers at Advanced Cell Technology (ACT), a California-based firm, reported that they had devised a method to create human embryonic stem cells without harming embryos, They said their technique involved taking a single cell, or blastomere, from a 2-day-old embryo after the fertilized egg divided into eight cells. The researchers said the rest of the embryo could be allowed to grow into a healthy human.

But the White House report charged that the technology ACT deployed "did in fact destroy every one of the human embryos used."

DOJ_NMG_0130654

Dr. Robert Lanza, director of research and development at ACT, disagreed.

"The embryo was not harmed or destroyed and remains frozen just like the embryos at in-vitro clinics," he said.

· In March 2006, German researchers disclosed that they had isolated stem cells from the testicles of adult mice that appeared similar to embryonic stem cells. They were optimistic the same type of cells could be extracted from human testicles.

· In October 2005, Dr. Rudolf Jaenisch of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology reported he had produced stem cells with the same capabilities as traditional embryonic stem cells through a process that has come to be known as altered nuclear transfer without cloning.

The technique used in mice relies on deactivating a gene essential for formation of an embryo.

Dr. Jaenisch modified mouse DNA and inserted it into an egg whose own genetic material had been removed. After the altered DNA was inserted, cells began to divide and formed an unorganized clump of cells from which stem cells were then retrieved.

Dr. Hurlbut said the method has been recommended for further exploration in animal studies by the presidential advisory panel on bioethics on which he serves and has been endorsed by 35 religious leaders or groups

· In August 2005, British scientists announced they had found a way to derive embryoniclike stem cells in umbilical-cord blood.

'An ongoing problem'

But some of the scientists whose work was cited in the White House report complained of misrepresentation by the council, saying they were unhappy that their findings were being used to support arguments that embryonic stem-cell research is unnecessary.

"Our work directly involves the use of human embryonic stem cells," the researchers said in a letter to members of Congress. The scientists urged passage of expanded federal funding for embryonic stem-cell research, which the Bush administration opposes.

"Science works best when scientists can pursue all avenues of research," Story Landis, acting chairwoman of the National Institutes of Health's stem-cell task force, told a Senate committee last month.

"If the cure for Parkinson's disease or juvenile diabetes lay behind one of four doors, wouldn't you want the option to open all four doors at once, instead of just one door?" Miss Landis asked.

"The rhetoric for embryonic stem-cell research is more shrill today than ever, but this research is not panning out," said David Prentice, a senior fellow for life sciences at the Family Research Council, which opposes embryonic stem-cell research.

The development of tumors has been "an ongoing problem" in animal research using embryonic stem cells, according to the White House report and other researchers.

Neurologists at the University of Rochester and Cornell reported in November that brain cells derived from embryonic stem cells dramatically improved the condition of rats with severe Parkinson's-like symptoms. But they said the treatment also caused a significant problem -- the appearance of brain tumors in the rodents.

"In fact, 100 percent of the rats got tumors," said Mr. Prentice, who is familiar with the research. He added that there have been "at least a dozen" cases of animal studies using embryonic stem cells in which 25 percent to 50 percent of the animals developed tumors.

The White House report does support clinical trials using adult stem cells, which it says "have produced encouraging improvements in patients with a range of disorders and diseases, including leukemia, lymphoma, diabetes, advanced kidney cancer and several genetic blood disorders."

Mr. Prentice agrees.

"More than 3,000 patients are better today as a result of heart treatments that relied on the patients' own bone-marrow stem cells," he said.

What's more, about 6,000 patients with conditions such as leukemia and sickle cell anemia have been successfully treated with stem cells from umbilical cord blood, Mr. Prentice said.

Funding the research

In 2001, Mr. Bush announced that federal funds could be awarded for embryonic stem-cell research but using only about 70 cell lines that were in existence at the time.

Since that time, $130 million in federal funding has been used for such research, including $40 million last year alone, Dr. Hurlbut said. Nearly $3 billion in federal funds have been used for all forms of stem-cell research, according to the White House report.

Nothing in the federal policy constrains either private or state funding of embryonic stem-cell research. To date, at least six states -- California, Connecticut, Illinois, Massachusetts, New Jersey and Wisconsin -- have encouraged embryonic stem-cell research or set aside money for it.

DOJ_NMG_0130655

In November, voters in Missouri narrowly approved a constitutional amendment that prohibits state officials from banning embryonic stem-cell research. And New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, a 2008 Democratic presidential candidate, said he would ask the state legislature to approve a $10 million stem-cell research center at the University of New Mexico. The center would feature research using both embryonic and adult stem cells.

In 2004, California voters approved a ballot measure to allow that state to raise as much as $3 billion through bond sales to fund embryonic stem-cell research.

"But that $3 billion has been locked up in lawsuits" brought by opponents of embryonic stem-cell research, Dr. Hurlbut said.

Even so, he said, "preliminary grants" for the research "are being distributed," as a result of $150 million Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has provided to start the research program and another $40 million in private donations.

The White House Domestic Policy Council report says that "funding [for embryonic stem-cell research] by individual states is expected to add up to several billion dollars in the next few years."

Meanwhile, some in Congress are seeking to end the restrictions on federal funding for embryonic stem-cell research.

The House voted last month to allow federal funding for new stem-cell lines derived from fertility clinic embryos that otherwise would be discarded. The Senate is likely to pass the measure next month. However, Mr. Bush vetoed an identical bill in July and says he will veto it again.

In another development, New York-based NeoStem, a leader in adult stem-cell technology, has opened the nation's first walk-in stem-cell center. It provides patients with adult stem-cell collection and banking services for their use in future medical crises.

Congress Finds Ways To Avoid Lobbyist Limits (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 10 — The 110th Congress opened with the passage of new rules intended to curb the influence of lobbyists by prohibiting them from treating lawmakers to meals, trips, stadium box seats or the discounted use of private jets.

But it did not take long for lawmakers to find ways to keep having lobbyist-financed fun.

In just the last two months, lawmakers invited lobbyists to help pay for a catalog of outings: lavish birthday parties in a lawmaker's honor ($1,000 a lobbyist), martinis and margaritas at Washington restaurants (at least $1,000), a California wine-tasting tour (all donors welcome), hunting and fishing trips (typically $5,000), weekend golf tournaments ($2,500 and up), a Presidents' Day weekend at Disney World ($5,000), parties in South Beach in Miami ($5,000), concerts by the Who or Bob Seger ($2,500 for two seats), and even Broadway shows like "Mary Poppins" and "The Drowsy Chaperone" (also $2,500 for two).

The lobbyists and their employers typically end up paying for the events, but within the new rules.

Instead of picking up the lawmaker's tab, lobbyists pay a political fund-raising committee set up by the lawmaker. In turn, the committee pays the legislator's way.

Lobbyists and fund-raisers say such trips are becoming increasingly popular, partly as a quirky consequence of the new ethics rules.

By barring lobbyists from mingling with a lawmaker or his staff for the cost of a steak dinner, the restrictions have stirred new demand for pricier tickets to social fund-raising events.

Lobbyists say that the rules might even increase the volume of contributions flowing to Congress from K Street, where many lobbying firms have their offices.

Some lawmakers acknowledge that some fund-raising trips resemble the lobbyist-paid junkets that Congress voted to prohibit.

Jennifer Crider, a spokeswoman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said its leaders had decided to stop holding fund-raising events for lobbyists with political action committees because of the seeming inconsistency.

So the committee canceled its annual Colorado ski weekend for lobbyists and lawmakers to raise money for the next campaign. Gone, too, is its Maryland hunting trip with Representative John D. Dingell of Michigan, the avid hunter who is chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee.

But other Congressional party campaign committees have not stopped their events, including the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee's annual Nantucket weekend for donors who contribute $25,000. And individual lawmakers are still playing host to plenty of events themselves.

Senator Lindsey Graham, a South Carolina Republican who sometimes invites lobbyists to join him for fund-raising hunting trips, called such events an innocuous fact of life.

DOJ_NMG_0130656

"If you are not going to have publicly financed elections and you are getting your support from private individuals — which I believe in — I don't see any problem with having events where private individuals who give you money can talk to you," said Mr. Graham, who like the other senators quoted in this article voted for the ethics reform. He added, "Hunting is a very popular attraction in South Carolina."

Representatives John R. Kuhl Jr. of New York and Greg Walden of Oregon, both Republicans, each recently invited lobbyists to a rock concert by Bob Seger and the Silver Bullet Band. And three Republican lawmakers, Mr. Walden and Representatives Darrell Issa and Mary Bono of California, have invited lobbyists to join them next month at a Who concert in Washington.

"They're her favorite rock 'n' roll band," said Frank Cullen, Ms. Bono's chief of staff.

Among Democrats, Senator Thomas R. Carper of Delaware recently returned from his annual ski trip to the Ritz-Carlton Bachelor Gulch in Beaver Creek, Colo. Senator Max Baucus, a Montana Democrat, just got back from a skiing and snowmobiling trip to his state and has planned two golfing and fly-fishing weekends as well. Expeditions of lobbyists attend each trip. The top prices for the events are meant for lobbyists with political action committees.

Meredith McGehee, policy director of the Campaign Legal Center, which advocates for tighter campaign finance rules, said that organizing a fund-raising trip was not the same as accepting a free vacation. But she added: "At the end of the day, it is the same thing."

Representative Eric Cantor, a Virginia Republican famous on K Street for his annual fund-raising weekends in Beverly Hills and South Beach, has recently invited lobbyists to join him for some expensive cups of coffee. A $2,500 contribution from a lobbyist's political action committee entitles the company's lobbyist to join Mr. Cantor at a Starbucks near his Capitol Hill office four times this spring.

"What's next? Come help me pick up my dry cleaning?" said Massie Ritsch, spokesman for the Center for Responsive Politics, a group that tracks political fund-raising.

The excursions would be illegal under the new ethics rules if lobbyists or their employers paid for them directly. (The rules, passed by both houses in early January, have already taken effect in the House and are expected to take effect in the Senate later this spring.) And some outings involving personal entertainment or recreation for lawmakers could also run afoul of legal restrictions on the personal use of campaign money if they were paid for by a lawmaker's re-election campaign.

But they are allowed, and increasingly common, because of a combination of loopholes. First, the ethics rules restrict personal gifts but not political contributions, so paying to attend a fund-raiser is still legitimate. Second, the "personal use" restrictions apply to lawmakers' re-election campaigns but not to their personal political action committees, which can spend money on almost anything. Lawmakers use their personal PACs to sponsor most of the events. (Lawyers disagree about whether Congressional ethics rules restrict personal use of members' PACs.)

The lawmakers' so-called leadership PACs began proliferating about two decades ago, initially as vehicles for senior members of Congress to build loyalty among their colleagues by funneling money to their campaigns.

These days, however, even the newest members of Congress usually start them. Two newly elected Democratic senators, Claire McCaskill of Missouri and Jim Webb of Virginia, already have. And many use them mainly to pay for travel or miscellaneous other costs.

Over the last two years, the roughly 300 PACs controlled by lawmakers raised a total of about $156 million and used only about a third of that on federal campaign contributions, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, a group that tracks political fund-raising.

Vacationlike fund-raising events with lobbyists are not new. Former Representative Tom DeLay's trips to Puerto Rico were legendary on K Street, for example. But the new ethics rules barring lobbyists from treating lawmakers to less-expensive amusements have given new importance to such getaways.

"I have to have some personal contacts to be a lobbyist," said James Dyer, a lobbyist at the firm of Clark & Weinstock. "If the only ticket in terms of contact is these fund-raising events, it is going to be costly," Mr. Dyer said. "The fund-raising part of our lives is a very expensive tool."

Thomas Susman, a lawyer who was an editor of the American Bar Association lobbying manual, said that at a recent presentation about the new rules to the lobbyists trade group, "the biggest question was, Is this going to drive everything to the fund-raising side? Is that going to be the way to have social contact with members?"

Some members of Congress said it would not bother them if the upshot of the new rules turned out to be more contributions.

"I am not going to hide from the fact that we have to raise money," said Representative Devin Nunes, a California Republican who has invited donors to his political action committee on a wine-tasting tour in June, modeled after the movie "Sideways." "Only a moron would sell a vote for a $2,000 contribution," Mr. Nunes said.

DOJ_NMG_0130657

Fund-raising consultants for both parties said they saw a golden opportunity. “We are definitely seeing an increase in the number of events across the board,” said Dana Harris of Bellwether Consulting, a Republican firm that specializes in courting lobbyists’ political action committees. “Fund-raising events will provide a safe haven for lobbyists to talk to members.”

Among the coming events Ms. Harris’s firm helped organize: a trip this month to the Yacht and Beach Club Resort at Disney World for Senator Mel Martinez of Florida, for a $5,000 PAC contribution, and a May trip to the Robert Trent Jones Golf Club in Virginia for Senator Richard M. Burr of North Carolina, for $2,500 a head.

Some private jet companies are trying to capitalize on the rules as well. Lawmakers can no longer fly on a company’s corporate jet and then reimburse the owner at a discount. But lawmakers can still use their PACs to pay the actual cost for the use of jets, as Mr. Cantor and others have done.

Marco Larsen, vice president for publicity at Blue Star Jets, a broker that sells single flights on private planes, said his company planned to hold an event in Washington to promote its services to members of Congress. Because of concerns about appearances, Mr. Larsen said, “We wanted to stay away right after the rules were passed, but I think it is a better time now.”

Lawmakers are usually reluctant to talk about their fund-raising events. Asked in an interview in the Capitol why he was taking lobbyists on a Montana hunting trip, Mr. Baucus said only, “To show off the beauty of our state,” then retreated behind a guarded door.

Mr. Martinez, who will be spending next weekend with lobbyists at Disney World, said, “I’ve heard from many other members that they have had very successful weekend events.” He added, “People can bring their families to it and bring their children, and it’s going to be fun.”

S.D. Senator Starts Working From Hospital (LAT/AP)

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2007

WASHINGTON — Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) is reading news clippings and starting to do some office work from the hospital, almost two months after suffering a life-threatening brain hemorrhage.

"He has requested more contact with office and is looking for updates from staff," his office said in a statement.

Spokeswoman Julianne Fisher said he was starting slowly. "We do not anticipate him back [in the Senate] for several weeks," Fisher said. "We are bringing work to him rather than him coming to us. His first priority still is rehabilitation."

Johnson has been undergoing physical, occupational and speech therapy since his transfer to rehabilitation from intensive care at George Washington University Hospital last month. He recently began to read and speak in full sentences, according to doctors' statements.

Part of Johnson's therapy has been to deal with weakness on his right side.

He was rushed to the hospital and had emergency surgery Dec. 13 after becoming disoriented during a phone call with reporters. He was diagnosed with arteriovenous malformation, which makes arteries and veins grow abnormally large, become tangled and sometimes burst.

Johnson was sedated and on a ventilator for several weeks because of fluid in his lungs. He was upgraded from critical to fair condition Jan. 9.

The senator is making decisions about his care and expressing opinions on his daily activities, the hospital's chief of rehabilitation, Dr. Philip Marion, said in a statement.

"He continues to initiate more conversations and questions," Marion said. "His therapy now includes computer exercises and problem-solving activities."

Johnson's wife, Barbara, said the family was impressed with his progress: "Even though there is a long road ahead to complete recovery, we feel that we have gotten 'our Tim' back."

Questions For Dr. Andrew C. Von Eschenbach: Put To The Test (NYT)

By Deborah Solomon

The New York Times Magazine, February 11, 2007

Q: As the newly confirmed head of the F.D.A., you are presiding over an agency that is probably better known for its failures than for its achievements. For starters, the department lacked a Senate-confirmed commissioner for most of the Bush administration. I actually came here in the fall of 2005 as “acting” commissioner. I don’t know what an acting surgeon is. You go into the operating room and you take charge of what needs to get done.

You’ve just announced a program that tries to ratchet up drug safety by studying the side effects of drugs 18 months after they hit the market, presumably to avoid another calamity like the Vioxx recall. It’s not just postmarketing surveillance. It’s a whole host of things. One of the important things in this initiative is this concept of the new science of safety. We can use the tools of genomics and proteomics and apply them in ways that can be much more predictive.

In the meantime, your predecessor, Lester Crawford, who resigned without explanation, is scheduled to be sentenced on Feb. 27 for failing to disclose that he and his wife owned stocks in several F.D.A.-regulated companies. Were you surprised by that news? I am just like everyone else. It's very sad that these circumstances have occurred and that he and his family are facing this.

Did you sell any stock before you took this job? I really didn't have much of anything. All I have are my retirement holdings, and they are fully disclosed. They are mutual funds, essentially, and a 529 for my grandchildren. It's been completely vetted by teams of lawyers.

You are a former director of the National Cancer Institute. Do you think nicotine should be regulated as a drug? As cancer doctors, we have looked at the consequences of tobacco, of which nicotine is one component, but in which there are many other components.

In addition to drug safety, you oversee food safety. Might you consider a national initiative similar to the trans-fat ban conceived by

Mayor Bloomberg in New York City? Fast-food chains, of course, are the biggest trans-fat users. What I've seen is a significant effort on their part to find alternatives to trans fats.

You seem pretty laissez-faire in your approach to regulation. I wouldn't call it laissez-faire. I would call it incremental.

You were appointed by President Bush, and I hear you are a friend of his parents, whom I assume you met during your many years at the M.D. Anderson Cancer Center in Houston. They had been supporters of M.D. Anderson long before he ever became president, and when they returned to Houston, he had an ongoing relationship with M.D. Anderson. That was part of our evolving friendship, because he was on my prostate-cancer research program advisory board.

How is your own health? I'm fine. I've been through a couple of cancers. Melanoma and prostate cancer were the two serious ones, and basal cell on my nose. My health is great, and fortunately, I exemplify what we hope will be the case for everyone — early detection and adequate and appropriate therapy, and we are cancer survivors.

You're famous in the medical community for your oft-stated plan to eliminate cancer by 2015. I didn't say that! What I said was we have it within our grasp to eliminate the outcome of that disease process — to eliminate the suffering and death due to cancer — and I believe we can bring that about as early as 2015.

How do you think you're doing with that promise? Superbly well.

Some oncologists say that your plan falsely elevates the hopes of patients. Then I would ask them why they got into medicine in the first place.

OTHER NEWS:

Obama Joins Race With Goals Set High (WP)

By Dan Balz, Anne E. Kornblut

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

SPRINGFIELD, Ill., Feb. 10 -- Illinois Sen. Barack Obama formally opened his campaign for president here Saturday, invoking memories of Abraham Lincoln and challenging a new generation to help him transform the nation.

Standing on the grounds of the Old State Capitol, where Lincoln delivered his famous "House Divided" speech against slavery in 1858, the Democratic first-term senator began a bid for the White House that barely seemed possible just a few months ago but could make him the first black president. "I recognize there is a certain presumptuousness -- a certain audacity -- to this announcement," he said. "I know I haven't spent a lot of time learning the ways of Washington. But I've been there long enough to know that the ways of Washington must change."

Thousands of supporters, some of whom had driven long distances to be here, braved freezing temperatures to join Obama at an event described by many as history in the making. Long before the candidate arrived with his wife, Michelle, and two young daughters shortly after 10 a.m. Central time, the Old Capitol grounds and surrounding areas were packed to capacity.

Against the morning cold, Obama wore an overcoat and a scarf, but no hat or gloves. In his speech, he presented an ambitious agenda that includes bringing an end to the Iraq war, eliminating poverty, ensuring universal health care and creating energy independence. But he seemed to be trying to transcend traditional political debate by arguing that what the country lacks is not good ideas.

"What's stopped us from meeting these challenges is not the absence of sound policies and sensible plans," he said. "What's stopped us is the failure of leadership, the smallness of our politics -- the ease with which we're distracted by the petty and trivial, our chronic avoidance of tough decisions, our preference for scoring cheap political points instead of rolling up our sleeves and building a working consensus to tackle big problems."

DOJ_NMG_0130659

Recalling past periods of economic or political crisis, he said, "Each and every time, a new generation has risen up and done what's needed to be done. Today we are called once more -- and it is time for our generation to answer that call."

The story of Obama's rise has captivated political insiders and ordinary Americans alike. The months ahead will test whether he now can transform himself from political phenomenon into the kind of candidate who can withstand the rigors of the marathon ahead.

Obama will be asked to demonstrate that his dearth of experience is not the liability that some of his rivals suggest, and he will be challenged to fill in the blanks of a policy agenda that is longer on goals than details.

He begins as one of the principal challengers to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), the early favorite for the Democratic nomination. But he must also contend with former North Carolina senator John Edwards, whose progressive agenda and grass-roots campaign threatens to occupy some of the same space Obama aims to seize for his own candidacy. Other more experienced candidates hope to profit if he falters.

For all the enthusiasm that surrounds his candidacy, Obama still faces the reality that Clinton begins with a political machine that is far deeper and broader than his. Obama advisers said their campaign for the nomination may be more unconventional than hers.

"I think that the path to get there has to do with our ability to inspire a lot of people to get involved in this process who have not been involved, or who may have been involved once but lost heart," said David Axelrod, the campaign's chief strategist. "We have to give people a real sense of investment so that the electorate will maybe look a little different."

Obama's sharpest difference with both Clinton and Edwards is his early opposition to the Iraq war; they voted for the 2002 resolution authorizing President Bush to invade Iraq. Edwards has since apologized for his vote, and Clinton has said she would not have voted that way had she known then what she knows now.

But Obama can point to remarks he made in the fall of 2002 in which he not only called the war "dumb" but also predicted the dangers of the long occupation that followed the successful invasion. In his announcement speech, he described the war as a "tragic mistake."

"It's time to admit that no amount of American lives can resolve the political disagreement that lies at the heart of someone else's civil war," he said Saturday. "That's why I have a plan that will bring our combat troops home by March of 2008. Letting the Iraqis know that we will not be there forever is our last, best hope to pressure the Sunni and Shia to come to the table and find peace."

Beyond the setting itself, Obama invoked Lincoln throughout the speech, even to the point where the tall, thin Obama recalled a "tall, gangly, self-made Springfield lawyer" who ended slavery and led the nation though one of its darkest moments.

"He had his doubts," Obama said of Lincoln. "He had his defeats. He had his setbacks. But through his will and his words, he moved a nation and helped free a people."

But in issuing a call for a new generation to take its place at the center of public life, Obama summoned up memories of President John F. Kennedy and his 1960 campaign.

Obama, 45 and the son of a black Kenyan man and a white Kansas woman, worked as a community organizer in Chicago before graduating from Harvard Law School and returning to the city to become a civil rights lawyer. He ran for the state Senate in 1996 and served four terms there before launching what seemed a long-shot campaign for the U.S. Senate. Even before he won the seat and became the only African American in the Senate, Obama was seen as a rising star in his party because of the keynote speech he gave at the 2004 Democratic National Convention. His two best-selling books -- and his appearances on "Oprah," on ESPN's "Monday Night Football" and in the pages of People magazine -- have spread his appeal widely over the past few months, even as his name recognition across the electorate remains relatively low.

In his announcement speech Saturday and in interviews leading up to it, Obama began the process of both laying out his professional experience and arguing that experience in Washington is not a requirement for becoming president.

Critical of Bush's presidency and what he said are the nation's unmet challenges, Obama decried the cynicism that he said pervades the political process and called on those disillusioned by a culture of special interests and gridlocked politics to join him in his campaign.

"The time for that politics is over. It is through. It is time to turn the page, right here, right now," he said, and the crowd responded with chants of "Obama, Obama, Obama."

Although his campaign infrastructure is still being built -- his advisers moved into their Chicago headquarters only last week -- Obama's launch had the trappings of a campaign that has been building for months. That included a new Web site launched in conjunction with the announcement and a new campaign logo, a blue "O" that evokes a rising sun and that appeared on buttons, placards and T-shirts.

The crowd was filled with committed Obama supporters who lifted signs -- "Barack the Vote" was among the more creative -- and cheered in waves as the candidate spoke.

DOJ_NMG_0130660

From Illinois, Obama flew to Cedar Rapids, Iowa, and a town hall meeting with more than 2,000 people. Obama spent an hour fielding questions about Iraq, North Korea, the No Child Left Behind Act and the cost of college tuition.

He said he believes many Americans feel that something has been lost since the promise of the Kennedy era.

"What's been lost is that our politics feels very much like an insider's game," he said. "People feel like you've got the two parties splitting the pot, and ordinary voters are left out of the process."

Opening the session, Obama talked about the challenges facing the country and his own ambitions to be president.

"I want to win," he said, "but I don't just want to win. I want to transform this country."

Obama Invokes Lincoln For Run (WT)

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, February 11, 2007

SPRINGFIELD, Ill. -- Sen. Barack Obama officially announced his presidential candidacy yesterday before thousands of supporters eager to become part of his "new leadership" movement.

"This campaign can't only be about me. It must be about us -- it must be about what we can do together," Mr. Obama said, standing in front of the building where Abraham Lincoln served in the state General Assembly before he became president.

"I know it's a little chilly, but I'm fired up," the Illinois Democrat said as he took the podium with his wife, Michelle, and daughters Malia, 8, and Sasha, 5.

Like former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean, who sought the Democratic nomination in 2004, Mr. Obama envisions a campaign to be built from the ground up using the Internet -- a grass-roots coalition that will be controlled by voters.

"This campaign must be the occasion, the vehicle, of your hopes, and your dreams," Mr. Obama said. "It will take your time, your energy and your advice to push us forward when we're doing right, and to let us know when we're not."

In a speech that invoked the memories of both Lincoln and Martin Luther King, the junior senator from Illinois acknowledged a "certain audacity" in his selection of the historic backdrop for his announcement and said he recognizes that his campaign is as much about the voters as it is about himself.

"In my heart, I know you didn't come here just for me," Mr. Obama said, as some in the audience shouted: "Yes, we did!" Unfazed, the senator said, "You came here because you believe in what this country can be."

Mr. Obama played on the similarities between himself and Lincoln, whose work he said was the reason that Americans of every race can stand together to face the challenges of the 21st century.

Like Lincoln, Mr. Obama is viewed as a novice to national politics, having spent eight years in the Illinois state Senate and just two years in the U.S. Senate before running for president. Mr. Obama lost his first bid for Congress in 2000; Lincoln lost a Senate bid in 1858, two years before being elected president.

Mr. Obama laid out a broad vision for the country, in which he and voters will "together" tackle the tough issues of providing health care for all Americans, improving education and creating jobs that provide a living wage.

He also spoke of empowering unions, putting an end to the nation's addiction to foreign oil and maintaining a strong military to fight terrorism.

At 45, Mr. Obama is the youngest candidate among a Democratic field that is dominated by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, and he tried to use his youth to distance himself from the others in the race.

"Each and every time, a new generation has risen up and done what's needed to be done," Mr. Obama said. "Today, we are called once more -- and it is time for our generation to answer that call."

He also made clear his opposition to the Iraq war and highlighted his plan to begin bringing troops home by March 2008.

"Letting the Iraqis know that we will not be there forever is our last, best hope to pressure the Sunni and Shia to come to the table and find peace," Mr. Obama said.

David Axelrod, the campaign's media adviser, said there was no attempt to tear down or disparage other Democrats in the campaign.

"We don't have a strategy to tear people down," he said. "Our premise is, if you can give people something to aspire to, then you don't have to do that, and if it works, we will have changed politics in America."

With his announcement, Mr. Obama's campaign shifted into high gear. A once-barren exploratory committee Web site was teeming with content, including speeches dating back as far as 2002 and highlighting Mr. Obama's opposition to the war in Iraq.

Many in the audience yesterday had traveled from as far away as California and Arizona for Mr. Obama's announcement, while others drove from nearby Peoria and Decatur.

"This is really amazing. He's amazing," said Paul Jeffords, 37, a sales representative from Peoria. "He is the most dynamic, the most humble. I just feel like he's the one who can bring all of us together."

DOJ_NMG_0130661

After his announcement yesterday, Mr. Obama traveled to Cedar Rapids, Iowa, where he addressed voters in a packed high school gym. The senator will travel to New Hampshire tomorrow before returning to Washington.

Obama Launches Campaign With Emphasis On Grassroots (HILL)

By Klaus Marre

The Hill, February 10, 2007

Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) officially announced his candidacy for the White House Saturday, saying he wants to lead a new generation of Americans in tackling the country's challenges.

"Each and every time, a new generation has risen up and has done what needed to be done," when America has faced challenges in the past, Obama said in an appeal to younger voters.

Speaking from outside of the Old State Capitol in Springfield, Ill., and joined by his family, Obama addressed hundreds of bundled up supporters, who cheered on the candidate despite having to stand outside in temperatures just above 10 degrees.

"You didn't just come here for me," Obama said. "You came here because you believed in what this country can be. In the face of war, you believe there can be peace. In the face of despair, you believe there can be hope."

This campaign "must be about us," he told a cheering crowd. "It will take your time, your energy and your advice..." The candidate cited the example of Abraham Lincoln, who Obama said showed the country that it is possible to make a change.

Obama hopes to launch a broad grassroots campaign that can propel him past Democratic frontrunner Sen. Hillary Clinton (N.Y.).

Across the street from the historic building, from which Lincoln had delivered one of his most famous speeches, the campaign had placed a gigantic U.S. flag.

Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) announced Obama, telling the crow that it had gathered in "a place filled with memories" and praising Obama as a man who had inspired America and reminded people that "anything is possible" in this country.

"Here, many years ago, another son of Illinois began his journey to Washington," he told the crowd. "Today another son of Illinois will take his first step on his journey to Washington."

Following the announcement, Obama planned to travel to Iowa later on Saturday. He intends to visit New Hampshire Monday to participate in a town hall meeting.

While Obama is seen as the rising star in the Democratic Party, he faces an uphill battle for the nomination, as Clinton has been leading in the polls and is viewed as the candidate with the greatest fundraising potential.

"I recognize that there is a certain presumptuousness in this [announcement], a certain audacity" because he had not spend a lot of time in Washington, Obama said in a reference to more experienced rivals. "I have been there long enough to know that the ways in Washington must change."

Aware that Clinton's network of large donors is extensive, Obama is asking supporters to contribute in small ways.

"[My] website is going to be set up so that you can build your own profile, form your own groups, plan your own events, take campaign fundraising into your own hands, so that we can collect small donations instead of having to rely on large campaign contributions," he said Friday, adding that his quest for the presidency is "a great journey."

"I know I can't do it by myself. Ultimately, this has to be a vehicle for your hopes and your dreams," Obama said in a message to his supporters.

It's Official: Obama Is Running For President (LAT)

By Mark Z. Barabak

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2007

— Sen. Barack Obama formally launched his bid for president Saturday, his eyes on history and feet rooted in the frigid Midwest as he pledged a new generation of leadership to end the war in Iraq and banish "the smallness of our politics."

In a speech that recalled his soaring remarks to the 2004 Democratic National Convention — the speech that launched his political rocket flight — Obama sought to set himself apart from the large Democratic field of White House hopefuls, and from the Washington establishment he joined two years ago as a senator representing Illinois.

He cited a familiar litany of woes: poverty, underperforming schools, soaring healthcare costs, hard-pressed wage earners, reliance on foreign oil, and the Iraq war. But the larger problem, he suggested, was a rancid political system that perpetuated those ills instead of solving them.

"What's stopped us is the failure of leadership, the smallness of our politics, the ease with which we're distracted by the petty and trivial, our chronic avoidance of tough decisions, our preference for scoring cheap political points," Obama said.

"The time for that kind of politics is over," he added. "It's time to turn the page."

DOJ_NMG_0130662

More than 15,000 people showed up for Obama's announcement, police said. The crowd formed a small sea of covered heads — temperatures were in the low teens — at the base of the old state Capitol, where Abraham Lincoln served, orated and, finally, lay in state.

The 45-year-old senator's announcement — his breath visible in the cold — marked a fully committed candidacy that, if successful, would make him the nation's first black president.

Obama is generally regarded as one of the top three Democratic White House hopefuls — behind Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, ahead of former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina. But Obama is also among the least experienced of the more than a dozen candidates running on both sides, a political phenom whose success to date grows more out of style than accomplishment.

Conceding "a certain presumptuousness, a certain audacity" in his announcement, Obama suggested that the brevity of his stint in Washington should not be viewed as a demerit. "I've been there long enough to know that the ways of Washington must change," he said, offering his seven years as a state senator in Springfield as an exemplar of the politics he wished to practice.

"We learned to disagree without being disagreeable," he said, "that so long as we're willing to listen to each other, we can assume the best in people instead of the worst."

Addressing the war in Iraq, Obama offered one of the few policy specifics of his 20-minute speech, drawing an approving roar from the crowd. "It's time to admit that no amount of American lives can resolve the political disagreement that lies at the heart of someone else's civil war," he said, calling for U.S. combat troops to leave by March 2008.

He also drew a contrast with Edwards and Clinton, who both voted in 2002 to authorize the invasion of Iraq. Edwards has apologized for his vote; Clinton, campaigning Saturday in New Hampshire, reiterated that she would not have voted the same way knowing what she does today, but refused to say she was wrong.

Obama was blunt: "I opposed this war from the start. I thought it was a tragic mistake."

The site he chose for his announcement was steeped in symbolism. Lincoln not only served as a state representative in the old Capitol, but in 1858 delivered his famous antislavery speech that quoted from the Bible, "A house divided against itself cannot stand."

Obama invoked that speech in declaring his candidacy and returned to Lincoln and his legacy throughout his own speech — referring at one point to the inspirational "life of a tall, gangly, self-made Springfield lawyer" who showed the power of words and conviction to overcome political division. The description, plainly made to invite comparison, drew appreciative laughs from the crowd.

At another point, Obama echoed the words of a more recent president, John F. Kennedy, who also sought the White House as a relatively young man with a short political resume. Citing a succession of generations that achieved great things — settling the West, ending slavery, overcoming the Great Depression, sending a man to the moon — Obama said, "Today we are called once more — and it is time for our generation to answer that call."

Obama, the son of a black father from Kenya and a white mother from Kansas, made no mention of his upbringing, which was mainly in Hawaii. He spoke only briefly of his time as a community activist in Chicago before launching his political career a decade ago. He also made little mention of President Bush or his policies, beyond a paragraph condemning the last six years and Bush's penchant, as Obama described it, to distract people from the administration's failures and "blame the other party, or gay people, or immigrants."

The largely uplifting tone contributed to a feeling that, whatever the outcome in 2008, Obama's announcement deserved a place in history.

Foster Ware III drove about an hour from Bloomington, Ill., to attend Obama's speech with his wife, their three small children and a family friend. He doubted any of the youngsters would remember the occasion, Ware said, but as an African American he wanted to tell them someday that they had been at the event and to urge them "to always dream and never let anyone kill that dream."

"I hate hearing, 'Is the country ready for a black president?' " said Ware, a 31-year-old pharmaceutical salesman. "If not now, when? If not him, who? I think it's a perfect opportunity for the country to rally behind Obama."

From Illinois, the freshly declared candidate traveled next door to Iowa, which opens the presidential nominating process with its precinct caucuses scheduled for January.

In a Cedar Rapids gymnasium, he faced another enthusiastic crowd (which applauded him at one point for removing his suit jacket). He offered a condensed version of his Illinois announcement speech and fielded a handful of questions.

One of them — how does he deal with so much adulation? — brought a smile and a quip. "I hope all the questions are like that," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0130663

Turning serious, Obama acknowledged he was new to practicing politics at the presidential level and conceded, "We don't know how I will deal, my family will deal with the rigors of this campaign. Part of the reason to do town hall meetings like this one is for people to lift the hood and kick the tires and see what this guy is actually about."

Obama Formally Enters Presidential Race (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney, Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

SPRINGFIELD, Ill., Feb. 10 — Senator Barack Obama of Illinois, standing before the Old State Capitol where Abraham Lincoln began his political career, announced his candidacy for the White House on Saturday by presenting himself as an agent of generational change who could transform a government hobbled by cynicism, petty corruption and "a smallness of our politics."

"The time for that politics is over," Mr. Obama said. "It is through. It's time to turn the page."

Wearing an overcoat but gloveless on a frigid morning, Mr. Obama invoked a speech Lincoln gave here in 1858 condemning slavery — "a house divided against itself cannot stand" — as he started his campaign to become the nation's first black president.

Speaking smoothly and comfortably, Mr. Obama offered a generational call to arms, portraying his campaign less as a candidacy and more as a movement. "Each and every time, a new generation has risen up and done what's needed to be done," he said. "Today we are called once more, and it is time for our generation to answer that call."

It was the latest step in a journey rich with historic possibilities and symbolism. Thousands of people packed the town square to witness it, shivering in the single-digit frostiness until Mr. Obama appeared, trailed by his wife, Michelle, and two young daughters. ("I wasn't too cold," Mr. Obama said later, grinning as he acknowledged a heating device had been positioned at his feet, out of the audience's view.)

Still, for all the excitement on display, Mr. Obama's speech also marked the start of a tough new phase in what until now has been a charmed introduction to national politics. Democrats and Mr. Obama's aides said they were girding for questions about his experience in national politics, his command of policy, a past that has gone largely unexamined by rivals and the news media, and a public persona defined more by his biography and charisma than by how he would seek to use the powers of the presidency.

"He's done impressively so far, but at some point he's really going to have to move to the next stage," said Walter Mondale, the former Democratic vice president who made the phrase "where's the beef" famous in his 1984 challenge to the credentials of a rival, Gary Hart, the former senator from Colorado.

The formal entry to the race framed a challenge that would seem daunting to even the most talented politician: whether Mr. Obama, with all his strengths and limitations, can win in a field dominated by Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, who brings years of experience in presidential politics, a command of policy and political history, and an extraordinarily battle-tested network of fund-raisers and advisers.

Mr. Obama has told friends that he views Mrs. Clinton as his biggest obstacle, though his aides said they remained very wary as well of former Senator John Edwards, another rival for the Democratic nomination.

Video More Video »

Mr. Obama hit the question of experience in the opening bars of his speech on Saturday, suggesting that he would seek to use his limited time in government as an asset by casting himself as an agent of change who was free from the pull of special interests and politics as usual.

"I recognize there is a certain presumptuousness in this — a certain audacity — to this announcement," he said. "I know that I haven't spent a lot of time learning the ways of Washington. But I've been there long enough to know that the ways of Washington must change."

For Mr. Obama's campaign, struggling to put this unlikely organization together in just three months, the first focus is Mrs. Clinton. Mr. Obama's aides said they had spent weeks discussing how to derail what David Plouffe, Mr. Obama's campaign manager, described as "the dominant political organization in the Democratic Party."

Mr. Obama's decision to spend the first two days of his presidential campaign in Iowa, where he headed after his announcement, reflected one of the first important strategic decisions in that regard. His organization sees Iowa as a place where he could surprise Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Edwards with an early victory. The eastern part of the state, a critical region for Democrats to win and where Mr. Obama spent the rest of Saturday, shares a media market with neighboring Illinois. Mr. Obama has been a fixture in local news since winning his Senate primary nearly three years ago.

In trying to undercut Mrs. Clinton's claims of experience, Mr. Obama's campaign has decided to borrow techniques that Bill Clinton used to defeat the first President Bush in 1992. Mr. Obama, reprising the role of Mr. Clinton, on Saturday presented himself as a candidate of generational change running to oust entrenched symbols of Washington, an allusion to Mrs. Clinton, as he tried to turn her experience into a burden. Mr. Obama is 45; Mrs. Clinton is 59.

DOJ_NMG_0130664

But more than anything, Mr. Obama's aides said, they believe the biggest advantage he has over Mrs. Clinton is his difference in position on the Iraq war. Mrs. Clinton supported the war authorization four years ago. Mr. Obama has opposed the war from the start, and has introduced a bill to begin withdrawing United States troops no later than May 1, with the goal of removing all combat brigades by March 31, 2008, taking a far more explicit stance than Mrs. Clinton on ending the conflict.

"America, it's time to start bringing our troops home," he said Saturday. "It's time to admit that no amount of American lives can resolve the political disagreement that lies at the heart of someone else's civil war."

Yet even on a day that pointed to Mr. Obama's strengths — a big, excited crowd, a speech that in its composition and delivery demonstrated yet again why he is viewed as a singular talent in the Democratic Party — it seems evident that Mr. Obama's easier days as a candidate have passed. Unlike Mrs. Clinton, or to a lesser extent Mr. Edwards, Mr. Obama has not gone through a full-scale audit that will now come from Republicans, Democrats, journalists and advocacy groups, eager to define him before he defines himself.

Some Democrats, including Mr. Obama's opponents, seem increasingly game to challenge him, particularly when it comes to the substance of an Obama candidacy. Mr. Edwards offered a hint of what Mr. Obama faced in an interview the other day, as he discussed national health care, when he was asked his reaction to Mr. Obama's views on providing national coverage.

"I haven't seen a plan from him," Mr. Edwards said. "Have you all?"

Mr. Obama has glided to his position in his party with a demeanor and series of eloquent speeches that have won him comparisons to the Kennedy brothers and put him in a position where his status as a black man with a chance to win the White House is only part of the excitement generated by his candidacy.

But with perhaps one major exception, his plan to disengage forces in Iraq, he has avoided offering the kind of specific ideas that his own advisers acknowledge could open him up to attack by opponents or alienate supporters initially drawn by his more thematic appeals.

Mr. Obama went so far as to tell Democrats in Washington last week that voters were looking for a message of hope, and disparaged the notion that a presidential campaign should be built on a foundation of position papers or details.

"There are those who don't believe in talking about hope: they say, well, we want specifics, we want details, we want white papers, we want plans," he said then. "We've had a lot of plans, Democrats. What we've had is a shortage of hope."

But some Democrats were scornful. "That's nonsense," Mr. Hart said. "It posits that it's either-or. Who's saying you can't talk about hope? I'm not talking about white papers: I'm talking about one big speech about 'How I view the world.' "

In an interview before he left for Illinois, Mr. Obama said he realized his powerful appeal as a campaigner would take him only so far. Other campaigns that have relied extensively on the life story of the candidate have typically foundered.

"If a campaign is premised on personality, then no, I don't think you can stay fresh for a year," he said. "But if the campaign is built from the ground up and there is a sense of ownership among people who want to see significant change, then absolutely. It can build and grow."

And in his speech here on Saturday, Mr. Obama, trying to offer himself as the grass-roots outsider in contrast to a member of a political family that has dominated Washington life for 15 years, presented his campaign as an effort "not just to hold an office, but to gather with you to transform a nation."

"That is why this campaign can't only be about me," Mr. Obama said. "It must be about us. It must be about what we can do together."

The Audacity Of Barack Obama (POL)

By Roger Simon

The Politico, February 10, 2007

SPRINGFIELD, Ill. - - The very audacity of it, the very unlikelihood of a black man becoming president of the United States is now the driving force of Barack Obama's campaign.

In an announcement speech Saturday of soaring rhetoric, on a bitterly cold day, to a large and shivering crowd, Barack Obama called what he was doing an "improbable quest."

"If you will join me in this improbable quest, if you feel destiny calling, and see as I see, a future of endless possibility stretching before us; if you sense, as I sense, that the time is now to shake off our slumber, and slough off our fear, and make good on the debt we owe past and future generations, then I'm ready to take up the cause, and march with you, and work with you," he said.

"Together, starting today, let us finish the work that needs to be done, and usher in a new birth of freedom on this Earth."

DOJ_NMG_0130665

Which is pretty audacious talk. But it was also pretty audacious to announce in Springfield, home of Abraham Lincoln, and in the shadow of the Old State Capitol, where Lincoln gave his "House Divided" speech in opposition to slavery.

Obama addressed it directly, again stressing the difficulty of what he was attempting:

"For that is our unyielding faith -- that in the face of impossible odds, people who love their country can change it. That's what Abraham Lincoln understood," Obama said.

And what will it take for Obama actually to be elected?

Decency, he said. The decency that is America.

"It was here, in Springfield, where North, South, East and West come together that I was reminded of the essential decency of the American people, where I came to believe that through this decency, we can build a more hopeful America," he said. "And that is why, in the shadow of the Old State Capitol, where Lincoln once called on a divided house to stand together, where common hopes and common dreams still, I stand before you today to announce my candidacy for president of the United States."

Announcement speeches are designed not just to generate support, not just to allow the candidate to slap himself on the back with both hands but also to address critics.

Think Obama has not had enough national experience? Try this:

"I recognize there is a certain presumptuousness -- a certain audacity -- to this announcement," Obama said. "I know I haven't spent a lot of time learning the ways of Washington. But I've been there long enough to know that the ways of Washington must change."

Take that, Hillary Clinton! Take that, John Edwards! And Chris Dodd! And Joe Biden!

And to those who are spreading rumors that because his middle name is Hussein he is a Muslim, Obama carefully pointed out that when working in the poor neighborhoods of Chicago, "I learned the true meaning of my Christian faith."

The press came in for its comeuppance, too. Obama criticized "the smallness of our politics -- the ease with which we're distracted by the petty and trivial."

In his interview with me on Wednesday, Obama said the media's obsession with the trivial is one of his problems. People say he does not give specifics? he said. That is because the press does not concentrate on his specifics.

"We've given major speeches on just about every issue," he said. "So the key for us, I think, is just making sure that we are getting the press to focus attention on that agenda as opposed to, you know, obsessing on how I look in my swimming trunks."

There was no danger on anybody concentrating on swimming trunks Saturday. It was far too cold.

Frigid Weather Tests Crowd's Fortitude (WP)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

SPRINGFIELD, Ill., Feb. 10 -- Raising questions about his judgment and risking the ire of the national press corps, Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) held fast on his first major campaign decision: to conduct his announcement speech in the frigid outdoors here on Saturday.

And so, as much as it was a political story, the Obama event became a weather story.

"I guess the Arctic Circle wasn't available this morning," said Chris Matthews, quivering during his live interview on NBC's "Weekend Today" as he ruefully noted that anchor Campbell Brown was usually the one outside doing cold-weather reporting.

Even by the standards of the wintry spells in New Hampshire and Iowa that political reporters and candidates ritually confront, it was a brutal morning in the Illinois capital -- sunny but subfreezing, especially in the shady corners where hundreds of supporters had to stand. Medical teams were on hand in case anyone collapsed. A local television station ran a report on preventing hypothermia, aimed at people planning to attend the Obama event.

Why not, some asked, just move the speech indoors?

Campaign officials pointed out that the backdrop of the old Illinois statehouse, where Abraham Lincoln gave his famous "House Divided" speech, was too symbolic and picturesque to be skipped, even on a morning when the temperature was 7 degrees. There were also suggestions that a pampered press corps might be more fragile than the candidate, who emerged in a simple suit and an overcoat, without head covering of any kind.

By contrast, columnist Joe Klein of Time magazine wore a large, fuzzy hat made of rabbit fur, procured in Amsterdam. A member of one of the camera crews -- which began assembling at 5 a.m. -- wore a full-body ski suit.

Though a trifling matter, the insistence on staying outside raised questions about the Obama message. Was he trying to prove his mettle? Distancing himself from his upbringing in Hawaii -- where he was recently photographed in his bathing suit? Subtly appealing to flinty Northerners who pride themselves on enduring the cold?

Obama dropped few clues, though he did acknowledge the temperature.

DOJ_NMG_0130666

"I know it's a little chilly," he said as he walked onstage with his wife and two daughters (both covered, unlike their father, in hats).

"No, it's cold!" someone shouted from the crowd.

The weather did not stop more than a dozen people in wheelchairs, some elderly, from taking up positions in the front row. Tara Davlin, 29, hobbled through the site on crutches after recent hip surgery (though, as the daughter of Springfield Mayor Timothy J. Davlin, she might have had more obligation to attend than most). "I wouldn't have missed it for the world," she said.

Nonchalance -- about the climate, not the candidate -- abounded. "If we can survive the cold to go sledding, we can survive the cold to see history," said Shanna Shipman, 27, who bundled up her daughters -- Hope, 4, and Kai, 18 months -- in layers to see the speech.

"We're hearty Midwesterners," beamed Dan Hankiewicz of Springfield. "A little weather never stopped us."

Obama: I'm Running For President (CHIT)

By Christi Parsons

Chicago Tribune, February 11, 2007

SPRINGFIELD—Sen. Barack Obama officially entered the race for president Saturday in the Illinois capital, urging Americans who hear "destiny calling" to join him in "the unfinished business of perfecting our union," then headed out to start campaigning in earnest in the battleground state of Iowa.

Against the backdrop of the Old State Capitol where Abraham Lincoln once served in the state legislature, the Illinois Democrat launched his campaign surrounded by thousands of supporters who traveled from around the state and country and braved freezing temperatures to witness an event many of them described in historic terms.

Sounding themes of hope and common purpose, Obama invoked the memory of Lincoln in calling for an end to the cynicism he says cleaves the nation, so that a united America can confront its problems at home and abroad.

"People who love their country can change it," said Obama, entering the race as the first African American candidate considered a leading contender for a major party nomination. "That's what Abraham Lincoln understood. He had his doubts. He had his defeats . . . But through his will and his words, he moved a nation and helped free a people."

But as Obama departed immediately for Iowa, the raucous crowd and frenzied applause of the morning quickly gave way to to difficult questions. Voters at a town hall meeting quizzed Obama about everything from the Iraq war and North Korea to education funding and race relations.

A seasoned electorate known for its careful vetting of candidates in the early presidential caucuses, voters in Cedar Rapids responded warmly but with much more restraint.

"A small percentage of people here are supporting Barack Obama," said Steve Sovern, a former state senator and local Democrat who moderated the meeting at the Kennedy High School gymnasium. "Voters here take the caucus seriously and they measure candidates carefully. They'll be back to hear Obama and other candidates many times before they make up their minds."

It was a dose of reality Obama said he was expecting would come as soon as he announced his candidacy. The competition for the Democratic nomination is heating up more each day, with Sen. Hillary Clinton of New York raising the bar for campaign fundraising and a host of candidates crowding into the field.

Voters will want to "check under the hood and kick the tires" now, Obama said Saturday afternoon.

"The novelty's going to wear off," Obama said. "People are going to be (thinking), 'Aw, it's Obama, he's coming through town again' . . . People are going to be able to ask me some questions you couldn't ask me this time out."

The heavy presence of security around Obama was also a silent reminder of the change that took place with the announcement. Michelle Obama, the candidate's wife, acknowledged it in an interview to air on CBS's "60 Minutes," in which she was asked if she fears for her husband's life as a black candidate.

"I don't lose sleep over it because the realities are that … as a black man … Barack can get shot going to the gas station," observed Michelle Obama in the interview, set to air Sunday night. "You can't make decisions based on fear and the possibility of what might happen."

In Springfield, a crowd police estimated at 15,000 or more began to gather in the early morning around the stage erected on the lawn of the old Capitol. Supporters crowded inside the fence around the building and spilled out onto surrounding streets, clutching hand-made signs and cups of coffee to brave a single-digit wind chill factor.

Obama took the stage with his wife and two young daughters, as strains of the U2 song "City of Blinding Lights" blared over loud speakers. Sharpshooters watched from the tops of several buildings overhead while Obama sounded a theme now familiar in its condemnation of political cynicism and its gauzy description of a better America.

DOJ_NMG_0130667

Though acknowledging what he called the "presumptuousness" of running for office after only two years in the Senate, Obama spun his lack of experience in national politics as a good thing.

"I've been there long enough to know that the ways of Washington must change," he said. He extolled the benefits of his history as a community organizer in Chicago, a state lawmaker and civil rights lawyer, and called for quick action to end the Iraq war and bring home American troops, as well as to provide quality health care for all and to end America's dependence on foreign oil.

Repeatedly, Obama invoked the memory of Lincoln, who delivered his famous "House Divided" speech in the building that served as his backdrop.

"It was here, in Springfield, where North, South, East and West come together, that I was reminded of the essential decency of the American people," Obama said, referring to his time in the state legislature that now meets a few blocks away in the new state Capitol. "That is why, in the shadow of the Old State Capitol, where Lincoln once called on a divided house to stand together, where common hopes and common dreams still live, I stand before you today to announce my candidacy for president of the United States."

Listeners in one corner of the crowd had a hard time hearing Obama because of the loud chants of protesters objecting to Obama's support for abortion rights. Obama spoke in an even tone and didn't appear deterred by them, though their presence was a not-so-subtle reminder that his future as a presidential candidate won't be as easy as the months leading up to it.

Republicans also injected a bit of skepticism to counter the months of celebrity that Obama has enjoyed since his 2004 address at the Democratic National Convention.

"His speech could have been given by any candidate, Republican or Democrat," Illinois GOP party chairman Andy McKenna said of the morning announcement. "He's very popular, but will he embrace some ideas that distinguish him? It remains to be seen."

The vast majority of the crowd received Obama warmly, chanting his name and cheering wildly at applause lines throughout his speech.

"The support is amazing," said Janet Williams of East St. Louis, noting the marked racial diversity of the crowd. "People seem ready to come together around him."

Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.), who traveled with Obama for the day, said he noticed the same thing about the crowd, assembled partially by invitation but also by word of mouth and caravans apparently organized by individuals not associated with the campaign.

"When you can turn out 15 or 20,000 people in 7 degrees, it's an indication of the excitement they feel about him," said Durbin. "They're from all over the United States, with a lot of young people. That's going to be Barack's strong suit. He really represents a generation of change."

Obama, who arrived in Springfield a decade ago as an obscure freshman lawmaker, left town Saturday afternoon with a police escort and an entourage of a dozen vehicles. As he made his way toward the airport, and the fight of his life, Springfield residents came out into their front yards and porches to wave goodbye.

"The country is ready for change, and I feel he is the one to bring it," said Juanita Johnson, also of East St. Louis. "I feel like this is a historic moment."

Obama Urges Iowans To Join Him Against Cynicism (DMR)

Des Moines Register, February 11, 2007

On a day that Iowans said felt historic, Barack Obama asked them to join him on his “improbable quest” for the presidency, stressing that when ordinary citizens join together, they can accomplish extraordinary things.

“I want to win,” Obama, 45, told the crowd of about 2,500 people at John F. Kennedy High School in Cedar Rapids, the second stop on his announcement tour. “But I don’t just want to win. I want to transform this country, and the only way I’m going to do it is if you make this a vehicle for your hopes and dreams.”

If elected, Obama, a Democrat, would become the United States’ first black president.

“This is so historic,” said Harriette Cooper, a full-time volunteer who lives Cedar Rapids. “It’s not just because he’s black. The things he says are so believable.”

With his wife, Michelle, and daughters Malia, 8, and Sasha, 5, and a substantial pack of reporters, Obama arrived in a chartered airplane from Illinois, a state he represents in the U.S. Senate. Earlier Saturday, he made his presidential bid official in a speech outside the Old Capitol in Springfield, evoking images of Abraham Lincoln, the president who abolished slavery and united “a house divided.”

Most national polls show that among Democrats, Obama’s popularity is second only to Hillary Clinton, the senator from New York.

DOJ_NMG_0130668

Those at the rally in Cedar Rapids said they've heard that Obama is being called a fresh face, a rock star, a political rocket who has that mysterious political "X-factor" that makes him a charismatic candidate.

They acknowledged Obama is new and wildly popular, but said Iowans have sensitive antenna, and many aren't making up their minds yet. After all, they flirted with Howard Dean during the last caucus season but dumped him for battle-tested John Kerry.

"I don't want the screaming," said Rosemarie Conner, a factory worker from Oxford who said it wasn't Obama's star power that drew her to the rally, but his thoughtfulness. "He seems so soft-spoken."

Iowans want Obama's plan for Iraq

"I don't want the screaming," said Rosemarie Conner, a factory worker from Oxford who said it wasn't Obama's star power that drew her to the rally, but his thoughtfulness. "He seems so soft-spoken."

Conner said she wanted to hear Obama's thoughts on basic issues such as health care and Iraq.

After shedding his suit jacket, Obama sat on a stool for a relaxed question-and-answer session, that touched on improving education, enlarging federal grants for college students, raising teacher pay, insuring those who have no health care, lowering health care costs for all Americans, ending poverty, dealing with global warming, and ending the country's dependence on foreign oil through the development of alternative fuels.

But, he said, those goals can't be achieved without an end to the "ill-conceived war in Iraq."

Obama has been unapologetically critical of the war from the start, a sharp contrast with Clinton, the Democratic forerunner, who voted in favor of the war resolution in 2002. Although Obama wasn't in U.S. Congress at that time, he spoke out about it while in the Illinois state legislature.

His plan is to bring combat troops home by March 2008, he said.

That impressed Adam Hoffman, 18, of Cedar Rapids, who said he trusts Obama to make good on that plan.

Obama urges voters to combat cynicism

Several Iowans at the event pointed out Obama is light on national political experience, with only two slim years in Washington. He spent seven years as a state senator in Illinois, representing a predominantly black community in southern Chicago. He led a failed bid for Congress in 2002, then won his U.S. Senate seat essentially unopposed.

None of the other top tier candidates, including New Mexico's governor Bill Richardson, who wants to become the first Hispanic president, Clinton, who is vying to become the first female president, and former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack, have lost a race, and most have beaten long odds.

Yet Obama said if someone asked who his most important rival is in this campaign, "I would say it's cynicism."

That was greeted with loud applause from the overflow crowd, some of whom clutched copies of Obama's "Dreams of My Father" and "The Audacity of Hope," both best-selling autobiographies.

"Making change in this country," Obama said, "is going to depend on your decision that the issues that we face now are so important, that the prospect of climate change is so urgent, that the need to free ourselves from foreign oil is so critical, that improving our school systems has to happen now and not later, that there's no reason we can't have health insurance for all Americans by the end of the next presidency. If you feel that same sense of urgency, then don't just wait for me to get it all done. I'm not going to be able to do this on my own."

He promises to meet Iowans in small groups

Some Iowans at the rally, including Jim McNeill, 46, owner of a Cedar Rapids floral supply company, said they'd never heard of Obama until the Illinois man's widely-heralded speech at the 2004 Democratic National Convention.

Figuring that was the case for other Iowans, Obama took time Saturday to tell some of his personal story. The product of a black father from Kenya and a white mother from Kansas, he grew up in Hawaii, where there's a strong Asian influence, he said. He is a Harvard Law School graduate, and is currently the sole African-American now holding office in the U.S. Senate.

When the crowd groaned when it was announced Obama's time was up, he promised many future visits — this was his fourth trip to Iowa as a senator — including some small group get-togethers.

"Let's face it, the novelty's going to wear off and you're going to be, 'Oh, it's Obama again. He's coming through town. Ballgame's on, I've got other things to do'."

Obama is scheduled to head to Iowa Falls this morning, then Ames, then Chicago.

The 2008 presidential election will be held on Nov. 4, 2008. The Iowa caucuses are tentatively scheduled for Monday, Jan. 14.

Obama Announces Presidential Bid In Illinois (AP)

AP, February 10, 2007

SPRINGFIELD, Ill. — U.S. Sen. Barack Obama embarked today on what he called "a great journey."

His announcement here at the Old State Capitol that he is running for president is the start of a long weekend for the Chicago Democrat, who will travel to Iowa and Chicago before wrapping up Monday in New Hampshire.

"It was here, in Springfield, where north, south, east and west come together that I was reminded of the essential decency of the American people — where I came to believe that through this decency, we can build a more hopeful America," said Obama, who served eight years in the state Senate. "And that is why, in the shadow of the Old State Capitol, where Lincoln once called on a house divided to stand together, where common hopes and common dreams still live, I stand before you today to announce my candidacy for President of the United States of America."

The square in front of the Old State Capitol was crammed with screaming spectators, many holding blue and white Obama signs. They interrupted his speech throughout, chanting, "O-bam-a!"

"Look at all of you," Obama said as he began speaking. "Goodness."

While the building where Obama delivered his speech has deep ties to Abraham Lincoln, the scene around it bustled with the signs of a modern-day presidential campaign.

Satellite trucks lined the street, TV crews were there and cables snaked along a sidewalk where there is a statue of Lincoln.

It was excitement that Bethany and Tim Scates of Ridgway couldn't resist.

The married couple drove almost four hours from their home in southern Illinois to witness Obama's announcement.

"This is a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity for us," said Bethany Scates, who was bundled against the frigid weather along with thousands of others filing into the square on Saturday.

People sported homemade campaign buttons, including some from Dan Richards of Springfield, who made about 3,000 badges for the occasion. His asking price for the "Obama for President" buttons was $3 each or two for $5.

Tucker Copi, 17, is not old enough to vote yet, but went to the speech because he thinks Obama is "young and fresh."

"It's good that he doesn't have too much baggage in office. He's young, a great speaker and the right guy for the job," Copi said.

Obama's decision to make his presidential announcement in Illinois' capital city — instead of another location like Chicago, where he lives, or in Washington — earned him accolades.

It also continued to feed the comparisons between Obama and Lincoln, the nation's 16th president. Lincoln served eight years in the Illinois legislature and two years in Congress.

"It's going to be the greatest thing in Illinois since Abraham Lincoln ran for president," said state Senate President Emil Jones, a Chicago Democrat.

While Helen Bailie of Petersburg didn't plan to be at Obama's announcement, the self-described Republican with some Democrat views still is glad he's making the announcement in central Illinois, especially if Chicago was the other choice.

"Chicago is not Illinois," Bailie said.

The big city, she said, is just different from the rest of the state, which is made up of smaller locales. She sees Obama's choice to come to Springfield as a nod to that.

"He's being respectful about it," she said.

But Obama isn't forgetting about the country's third largest city and the money it can pump into a presidential campaign.

He has a rally planned for Sunday at the University of Illinois at Chicago and a fundraiser later that night at a downtown hotel.

Springfield resident Mack Alexander said he's glad about the attention Obama's announcement is bringing to his town.

"It'll put us on the map," Alexander said. "Some people say 'Springfield, where's Springfield?'"

Obama Declares He's Running For President (CNN)

CNN.com, February 10, 2007

SPRINGFIELD, Illinois (CNN) -- Sen. Barack Obama stood before a cheering crowd in his home state Saturday and announced he will seek the 2008 Democratic nomination for president.

Invoking the memory of fellow Illinoisan and the 16th president of the United States, Abraham Lincoln, the first-term senator addressed thousands packed into the Springfield, Illinois, town square on a chilly day in America's heartland.

To chants of "Obama! Obama!," he told the crowd: "It was here, in Springfield, where North, South, East and West come together that I was reminded of the essential decency of the American people -- where I came to believe that through this decency, we can build a more hopeful America." (Watch as the crowd erupts when Obama officially declares his candidacy)

If the 45-year-old Obama were elected, he would become the nation's first African-American president.

DOJ_NMG_0130670

"And that is why, in the shadow of the Old State Capitol, where Lincoln once called on a divided house to stand together, where common hopes and common dreams still live, I stand before you today to announce my candidacy for president of the United States of America."

Obama told the crowd he would tackle problems like poor schools, economic hardships and oil dependence, saying a "failure of leadership" is to blame for not meeting the nation's challenges. He also implored the crowd to demand that there be "universal health care in America by the end of the president's first term."

He called the Iraq war a "tragic mistake" and said, "It's time to admit that no amount of American lives can resolve the political disagreement that lies at the heart of someone else's civil war. That's why I have a plan that will bring our combat troops home by March of 2008.

"Letting the Iraqis know that we will not be there forever is our last, best hope to pressure the Sunni and Shia to come to the table and find peace," he said. (Watch the senator lay out his plan for Iraq)

He also lauded what he called the founding fathers' "genius" in creating a system of government that can be changed. He cited examples throughout history -- from the American Revolution to the Civil War to the Great Depression -- in which Americans have demanded, and effected, change.

"We've done this before. Each and every time, a new generation has risen up and done what's needed to be done. Today we are called once more, and it is time for our generation to answer that call," he said.

The absence of sound policy is not what's holding the country back, he said.

Rather, Obama said, "what's stopped us is the failure of leadership, the smallness of our politics -- the ease with which we're distracted by the petty and trivial, our chronic avoidance of tough decisions, our preference for scoring cheap political points instead of rolling up our sleeves and building a working consensus to tackle the big problems of America.'"Long enough' to know better

The senator acknowledged that he hasn't been in Washington long, but said he is familiar enough with the city's political machinations to understand that change is in order.

"I recognize there is a certain presumptuousness in this -- a certain audacity -- to this announcement," Obama said. "I know that I haven't spent a lot of time learning the ways of Washington, but I've been there long enough to know that the ways of Washington must change. (Watch how name recognition may be Obama's best weapon)

He added, "People who love their country can change it."

Admitting the tactic is typical of aspiring candidates, Obama promised to overhaul a political system he says is dominated by lobbyists and special interest groups "who've turned our government into a game only they can afford to play."

"They write the checks and you get stuck with the bills, they get the access while you get to write a letter, they think they own this government, but we're here today to take it back. The time for that kind of politics is over," he said. "It's time to turn the page right here and right now."

Obama, the son of a black Kenyan father and white American mother, then invoked Lincoln again.

"He had his doubts. He had his defeats. He had his setbacks, but through his will and his words, he moved a nation and helped free a people."

Despite his brief tenure in the Senate, Obama has quickly gained popularity as he pondered his bid to break the Oval Office's color barrier.

According to a University of New Hampshire Survey Research Center conducted this month, Obama placed second, behind Sen. Hillary Clinton, among New Hampshire Democratic primary voters. Obama snared 21 percent of the vote in that popularity poll, trailing Clinton by 14 points. (Full story)

Other Democrats seeking the office include Sen. Joe Biden of Delaware; Sen. Chris Dodd of Connecticut; former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina; Ohio Rep. Dennis Kucinich; New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson; Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack and Sen. Clinton of New York.

While speculation abounds over whether a black presidential candidate can be viable, Obama -- whose first name comes from the Swahili word for "one who is blessed" -- has not let the color of skin hinder his career.

He attended Harvard and Columbia universities and was the first black president of the Harvard Law Review. He entered politics in Illinois, where he practiced civil rights law and taught at the University of Chicago Law School.

His first foray into politics came in 1997, when he took his seat in the state Senate, where he served until 2005. He was sworn in as a U.S. senator in 2005.

Obama Formally Joins '08 Presidential Race (GAN)

By Judy Keen

Gannett, February 10, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0130671

SPRINGFIELD, Ill. — With an appeal to his generation to "transform this nation," Illinois Sen. Barack Obama said Saturday that he's running for the Democratic presidential nomination.

Obama made his announcement outdoors in frigid temperatures to a cheering crowd at the Old State Capitol, where his hero Abraham Lincoln said in 1858 that "a house divided against itself cannot stand."

It was here during his tenure as a state senator, Obama said, "that I was reminded of the essential decency of the American people — where I came to believe that through this decency, we can build a more hopeful America."

Obama took the stage hatless to the U2 song City of Blinding Lights with his wife, Michelle, and daughters Malia, 8, and Sasha, 5. "I know it's a little chilly, but I'm fired up," he said.

Obama, 45, who has been a U.S. senator for two years and served seven years in the Illinois legislature, acknowledged his inexperience.

"I recognize there is a certain presumptuousness in this, a certain audacity to this announcement," he said. "I know I haven't spent a lot of time learning the ways of Washington. But I've been there long enough to know that the ways of Washington must change."

It is time, he said, to end "the failure of leadership, the smallness of our politics" and "take back" the government.

"The time for that politics is over. It is true. It's time to turn the page, right here and right now," he said.

Obama joins a growing roster of Democratic candidates that includes New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and John Edwards, the 2004 vice presidential nominee. Clinton made her first trip to New Hampshire in more than a decade Saturday. Obama will campaign in New Hampshire, host of the first primary election, on Monday.

From here, Obama heads to Iowa, where the nation's first caucuses will be held in less than a year. He is in third place there among Democratic voters, according to a Des Moines Register/American Research Group Poll taken last week (Jan. 29-Feb. 1). Clinton leads with 35%, followed by Edwards with 18%. Obama was the choice of 14%, up from 10% in December, the poll showed.

"Let us be the generation" to reshape the economy, end poverty, tackle the health care crisis and free America "from the tyranny of oil," Obama said. "Most of all, let's be the generation that never forgets what happened on that September day and confront the terrorists with everything we've got."

The campaign "can't only be about me," he said, but will succeed with "the power of millions of voices calling for change. By ourselves, this change will not happen. Divided, we are bound to fail."

The theme of Obama's speech reflected the title of his best-selling 2006 book, The Audacity of Hope. "It's humbling, but in my heart I know you didn't come here just for me," he said. "You came here because you believe in what this country can be.

"In the face of war, you believe there can be peace. In the face of despair, you believe there can be hope," he said. "In the face of a politics that's shut you out, that's told you to settle, that's divided us for too long, you believe we can be one people, reaching for what's possible, building that more perfect union."

Obama, the Senate's only African-American, traced his personal history as a $13,000-a-year community organizer in Chicago's black neighborhoods, civil-rights lawyer and professor of constitutional law. It was among Chicago's poor, he said, "that I received the best education I ever had, and where I learned the meaning of my Christian faith."

Every time the nation has faced great challenges, Obama said, "A new generation has risen up and done what's needed to be done. Today we are called once more — and it is time for our generation to answer that call. For that is our unyielding faith — that in the face of impossible odds, people who love their country can change it."

That's what Lincoln understood, he said. "He had his doubts. He had his defeats. He had his skeptics, he had his setbacks. But through his will and his words, he moved a nation and helped free a people."

"All of us know what those challenges are today — a war with no end, a dependence on oil that threatens our future, schools where too many children aren't learning, and families struggling paycheck to paycheck despite working as hard as they can," he said.

The obstacles to solutions to those problems, he said, stem from "our chronic avoidance of tough decisions, our preference for scoring cheap political points instead of rolling up our sleeves and building a working consensus to tackle big problems."

Without naming President Bush, he said that for the last six years Americans have been told the nation's debts don't matter, rising health care costs and stagnant wages are an illusion, climate change is a hoax "and that tough talk and an ill-conceived war can replace diplomacy, and strategy, and foresight.

"And when all else fails, when Katrina happens, or the death toll in Iraq mounts, we've been told that our crises are somebody else's fault. We're distracted from our real failures, and told to blame the other party, or gay people, or immigrants," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0130672

Obama has long opposed the war in Iraq and has proposed a phased withdrawal that would bring all U.S. troops home by March 31, 2008. "It's time to admit that no amount of American lives can resolve the political disagreement that lies at the heart of someone else's civil war," he said.

The temperatures were in the low teens as Obama spoke. That didn't matter to Lori Hammell, 45, a real estate agent from Springfield. "I said to my family, 'We live 20 minutes from history and we're going,' " she said as she gripped a rapidly cooling cup of coffee.

Her husband Howard, 51, a consultant and their 14-year-old twins, Ben and Emily, stood across the street from the historic capital. "I'm wearing two pairs of socks, four shirts, everything," she said.

Jeremy Smith, 29, a land surveyor from Springfield, thought about staying home and watching the announcement on TV, but decided he couldn't. "I'm here to watch history," he said.

Recalling A Natural (WP)

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

In law school, Barack drove an old mustard-yellow Toyota Tercel that was pockmarked with rust. It was the kind of car you would imagine a struggling community organizer driving. And while the car appeared to be on its last legs, it had a reliable engine that took him from Chicago to Cambridge without incident. Barack was attached to the car. Each time I saw the Tercel it reminded me of one of Barack's favorite songs growing up, William DeVaughn's "Be Thankful for What You Got," and I could hear him enthusiastically singing it:

Though you may not drive a great big Cadillac/ Gangsta whitewalls TV antennas in the back/ You may not have a car at all/ But remember , brothers and sisters/ You can still stand tall. . . .

One evening after dinner with a group of friends, those of us who rode with Barack came out of the restaurant to find his car missing. We immediately concluded that it had not been stolen, because who would want it other than Barack? After some scrutiny and the application of our finely honed analytical skills, we determined that the car had been towed. We used the handy phone number on the "No Parking" sign to find the impound lot. We arrived at the lot after midnight and found the car looking quite at home in a parking space bordering on the junkyard. A relieved Barack paid the fine -- $75, no joke for a poor law student -- and the car was recovered. We ribbed him that the fine was probably half the car's value, but he was content to have it back, flaws and all.

Barack's connection to the car symbolized in its own way his loyalty, his humility and, yes, his frugality. I've always believed that one of the appeals to him of joining the Harvard Law Review and becoming its first black president was that the position came with a parking space. I think the car finally gave out on him when he went back to Chicago after law school, but like any good community organizer, Barack had never given up on it.

-- Cassandra Butts, senior vice president for domestic policy at the Center for American Progress and Obama's Harvard Law School classmate

I was a basketball teammate of Barack's in high school. He was two grades ahead of me, the same class as my brother. I remember him as a charismatic guy who loved to play basketball. There were a number of courts on campus and if class schedules and time permitted, we would play pick-up ball when we could. He was a lefty with a great double pump shot in the lane. I remember him as a fierce competitor who could break intense situations (arguments over scores and fouls) with a flash of his smile and a voice of reason. Anyone who has ever played pick-up ball knows that such arguments are common. It's fair to say that Barack would never shy away from them but would somehow come out with his desired result. I did like to be on his team, even though he was not shy about shooting every time he touched the ball. I was a good rebounder. As a member of the varsity team, he was very encouraging to his fellow players and particularly to me. When we won the state tournament that year, all of us pick-up players felt justified, even though we were a little sweaty going to class.

-- Dan Hale was Obama's teammate on the championship 1979 basketball team at Punahou School in Hawaii. Hale is now the head coach of Punahou's Varsity I basketball team.

* * *

Barry (the name Barack used then) played a small forward, or "three man," in our system. I would define him as a "slasher," very good driving to the basket off the dribble. But with limited shooting range, although fairly accurate from 12 feet in. Very athletic, fast, good jumper. He had a long, lean body and was a very good defender. He was a starter who scored about 10 points and six or seven rebounds per game. We would put him on the best forward of the opposing team, regardless of their height. His athletic ability, jumping ability, etc., allowed him to guard bigger or smaller players. We pressed a lot and Barry was an integral part of the press with his quickness and speed.

Barry was the same in victory or defeat -- even-tempered. You could sense that the sport and competition were important, but once the season was over, it was time to focus again on academic issues.

DOJ_NMG_0130673

-- Mike Zinn, a basketball coach at Occidental College in Los Angeles when Obama was a student there in 1980-81.

* * *

On St. Patrick's Day in Chicago there are two parades: the one downtown, for the tourists, and the one in the 19th Ward, in the southwest corner of the city. That's the home of the real St. Patrick's Day Parade. More than 200,000 people show up and in 2000, when he was running against Bobby Rush in the Democratic congressional primary, Barack Obama marched in that parade. I remember he passed out a surprising piece of literature touting the important civil rights litigation he handled. On St. Patrick's Day, you don't hand out campaign literature to solicit law business. Perhaps that wasn't his intention, but his brochures were littering the sidewalks of the entire parade route, from 103rd Street to 115th. He was either very brash or naive in the way he was introducing himself to paradegoers. Whether he meant it or not, it came off as an attempt to sell that litigation background to an Irish Catholic crowd on the South Side of Chicago.

-- Patrick O'Malley, a Republican who served as an Illinois state senator from 1993 to 2003

* * *

